38 See Hunter, "Time Limits on Abortion," Reproductive Laws for the 1990's: A Briefing Handbook 106, 129 (N. Taub and S. Cohen, eds. 1988) (two main situations that give rise to abortions late in pregnancy are teenage pregnancy, since teenagers face greater impediments in obtaining the procedure than adults, and fetal anomalies, which are detected through amniocentesis possible only after approximately twenty weeks); Nsiah-Jefferson, "Reproduction Laws, Women of Color, and Low-Income Women," Reproduction Laws for the 1990's: A Briefing Handbook 23 (N. Taub and S. Cohen, eds. 1988). In some instances, late abortion is required because young women, fearful of adverse societal reaction and parental retribution, ignore their own pregnant conditions and fail to seek appropriate care. Removal of burdens on abortion helps these young women seek it at an earlier stage. Criminalization has the opposite effect.

39 See, e g., Brief for the State of Missouri, at 12-14.

A. There Is An Immutable Threshold Prior To Which A Fetus Cannot Survive Apart From A Pregnant Woman And Thus Is Biologically Inseparable From That Woman.

Certain biological facts of pregnancy are unalterable by technology. One is that only women can be pregnant. Another is that a "threshold" exists prior to which the fetus has no ability to survive outside the womb. The biological threshold marks the gestational age at which fetal organ systems—including the brain, the kidneys and the lungs—become sufficiently developed to maintain the physiological balance minimally required (even with artificial support as necessary) to sustain life outside the womb.[40] The threshold usually occurs at the twenty-third to twenty-fourth week of pregnancy. Prior to that time, the crucial organs are not sufficiently matured to provide the mutually sustaining functions that are prerequisite to extrauterine survival, or viability.

Today, "[n]eonates less than 24 weeks gestational age have close to a 0% survival rate." Moreover, it is well-documented that "no technology exists to bridge the development gap between the three-day embryo culture and the 24th week of gestation." Fetal Extrauterine Survivability, Report to the New York State Task Force on Life and Law 3, 10 (1988) (Task Force and its Committee on Fetal Extrauterine Survivability convened in March 1984 by the Governor of the State of New York).[41] It is thus no less true today than it was in 1973 that 40 Fetal Extrauterine Survivability, Report to the New York Task Force on Life and the Law (1988). See also Coulthard, Maturation of glomerular filtration in preterm and mature babies, 11 Early Human Development 281-85 (1985); Hallman, et al., Exogenous human surfactant for treatment of severe respiratory distress syndrome: a randomized prospective clinical, 106 J. Pediatry 963 (1985); K. Moore, The Developing Human 224 (1982).

41 "The increasing ability over the past decade to save progressively younger neonates is primarily due to the ability to support and assist, at an earlier age, the organs already present in the fetus. The developmental biology of the fetus, however, has not changed. After reviewing the development biology of several crucial fetal organs, including the brain, the kidneys, and the lungs, the Committee concluded that a point exists before which the fetal organs are too immature to function, even with the assistance of sophisti-

"before [the occurrence of the fixed biological threshold], the fetal organs, especially the lungs, are not sufficiently developed to permit extrauterine survival even with the most sophisticated technology currently available." Id. at 12.

Any speculation about technology capable of shifting the fetal survivability point to before the biological threshold is pure science fiction.[42] Indeed, basic scientific research has not even approached an understanding of the complex developmental process during the period prior to the threshold.[43] An understanding of fetal development during this period would be necessary before such technology could even be contemplated.[44] cated medical technology. This point in time is 23-24 weeks of gestation; prior to that time, fetal life cannot be maintained outside the womb." Fetal Extrauterine Survivability, supra, at 9.

---

42 "Public knowledge about the new reproductive technologies, particularly in vitro fertilization and embryo transfer, combined with advances in care for very premature newborns, have generated a false assumption that it may soon be possible to save virtually any fetus, regardless of gestational age." Fetal Extrauterine Survivability, supra, at 1.

43 During the progression of fetal development from the one cell fertilized egg to the point at which the fetus crosses the biological threshold, the cells of the fetus grow in both size and number. These cells begin to differentiate under the concerted control of numerous biological signal substances—including hormones and regulatory molecules—that are either produced by the fetus, the woman's organs, or the placenta. See J.R. Pasqualini and F. Kincl, Hormones and the Fetus (1985). These processes are not yet understood, and research concerning them has not passed the most basic stages. See, e.g., H. Hoshi, M. Kan and W.L. McKeehan, Direct Analysis of Growth Factor Requirements for Isolated Human Fetal Hepatocytes, 23 In Vitro Cell Developmental Biology 723-32 (1987); J.R. Bickenbach and K.A. Holbrook, Proliferation of Human Embryonic and Fetal Epidermal Cells in Organ Culture, 177 Am. J. Anat. 97-106 (1986); Moore and Walsh, Specific regulation of N-CAM/D2-CAM cell adhesion molecule during skeletal muscle development, 4 Embo. J. 623-30 (1980); Holmes, Morphological and physiological maturation of the brain in the neonate and young child, 3 J. Clin. Neurophysiology 207-38 (1986). Indeed, because we do not yet know the exact role pre-threshold survival technology would play, it is not even possible to describe the machines or other devices that would have to be developed—let alone their cost and availability.

44 Nor could such pre-threshold technology create a potential for life outside a womb prior to the threshold point. Throughout pregnancy, a

As far as existing and foreseeable technology is concerned, then, it is not at all the case that "[t]he Roe framework . . . is on a collision course with itself." Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416, 458 (1983) (O'Connor, J., dissenting). What is true is that "the safety of second-trimester abortions has increased dramatically" since 1973, extending the time before which no interest in maternal health can justify restrictions of abortion. Akron, 462 U.S. at 435-36. There is, however, no scientific or technological support for the proposition that the "point of viability" is moving "further back toward conception." Akron, 462 U.S. at 457 (O'Connor, J., dissenting). Indeed, "[i]n the foreseeable future, it is likely that technological advances in the care of newborns will enhance survival at each gestational age above 24 weeks, but will not lower the threshold for fetal extrauterine survival." Fetal Extrauterine Survivability, supra, at 12.[45] The test Roe enunciated for determining the point where the State's interests may arguably justify material restrictions on abortion, always subject to the pregnant woman's interest in life and health, remains just as tenable and workable a standard today as it was in 1973.

---

womb performs all bodily functions for the fetus. However, in the post-threshold period, there is a potential for fetal survival outside a womb because the fetus' organs are sufficiently developed to perform bodily functions. Post-threshold technology, unlike a womb, thus assists the fetus' own organs themselves to perform those bodily functions themselves. C.R. Austin and R.U. Short, Embryonic and Fetal Development 77 (1972). For example, even in the latter stages of pregnancy, oxygen is provided to the fetus by the placenta: the lungs of the fetus do not themselves "breathe". Yet once outside the womb, that same post-threshold fetus might be assisted by a respirator so that its lungs could start to breathe. In the pre-threshold period, however, there is no similar potential for fetal survival outside a womb because there are no functional fetal organs which would be able to perform bodily functions. At best, a pre-threshold technology, whatever it could be, could only simulate a womb by performing bodily functions for the fetus; such technology could never give the fetus the functional organs necessary to make possible extrauterine survival.

45 The "recent studies" cited by Justice O'Connor in her Akron dissent, 462 U.S. at 457 n.5, reach no different conclusion. See Law, Rethinking Sex and the Constitution, 132 U. Pa. L. Rev. 955, 1023 & n.245 (1984).

B. As Against A Woman's Constitutionally Protected Liberty To Terminate Her Pregnancy, A State May Not Constitutionally Assert That A Fetus Is, From The Moment Of Conception, A Person Having Legal Rights Competitive With Those Of The Woman Who Is Pregnant.

Several submissions in this case urge recognition of fetuses as "persons" bearing legally cognizable interests or rights by virtue of which the directly conflicting rights of a pregnant woman may be qualified or subordinated by state law.[46] There are, however, insuperable constitutional objections to the premise of fetal personhood as a ground for abrogating the fundamental liberties of pregnant women.

First, no compelling state interest in the fetus as a person, or as a "potential life," can exist beginning at conception. Throughout pregnancy, the fetus is physiologically united with the pregnant woman. Prior to the biological threshold, any life potential of the fetus is inextricably dependent on the woman to bring the fetus to a point where independent survival is possible. It is not possible to define an interest in a fetus distinct from the woman from whom it is thus biologically inseparable. To overturn the central holding of Roe would be tantamount to ruling that a pregnant woman may constitutionally be required to serve the State by carrying a fetus as a part of herself.[47] To reject Roe's holding is effectively to strip pregnant women of their own constitutionally shielded statuses as persons bearing rights against the State. No comparable coerced agency of the body has ever been demanded of people under our Constitution, much less tolerated when imposed in a form to which only a particular class of persons—women—can possibly ever be exposed.[48] For women whose own decision is not to carry the fetus, there is no justification for the type of subordination of body to State that a reversal of Roe v. Wade would entail.

46 See, e.g., Brief of Right to Life Advocates, Inc., at 22-26; Brief of the Knights of Columbus at 8-21.

47 "[A] just society cannot commandeer [a] woman in this inchoate interest." Hirshman, Bronte, Bloom, and Bork: An Essay on the Moral Education of Judges, 137 U. Pa. L. Rev. 177, 224 (1988).

48 Cf. Regan, Rewriting Roe v. Wade, 77 Mich. L. Rev. 1569 (1979).

Second, since a fetus cannot from the moment of conception be held in any objective, biological sense to be a person separate from the pregnant woman herself, to base restrictions of abortion upon a premise of fetal personhood is to subordinate fundamental constitutional liberties to a majoritarian will regarding what must, therefore, be understood as matters of morality and conscience. But, as this Court held in Roe, legislative sides-taking on such deeply contested, philosophical and moral questions as those involving the onset, nature, and status of fetal life, cannot possibly justify infringement of fundamental personal liberties, including a woman's right to choose whether she will bear a child. 410 U.S. at 159-62. The root idea of limited, constitutional government is that such essentially contested, divisive, and speculative matters as the moral or metaphysical status of fetuses from the moment of conception are not to be mandatorily resolved for us all, at the cost of fundamental liberties of personal self-direction, by "accommodation" among any number of "factions" in a "political process."[49]

It would directly contradict the most basic, anti-authoritarian premise of the constitutional rights of personal privacy and procreational choice to permit specific exercises of those rights to be subordinated to the controversial, moral dictates of a majority or powerful minority. See Abele v. Markle, 351 F. Supp. 224, 230 (D. Conn. 1972) (Newman, D.J.) ("No decision of the Supreme Court has ever permitted anyone's constitutional right to be directly abridged to protect a state interest which is subject to such a variety of personal judgements.")[50]

49 As, for example, the United States would have them resolved. Brief for the United States at 21.

50 "The premise of these decisions [in Barnett, supra, Griswold, supra, and Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962)], and of the Bill of Rights itself, is that in the long run, patriotism, religion, and family life will flourish better in an environment of individual freedom if state regimentation of thought is prohibited. The same premise leads to the conclusion that a woman's right to decide whether to have an abortion cannot be completely abridged by a state statute imposing upon her [a state-dictated] uniformity of thought about the nature of a fetus. . . ." Abele v. Markle, supra, 351 F. Supp. at 231.

By rejecting fetal personhood as a legitimate basis for state abrogation of procreational freedom, the Court in Roe did not presume to resolve for the country that a person does not exist prior to birth.[51] Roe rather held that no agency of government—including this Court—is empowered to base an infringement of fundamental freedoms upon its purported resolution either way of such a popularly divisive and contested moral question; specifically, that Texas could not "by adopting one theory of life . . . override the rights of the pregnant woman that are at stake." Roe at 162.

C. Restricting A Woman's Right To Procreative Choice Is Not A Constitutionally Acceptable Means For Fostering A General Societal Regard For Human Life.

As opposed to asserting an interest in fetal personhood dependent upon one theory of life, a State may seek to justify restrictions on abortions on grounds that it seeks to avoid corrosive effects on society's regard for human life in general.

Amici wholeheartedly endorse the goal of advancing societal regard for human life as a proper and commendable objective for state policy. There are, however, many less restrictive, noncoercive ways of pursuing this goal, which States must use rather than violate the fundamental liberties of pregnant women. States can act more aggressively than has been their past practice to ensure that women do not become pregnant as a consequence of involuntary sexual relations; to make accurate and sensitive contraceptive counseling available to women and girls who would welcome and act upon it;[52] and to enhance 51 As charged, e.g., by Brief for Right to Life Advocates, Inc., at 3.

52 Though major strides towards effective family planning as a national policy were accomplished between 1965 and 1982, resulting in dramatic drops in unwanted pregnancy and infant mortality rates, public support for family planning services has been reduced since 1982. L. Schorr, Within Our Reach: Breaking the Cycle of Disadvantage 39-40 (1988). Consequences of these cutbacks include the closing of 43 family planning outreach offices and the termination of all family life education services, including those in schools, in Minnesota in 1982; and the virtual elimination of teenage sex education and family planning assistance in Utah in 1984. R. Sidel, Women and Children Last: The Plight of Poor Women in Affluent America, 140-41 (1986).

health education and medical care for all women so as to reduce the number of pregnancies that must be terminated for the sake of maternal health or life.[53] Finally, States may encourage decisions in favor of childbirth by providing assurance of adequate support to protect the lives of born children against starvation and malnutrition, exposure and disease, and violence and abuse; and to offset the anticipated financial and emotional burdens of adding children, including those expected to have special needs, to life situations that may already be strained to the limit.

By such means, States may encourage a regard for human life in the particular context of child-bearing by modeling such a regard in their own treatment of women who bear children and of the children they bear. Simply prohibiting abortion, or surrounding it with onerous restrictions, conveys a quite different, and indeed outrageous, message. The message then is that the State accords more value to fetal potential for life than it does to the actual lives of countless women, or even to the actual lives of the children whom the state would have those fetuses become.

53 More than eight hundred thousand pregnant women annually do not receive prenatal care during the first trimester of their pregnancies, and the percentage of women receiving timely prenatal care has dropped since 1980. L. Schorr, Within Our Reach: Breaking the Cycle of Disadvantage 68-69 (1988). In 1985, the United States had the nineteenth lowest infant mortality rate in the world, placing it behind such less affluent countries as Finland, Spain and Singapore. When considered separately, the black infant mortality rate in the United States was the twenty-eighth lowest worldwide. A Children's Defense Budget FY 1989: An Analysis of Our Nation's Investment in Children 63 (1988).

The lack of prenatal and general health care that results from poverty creates serious health problems during pregnancy for many poor women and, disproportionately, women of color. R. Sidel, Women and Children Last: The Plight of Poor Women in Affluent America 137 (1986). Nsiah-Jefferson, "Reproductive Laws, Women of Color and Low-Income Women", in Reproductive Laws for the 1990's: A Briefing Handbook 25-26 (N. Taub and S. Cohen, eds., 1988).

CONCLUSION

Decisions of this Court have recognized that the constitutional right of privacy stands as a barrier against laws that deny individuals the ability to make the most fundamental choices affecting the totality of their values and lives. A woman's freedom of procreative choice occupies a high place in that firmament of precedent, and in this Court's jurisprudence of equality. Roe v. Wade is solidly based in the Constitution and sets forth a workable standard of adjudication—not at war with itself—accurately reflecting the privacy interests of women and the biological realities of pregnancy. It should be reaffirmed.

Respectfully submitted,

/s/ NORMAN REDLICH*

FRANK I. MICHELMAN
1525 Massachusetts Avenue
Cambridge, Massachusetts 02138
(617) 495-4628

DENISE CARTY-BENNIA
400 Huntington Avenue
Boston, Massachusetts 02115
(617) 437-3301

NORMAN REDLICH
STEPHEN R. NEUWIRTH
Wachtell, Lipton, Rosen & Katz
299 Park Avenue
New York, New York 10171
(212) 371-9200

Attorneys for a Group of American Law Professors as Amicus Curiae

March 30, 1989

*Counsel of Record

APPENDIX

AMICI CURIAE
AD HOC GROUP OF LAW PROFESSORS*

(* Institutional names have been used for identification purposes only.)

Kathryn Abrams, Boston University
Bruce Ackerman, Yale University
Cynthia Matson Adams, Indiana University at Indianapolis
Harold I. Abramson, Tuoro College
Lee A. Albert, State University of New York at Buffalo
T. Alexander Aleinikoff, University of Michigan
Alice Alexander, Northeastern University
Alexis Anderson, Boston College
Gregory S. Alexander, Cornell University
Susan Grossman Alexander, Northwestern University
William P. Alford, University of California at Los Angeles
Anita L. Allen, Georgetown University
Edward Allen, District of Columbia
Scott Altman, University of Southern California
Alison Anderson, University of California at Los Angeles
Terence J. Anderson, University of Miami
William L. Andreen, University of Alabama
Arthur W. Andrews, University of Arizona
Marina Angel, Temple University
Fran Ansley, University of Tennessee
John S. Applegate, University of Cincinnati
Susan Frelich Appleton, Washington University of St. Louis
Peter Arenella, University of California at Los Angeles
Jennifer Arlen, Emory University
Robert H. Aronson, University of Washington at Seattle
Dennis Wayne Arrow, Oklahoma City University
Donna E. Arzt, Syracuse University
Gerald G. Ashdown, West Virginia University
Marie Ashe, West Virginia University
Michael Asimov, University of California at Los Angeles
Frank Askin, Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, Newark
Barbara Ann Atwood, University of Arizona
Barbara Allen Babcock, Stanford University

James P. Bailinson, University of Chicago
Brook K. Baker, Northeastern University
C. Edwin Baker, University of Pennsylvania
Joan E. Baker, Cleveland State University
David C. Baldus, University of Iowa
Milner S. Ball, University of Georgia
Susan A. Bandes, DePaul University
Taunya Lovell Banks, University of Tulsa
William C. Banks, Syracuse University
Mark Barenberg, Columbia University
Jayne W. Barnard, College of William and Mary
Stephen R. Barnett, University of California at Berkeley
Elizabeth Bartholet, Harvard University
Katherine T. Bartlett, Duke University
Babette B. Barton, University of California at Berkeley
James B. Baskey, Seton Hall University
Robert M. Bastress, West Virginia University
Jon Bauer, University of Connecticut
Loftus E. Becker, Jr., University of Connecticut
Mary E. Becker, University of Chicago
Vicki Been, Rutgers, State University of New Jersey
Stephen F. Befort, University of Minnesota
Derrick A. Bell, Jr., Harvard University
Peter A. Bell, Syracuse University
Edmund O. Belsheim, Lewis and Clark
Robert Belton, Vanderbilt University
Terence H. Benbow, University of Bridgeport
Leslie Bender, Syracuse University
Susan D. Bennett, American University
Robert W. Benson, Loyola University of Los Angeles
Vivian Berger, Columbia University
Thomas F. Bergin, University of Virginia
Donald H. Berman, Northeastern University
Arthur L. Berney, Boston College
Herbert N. Bernhardt, University of Baltimore
Mary Lu Bilek, City University of New York
David A. Binder, University of California at Los Angeles
Dennis E. Bires, University of Tulsa
Barbara Black, Pace University

Catherine E. Blackburn, University of Louisville
Sandra L. Blackstone, University of Denver
Chris Blair, University of Tulsa
Beryl Blaustone, City University of New York
Ira Mark Bloom, Union University
Robert M. Bloom, Boston College
Grace Ganz Blumberg, University of California at Los Angeles
Theodore Y. Blumoff, Mercer University
Ivan E. Bodensteiner, Valparaiso University
Robert A. Bohrer, California Western
Richard C. Boldt, City University of New York
Charles D. Booth, University of Hawaii
Cynthia G. Bowman, Northwestern University
William E. Boyd, University of Arizona
Francis A. Boyle, University of Illinois
James Boyle, American University
Linda Willett Brackins, Southwestern University
Carolyn S. Bratt, University of Kentucky
Jean Braucher, University of Cincinnati
Daan Braveman, Syracuse University
Richard F. Breen, Jr., Willamette University
Michael Brennan, University of Southern California
Barbara B. Bressler, DePaul University
William J. Bridge, Southern Methodist University
Paul H. Brietzke, Valparaiso University
Ralph L. Brill, Illinois Institute of Technology
John C. Brittain, University of Connecticut
Katherine S. Broderick, District of Columbia
Mark S. Brodin, Boston College
James Brook, New York Law
Alexander D. Brooks, Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, Newark
Jennifer Brooks, William Mitchell College
Judith Olans Brown, Northeastern University
Karen B. Brown, Brooklyn College
Ralph S. Brown, Yale University
Wendy Brown, City University of New York
Alan E. Brownstein, University of California at Davis
Carol S. Bruch, University of California at Davis

Patricia L. Bryon, University of North Carolina
Susan Bryant, City University of New York
Taimie L. Bryant, University of California at Los Angeles
Thomas D. Buckley, Cleveland State University
Pamela H. Bucy, University of Alabama
Bari R. Burke, University of Montana
William T. Burke, University of Washington at Seattle
Ann M. Burkhart, University of Minnesota
John M. Burkhoff, University of Pittsburgh
Barbara A. Burnett, Syracuse University
Haywood Burns, City University of New York
Michael M. Burns, Nova University
Claudia Burton, Willamette University
Larry Bush, University of Mississippi
Carole Butler, Capital University
Richard M. Buxbaum, University of California at Berkeley
Patricia A. Cain, University of Texas
Paulette M. Caldwell, New York University
Janet M. Calvo, City University of New York
Angela Campbell, Georgetown University
Arthur W. Campbell, California Western
Vincent P. Cardi, West Virginia University
M. Susan Carlson, Washington University of St. Louis
Jay E. Carlisle, Pace University
Charles N. Carnes, University of Arkansas
Susan E. Carpenter, City University of New York
Cindy Alberts Carson, Whittier College
Leonard L. Cavise, DePaul University
Mario A. Ceresa, Detroit College
Eugene Cerruti, New York Law
Leah F. Chanin, Mercer University
Oscar G. Chase, New York University
Erwin Chemerinsky, University of Southern California
Ronald Chen, Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, Newark
Paul G. Chevigny, New York University
Carol Chomsky, University of Minnesota
Thomas G.S. Christensen, New York University
Gordon A. Christenson, University of Cincinnati
Richard H. Chused, Georgetown University

Elizabeth B. Clark, Yeshiva University
Leroy D. Clark, Catholic University
Robert Emmet Clark, University of Arizona
Roger S. Clark, Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, Camden
Robert N. Clinton, University of Iowa
David M. Cobin, Hamline University
Amy B. Cohen, Western New England College
Marsha N. Cohen, University of California at Hastings
Douglas L. Colbert, Hofstra University
Liz Ryan Cole, Vermont Law
Robert H. Cole, University of California at Berkeley
Phyllis Coleman, Nova University
Mary I. Coombs, University of Miami
Corinne Cooper, University of Missouri at Kansas City
Rhonda Copelon, City University of New York
Jan C. Costello, Loyola University of Los Angeles
Glenn E. Coven, Jr., College of William and Mary Barbara J. Cox, California Western Marion Crain, West Virginia University
Joseph Crea, Brooklyn College
Kimberle Crenshaw, University of California at Los Angeles
Earl M. Curry, Jr., Cleveland State University
Dennis Curtis, Yale University
Karen Czapanskiy, University of Maryland
Clare Dalton, Northeastern University
Anthony D'Amato, Northwestern University
Perry Dane, Yale University
Wes Daniels, University of Miami
Deryl D. Dantzler, Mercer University
Nancy Dart, University of Connecticut
Kenneth Dau-Schmidt, University of Cincinnati
John H. Davidson, University of South Dakota
Michael H. Davis, Cleveland State University
Peggy C. Davis, New York University
Samuel M. Davis, University of Georgia
Drew Days, III, Yale University
Cathryn V. Deal, Hamline University
Mary E. Dean, William Mitchell College

Diane E. De Geiso, Western New England College
Luis Jorge DeGraffe, City University of New York
Sandra L. DeGraw, South Texas
Walter E. Dellinger, III, Duke University
Joan Denvir, University of San Francisco
Rodolphe J.A. de Seife, Illinois Institute of Technology
Michael D. DeVito, Golden Gate University
Martha Bakos Dietz, Brooklyn College
Judy Dimes-Smith, Howard University
Robert Dinerstein, American University
Victoria J. Dodd, Suffolk University
Patricia Ann Dolan, William Mitchell College
Dolores A. Donovan, University of San Francisco
Patricia Dore, Florida State University
Norman Dorsen, New York University
James Douglas, Texas Southern University
David R. Dow, University of Houston
John N. Drobak, Washington University of St. Louis
Mary L. Dudziak, University of Iowa
Alice K. Dueker, New York University
Steven Duke, Yale University
William V. Dunlap, University of Bridgeport
Mary C. Dunlop, Stanford University
Donald J. Dunn, Western New England College
Melvyn R. Durchslag, Case Western Reserve University
Christopher F. Edley, Jr., Harvard University
John D. Egnal, Western New England College
Charles A. Ehren, Jr., Valparaiso University
Nancy S. Ehrenreich, University of Denver
Scott B. Ehrlich, California Western Theodore Eisenberg, Cornell University
David A. Elder, Salmon P. Chase College
Jane W. Ellis, University of Washington at Seattle
Robert L. Ellis, Indiana University at Indianapolis
Richard A. Ellison, Syracuse University
Thomas I. Emerson, Yale University
C. Peter Erlinder, William Mitchell College
Leslie G. Espinoza, University of Arizona
Susan Estrich, Harvard University

Debra Evenson, DePaul University
Charles Patrick Ewing, State University of New York at Buffalo
David L. Faigman, University of California, San Francisco
Elizabeth Fajans, Brooklyn College
John Farago, City University of New York
Daniel A. Farber, University of Minnesota
Cynthia R. Farina, Cornell University
Stephanie T. Farrior, New York University
Katherine Hunt Federle, University of Hawaii
Neal Feigenson, University of Bridgeport
Joel Feinberg, University of Arizona
Jay M. Feinman, Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, Camden
Linda B. Feldman, Brooklyn College
Jose L. Fernandez, Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, Camden
Mary Ferrari, University of Bridgeport
Nan E. Feyler, City University of New York
Charles L. Field, Northeastern University
Ted J. Fiflis, University of Colorado
Stuart J. Filler, University of Bridgeport
Janet E. Findlater, Wayne State University
Nancy H. Fink, Brooklyn College
Lucinda M. Finley, State University of New York
David B. Firestone, Vermont Law
Edwin B. Firmage, University of Utah
Harry First, New York University
Richard Michael Fischl, University of Miami
William W. Fisher III, Harvard University
James J. Fishman, Pace University
Harry M. Fletcher, University of Pittsburgh
William A. Fletcher, University of California at Berkeley
W. Garrett Flickinger, University of New Mexico
Alyson C. Flournoy, University of Florida
Robert Force, Tulane University
Caroline A. Forell, University of Oregon
G.W. Foster, Jr., University of Wisconsin
Eleanor M. Fox, New York University

Sanford J. Fox, Boston College
Gary L. Francione, University of Pennsylvania
Leslie Pickering Francis, University of Utah
Thomas M. Franck, New York University
Beatrice S. Frank, New York University
Sally Frank, New York University
Richard S. Frase, University of Minnesota
Daniel J. Freed, Yale University
Ann E. Freedman, Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, Camden
Eric M. Freedman, Hofstra University
Monroe H. Freedman, Hofstra University
Alan Freeman, State University of New York at Buffalo
Susan F. French, University of California at Davis
Eric T. Freyfogle, University of Illinois
James J. Friedberg, West Virginia University
Bruce E. Friedman, Franklin Pierce
Joel W. Friedman, Tulane University
Jennifer Friesen, Loyola University of Los Angeles
Lawrence A. Frolik, University of Pittsburgh
Gerald Frug, Harvard University
Mary Joe Frug, New England Law
Patricia Brumfield Fry, University of North Dakota
Sanford E. Gaines, University of Houston
Paul J. Galanti, Indiana University at Indianapolis
Glenn G. Galbreath, Cornell University
Mary Ellen Gale, Whittier College
Linda J. Gallant, William Mitchell College
Paula Galowitz, New York University
Robert Garcia, University of California at Los Angeles
Stephen W. Gard, Cleveland State University
Alan E. Garfield, Widener University
Helen Garfield, Indiana University at Indianapolis
Albert H. Garretson, New York University
Marsha Garrison, Brooklyn College
Judith A. Gaskell, DePaul University
Alphonso Gaskins, City University of New York
Therese E. Geiger, University of Dayton
Gregory Gelfand, University of Pittsburgh

Philip M. Genty, Brooklyn College
B.J. George, Jr., New York University
Lawrence C. George, Florida State University
Diane Geraghty, Loyola University of Chicago
Patty Gerstenblith, DePaul University
Steven G. Gey, Florida State University
Nancy S. Gibson, Northwestern University
M. Shinara Gilbert, City University of New York
Barbara J. Gilchrist, St. Louis University
Stephen Gillers, New York University
Michele Gilligan, University of Baltimore
Robert Girard, Stanford University
W. Dent Gitchel, University of Arkansas at Little Rock
Morton Gitelman, University of Arkansas at Fayetteville
Daniel J. Givelber, Northeastern University
Elliot Glicksman, Thomas M. Cooley
Howard A. Glickstein, Touro College
Dale Goble, University of Idaho
Thomas M. Goetzl, Golden Gate University
Dwight Golann, Suffolk University
Carole E. Goldberg-Ambrose, University of California at Los Angeles
Michael J. Goldberg, University of Washington at Seattle
Carol L. Golden, University of Bridgeport
Phyllis Goldfard, Boston College
Alvin L. Goldman, University of Kentucky
Greer S. Goldman, American University
Anne B. Goldstein, Western New England College
Robert D. Goldstein, University of California at Los Angeles
Victor M. Goode, City University of New York
C. Peter Goplerud, Southern Illinois University
Irving Gordon, Northwestern University
Robert A. Gorman, University of Pennsylvania
Kenneth S. Gould, University of Arkansas at Little Rock
Nathaniel E. Gozansky, Emory University
Kenneth W. Graham, Jr., University of California at Los Angeles
Louise Graham, University of Kentucky

J. Kirland Grant, Touro College
Alan S. Gratch, Loyola University of Chicago
Grayfred B. Gray, University of Tennessee
Emily R. Greenberg, University of Baltimore
Judith D. Greenberg, New England Law
Howard L. Greenberger, New York University
Michael M. Greenfield, Washington University of St. Louis
Thomas C. Grey, Stanford University
Ronald Charles Griffin, Washburn University
Trina Grillo, University of San Francisco
Samuel R. Gross, University of Michigan
George S. Grossman, Northwestern University
Egon Guttman, American University
Ronald M. Hager, State University of New York at Buffalo
David Hall, Northeastern University
Louise Halper, New York University
Celeste M. Hammond, Cleveland State University
Gwen Thayer Handelman, Washington and Lee
Joel F. Handler, University of California at Los Angeles
Richard S. Harnsberger, University of Nebraska
Sidney L. Harring, City University of New York
Leslie J. Harris, University of Oregon
Bernadette W. Hartfield, Georgia State University
Hendrick A. Hartog, University of Wisconsin
J. Denny Haythorn, Whittier College
Penny A. Hazelton, University of Washington at Seattle
Thomas Hazen, University of North Carolina
Douglas R. Heidenreich, William Mitchell College
Janice E. Henderson, City University of New York
Lynne Henderson, Cleveland State University
Louis Henkin, Columbia University
Edward D. Henneman, Washington and Lee
Anthony Herman, Florida State University
Lawrence Herman, Ohio State University
Susan N. Herman, Brooklyn College
Randy Hertz, New York University
David R. Herwitz, Harvard University
Steven J. Heyman, University of Colorado
Philip Heymann, Harvard University

Mark J. Heyrman, University of Chicago
Stephen C. Hicks, Suffolk University
Jack A. Hiller, Valparaiso University
Ingrid M. Hillinger, Boston College
Robert A. Hillman, Cornell University
Linda R. Hirshman, Illinois Institute of Technology
Reka P. Hoff, University of Arizona
Michael H. Hoffheimer, University of Mississippi
Peter T. Hoffman, University of Nebraska
S. Candice Hoke, University of Pittsburgh
Linda L. Holdeman, New York University
Joan Heifetz Hollinger, University of Detroit
Wallace E. Holohan, Northeastern University
Wythe W. Holt, Jr., West Virginia University
Sharon Hom, City University of New York
Ruth-Arlene W. Howe, Boston College
Tom Huff, University of Montana
Linda S. Hume, University of Washington at Seattle
Marcus Hurn, Franklin Pierce
Sheila K. Hyatt, University of Denver
Alan Hyde, Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, Newark
Jonathan M. Hyman, University of California at Los Angeles
Ellen Hyman-Browne, City University of New York
Louis A. Jacobs, Ohio State University
Steven D. Jamar, William Mitchell College
Eric S. Janus, William Mitchell College
M. Casey Jarman, University of Hawaii
Peter Jaszi, American University
Stewart M. Jay, University of Washington at Seattle
Richard W. Jennings, University of California at Berkeley
Mary Brandt Jensen, University of South Dakota
Sara L. Johnson, Illinois Institute of Technology
Beryl Jones, Brooklyn College
Cathy J. Jones, Western New England College
Christin L. Jones, William Mitchell College
Marvin Jones, University of Miami
Paul R. Joseph, Nova University
David K. Kadane, Hofstra University
James L. Kainen, University of Miami

Allen R. Kamp, Cleveland State University
Leo Kanowitz, University of California at Hastings
Diane S. Kaplan, Cleveland State University
Roberta S. Karmel, Brooklyn College
Kenneth L. Karst, University of California at Los Angeles
Katheryn D. Katz, Union University
Lewis R. Katz, Case Western University
Eileen Kaufman, Touro College
Herma Hill Kay, University of California at Berkeley
Caroline Kearney, Brooklyn College
Robert B. Keiter, University of Wyoming
Mark Kelman, Stanford University
R. Randall Kelso, South Texas College
David W. Kennedy, Harvard University
Duncan M. Kennedy, Harvard University
Randall L. Kennedy, Harvard University
Dinesh Khosla, City University of New York
Judith E. Kincaid, North Carolina Central University
Arthur Kinoy, Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, Newark
Philip C. Kissam, University of Kansas
Karl E. Klare, Northeastern University
Richard Klein, Touro College
Thomas Kleven, Texas Southern University
Charles L. Knapp, New York University
Lois H. Knight, Boston University
W.H. Knight, University of Iowa
Laurence W. Knowles, University of Louisville
Daniel T. Kobil, Capital University
Bonnie L. Koneski-White, Western New England College
Susan P. Koniak, University of Pittsburgh
Stanley Koppelman, Boston University
Lewis A. Kornhauser, New York University
Minna J. Kotkin, Brooklyn College
Susan D. Kovac, University of Tennessee
Reinier H. Kraakman, Harvard University
Joan M. Krauskopf, Ohio State University
Gene Krauss, Northern Kentucky University
Sheila James Kuehl, Loyola University of Los Angeles

Bailey Kuklin, Brooklyn College
Christina L. Kunz, William Mitchell College
Lewis Kurlantzick, University of Connecticut
James A. Kushner, Southwestern University
Stephen Kuttner, University of California at Berkeley
Linda Lacey, University of Tulsa
Renee M. Landers, Boston College
Arthur R. Landever, Cleveland State University
Sarah Landis, Suffolk University
Geoffrey J. Lanning, Wayne State University
William P. LaPiana, New York Law
E. Richard Larson, New York University
John W. Larson, Florida State University
Sylvia A. Law, New York University
Charles R. Lawrence, III, Stanford University
Stephen R. Lazarus, Cleveland State University
Susan M. Leeson, Willamette University
George Lefcoe, University of Southern California
Arthur S. Leonard, New York Law
David P. Leonard, Indiana University
Howard Lesnick, University of Pennsylvania
Hester Lessard, Columbia University
Leon Letwin, University of California at Los Angeles
John Leubsddorf, Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, Newark
Daniel Levin, University of Chicago
David I. Levine, University of California at Hastings
Sanford Levinson, University of Texas
Herman M. Levy, Santa Clara University
John Levy, College of William and Mary
Jeff L. Lewin, West Virginia University
Barbara B. Lewis, University of Louisville
D. Craig Lewis, University of Idaho
Cynthia C. Lichtenstein, Boston College
Carol B. Liebman, Boston College
Lance M. Liebman, Harvard University
Peter Linzer, University of Houston
Robert J. Lipkin, Widener University
Edward J. Littlejohn, Wayne State University

Christine A. Littleton, University of California at Los Angeles
Jules Lobel, University of Pittsburgh
Bert B. Lockwood, Jr., University of Cincinnati
Stephen Loffredo, City University of New York
Pierre R. Loiseaux, University of California at Davis
Richard G. Lonsdorf, University of Pennsylvania
Susan E. Looper-Friedman, Capital University
Gerald P. Lopez, Stanford University
Lynn M. Lopucki, University of Wisconsin
Nathan S. Lord, University of Louisville
Louis Loss, Harvard University
Jean Love, University of California at Davis
Daniel H. Lowenstein, University of California at Los Angeles
Gary Tobins Lowenthal, Arizona State University
Kristen Luker, University of California at Berkeley
Gerard E. Lynch, Columbia University
David Lyons, Cornell University
H.C. Macgill, University of Connecticut
Thomas J. Mack, District of Columbia
M. Stuart Madden, Pace University
Debra J. Madsen, University of Wyoming
Holly Maguigan, New York University
Catherine Mahern, Texas Southern University
Joan Mahoney, University of Missouri at Kansas City
Linda A. Malone, College of William and Mary
Karl M. Manheim, Loyola University of Los Angeles
Bruce H. Mann, University of Pennsylvania
Deborah Maranville, University of Puget Sound
Isabel Marcos, State University of New York at Buffalo
Elizabeth Phillips Marsh, University of Bridgeport
William E. Marsh, Indiana University at Indianapolis
Michael R. Masinter, Nova University
Calvin R. Massey, University of California at Hastings
M. Minnette Massey, University of Miami
Mari J. Matsuda, University of Hawaii
Barbara Taylor Mattis, Southern Illinois University
Judith L. Maute, University of Oklahoma

Nancy G. Maxwell, Washburn University
Christopher N. May, Loyola University of Los Angeles
Therese H. Maynard, Loyola University of Los Angeles
Thomas W. Mayo, Southern Methodist University
Kamilla M. Mazanec, Northern Kentucky University
Dorothy McCarrick, City University of New York
Mary McCarthy, Yale University
Sabrina A. McCarthy, Tulane University
Marjorie A. McDiarmid, West Virginia University
Julian B. McDonnell, University of Georgia
Banks McDowell, Washburn University
Henry W. McGee, Jr., University of California at Los Angeles
Lucy S. McGough, Louisiana State University
Robert B. McKay, New York University
Judith McKelvey, Golden Gate University
Mary Brigid McManamon, University of Florida
Catherine Mealey, University of Wyoming
David Medine, University of Maryland
Alan Meisel, University of Pittsburgh
Michael Meltsner, Northeastern University
Miguel Angel Mendez, Stanford University
Saul Mendlovitz, Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, Newark
Carrie J. Menkel-Meadow, University of California at Los Angeles
Elizabeth Mensch, State University of New York at Buffalo
Samuel Merwin, University of Wisconsin
Roy M. Mersky, University of Texas
Vanessa Merton, City University of New York
Howard R. Messing, Nova University
Cheryl A. Meyer, City University of New York
Carlin Meyer, New York Law
Kristian Miccio, City University of New York
Vicki Michel, Loyola University of Los Angeles
Miriam T. Miller, Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, Newark
Elliott S. Milstein, American University
Gary Minda, Brooklyn College

Joanne Mineri, Cornell University
Leslie A. Minkus, Golden Gate University
Martha Minow, Harvard University
Edward R. Mitnick, Western New England College
Ralph James Mooney, University of Oregon
Albert Moore, University of California at Los Angeles
Beverly I. Moran, University of Cincinnati
Rachel Moran, University of California at Berkeley
Nancy Morawetz, New York University
Martha I. Morgan, University of Alabama
John K. Morris, University of Utah
Robin A. Morris, University of the Pacific
Mary Jane Morrison, Hamline University
Linda Morton, University of Florida
Mary Helen Moses, Union University
Seymour Moskowitz, Valparaiso University
Frank Motley, Indiana University
Suzanne E. Mounts, University of San Francisco
Sean Murray, University of Dayton
Michael B. Mushlin, Pace University
Ellen Musinsky, Franklin Pierce
James A. R. Nafziger, Willamette University
Dale Nance, Northern Illinois University
Subha Narasimhan, Columbia University
Philip T. Nash, City University of New York
Eric Neisser, Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, Newark
Gerald L. Neuman, University of Pennsylvania
Richard K. Neumann, Hofstra University
Michael Newson, Howard University
Nathaniel C. Nichols, Widener University
Steve H. Nickles, University of Minnesota
Harold Norris, Detroit College
Richard L. North, University of Maryland
James Noughteling, Boston College
Richard H. Nowka, University of Louisville
Michelle Oberman, Loyola University of Chicago
Mary E. O'Connell, Northeastern University
James M. O'Fallon, University of Oregon

J. P. Ogilvy, Texas Southern University
Charles Ogletree, Harvard University
Edward D. Ohlbaum, Temple University
Marcia O'Kelley, University of North Dakota
Oliver Oldman, Harvard University
Anne O'Leary, Western New England College
R. Nils Olsen, Jr., State University of New York at Buffalo
Paul O'Neil, City University of New York
Helene Opocensky, Western New England College
David Benjamin Oppenheimer, University of San Francisco
Richard L. Ottinger, Pace University
Anthony Palasota, Texas Southern University
Wendy Parmet, Northeastern University
Jeffrey A. Parness, Northern Illinois University
Jan Powell Patterson, University of Texas
Joel Richard Paul, American University
Jordan J. Paust, University of Houston
John Payne, Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, Newark
Michael L. Perlin, New York Law
Rudolph J. Perlitz, New York Law
James M. Phemister, Washington and Lee
Zygmunt J.B. Plater, Boston College
Joy H. Plunket, Northeastern University
Dan Pochoda, City University of New York
Nancy D. Polikoff, American University
Sandra J. Polin, University of Toledo
Daniel H. Pollitt, University of North Carolina
James Pope, Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, Newark
Robert C. Post, University of California at Berkeley
W. Marshall Prettyman, Seton Hall University
Dee Pridgen, University of Wyoming
George W. Pring, University of Denver
John Quigley, Ohio State University
Suzanne Rabe, University of Arizona
Mary F. Radford, Georgia State University
Noel Ragsdale, University of Southern California
Todd D. Rakoff, Harvard University

Sarah H. Ramsey, Syracuse University
J. Mark Ramseyer, University of California at Los Angeles
Walter B. Raushenbush, University of Wisconsin
Louis S. Raveson, Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, Newark
Mary Barnard Ray, University of Wisconsin
Eldon H. Reiley, University of San Francisco
Stephen C. Rench, University of Denver
Edwin Render, University of Louisville
Doug Rendleman, Washington and Lee
Judith Resnik, University of Southern California
C. Nicholas Revelos, Detroit College
Sheila Reynolds, Washburn University
Nancy Rhoden, University of North Carolina
Paul R. Rice, American University
J. Thomas Richardson, University of Puget Sound
William Rich, Washburn University
Leonard L. Riskin, University of Missouri at Columbia
Judith L. Ritler, Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, Newark
Rhonda R. Rivera, Ohio State University
Ira P. Robbins, American University
Lauren Robel, Indiana University
Toni Robinson, University of Bridgeport
Ruth Roemer, University of California at Los Angeles
Celina Romany, City University of New York
Richard A. Rosen, University of North Carolina
Irene Merker Rosenberg, University of Houston
Joshua D. Rosenberg, University of San Francisco
Yale L. Rosenberg, University of Houston
Rand E. Rosenblatt, Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, Camden
Michel Rosenfeld, Yeshiva University
Susan Deller Ross, Georgetown University
Merrick Rossein, City University of New York
Laura F. Rothstein, University of Houston
Mark A. Rothstein, University of Houston
Patricia E. Rousseau, University of Dayton
James V. Rowan, Northeastern University

Thomas D. Rowe, Duke University
Edward L. Rubin, University of California at Berkeley
David Rudenstine, Yeshiva University
David Rudovsky, University of Pennsylvania
David S. Rudstein, Illinois Institute of Technology
Jane Rutherford, DePaul University
Anne Rutledge, University of Florida
Laura Sager, New York University
Barbara C. Salken, Pace University
Joyce Saltalamachia, New York Law
Alan Saltzman, University of Detroit
Rob Saltzman, University of Southern California
Elizabeth J. Samuels, University of Baltimore
Pamela Samuelson, University of Pittsburgh
Verna Sanchez, New York University
Frank E. A. Sander, Harvard University
Carol Sanger, Santa Clara University
Lewis D. Sargentich, Harvard University
Thomas O. Sargentich, American University
Ann C. Scales, University of New Mexico
Cornelius J. Scanlon, University of Connecticut
Jane L. Scarborough, Northeastern University
Peter C. Schanck, University of Kansas
George Schatzki, University of Connecticut
Douglas D. Scherer, Touro College
Lawrence Schlam, Northern Illinois University
John Henry Schlegel, State University of New York at Buffalo
Lorraine Schmall, Wake Forest University
Stephen J. Schnably, University of Miami
Elizabeth Schneider, Brooklyn College
Ronna G. Schneider, University of Cincinnati
Stephen J. Schulhofer, University of Chicago
Vicki Schultz, University of Wisconsin
Stewart Schwab, Cornell University
Herman Schwartz, American University
Louis B. Schwartz, University of California at Hastings
Martin A. Schwartz, Touro College
Marjorie Anne Sciulli, Widener University

Bettie Scott, City University of New York
Robert A. Sedler, Wayne State University
Bernard L. Segal, Golden Gate University
Robert Seibel, Cornell University
Mark Seidenfeld, Florida State University
Carl M. Selinger, West Virginia University
Ann Shalleck, American University
Peter M. Shane, University of Iowa
Stephen J. Shapiro, University of Baltimore
Sally Burnett Sharp, University of North Carolina
Daniel Shaviro, University of Chicago
Michael R. Sheldon, University of Connecticut
Robert E. Shepherd, Jr., University of Richmond
Annamay Sheppard, Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, Newark
Francine Sherman, Boston College
Jeffrey G. Sherman, Illinois Institute of Technology
Suzanna Sherry, University of Minnesota
Richard K. Sherwin, New York Law
Steven H. Shiffrin, Cornell University
Barbara S. Shulman, Northwestern University
Daniel W. Shuman, Southern Methodist University
Belinda Sifford, City University of New York
Marjorie A. Silver, New York Law
Andrew Silverman, University of Arizona
Jane B. Silverman, University of Arizona
Ronald Silverman, Hofstra University
Eileen Silverstein, University of Connecticut
Jana B. Singer, University of Maryland
Joseph W. Singer, Boston University
Norman J. Singer, University of Alabama
Eric S. Sirulnik, George Washington University
Patricia Ann Siuta, Georgia State University
Frank F. Skillern, Texas Tech. University
Jerome H. Skolnick, University of California at Berkeley
David Slawson, University of Southern California
Abbe Smith, City University of New York
Bea Ann Smith, University of Texas
Jeffrey A. Smith, Northeastern University

Joseph F. Smith, Nova University
Rip Smith, University of Southern California
Robert H. Smith, Boston College
J. Eric Smithburn, Notre Dame University
John Rockwell Snowden, University of Nebraska
Lloyd B. Snyder, Cleveland State University
Aviam Soifer, Boston University
Naira B. Soifer, University of Maine
Frances Cappelletti Solari, North Carolina Central University
Elizabeth K. Spahn, New England Law
Larry R. Spain, University of North Dakota
Giradeau A. Spann, Georgetown University
Mark Spiegel, Boston College
Mark Squillace, University of Wyoming
Elizabeth St. Clair, City University of New York
Barbara Stark, Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, Newark
Norman Stein, University of Alabama
Ralph Michael Stein, Pace University
Henry Steiner, Harvard University
Robert Steinfeld, State University of New York at Buffalo
Joan Steinman, Illinois Institute of Technology
Jeffrey W. Stempel, Brooklyn College
Nancy Sterns, Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, Newark
Ann B. Stevens, University of Wyoming
Margaret Stewart, Illinois Institute of Technology
Marc Stickgold, Golden Gate University
Serena Stier, Union University
Jan Stiglitz, California Western
Nomi Stolzenberg, University of Southern California
Albert W. Stone, University of Montana
Katherine Stone, Yeshiva University
George A. Strait, District of Columbia
John A. Strait, University of Puget Sound
Kurt A. Strasser, University of Connecticut
Michael S. Straubel, Valparaiso University
Marcy Strauss, Loyola University of Los Angeles
Nadine Strossen, New York Law

Harry I. Subin, New York University
Stephen N. Subrin, Northeastern University
John J. Sullivan, University of Washington
Kathleen A. Sullivan, Brooklyn
Clyde W. Summers, University of Pennsylvania
Steven R. Swanson, Hamline University
Barbara Swartz, Touro College
Louis H. Swartz, State University of New York at Buffalo
Kenneth J. Tager, University of Bridgeport
Winnona Tanaka, University of Tulsa
J. Alexander Tanford, Indiana University
Kathryn W. Tate, Loyola University of Los Angeles
Nadine Taub, Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, Newark
Sheila Taub, University of Bridgeport
George Peach Taylor, University of Alabama
Elizabeth Thornburg, Southern Methodist University
Victor Thuronyi, State University of New York at Buffalo
Karen Tokarz, Washington University of St. Louis
Donald T. Trautman, Harvard University
Paul R. Tremblay, Boston College
Charles Robert Tremper, University of Nebraska
Laurence H. Tribe, Harvard University
Frank Tuerkheimer, University of Wisconsin
Gilda M. Tuoni, Northeastern University
Mark Tushnet, Georgetown University
Richard B. Tyler, University of Missouri
Kathryn R. Urbonya, Georgia State University
John W. Van Doren, Florida State University
Jon M. Van Dyke, University of Hawaii
Dominick Vetri, University of Oregon
Barry R. Vickrey, University of North Dakota
Diana Vincent-Daviss, New York University
Ken Vinson, Florida State University
Michael Vitiello, Loyola University of New Orleans
Howard J. Vogel, Hamline University
John Vogel, Oklahoma City University
Kenneth Vogel, Loyola University of Marymount
Valerie J. Vollmar, Willamette University

Arthur Taylor Von Mehren, Harvard University
Michael J. Waggoner, University of Colorado
Kathleen Waits, Union University
Heathcote W. Wales, Georgetown University
Manning Warren, University of Alabama
William D. Warren, University of California at Los Angeles
Rhonda Wasserman, University of Pittsburgh
Sidney Watson, Mercer University
Burton D. Wechsler, American University
Lloyd L. Weinreb, Harvard University
Alan C. Weinstein, Touro College
Janet Motley Weinstein, California Western Robert Weisberg, Stanford University
June Weisberger, University of Wisconsin
Sarah N. Welling, University of Kentucky
Mary Moers Wenig, University of Bridgeport
Robert A. Weninger, Texas Tech. University
Stephen J. Werber, Cleveland State University
Meera Werth, University of Chicago
David Westfall, Harvard University
Barbara Ann White, University of Houston
Frederic White, Jr., Cleveland State University
Lucie White, University of California at Los Angeles
Wenona Yvonne Whitfield, Southern Illinois University
Shirley A. Wiegand, University of Oklahoma
Stephanie Wildman, University of San Francisco
David B. Wilkins, Harvard University
Steven L. Willborn, University of Nebraska
Robert J. Willey, Cleveland State University
David Williams, Cornell University
Norman Williams, University of Arizona
Particia Williams, Stanford University
Robert F. Williams, Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, Camden
Susan Williams, Cornell University
Wendy W. Williams, Georgetown University
Thomas A. Wills, University of Miami
Charles E. Wilson, Ohio State University
Evelyn L. Wilson, Washington and Lee

Richard J. Wilson, City University of New York
Timothy Wilton, Suffolk University
C. Keith Wingate, University of California at Hastings
Bruce J. Winick, University of Miami
Steven L. Winter, University of Miami
Stephen Wizner, Yale University
Louis E. Wolcher, University of Washington at Seattle
Arthur D. Wolf, Western New England
Roger C. Wolf, University of Maryland
Bernard Wolfman, Harvard University
Charles W. Wolfram, Cornell University
William J. Woodward, Jr., Temple University
Ann Woolhandler, University of Cincinnati
Gail J. Wright, Pace University
Judith M. Wright, University of Chicago
Eric K. Yamamoto, University of Hawaii
Marilyn V. Yarbrough, University of Tennessee
Paul Howard Zarefsky, Santa Clara University
Amy C. Ziegler, St. Louis University
Carol L. Zeigler, Brooklyn College
Zigurds L. Zile, University of Wisconsin
Diane L. Zimmerman, New York University
Luize E. Zubrow, George Washington University

AMICUS CURIAE

BRIEF

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
MAR 30 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

No. 88-605

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,

Appellants,

—vs.—

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,

Appellees.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES
COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT

BRIEF AMICI CURIAE OF THE AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION, THE NATIONAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION, PEOPLE FOR THE AMERICAN WAY, THE NEWSPAPER GUILD, THE NATIONAL WRITERS UNION, AND THE FRESNO FREE COLLEGE FOUNDATION

JANET BENSHOOF
RACHAEL N. PINE
LYNN M. PALTROW
132 West 43rd Street
New York, New York 10036
(212) 944-9800

BURT NEUBORNE*
40 Washington Square South
New York, New York 10012
(212) 998-6239

Counsel of Record*

Attorneys for Amici Curiae

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	PAGE
TABLE OF AUTHORITIES	ii
INTEREST OF AMICI	1
INTRODUCTORY STATEMENT	2
STATEMENT OF FACTS	5
SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT	8
ARGUMENT	10
I. MISSOURI'S STATUTE LIMITS THE ABILITY OF HEALTH PROFESSIONALS EMPLOYED BY THE STATE TO SPEAK FREELY AND TRUTHFULLY TO THEIR PATIENTS ABOUT MATTERS OF MEDICAL IMPORTANCE AND THEREFORE VIOLATES THE FIRST AMENDMENT	11
II. MISSOURI'S ATTEMPT TO IMPOSE VIEWPOINT-BASED SPEECH RESTRICTIONS CONCERNING ABORTION ON HEALTH CARE PROFESSIONALS RECEIVING PUBLIC FUNDS VIOLATES THE FIRST AMENDMENT	18
III. MO. REV. STAT. § 188.205 IS UNCONSTITUTIONALLY VAGUE AND OVERBROAD	23
IV. MISSOURI'S STATUTE SERVES NO COMPELLING STATE INTEREST NOR IS IT NARROWLY TAILORED	26
CONCLUSION	27

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

Cases: PAGE

A.B. Small Co. v. American Sugar Refining Co., 267 U.S. 233 (1925) 24

American Council of the Blind v. Boorstin, 644 F. Supp. 811 (D.D.C. 1986) 21

Arkansas Writers' Project v. Ragland, 107 S.Ct. 1722 (1987) 20-21, 26

Baggett v. Bullitt, 377 U.S. 360 (1964) 24, 24-25

Big Mama Rag, Inc. v. United States, 631 F.2d 1030 (D.C. Cir. 1980) 21

Bigelow v. Virginia, 421 U.S. 809 (1975) 10

Block v. Meese, 793 F.2d 1303 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 478 U.S. 1021 (1986) 20

Board of Airport Comm'rs v. Jews for Jesus, 107 S.Ct. 2568 (1987) 25

Board of Educ. v. Pico, 457 U.S. 853 (1982) 15, 17

Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601 (1973) 20, 25

Bullfrog Films v. Wick, 847 F.2d 502 (9th Cir. 1988) ... 21

Cammarano v. United States, 358 U.S. 498 (1959) 20

City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416 (1983) 7, 8

City of Lakewood v. Plain Dealer Publishing Co., 108 S.Ct. 2138 (1988) 24, 25

Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15 (1971) 18

Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379 (1979) 24

Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S. 138 (1983) 11, 12, 13, 14

PAGE

Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Defense and Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788 (1985) 21, 26

Cramp v. Board of Educ., 368 U.S. 278 (1961) 24

Edwards v. Aguillard, 107 S.Ct. 2573 (1987) 16, 17

Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968) 16, 17, 17-18

FCC v. League of Women Voters, 468 U.S. 364 (1984). 20, 23

Gay & Lesbian Law Students Ass'n v. Gohn, 850 F.2d 361 (8th Cir. 1988) 21

Givhan v. Western Line Consol. School Dist., 439 U.S. 410 (1979) ..... passim

Gooding v. Wilson, 405 U.S. 518 (1972) 25

Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104 (1972) 24

Greenberg v. Knetko, 811 F.2d 1057 (7th Cir. 1987) ... 11

Griacco v. Pennsylvania, 382 U.S. 399 (1966) 24

Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1985) 22

Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980) 22, 26

Houston v. Hill, 107 S.Ct. 2502 (1987) 25

In re Primus, 436 U.S. 412 (1978) 10

Johnston v. Koppes, 850 F.2d 594 (9th Cir. 1988) 12

Keyishian v. Board of Regents, 385 U.S. 589 (1967) 16, 24

King v. Smith, 392 U.S. 309 (1968) 19

Kinser v. Elkadi, 674 S.W.2d 226 (Mo. Ct. App. 1984). 8

Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352 (1983) 24, 25

Lamont v. Postmaster General, 381 U.S. 301 (1965) ... 15

PAGE

Lyng v. International Union, United Auto., Aerospace and Agric. Implement Workers of Am., 108 S. Ct. 1184 (1988) 22

Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977) 22, 26

Massachusetts v. Bowen, 679 F. Supp. 137 (D. Mass. 1988), appeal pending, No. 88-1279 (1st Cir.) 19

Meese v. Keene, 107 S.Ct. 1862 (1987) 10

Members of City Council v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789 (1984)..... 26

Meyer v. Grant, 108 S.Ct. 1886 (1988) 22

Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923)..... 16

Mt. Healthy City School Dist. Bd. of Educ. v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274 (1977)..... 11

New York v. Bowen, 690 F. Supp. 1261 (S.D.N.Y. 1988), appeal pending, Nos. 88-6204/06 (2d Cir.)..... 19

New York State Club Ass'n v. New York City, 108 S.Ct. 2225 (1988) 25

Patteson v. Johnson, 787 F.2d 1245 (8th Cir. 1986).... 11

Pickering v. Board of Educ., 391 U.S. 563 (1968) .....passim

Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925) 16

Planned Parenthood Ass'n of Utah v. Dandoy, 635 F. Supp. 184 (D. Utah 1986)..... 19

Planned Parenthood Fed'n of Am. v. Bowen, 680 F. Supp. 1465 (preliminary injunction), 687 F. Supp. 540 (permanent injunction) (D. Colo. 1988), appeal pending, No. 88-2251 (10th Cir.)..... 19

PAGE

Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497 (1961)..... 10

Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396 (1974) 15

Rankin v. McPherson, 483 U.S. 378, 107 S.Ct. 2891 (1987).....passim

Regan v. Taxation With Representation, 461 U.S. 540 (1983) 21, 22

Reproductive Health Servs. v. Webster, 662 F. Supp. 407 (W.D. Mo. 1987), aff'd, 851 F.2d 1071 (8th Cir. 1988), prob. juris. noted, 109 S.Ct. 780 (1988).....5, 7, 15, 23

Ridgway v. Ridgway, 454 U.S. 46 (1981) 19

Roth v. Veteran's Admin. of United States, 856 F.2d 1401 (9th Cir. 1988)..... 11

Schad v. Mt. Ephraim, 452 U.S. 61 (1981)..... 25

Schaumberg v. Citizens for a Better Environment, 444 U.S. 620 (1980)..... 25

Scopes v. State, 154 Tenn. 105, 289 S.W. 363 (1927)... 17

Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479 (1960)..... 16

Smith v. Goguen, 415 U.S. 566 (1974).....24, 25

Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234 (1957) 16, 17

Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986) 10, 25

Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88 (1940) 25

Townsend v. Swank, 404 U.S. 282 (1971)..... 19

United Pub. Workers v. Mitchell, 330 U.S. 75 (1947) .. 20

United States Civil Serv. Comm'n v. National Ass'n of Letter Carriers, 413 U.S. 548 (1973)..... 20

PAGE

Village of Hoffman Estates v. The Flipside, Hoffman Estates, Inc., 455 U.S. 489 (1982) 24

West Virginia State Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943) 20

Wieman v. Updegraf, 344 U.S. 183 (1952) 11, 16, 17

Statutes and Regulations:

Mo. Rev. Stat. §§ 188.200(3), 205, 210, 215 (1986) ....passim

53 Fed. Reg. 2922-46 (1988) (to be codified at 42 C.F.R. §§ 59.2, 59.5, 59.7, 59.8, 59.9, 59.10) 19

Other Authorities:

Alan Guttmacher Institute, Teenage Pregnancy: The Problem That Hasn't Gone Away (1981) 12

American College of Obstetricians & Gynecologists, Standards for Obstetric-Gynecologic Services (1985) . 7, 8

American College of Obstetricians & Gynecologists, Statement of Policy, Further Ethical Considerations in Induced Abortion..... 7

American Medical Association, Current Opinions of the Council on Ethical and Judicial Affairs (1986) 7

Benshoof, The Chastity Act: Government Manipulation of Abortion Information and the First Amendment, 101 Harv. L. Rev. 1916 (1988) 18

Born Unwanted: Developmental Effects of Denied Abortion (H. David et al. eds. 1988)..... 12

Cates & Grimes, Morbidity and Mortality of Abortions in the United States, in Abortion and Sterilization: Medical and Social Aspects (J. Hodgson ed. 1981)... 12

PAGE

Centers for Disease Control, Dept. of Health and Human Services, Abortion Surveillance 1979-80 (1983) 12

T. Emerson, The System of Freedom of Expression (1970) 14

High Risk Pregnancy and Delivery (F. Arias ed. 1984) . 12

Karst, Equality as a Central Principle in the First Amendment, 43 U. Chi. L. Rev. 20 (1975) 21

Katz, Informed Consent—A Fairy Tale? Law's Vision, 39 U. Pitt. L. Rev. 137 (1977)..... 8

Miller, Informed Consent: I, 244 J. A.M.A. 2100 (1980) 8

Note, The First Amendment Overbreadth Doctrine, 83 Harv. L. Rev. 844 (1970) 25

Note, The Void-for-Vagueness Doctrine in the Supreme Court, 109 U. Pa. L. Rev. 67 (1960) 24

President's Comm'n for the Study of Ethical Problems in Medicine and Biomedical and Behavioral Research, Making Health Care Decisions (1982) 8

S.L. Romney, N.J. Hay, A.B. Little, J.A. Merill, E.J. Quilligan, & R.W. Standler, Gynecology & Obstetrics (2d ed. 1981)..... 12

Rose, Informed Consent: History, Theory, and Practice, 7 Am. J. of Ontology 82 (1986) 8

Shiffrin, Government Speech, 27 U.C.L.A. L. Rev. 565 (1980) 10, 20

Stephan, The First Amendment and Content Discrimination, 68 Va. L. Rev. 203 (1982)..... 21

Stone, Content Regulation and the First Amendment, 25 Wm & Mary L. Rev. 189 (1983) 21

PAGE

Waltz and Scheuneman, Informed Consent to Therapy, 64 Nw. U.L. Rev. 628 (1969)..... 8

M. Yudof, When Government Speaks (1983) 10, 18, 20

INTEREST OF AMICI*

The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) is a nationwide non-partisan, membership organization dedicated to defending the principles embodied in the Bill of Rights. Since its founding nearly 70 years ago, the ACLU has been particularly concerned with government action—whether administrative, legislative, or judicial—that restricts the free flow of information contemplated by the First Amendment. In addition, the ACLU established a Reproductive Freedom Project in 1974 interested in protecting a woman's fundamental right to privacy and reproductive freedom. The ACLU believes that full and unbiased information about the abortion option is critical to reproductive choice and that attempts to censor and manipulate the doctor-patient dialogue in an effort to promote childbirth over abortion violate the First Amendment.

The National Education Association (NEA) is a nationwide employee organization with a current membership of some 1.9 million members, the vast majority of whom are employed by public educational institutions. NEA operates through a network of affiliated organizations: it has state affiliate organizations in each of the 50 states, and it has approximately 12,000 local affiliates in individual school districts, colleges and universities throughout the United States. One of the principal purposes of NEA and its affiliates is to protect the constitutional rights of educational employees, including their First Amendment right of free speech. Because the Court is being asked in this case to decide, inter alia, issues of importance to the exercise of free speech by public employees, NEA has an interest in the outcome.

People for the American Way is a nonpartisan, education-oriented citizen's organization established to promote and protect civil and constitutional rights. Founded in 1980 by a group of religious, civic, and educational leaders devoted to the nation's heritage of tolerance and pluralism, People for the

---

* The parties have consented to the submission of this brief in letters on file with this Court.

American Way now has 275,000 members nationwide. The organization's primary mission is to educate the public on the vital importance of the democratic tradition and to defend it against attacks from those who would seek to limit our fundamental freedoms, particularly our First Amendment rights.

The Newspaper Guild is a labor union representing some 40,000 employees of newspapers, magazines, wire services, and related enterprises in the United States, Canada, and Puerto Rico. It has been actively involved in protecting the First Amendment rights of its members and all Americans.

The National Writers Union (NWU) is a five-year-old organization dedicated to improving wages and working conditions for freelance writers as well as fighting for free speech issues that have an impact on NWU's members. As representative of 2,500 writers nationwide, some of whom work for publicly-funded agencies, the NWU views with deep concern any attempt, by legislation or other means, to restrict free speech or to control the flow of information.

The Fresno Free College Foundation is a community organization with offices in Fresno, California. Its origin in 1968 is connected to an academic freedom case and, since that time, it has, in various ways, been supportive of academic freedom and the civil liberties of students, professors, and citizens. Since 1968 the Fresno College Foundation has been dedicated to the preservation of a free and open society through the support of free inquiry and the free expression of ideas.

INTRODUCTORY STATEMENT

Missouri's prohibition on the use of public funds to "encourage or counsel a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life," Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.205 (1986); see also id. § 188.210, can be viewed from several perspectives. From Missouri's perspective, the question is whether a state must tolerate speech by publicly subsidized health care professionals that is contrary to an avowed state policy favoring childbirth over abortion. Not surprisingly, Missouri calls this a "public subsidy" case. From the perspective of a publicly-funded doctor or counselor, however, the question is whether the state may politicize the doctor-patient dialogue by forcing a health care professional to truncate and distort information and advice to patients in order to advance state policy. Health care professionals such as the public employee plaintiffs herein call this an "employee free speech" case.

It would, however, be simplistic to decide this case by a process of categorization. The significant First Amendment issues posed by Missouri's statutory scheme cannot be answered by labeling the case a "subsidy" or "employee free speech" case. Under either rubric, the fundamental question before the Court is whether the communication at issue—medically relevant speech between a health care professional and a patient—is of sufficient public import to warrant significant First Amendment protection from viewpoint-based censorship designed to promote state policy. If it is—and amici do not believe that anyone would argue to the contrary—Missouri's statutory scheme must fall, whether analyzed by this Court as a violation of the public employee's right to free speech, see Point I infra, or as an invidious manipulation of a subsidy to suppress disfavored ideas, see Point II infra.

Viewed as a public employee speech case, the ban must fall because it is an unprecedented attempt to limit the ability of government-funded health care professionals—doctors, social workers, nurses—to speak their minds openly and honestly on matters of public concern in the performance of their public functions.

Viewed as a public subsidy case, Missouri's scheme must fall as an attempt to impose viewpoint-based censorship rules upon an entire workforce. While Missouri may fund willing speakers to advance its policies, it may not turn all persons receiving public funds into unwilling exponents of state policy by requiring them, whatever their function, to present only one side of a medical issue of transcendant importance to the low-income women who depend almost entirely on government-funded personnel for information and advice.

There is yet a third perspective from which to view the Missouri statutory scheme—the perspective of a patient seeking medical advice and counsel from a publicly subsidized doctor. Missouri's concerns about subsidizing speech with which it disagrees, and even the health care professional's interest in performing the essence of the medical function, pale into relative insignificance before the low-income patient's urgent need for medical advice and information that is free of a political litmus test. The invasion of the patient's right to know is the ultimate casualty of the Missouri scheme.

By imposing a statutory gag on a doctor's speech to a pregnant patient regarding the medical advisability or availability of abortion, Missouri has gone far beyond the legitimate regulation of speech by public employees or others it subsidizes. It has attempted to politicize the practice of medicine in violation of the deepest ethical precepts of the medical profession. It is as if Missouri had informed publicly funded Legal Aid lawyers that they were free to discuss criminal law with their clients, but were forbidden to counsel or encourage them to bring motions to suppress.

While amici agree that government may—indeed, should—influence the job-related speech of certain public officials during the performance of their official duties, Missouri's attempt to manipulate the flow of advice from a public health professional to a patient concerning abortion is a flagrant violation of the First Amendment rights of both the public health professional and the patient. When the state "buys" the services of a public health doctor, it does not "buy" the doctor's medical integrity. When a patient consults a public health professional, she has a right to expect more than a government shill.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.205 prohibits any state-subsidized health professional from "encouraging or counseling a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life."[1] The statute prohibits a physician receiving public funds from "encouraging or counseling" an abortion, even when continuation of a pregnancy would jeopardize a patient's health.[2] Only when an abortion is "necessary to save the woman's life" may a physician or counselor advise a woman of the full range of pregnancy treatment options and recommend that she consider an abortion. Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.205.[3]

---

1 Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.205 (1986) states:

> It shall be unlawful for any public funds to be expended for the purpose of . . . encouraging or counseling a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life.

The statute broadly defines "public funds" to include:

> . . . any funds received or controlled by this state or any agency or political subdivision thereof, including, but not limited to, funds derived from federal, state or local taxes, gifts or grants from any source, public or private, federal grants or payments, or intergovernmental transfers.

Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.200(3).

2 The drafters of the Missouri statute consciously omitted the phrase "or health" from each of the statutory provisions. See Mo. Rev. Stat. §§ 188.205, 210, 215.

Various doctors testified during trial that abortion may be medically indicated "where there are gross fetal anomalies . . . , or where maternal health may be compromised by cardiac disease, recurrent cerebral vascular accidents (CVAS or strokes), diabetic retinopathy (which threatens blindness) and renal disorders." Abortions may also be indicated in the presence of diabetes, cancer, or early amniotic sac rupture. Reproductive Health Servs. v. Webster, 662 F. Supp. 407, 427 n.52 (W.D. Mo. 1987), aff'd, 851 F.2d 1071 (8th Cir. 1988), prob. juris. noted, 109 S.Ct. 780 (1988) (citing trial testimony of Drs. Maulik, Pearman and Hern at Trial Transcript 1-44 to 1-52, 1-129 and 1-131, 2-25 to 2-27).

3 While the State argues in its brief that the statute does not restrict the provision of mere information about abortion, Brief for Appel-

A related provision makes clear that Missouri intends, through its statutory scheme, to prohibit its own employees—including doctors, nurses, counselors, and social workers—from speaking non-pejoratively about abortion within the scope of their employment, even when necessary to preserve a patient's health. Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.210; see also id. § 188.215 (prohibiting the use of a "public facility" for "encouraging or counseling" abortion).[4]

Under Missouri's statutory scheme, a health care professional employed in a Missouri state hospital, or subsidized by the State, must violate the deepest ethical precepts of her profession by withholding counseling from a pregnant patient on the availability or medical advisability of an abortion. These precepts, established by the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists ("ACOG") and previously relied upon by this Court, see, e.g., City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416, 429 n.11, 437 n.26, 449 n.40, 450 n.43 (1983), state that, "[i]n the event of an unwanted pregnancy, the physician should counsel the patient about her options of continuing the pregnancy to term and keeping the infant, continuing the pregnancy to term and offering the infant for legal adoption, or aborting the pregnancy." ACOG, Standards for Obstetric-Gynecologic Services 57 (1985).[5]

Further, as Missouri itself recognizes in its creation of a statutory exception for abortions necessary to save a woman's life, a doctor is not merely a passive repository of raw data. Doctors, in the everyday exercise of their professional responsibilities, routinely advise patients on the pros and cons, risks and benefits of alternative courses of treatment.[6] Indeed, the American Medical Association ("AMA") itself requires physicians "to present the medical facts accurately to the patient or to the individual responsible for his care and to make recommendations for management in accordance with good medical practice." AMA, Current Opinions of the Council on Ethical and Judicial Affairs § 8.07 (1986) (emphasis added). Health care lants at 42 [hereinafter "Mo. Br."], the Eighth Circuit correctly rejected this argument on the ground that "the scope of the . . . ban appears literally to be much broader than the interpretation offered by the state." See Point III infra.

---

4 Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.210 states:

> . . . It shall be unlawful for a doctor, nurse or other health care personnel, a social worker, a counselor or persons of similar occupation who is [sic] a public employee within the scope of his employment to encourage or counsel a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life.

Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.215 states:

> It shall be unlawful for any public facility to be used . . . for the purpose of encouraging or counseling a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life.

Missouri's decision to appeal only one of the three provisions struck down by the Eighth Circuit, Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.205, quoted supra note 1, is an attempt to shift the Court's attention to the generalized ban on the use of public funds. The State thereby seeks to obscure the fact that, as applied to doctors and nurses in the Missouri public health system, a ban on the use of "public funds" to counsel about abortion is indistinguishable from a ban on the speech of doctors who, like the named plaintiffs herein, are employed and therefore paid by the State of Missouri. To the extent that a doctor is paid with "public funds," she is as bound by Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.205 as by § 188.210. In fact, Missouri's abandonment of Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.210 in favor of Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.205 appears to be nothing more than a strategic ploy designed to facilitate the simplistic labeling of this case as a "subsidy" case, instead of one involving the free speech of public employees and others.

---

5 "Counseling directed solely toward either promoting or preventing abortion does not sufficiently reflect the full nature of the problem or the range of options to which the patient is entitled. Appropriately balanced counseling, combined with the available and accessible facilities, provides the minimum base for the opportunity to make a truly informed choice." ACOG, Statement of Policy, Further Ethical Considerations in Induced Abortion, ¶ 4; see also, American Medical Association, Current Opinions of the Council on Ethical and Judicial Affairs § 8.07 (1986).

6 Drs. Maulik and Pearman testified that ethical obligations compelled them to counsel women about abortion and make recommendations based on their medical opinion. They stated that a prohibition on this would be "devastating" to medical practice. Reproductive Health Servs., 662 F. Supp. at 427 n.53 (citing trial testimony of Drs. Maulik and Pearman at 1-44 and 1-52, 1-129 and 1-131).

providers who fail to adhere to these principles risk professional censure or civil liability.[7]

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Missouri's prohibition against the use of public funds to "encourage or counsel" abortion violates the First Amendment for three reasons. First, § 188.205's restriction on the use of public funds operates primarily to restrict the speech of public employees in the State of Missouri. While the State has attempted to escape the constitutional implications of this fact by not appealing the ruling of the Eighth Circuit as to § 188.210, it cannot do so. Named plaintiff doctors in this case work as public employees and Missouri's prohibition on the use of public funds to counsel about abortion restricts their freedom of speech in the course of their public employment.[8] Public employees retain First Amendment rights to speak free from government coercion, even on the job and about matters related

7 See, e.g., President's Comm'n for the Study of Ethical Problems in Medicine and Biomedical and Behavioral Research, Making Health Care Decisions 76 (1982) ("a physician is obliged to mention all alternative treatments, including those he or she does not provide or favor, so long as they are supported by respectable medical opinion"). See also Rose, Informed Consent: History, Theory, and Practice, 7 Am. J. of Ontology 82 (1986); Miller, Informed Consent: I, 244 J. A.M.A. 2100 (1980); Katz, Informed Consent—A Fairy Tale? Law's Vision, 39 U. Pitt. L. Rev. 137 (1977); Waltz and Scheuneman, Informed Consent to Therapy, 64 Nw. U.L. Rev. 628 (1969).

As this Court has made clear, "[i]t remains primarily the responsibility of the physician [or other health care worker under the physician's supervision] to ensure that appropriate information is conveyed to his patient, depending on her particular circumstances." Akron, 462 U.S. at 443. Missouri has itself recognized that such information must include the "foreseeable risks [if any] and possible alternatives" of a proposed course. See, e.g., Kinser v. Elkadi, 674 S.W.2d 226, 232 (Mo. Ct. App. 1984). For a pregnant woman, these alternatives include childbirth, adoption, and abortion. ACOG, Standards for Obstetric-Gynecologic Services 57 (1985).

8 If this were not the case, there would be no case or controversy. See Brief of Appellee at _____.

to their official function. When speech by a government employee on a matter of public concern does not inhibit the performance of her duties, and particularly when it is necessary to the performance of those duties, it is protected by the First Amendment.

Second, the statutory provision challenged here creates an impermissible distinction on the basis of viewpoint. Under the provision, recipients of public funds are free to counsel against abortion, but are prohibited from speaking non-pejoratively about abortion. Legislative efforts to suppress one viewpoint so as to promote another are subject to the strictest First Amendment scrutiny. The mandatory omission of medical information and advice about abortion compels physicians, whose salaries Missouri has chosen to subsidize, to act as instruments of state policy in violation of their medical judgment and their First Amendment rights. A provision that permits the dissemination of only skewed medical advice to a reliant audience must be invalidated.

Finally, the challenged provision is unconstitutionally vague and overbroad. It is vague because the statute's terms fail clearly to distinguish speech which is prohibited from that which is permitted. It is overbroad because it sweeps within its ambit even informational speech about abortion by physicians and others employed by the State. The State's effort in its brief to clarify and limit the scope of the law serves only to reinforce the conclusion that the statute is impermissibly vague.

Missouri has profferred no compelling state interest to justify its restrictions on constitutionally protected speech, and it has chosen means that sweep broadly over First Amendment freedoms.

ARGUMENT

All parties agree that if a state statute sought, through the imposition of criminal sanctions, to prevent a private doctor from counseling a patient about the advisability or availability of a lawful course of treatment, the statute would violate the First Amendment. See Bigelow v. Virginia, 421 U.S. 809 (1975); See also In re Primus, 436 U.S. 412 (1978).[9] See also Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497, 513 (1961) (Douglas, J., dissenting) ("The right of the doctor to advise his patients according to his best lights seems so obviously within First Amendment rights as to need no extended discussion").[10]

Missouri argues, however, that when public health professionals are paid with public funds, the State may advance its policy of favoring childbirth over abortion by dictating the content of the medical information and advice that funded doctors and nurses are permitted to give their patients. While it is, of course, true that government may generally speak in favor of its policy choices,[11] the breathtaking assertion of plenary state power over speech by state-funded professionals asserted by Missouri herein, were it to be taken seriously, would threaten the integrity of our public health, legal aid, and state university systems.

---

9 Indeed where the constitutionally protected right to choose abortion is concerned, this Court has struck down any attempt to invade or "straight-jacket" the doctor-patient dialogue under the Fourteenth Amendment. See Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747, 762 (1986); Akron, 462 U.S. at 443-45.

10 The dissent was from a standing decision not bearing on the First Amendment. Poe, 367 U.S. at 510. (Douglas, J., dissenting).

11 See, e.g., Meese v. Keene, 107 S.Ct. 1862 (1987); see generally, M. Yudof, When Government Speaks (1983); Shiffrin, Government Speech, 27 U.C.L.A. L. Rev. 565 (1980).

I. MISSOURI'S STATUTE LIMITS THE ABILITY OF HEALTH PROFESSIONALS EMPLOYED BY THE STATE TO SPEAK FREELY AND TRUTHFULLY TO THEIR PATIENTS ABOUT MATTERS OF MEDICAL IMPORTANCE AND THEREFORE VIOLATES THE FIRST AMENDMENT.

This Court has consistently recognized that the First Amendment grants significant protection to public employees. E.g., Rankin v. McPherson, 483 U.S. 378, 107 S.Ct. 2891 (1987); Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S. 138 (1983); Givhan v. Western Line Consol. School Dist., 439 U.S. 410 (1979); Mt. Healthy City School Dist. Bd. of Educ. v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274 (1977); Pickering v. Board of Educ., 391 U.S. 563 (1968); cf. Wieman v. Updegraf, 344 U.S. 183, 194 (1952) (Frankfurter, J., concurring) (academic freedom of state university professors protected). This protection extends to speech occurring on the job[12] and to speech expressed by an employee in a private conversation. E.g., Rankin, 107 S. Ct. at 2899; Givhan, 439 U.S. at 413-16.

Missouri attempts to sidestep the plain import of these cases by assuming that all speech is fungible in determining the range of permissible governmental censorship.[13] Government's power

---

12 Lower courts consistently apply the analysis of Pickering to speech occurring on the job or in the course of employment. See Patteson v. Johnson, 787 F.2d 1245 (8th Cir. 1986) (Deputy State Auditor's negative testimony before state senate committee concerning audit is protected speech); Roth v. Veteran's Admin. of United States, 856 F.2d 1401 (9th Cir. 1988) (hired "trouble shooters' " allegations of misuse of public funds and inefficient operation of hospital are protected speech); Greenberg v. Knetko, 811 F.2d 1057 (7th Cir. 1987) (citations and unauthorized actions taken by social worker in Department of Children and Family Services to protect physical and mental health of children are protected speech).

13 The State also argues that the speech prohibited by the statutory provision in question is not of "public concern." See Mo. Br. at 38-39. While reasonable people may differ over whether a trivial and tasteless to interfere with public employee speech is not, however, monolithic. It varies depending upon the nature of the speech and the interests at stake. While a state would undoubtedly have the power to prevent its employees from engaging, while on the job, in racially or sexually insulting speech directed to the public, Rankin, 107 S. Ct. at 2903 (Scalia, J., dissenting), at a minimum, it lacks the power to conform the medical counseling of its doctors; the scholarship of its university professors; or the legal advice of its public defenders to the shifting sands of "state policy."

Under existing doctrine, the free speech protection available to a given expression by a public employee is a function of three factors: (1) the employee's interest in engaging in the expression in question; (2) the hearer's interest in receiving the information remark by a public employee to a boyfriend about an attempt to assassinate President Reagan is worthy of constitutional protection, Rankin, 107 S. Ct. 2891, it cannot be seriously contested that medically relevant speech between a doctor and patient is of "public concern" under the First Amendment.

---

The "content, form, and context" of such speech is of critical public concern. See Connick, 461 U.S. at 147-48. The freedom of a doctor to advise a patient within the scope of professional judgment and to provide medical care to low-income women consistent with prevailing standards is of paramount public concern. Further, the public interest in availability of information about abortion is evident. The public health consequences of denying women this information are increased maternal morbidity and mortality due to delayed abortion, unwanted parenthood, and increased morbidity and mortality due to health-endangering pregnancy and childbirth. Cates & Grimes, Morbidity and Mortality of Abortions in the United States, in Abortion and Sterilization: Medical and Social Aspects (J. Hodgson ed. 1981); Centers for Disease Control, Dept. of Health and Human Services, Abortion Surveillance 1979-1980 (1983); Alan Guttmacher Institute, Teenage Pregnancy: The Problem That Hasn't Gone Away 16 (1981); Born Unwanted: Developmental Effects of Denied Abortion (H. David et al. eds. 1988); High Risk Pregnancy and Delivery (F. Arias ed. 1984); S.L. Romney, N.J. Hay, A.B. Little, J.A. Merill, E.J. Quilligan, & R.W. Standler, Gynecology & Obstetrics 703-95 (2d ed. 1981). See also Johnston v. Koppes, 850 F.2d 594 (9th Cir. 1988). Finally, that speech occurs in a private conversation is no barrier to a finding that it concerns a subject of public importance. Givhan, 439 U.S. at 413.

in question; and (3) the relationship between the speech in question and the employee's public function.[14] Where, as here, a public health professional has an extraordinarily powerful interest in self-expression; a patient has a critical need for the information; and counseling is at the core of the doctor's public function, the First Amendment forbids Missouri from censoring the speech in the name of fidelity to its policies.

In both Pickering and Givhan, these factors pointed strongly toward protection of the speech in question. The public teacher in Pickering believed that the budgetary decisions of the school administration were making it impossible for him to fulfill his responsibilities to his students. The teacher in Givhan believed that the policies of her school were frustrating its desegregation. Both the speakers and the listeners had significant interests in the communication of these messages, and the speech was intimately connected with the teachers' public functions. Not surprisingly, in both cases this Court unanimously invalidated the dismissals of the teachers for their protected speech.[15]

In Rankin, by contrast, the three factors were significantly weaker. The public employee's interest in expressing a hope for the successful assassination of the President was problematic. Viewing the speech in the context of a conversation addressing 14 When speech of public concern occurs on the job, this Court has looked as well to the governmental employer's "interest in the effective and efficient fulfillment of its responsibilities to the public," Connick, 461 U.S. at 150, in short, to the government employer's "legitimate purpose in 'promot[ing] efficiency and integrity in the discharge of official duties . . . .' " Id. at 150-151 (emphasis added) (citation omitted). See also Pickering, 391 U.S. at 570-73. Because there is no meritorious argument that the speech prohibited by Missouri would disrupt employee relations in the workplace or interfere with a state health care institution's ability to fulfill its public function, amici focus on the question whether the speech at issue is consistent or at odds with the "integrity of the discharge" of a publicly employed physician's duties.

---

15 Justice Rehnquist wrote for a unanimous Court in Givhan; Justice Marshall, for a unanimous Court in Pickering. Justice White concurred in Pickering only insofar as the teacher's speech was truthful. 391 U.S. at 583 (White, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

the policies of the Reagan Administration, however, a majority of the Court discerned cognizable speaker and hearer interests. Moreover, while the speech in question bore no relationship to the employee's function, it did not appear to have inhibited the performance of this function. Given the relative weakness of the three factors, Rankin was a close case. Nevertheless, a majority found the speech protected.[16]

Measured against the speech protected in Pickering, Givhan, and Rankin, the public health professional's speech at issue here merits vigorous First Amendment protection. The doctor who is subject to Missouri's restriction on speech has an even greater interest in self-expression than did the teachers in Pickering and Givhan. Under the Missouri statutory scheme, a publicly employed doctor may not advise any patient about the availability of the abortion option. Confronted by a patient whose health would be imperilled by the continuation of a pregnancy, the physician is caught in a particularly vicious bind. On the one hand, canons of medical ethics may compel the doctor, on penalty of professional censure or loss of licensure, to speak in favor of abortion as a medical option of choice, see ethical standards discussed in Statement of Facts supra; on the other hand, Missouri's statutory scheme forbids the doctor from "encouraging or counseling" the patient to have an abortion not necessary to save her life. The net result is a statutorily compelled violation of the single most important tenet of a doctor's professional code.

The history of the First Amendment has been, in significant part, an attempt to shield speakers of conscience from state imposed restrictions on deeply felt self-expression. See generally, T. Emerson, The System of Freedom of Expression at Ch. 2. (1970). There can hardly be a more compelling candidate for 16 In Connick, 461 U.S. 138, the Court upheld the dismissal of a public employee, finding none of the speech-protective interests present. The Court found that the employee's speech did not implicate issues of public importance, thus minimizing the speaker and hearer interests; and did interfere with the performance of her public function, thus maximizing the government's interest.

such protection than a public health professional faced with a statutorily mandated violation of her oath to heal the sick and to provide accurate and complete information to all patients.

Similarly, the hearer's interest in this case dwarfs the interests found sufficient in Pickering and Givhan, to say nothing of Rankin.[17] A patient in the Missouri public hospital system generally cannot afford private medical care. She is dependent on the medical advice she receives from publicly funded health professionals to enable her to make an informed and autonomous choice whether to continue a pregnancy or to undergo an abortion. Her interest in receiving truthful advice from public health professionals cannot be overstated, especially since the choice at issue is itself constitutionally protected. Yet, the Missouri statutory scheme attempts to skew the nature of the medical advice that she will receive, in the name of advancing a state policy favoring childbirth over abortion. In effect, Missouri attempts to use medical censorship as a device to manipulate the behavior of poor women in favor of childbirth. Such a regime makes a mockery of the patient's constitutionally protected right to choose freely whether or not to bear a child.[18]

Finally, the speech at issue in this case is even closer to the employee's core public function than was the speech in Pickering or Givhan. In those cases, the speech at issue bore a substantial relationship to the public responsibilities of the teachers. In this case, the speech at issue goes to the very essence of the health professional's public function. Indeed, the prohibited speech is inextricable from the function which publicly employed physicians are hired to perform. When the state hires

17 The Supreme Court has repeatedly recognized that the right to speak includes the right to receive information. See Lamont v. Postmaster General, 381 U.S. 301, 308 (1965) (Brennan, J., concurring); Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396, 408-09 (1974); Board of Educ. v. Pico, 457 U.S. 853, 867-68 (1982) (plurality opinion).

18 On this basis, the Eighth Circuit held:

> "We can perceive of few obstacles more burdensome to the right to decide than a state-imposed blackout on the information necessary to make a decision."

Reproductive Health Servs., 851 F.2d at 1080

a doctor, it necessarily engages her to provide sound medical care consistent with ethical and common law standards. The essence of that task is the giving of truthful and complete medical advice. Censorship of that advice in the name of "state policy" is totally inconsistent with the employee's public function.

Thus, whether measured by the intensity of the public health professional's interest in self-expression; the urgency of the patient's interest in receiving uncensored advice; or the incompatibility of censorship of medical advice with the health professional's public function, Missouri's attempt at turning health professionals into creatures of "state policy" cannot withstand First Amendment scrutiny.

While public employee speech cases provide a helpful framework within which to consider Missouri's attempt at censoring the medical advice of its public health professionals, the nature of the speech at issue here suggests an even more analogous line of authority—this Court's attempt to preserve academic freedom within the nation's publicly funded universities.[19] In a historic series of cases, the Court has recognized that the First Amendment limits the power of the state to interfere with the on-the-job speech of publicly funded university educators. E.g., Keyishian v. Board of Regents, 385 U.S. 589, 603 (1967); Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479, 487 (1960); Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234, 261-62 (1957) (Frankfurter, J., concurring); Wieman v. Updegraf, 344 U.S. 183, 195-97 (1952) (Frankfurter, J., concurring). See also Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968); Edwards v. Aguillard, 107 S.Ct. 2573 (1987); Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923); Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925).

The Court's academic freedom cases reflect the collision of two principles—the power of the state to influence the speech of publicly funded educators through the selection of curriculum and general pedagogic policy, on the one hand; and the importance of intellectual freedom, critical inquiry, and open-

19 University professors, like physicians, have the highest interest in maintaining freedom of expression within the scope and in the course of performing their essential functions.

mindedness to the success of the educational mission on the other. See Board of Educ. v. Pico, 457 U.S. at 876-82 (Blackmun, J., concurring). But the state's interest in directing pedagogic policy fades in the university context because, as the Court has recognized, the free interplay of ideas is at the heart of higher education in a democracy.[20]

As Justice Frankfurter recognized in his concurrence in Sweezy, the state's power to regulate job-related, publicly funded speech, broad as it is, cannot destroy the freedom of a public educator to carry out the essence of his public function in a state university—the teaching of open minds. 354 U.S. at 261-63. Similarly, Missouri's power to regulate the speech of its public employees cannot destroy the freedom of a public health professional to carry out the essence of her public function—the provision of accurate and complete medical advice. Indeed, as strong as Justice Frankfurter's case for "academic freedom" may have been, the First Amendment argument in favor of "medical freedom" is even stronger.

Before in our nation's history, dedicated ideologues sought to use the public purse to prevent publicly-funded employees from fulfilling a professional duty to speak their minds. The targets were not public health professionals caught between their ethics and a ban on counseling abortion, but public school teachers caught between their duty to teach and a ban on espousing Darwinian theories of evolution in the classroom. Scopes v. State, 154 Tenn. 105, 289 S.W. 363 (1927); Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97; Edwards v. Aguillard, 107 S.Ct. 2573. These cases upheld the freedom of teachers in the classroom. As the Court noted in Epperson, "[o]ur Courts . . . have not failed to apply the First Amendment's mandate in our educational system where essential to safeguard the fundamental values of freedom of speech and inquiry and of belief." 393

20 See, e.g., Pico, 457 U.S. at 920 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting) ("the government as educator is subject to fewer [constitutional] strictures when operating an elementary and secondary school system than when operating an institution of higher learning"); Wieman, 344 U.S. at 196-97 (Frankfurter, J., concurring).

U.S. at 104; id. at 115-16 (Stewart J., concurring) (based explicitly on academic freedom grounds).

If well-meaning zealots were not permitted to prevent public school teachers from educating students about the origins of human life, surely those who have succeeded in enacting the statutory gag challenged in this case cannot be permitted to prevent physicians from providing pregnant patients with encouragement and counseling about abortion.

II. MISSOURI'S ATTEMPT TO IMPOSE VIEWPOINT-BASED SPEECH RESTRICTIONS CONCERNING ABORTION ON HEALTH CARE PROFESSIONALS RECEIVING PUBLIC FUNDS VIOLATES THE FIRST AMENDMENT.

In a world where literally millions of Americans depend upon government-funded programs to provide them with critical guidance in areas as diverse as medical care, law, and higher education, the prospect of state manipulation of the free flow of information and advice from government-funded professionals to individual hearers in the name of advancing "state policy" poses an intolerable threat to First Amendment values.[21] One of the ultimate purposes of the First Amendment is the protection of the individual's capacity for informed and autonomous choice.[22] That capacity is seriously undermined when the state is permitted to censor the flow of publicly funded professional information and advice. Under such a regime, hearers are given the illusion of autonomous choice; but the reality of control rests with the state.

This case raises the question whether the state may compel subsidized health professionals to omit information about one side of a controversial health care decision in attempting to insure that the choices of individuals comport with government policy.[23] In seeking to couch the issue before the Court as a mere decision not to provide "public funds" for counseling or encouragement about abortion, Missouri has raised the First Amendment stakes. Instead of a relatively narrow statutory provision like Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.210, which applied to a designated category of public employees, the flat ban imposed by § 188.205 on certain abortion-related speech by persons receiving "public funds" casts a larger net of censorship.[24] It appears to apply to every public employee, in every context; as well as to every private person receiving funds from the State.[25]

21 See Yudof, supra note 11, at 157; see also Benshoof, The Chastity Act: Government Manipulation of Abortion Information and the First Amendment, 101 Harv. L. Rev. 1916, 1931-37 (1988).

22 See Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15, 24 (1971) ("putting the decision as to what views shall be voiced into the hands of each of us . . . [reflects] the belief that no other approach would comport with the premise of individual dignity and choice upon which our political system rests").

While willing government officials may speak in favor of one side of a controversial issue without automatically incurring an 23 This question is more sharply presented in three cases currently pending in three United States Courts of Appeals. New York v. Bowen, 690 F. Supp. 1261 (S.D.N.Y. 1988), appeal pending, Nos. 88-6204/06 (2d Cir.); Planned Parenthood Fed'n of Am. v. Bowen, 680 F. Supp. 1465 (preliminary injunction), 687 F. Supp. 540 (permanent injunction) (D. Colo. 1988), appeal pending, No. 88-2251 (10th Cir.); Massachusetts v. Bowen, 679 F. Supp. 137 (D. Mass. 1988), appeal pending, No. 88-1279 (1st Cir.). In these cases, the meaning and effect of the challenged federal regulations are undisputed: all non-pejorative speech about and referral for abortion are prohibited and physicians are simultaneously compelled to refer all pregnant patients for prenatal care. See 53 Fed. Reg. 2922-46 (1988) (to be codified at 42 C.F.R. §§ 59.2, 59.5, 59.7, 59.8, 59.9, 59.10).

24 If the state lacks the power to censor the speech of public employees who are paid entirely by the state, see Point I supra, it necessarily lacks the power to censor private physicians whom it only partially subsidizes.

25 Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.200(3), quoted supra note 1, broadly defines "public funds" as those "received or controlled" by the State and, notwithstanding the Supremacy Clause of the United States Constitution, expressly purports to regulate federal funds as well. States may not, however, attach conditions to the disbursement of federal funds that exclude recipients who would otherwise be eligible under the federal enabling legislation and regulations. See Townsend v. Swank, 404 U.S. 282, 291 (1971); King v. Smith, 392 U.S. 309, 333 (1968); Planned Parenthood Ass'n of Utah v. Dandoy, 635 F. Supp. 184, 189-90 (D. Utah 1986); see also Ridgway v. Ridgway, 454 U.S. 46, 54-55 (1981).

obligation to subsidize their opponents;[26] and while public employees may be subjected to non-discriminatory rules requiring them to refrain from certain political activity that conflicts with their public function,[27] the government may not, consistently with the First Amendment, engage in viewpoint discrimination designed to force every subsidized individual or entity to present only one side of a controversial issue to the public. Under our Constitution the state lacks the power to turn its workforce into a propaganda machine that parrots the party line. See generally, West Virginia State Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 642 (1943); Cammarano v. United States, 358 U.S. 498 (1959).

For these reasons, the Supreme Court has consistently invalidated the uneven allocation of subsidies based on the viewpoint or content of the funded expression. In FCC v. League of Women Voters, 468 U.S. 364 (1984), this Court invalidated a ban on editorializing in stations receiving federal grants for public broadcasting because the ban was intended "to limit discussion of controversial topics and thus to shape the agenda for public debate." Id. at 384.[28] Similarly, in Arkansas Writers' Project v. Ragland, 107 S.Ct. 1722 (1987), the Court declared unconstitutional an Arkansas statute that taxed certain newspapers and magazines while exempting others: "official scrutiny of the content of publications as the basis for imposing a tax is entirely incompatible with the First Amendment." Id. at 1728. See also id. at 1731 (Scalia, J., dissenting) ("a more stringent, prophylactic rule is appropriate . . . when the subsidy pertains to the expression of a particular viewpoint on a matter of political concern"); Regan v. Taxation With Representation, 461 U.S. 540, 548 (1983) (" '[t]he case would be different if Congress were to discriminate invidiously in its subsidies in such a way as to 'ai[m] at the suppression of dangerous ideas' ") (citation omitted); cf. Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Defense and Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788, 811-813 (1985) (plurality opinion) (remanding for determination whether exclusion of certain speech from a nonpublic forum was "in reality a facade for viewpoint discrimination"). Thus, while the State is free to speak in favor of childbirth, Missouri is not free to impose a viewpoint-based restriction on subsidized speech simply to advance this policy.[29]

26 Government officials need not subsidize the opposition every time the government speaks, but the First Amendment precludes the government from taking unfair advantage of its incumbency to advance its own positions. Thus, for example, government funds may not be used to pay for campaign activities. See generally, Yudof, supra note 11; Shiffrin, supra note 11. See Block v. Meese, 793 F.2d 1303, 1312-14 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 478 U.S. 1021 (1986).

27 See Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601 (1973); United States Civil Serv. Comm'n v. National Ass'n of Letter Carriers, 413 U.S. 548 (1973); United Pub. Workers v. Mitchell, 330 U.S. 75 (1947).

28 Significantly, the four Justices who dissented in FCC did so because they viewed the editorializing ban as viewpoint neutral, not because they believed the government could condition a benefit on a viewpoint-discriminatory limit on speech. Id. at 407 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting) ("In no sense can it be said that Congress has prohibited only editorial views of one particular ideological bent").

Unlike most "government speech" cases, where the effect of the government's speech in favor of its policies is to increase the amount of information available to the public, Missouri asserts the power to prevent public health professionals from providing truthful advice to patients solely because the advice is contrary to government policy. Thus, Missouri seeks to advance its policies in this case by selectively induced ignorance. But see Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 482 (1985) ("The State may not, consistently with the spirit of the First Amendment, contract the spectrum of available knowledge").

29 See also Gay & Lesbian Law Students Ass'n v. Gohn, 850 F.2d 361, 366-68 (8th Cir. 1988) (public university may not withhold funding from student group because it "dislikes their ideas"); Bullfrog Films v. Wick, 847 F.2d 502, 509-10 & n.11 (9th Cir. 1988) (USIA may not deny films certification for exemption from import duties because of content of films or viewpoints expressed in them); Big Mama Rag, Inc. v. United States, 631 F.2d 1030, 1040 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (IRS may not deny tax exemptions under standards so imprecise that they risk viewpoint- or content-based discrimination in allocation of benefits); American Council of the Blind v. Boorstin, 644 F. Supp. 811, 815-16 (D.D.C. 1986) (Library of Congress may not stop subsidized production of braille editions of Playboy because of its sexual content). See generally, Karst, Equality as a Central Principle in the First Amendment, 43 U. Chi. L. Rev. 20 (1975); Stephan, The First Amendment and Content Discrimination, 68 Va. L. Rev. 203 (1982); Stone, Content Regulation and the First Amendment, 25 Wm & Mary L. Rev. 189 (1983).

Missouri's assertion of the unchecked power to censor the medical advice of its public health doctors flows from a fundamental misconception. The State incorrectly assumes that because government is under no constitutional obligation to fund a particular medical procedure,[30] or to subsidize a given political activity,[31] it is free to prevent its medical employees from delivering truthful professional "counseling" about the advisability of engaging in the activity or procedure privately. Mo. Br. at 38-40. However, the power to refrain from subsidizing an activity does not translate into the power to ban truthful 30 Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980); Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977). In these cases, this Court held that the government need not reimburse the medical costs of certain abortions. The government's power to subsidize some medical procedures but not others does not mean, however, that government may discriminate in funding on the basis of a health care professional's viewpoint or speech about abortion. Free speech, particularly when exercised in furtherance of a constitutional right, is independently protected under the First Amendment. Cf. Meyer v. Grant, 108 S.Ct. 1886, 1893-94 (1988) (state power to limit gambling does not permit state to limit advocacy of legalization of gambling).

31 Lyng v. International Union, United Auto., Aerospace and Agric. Implement Workers of Am., 108 S.Ct. 1184 (1988). In Lyng this Court upheld an amendment to the Food Stamp Act withholding benefits from the households of some striking workers. Although the denial of benefits may indirectly have coerced some workers to shun expressive activities, the amendment did not itself fund expression in a viewpoint-discriminatory manner. Had Congress established a special information bureau for the purpose of informing the public about the availability of welfare benefits, but required that strikers seeking information from the bureau not be told about the availability of food stamps or other benefits for which they would be eligible, then Lyng might bear upon this case. Further, unlike Regan v. Taxation With Representation, 461 U.S. 540 (1983), this case does not involve a viewpoint-neutral decision to subsidize one category of private speaker, but not another. Rather, it is an unconstitutional attempt to dictate to subsidized health care professionals which views are permissible to express and which are forbidden. Id. at 548.

public employee speech about it when, as here, the speech is necessary to permit a hearer to make an informed choice about whether to engage in the activity with private funds.[32] When Missouri decides not to subsidize an activity, it makes a choice about the allocation of finite resources. When, however, Missouri attempts to prevent public health professionals from speaking truthfully about the medical advisability of an abortion, the State is no longer engaged in allocating its own resources; it is attempting to manipulate the private behavior of its citizens by controlling the flow of information to them. Such a regime is wholly antithetical to the postulates of a free society.

III. MO. REV. STAT. § 188.205 IS UNCONSTITUTIONALLY VAGUE AND OVERBROAD.

Missouri suggests that the challenged provision does not forbid the dissemination of "information" about abortion, but withholds funding only from speech "affirmatively advocating" that a woman have an abortion. Mo. Br. at 42.[33] The statutory language does not, however, articulate any such intelligible distinction between abortion advocacy and other kinds of information or dialogue about abortion. Instead, it refers broadly to "counseling" which, in the context of delivery of health care, is susceptible to a wide range of interpretations. It could mean, for example: informing a woman that abortion is one legal and medically feasible option in her case; helping an individual to clarify her own responses to the abortion option;

32 Cf. FCC v. League of Women Voters, 468 U.S. at 400 (government cannot dispense benefits in a way that inhibits party's use of its own funds to exercise fundamental right).

33 Missouri's claim that the statute merely assures neutrality on the issue of abortion would be more credible if the statute forbade the taking of a negative position on abortion as well as a positive one. Instead, Missouri has enacted a classic viewpoint-based speech restriction. See Point II supra. Further, the manifest impossibility of determining the point at which the permissible delivery of "information" about an abortion shades into impermissible "counseling or encouraging" abortion is what led the Eighth Circuit to hold the statute unconstitutionally vague. Reproductive Health Servs., 851 F.2d at 1078.

providing the information that a woman seeking abortion would need in order to give her informed consent to the procedure; answering a woman's questions about different abortion procedures; or explaining to a woman why abortion would pose fewer risks than childbirth in her case. The State's effort in its brief to confine the statute's broad language cannot compensate for the absence of a clarifying construction by the Missouri courts, which are uniquely empowered to articulate saving constructions of vague state laws. Smith v. Goguen, 415 U.S. 566, 573 (1974).

Statutory provisions such as § 188.205, which do not clearly distinguish permissible from forbidden speech, violate the due process and free speech rights of those to whom they apply. See, e.g., Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352, 358 (1983); Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379 (1979); Baggett v. Bullitt, 377 U.S. 360, 372 (1964). See generally, Note, The Void-for-Vagueness Doctrine in the Supreme Court, 109 U. Pa. L. Rev. 67 (1960).[34] This constitutional requirement of clarity in statutory drafting serves three related functions. First, it is designed to give fair notice of prohibited conduct. E.g., Village of Hoffman Estates v. The Flipside, Hoffman Estates, Inc., 455 U.S. 489, 498 (1982); Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104, 108-09 (1972). A statute that places a doctor's job on the line on the basis of what she says in the course of treatment cannot use terms so vague that she cannot discern in advance what speech is forbidden. The related concern that unclear statutory drafting causes people to steer wide of prohibited conduct is especially problematic when the statute touches speech, as does § 188.205. Undue self-censorship is constitutionally unacceptable. E.g., City of Lakewood v. Plain Dealer Publishing Co., 108 S.Ct. 2138, 2144 (1988); Kolender, 461 U.S. at 358; Baggett, 377 U.S. at 372. Finally, the vagueness doctrine is designed to place precise restrictions on the ability of enforcement officials to use the law to harass persons with whom they disagree. E.g., City of Lakewood, 108 S.Ct. at 2144; Smith v. Goguen, 415 U.S. at 575; Kolender, 461 U.S. at 358. In the emotionally charged atmosphere of the debate over abortion, see Thornburgh v. ACOG, 476 U.S. at 771-72, this third prong of the vagueness doctrine is of particular significance. The Eighth Circuit was, thus, clearly correct when it invalidated Missouri's statutory scheme on vagueness grounds.[35]

Even if § 188.205 were capable of an occasional constitutional application, the provision is facially invalid because it is substantially overbroad. The unconstitutional operation of the Missouri statutory scheme to silence publicly employed health professionals, see Point I supra, will constitute the bulk of the statute's applications. The "substantial overbreadth" test enunciated in Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601 (1973), and New York State Club Ass'n v. New York City, 108 S.Ct. 2225 (1988), is, therefore, clearly satisfied. Moreover, even if the statute on its face distinguished between non-directive, psychotherapeutic, or informational counseling and affirmative medical advice, it would still reach protected speech. A doctor cannot be reduced to a passive repository of "information." Encouragement and directive advice in favor of medically indicated treatments are an integral part of the doctor's art. The statute is thus overbroad in this respect as well. See generally, Houston v. Hill, 107 S.Ct. 2502 (1987); Board of Airport Comm'rs v. Jews for Jesus, 107 S.Ct. 2568 (1987); Schad v. Mt. Ephraim, 452 U.S. 61 (1981); Schaumberg v. Citizens for a Better Environment, 444 U.S. 620 (1980); Gooding v. Wilson, 405 U.S. 518 (1972); Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88 (1940). See generally, Note, The First Amendment Overbreadth Doctrine, 83 Harv. L. Rev. 844 (1970).

---

34 The Missouri statute is not exempt from a vagueness challenge because it imposes civil, not criminal, penalties. The same standard applies when First Amendment rights are implicated. Civil statutes that infringe on an employee's right to free speech have been held unconstitutionally vague. See Keyishian v. Board of Regents, 385 U.S. 589; Baggett, 377 U.S. 360; Cramp v. Board of Educ., 368 U.S. 278 (1961). See also Griacco v. Pennsylvania, 382 U.S. 399 (1966); A.B. Small Co. v. American Sugar Refining Co., 267 U.S. 233 (1925).

35 The vagueness of the statute has been exacerbated by Missouri's decision not to appeal § 188.210 thereby rendering the intended scope of § 188.205 unclear. As noted supra, if Missouri no longer intends to restrict the speech of public employees who would otherwise have been subject to the provisions of § 188.210, no case or controversy remains herein. See Brief of Appellee at _____.

IV. MISSOURI'S STATUTE SERVES NO COMPELLING STATE INTEREST NOR IS IT NARROWLY TAILORED.

Because the Missouri statutory scheme infringes upon cherished First Amendment guarantees, it can be justified only if it is narrowly tailored to serve a compelling state interest. Ragland, 107 S.Ct. at 1728.

The State advances one primary purpose in support of the statute: the desire "not to expend public funds . . . for the purpose of performing abortion services, including encouraging or counseling a woman to have an abortion . . . ." Mo. Br. at 38. This interest falls far short of "compelling."

While the government's "value judgment favoring childbirth over abortion" may be sufficient "under the less demanding test of rationality that applies in the absence of . . . the impingement of a fundamental right," Maher, 432 U.S. at 474, 478; see also McRae, 448 U.S. at 324, this interest is insufficient where, as here, First Amendment rights are violated. Insofar as Missouri sought to censor non-pejorative speech about abortion, this interest fails even a "rationality" test. A governmental "desire to suppress a particular point of view" is never "reasonable." Cornelius, 473 U.S. at 811-13 (plurality opinion); Members of City Council v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789, 804 (1984).

Nor has the State chosen narrow means. As shown supra, Point III, the terms "encouraging or counseling" are susceptible to myriad interpretations, and the prohibition on counseling and encouragement except when "necessary to save [the woman's] life," § 188.205, makes the ban applicable in nearly every medical setting. The State might have drafted a restriction reaching only speech inherently inconsistent with the physician's function, or it might have withheld funds only for the performance of abortions without restricting speech at all. Cf. McRae, 448 U.S. 297; Maher, 432 U.S. 464. Instead, it chose means that sweep with unconstitutional breadth over protected freedoms.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, amici respectfully request that this Court affirm the decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit holding Missouri's law unconstitutional under the First Amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

JANET BENSHOOF
RACHAEL N. PINE
LYNN M. PALTROW
132 West 43rd Street
New York, New York 10036
(212) 944-9800

BURT NEUBORNE*
40 Washington Square South
New York, New York 10012
(212) 998-6239
Counsel of Record*

March 30, 1989

AMICUS CURIAE

BRIEF

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
MAR 30 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

No. 88-605

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,

Appellants,

—v.—

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,

Appellees.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES COURT
OF APPEALS FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT

BRIEF OF CANADIAN WOMEN'S ORGANIZATIONS, AMICI CURIAE IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEES

Martha Shaffer
Faculty of Law
McGill University
3644 Peel Street
Montreal, Quebec
Canada H3A 1W9

Attorney for Amici Curiae

Estelle Rogers
2000 P. Street N.W.
Suite 515
Washington, D.C. 20036

Counsel of Record

TABLE OF CONTENTS

PAGE

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES iii

STATEMENT OF INTEREST OF AMICI 1

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT 2

ARGUMENT:

I. THE MORGENTALER DECISION HOLDS THAT LAWS CURTAILING ABORTION AFFECT A WOMAN'S CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS 3

A. Section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada 4

B. The Canadian Constitutional Framework . . 4

II. THE MORGENTALER DECISION RECOGNIZES THAT ABORTION LAWS WHICH INCREASE RISK TO WOMEN'S PHYSICAL OR EMOTIONAL HEALTH VIOLATE THE CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT TO SECURITY OF THE PERSON 6

III. THE MORGENTALER DECISION RECOGNIZES THAT THE POWER TO DECIDE TO TERMINATE A PREGNANCY FALLS WITHIN A CONSTITUTIONALLY PROTECTED RIGHT TO PERSONAL AUTONOMY 8

IV. THE MORGENTALER DECISION RECOGNIZES THAT WHILE SOME LIMITATION ON WOMEN'S RIGHTS MAY BE JUSTIFIED, LIMITATIONS MUST BE CAREFULLY PRESCRIBED 11

PAGE

V. REVERSING ROE V. WADE WOULD BE A REGRESSIVE DEVELOPMENT IN AMERICAN LAW 14

VI. ACCESS TO ABORTION IS NECESSARY FOR WOMEN'S EQUALITY 14

VII. CONCLUSION 15

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

Cases: PAGE

R.v. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 30 ..... passim

R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103 12

Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973) 2, 12, 13, 14

Constitutions and Statutes:

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Part I of the Constitution Act, 1982, being Schedule B of the Canada Act 1982 (U.K.), 1982, c. 11 ..... passim

Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34 ..... passim

United States Constitution, Amendment XIV 5

Other Authorities:

Canada Department of Justice, Report of the Committee on the Operation of the Abortion Law (Badgley Report), Ottawa: Minister of Supply and Services, 1977 4

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

No. 88-605

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,

Appellants,

—v.—

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,

Appellees.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT

BRIEF OF CANADIAN WOMEN'S ORGANIZATIONS, AMICI CURIAE IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEES

STATEMENT OF INTEREST

The Canadian Abortion Rights Action League (CARAL) is a national pro-choice organization of 17,000 individuals and 100 groups whose aims are to keep abortion decriminalized and to improve access to contraception and abortion. CARAL regards the right to safe, legal abortion to be a fundamental human right.

The ONTARIO COALITION FOR ABORTION CLINICS (OCAC) is an independent volunteer organization representing individuals and groups in the province of Ontario. OCAC believes that access to abortion is essential to women's equality.

The NATIONAL ACTION COMMITTEE ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN (NAC) is the largest women's organization in Canada representing approximately 600 non-governmental associations from all regions of the country. NAC's priority is to unite women and women's organizations from across Canada in the struggle for equality. NAC supports access to abortion because reproductive choice is necessary for women's liberty and equality.

The NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF WOMEN AND THE LAW (NAWL) is a Canadian non-profit organization of lawyers and law students dedicated to improving the legal status of women in Canada and to providing public education. NAWL believes that freedom of choice on abortion is a fundamental human right, and that those opposing reproductive choice threaten the freedom of Canadian women.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The purpose of this brief is to support the appellees, the Reproductive Health Services et al., and to argue that recent developments in Canadian law support the position that Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973) should not be reconsidered. In January, 1988 the Supreme Court of Canada struck down the Canadian abortion law in R v. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 30 as violating women's rights under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We believe the Morgentaler decision is of relevance to the present appeal because it is the judgment of the highest Court of a country that is not only proximate geographically to the United States but which has political, religious, social and legal traditions closer to the traditions of the United States than those of any other country. In our view, the majority judgments in Morgentaler recognize the importance for women of access to abortion and constitute an independent affirmation of the principles articulated in Roe v. Wade. Reversing Roe v. Wade would represent, in our opinion, a regressive development in American law.

In the Morgentaler decision the Supreme Court of Canada held that abortion laws which expose pregnant women to unnecessary physical and emotional risk, at a minimum violate women's interests in bodily integrity. Two of the judgments for the majority result may also be read as indicating that laws which wrest control over the decision to have an abortion from the pregnant woman and which allow the decision to be made on criteria totally unrelated to the woman's "priorities and aspirations" infringe women's rights to liberty and personal autonomy.

We seek to present to the Court the constitutionally protected interests of women in respect of access to abortion recognized by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Morgentaler decision. Although the Supreme Court of Canada did not need to consider abortion in the context of women's right to equality, we also seek to argue that the ability to decide to terminate a pregnancy is essential if women are to be full and equal participants in society.

ARGUMENT

I. THE MORGENTALER DECISION HOLDS THAT LAWS CURTAILING ABORTION AFFECT A WOMAN'S CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS

By a majority of five judges, a seven member panel of the Supreme Court of Canada struck down the abortion provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada. The Chief Justice, Justice Beetz, and Justice Wilson, wrote separate reasons for holding s. 251 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34 contravened the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. All three judges agreed that s. 251 violated a woman's constitutional right to "security of the person". Two of the judges also held that s. 251 violated a woman's constitutionally protected personal autonomy. To explain the significance of these findings, it is helpful to briefly review both the impugned abortion law and the constitutional framework in which the law was declared unconstitutional.

A. Section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada

Section 251 of the Criminal Code constituted the abortion law of Canada. The provision was composed of six subsections. The first two of these made abortion a criminal offence both for the medical personnel performing the procedure and for the pregnant woman. The remaining four subsections created an exception to the offence where an abortion was performed under specified conditions. Abortions were exempt from criminal liability when: (1) they were performed in a hospital that had been approved by the provincial Minister of Health or accredited by the Canadian Council on Hospital Accreditation; and (2) a hospital "therapeutic abortion committee" composed of no fewer than three doctors had certified in writing that the continuation of pregnancy would or would be likely to endanger the life or health of the woman.

The requirement of prior authorization by a therapeutic abortion committee had three significant implications. First, removing the power to decide to terminate a pregnancy from the pregnant woman and placing it in the hands of a committee of no fewer than three doctors abrogated the right of a woman to make fundamental decisions regarding her body. Second, the requirement created acute problems of differential access to abortion. According to the Badgley Report on the operation of the abortion law commissioned by the Department of Justice and quoted by the Court in Morgentaler, over one half of the non-military hospitals in Canada were ineligible to establish therapeutic abortion committees and an additional twenty percent simply chose not to establish them. Third, the mechanics of convening a therapeutic abortion committee combined with the problem of access delayed the performance of abortions thereby increasing the health risks associated with the procedure and the psychological stress endured by the pregnant woman.

B. The Constitutional Framework

Section 251 was challenged under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, a constitutional document which, like the American Bill of Rights, entrenches rights and freedoms. For the purposes of analyzing Morgentaler two differences between the documents are relevant: (1) the approach to interpretation under the Charter; and (2) the substantive right implicated in abortion legislation.

One of the distinctive features of the Charter as compared with the Bill of Rights is the presence of a provision allowing specific infringements of rights to be justified and therefore upheld. Section 1 of the Charter states:

> The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

This provision permits explicit consideration of the government's objectives in enacting the challenged legislation and allows the courts to balance the interests of the government against the interests of the individual. Declaring a law unconstitutional is a twofold process: the Court first determines whether there has been a violation of a substantive Charter right and, if a right has been violated, the Court continues to consider whether the violation may be justified under s. 1.

Although counsel for Morgentaler argued that s. 251 violated a number of Charter rights, including the right to equality, the Supreme Court restricted its analysis to the right to "life, liberty and security of the person" found in s. 7. Section 7 reads:

> Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

This provision most closely resembles the fourteenth amendment of the American Constitution with one notable difference: s. 7 does not protect property but instead specifically guarantees "security of the person". Canadian courts have interpreted this right to encompass a right to physical integrity and, at least in the area of criminal law, a right to be free from psychological stress created by the state. As Chief Justice Dickson explained in Morgentaler:

> [t]he case law leads me to the conclusion that state interference with bodily integrity and serious state-imposed psychological stress, at least in the criminal context, constitute a breach of security of the person. (at p. 56).

The right of security of the person is similar to aspects of the right to bodily integrity and to liberty in the American Constitution.

II. THE MORGENTALER DECISION RECOGNIZES THAT ABORTION LAWS WHICH INCREASE RISK TO WOMEN'S PHYSICIAL OR EMOTIONAL HEALTH VIOLATE THE CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT TO BODILY INTEGRITY

Each of the three judges who wrote for the majority followed a different path to reach the conclusion that s. 251 contravened s. 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Of the three, the course charted by Justice Beetz is the narrowest and should be viewed as a minimum articulation of women's constitutional claim to access to abortion. Justice Beetz was content to strike down s. 251 as a violation of the right to security of the person solely on the basis of the increased health risks to pregnant women caused by the operation of the provision. He held that the abortion provision violated s. 7 as it placed the life or health of women attempting to comply with the requirements of s. 251 in jeopardy through an administrative structure made up of unnecessary rules. Although Justice Beetz was of the view that the government objective he identified as underlying the legislation, protection of the foetus, was valid, the infringement could not be justified under s. 1 of the Charter because the means chosen to meet the objective were not carefully constructed. As the procedural aspects of the legislation provided sufficient grounds for deciding the case, Justice Beetz did not consider whether any additional interests were at stake. He was careful to point out that his reasons did not include any consideration of a right to abortion founded in liberty or personal autonomy and that on a liberty challenge, some of the narrow precepts of his reasoning "would need to be reevaluated" (at p. 112).

Chief Justice Dickson was also of the opinion that the health risks caused by s. 251 infringed the right to security of the person. He saw this infringement as secondary to the initial violation of security of the person resulting from placing the decision to terminate a pregnancy beyond the pregnant woman's control. Referring to this first violation the Chief Justice stated, (at p. 57):

> Although this interference with physical and emotional integrity is sufficient in itself to trigger a review of s. 251 against the principles of fundamental justice, the operation of the decision-making mechanism set out in s. 251 creates additional and glaring breaches of security of the person. The evidence indicates that s. 251 causes a certain amount of delay for women who are successful in meeting its criteria. In the context of abortion, any unnecessary delay can have profound consequences on the woman's physical and emotional well-being.

Justice Wilson also viewed the threat to bodily integrity posed by s. 251 as infringing the right to security of the person, but like the Chief Justice, felt that there was a more fundamental basis for finding s. 251 in contravention of s. 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Hers is the strongest statement of the relationship between the ability to decide to terminate a pregnancy and the right to bodily integrity (at pp. 173-174):

> I agree with the Chief Justice and with Beetz J. that the right to "security of the person" under s. 7 of the Charter protects both the physical and psychological integrity of the individual . . . as the Chief Justice and Beetz J. point out, the present legislative scheme for the obtaining of an abortion clearly subjects pregnant women to considerable emotional stress as well as to unnecessary physical risk. I believe, however, that the flaw in the present legislative scheme goes much deeper than that. In essence, what it does is assert that the woman's capacity to reproduce is not to be subject to her own control. It is to be subject to the control of the state. She may not choose whether to exercise her existing capacity or not to exercise it. This is > not, in my view, just a matter of interfering with her right to liberty in the sense . . . of her right to personal autonomy in decision-making, it is a direct interference with her physical "person" as well. She is truly being treated as a means—a means to an end which she does not desire but over which she has no control. She is the passive recipient of a decision made by others as to whether her body is to be used to nurture a new life. Can there be anything that comports less with human dignity and self-respect? How can a woman in this position have any sense of security with respect to her person?

>
> [emphasis added]

Read together, the three judgments of the majority indicate that, at a minimum, abortion laws which create unnecessary delay for women seeking the procedure and which expose women to avoidable physical and emotional risk violate the right to bodily integrity. Abortion laws that in any way potentially endanger the life or health of a pregnant women will not withstand scrutiny under s. 7 of the Charter.

III. THE MORGENTALER DECISION RECOGNIZES THAT THE POWER TO DECIDE TO TERMINATE A PREGNANCY FALLS WITHIN A CONSTITUTIONALLY PROTECTED RIGHT TO PERSONAL AUTONOMY

Chief Justice Dickson and Justice Wilson both recognized that s. 251 of the Criminal Code violated a broader right to personal autonomy. Although the Chief Justice characterized this interest as relating to the right to security of the person and Justice Wilson viewed it as part of a right to liberty, both held that s. 251 contravened women's s. 7 rights by preventing women from making fundamental decisions affecting their bodies.

Chief Justice Dickson described this interest in personal autonomy as the ability of a woman to make decisions about her body in accordance with her own goals and aspirations (at pp. 56-57):

> At the most basic, physical and emotional level, every pregnant woman is told by the section that she cannot submit to a generally safe medical procedure that might be of clear benefit to her unless she meets criteria entirely unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations. Not only does the removal of decision-making power threaten women in a physical sense; the indecision of knowing whether an abortion will be granted inflicts emotional stress. Section 251 clearly interferes with a woman's bodily integrity in both a physical and emotional sense. Forcing a woman, by threat of criminal sanction, to carry a foetus to term unless she meets certain criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations, is a profound interference with a woman's body and thus a violation of security of the person.
>
> [emphasis added]

The Chief Justice exhibited in this passage a concern for a woman's control over her reproductive capacity that goes far beyond the procedural mechanics of the particular abortion legislation at issue in the case.

Justice Wilson expressed the same concern as a liberty interest. As was the case with the right to bodily integrity, Justice Wilson's statement of the interests involved is the more forceful. Justice Wilson began by examining the content of the right to liberty, holding that liberty includes the power to make significant personal decisions (at p. 166):

> . . . an aspect of the respect for human dignity on which the Charter is founded is the right to make fundamental personal decisions without interference from the state. This right is a critical component of the right to liberty.

Using this definition of liberty, Justice Wilson next considered whether the decision to have an abortion fell within the ambit of the s. 7 liberty guarantee (at pp. 171-172):

> The question then becomes whether the decision of a woman to terminate her pregnancy falls within this class of protected decisions. I have no doubt that it does. This decision is one that will have profound psychological, eco- nomic and social consequences for the pregnant woman. The circumstances giving rise to it can be complex and varied and there may be, and usually are, powerful considerations militating in opposite directions. It is a decision that deeply reflects the way the woman thinks about herself and her relationship to others and to society at large. It is not just a medical decision; it is a profound social and ethical one as well. Her response to it will be the response of the whole person.

It is probably impossible for a man to respond, even imaginatively, to such a dilemma not just because it is outside the realm of his personal experience (although this is, of course, the case) but because he can relate to it only by objectifying it, thereby eliminating the subjective elements of the female pysche which are at the heart of the dilemma. As Noreen Burrows, lecturer in European Law at the University of Glasgow, has pointed out . . . the history of the struggle for human rights from the eighteenth century on has been the history of men struggling to assert their dignity and common humanity against an overbearing state apparatus. The more recent struggle for women's rights has been a struggle to achieve a place for women in a man's world, to develop a set of legislative reforms in order to place women in the same position as men . . . Thus, women's needs and aspirations are only now being translated into protected rights. The right to reproduce or not to reproduce which is in issue in this case is one such right and is properly perceived as an integral part of modern woman's struggle to assert her dignity and worth as a human being.

[emphasis added]

Justice Wilson had no difficulty concluding that s. 251 of the Criminal Code violated the right to liberty by depriving a woman of control of her body (at p. 172):

> Given then that the right to liberty guaranteed by s. 7 of the Charter gives a woman the right to decide for herself whether or not to terminate her pregnancy does s. 251 of > the Criminal Code violate this right? Clearly it does. The purpose of the section is to take the decision away from the woman and to give it to a committee. Furthermore, as the Chief Justice correctly points out, at p. 56, the committee bases its decision on "criteria entirely unrelated to [the pregnant woman's] own priorities and aspirations". The fact that the decision whether a woman will be allowed to terminate her pregnancy is in the hands of a committee is just as great a violation of the woman's right to personal autonomy in decisions of an intimate and private nature as it would be if a committee were established to decide whether a woman should be allowed to continue her pregnancy. Both these arrangements violate the woman's right to liberty by deciding for her something that she has the right to decide for herself.

>
> [emphasis added]

Chief Justice Dickson and Justice Wilson both recognized that the right of a woman to decide to terminate a pregnancy in accordance with her personal goals is an essential component of women's constitutionally protected autonomy. Any abortion law which places the decision to have an abortion beyond a woman's control—by usurping the power to make the decision, by placing obstacles in her path or by denying access to abortion all together—would violate a woman's s. 7 rights under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

IV. THE MORGENTALER DECISION RECOGNIZES THAT WHILE SOME LIMITATION ON WOMEN'S RIGHTS TO ABORTION MAY BE JUSTIFIED, LIMITATIONS MUST BE CAREFULLY PRESCRIBED

Having found that the abortion legislation violated women's rights under s. 7 of the Charter, the three judges in the majority considered whether the violations could be justified under s. 1. Although the justification of laws infringing the Charter may seem unusual to an American jurist, rights violations may be justified in Canada because the rights guaranteed in the Charter are not absolute. Section 1 is an explicit statement that the Charter protects rights "subject only to reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society." If the state has a sufficiently important objective and can establish that the legislative means it has enacted are proportional to this goal, legislation violating a substantive Charter right will not be declared unconstitutional. The courts have imposed a very exacting standard of scrutiny on legislation violating Charter rights requiring laws: (1) to be rationally related to the objective; (2) to impair the right as little as possible; and (3) to have a proportionality between the effects of the legislative means and the objective; R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103.

Justice Beetz and Justice Wilson identified protection of the foetus as the objective of s. 251 of the Criminal Code. Chief Justice Dickson was of the opinion that the objective underlying the provision was to balance the competing interests of the pregnant woman and the foetus. All three justices agreed that the state interest in the foetus was a sufficiently important objective to warrant some restriction on women's rights. The judges were also unanimously of the view that s. 251 constituted too severe an infringement on women's rights to be justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

Because the judges held that s. 251 could not be sustained under s. 1 of the Charter, the Court was not compelled to address the precise point at which limitations on a woman's rights to security of the person and to liberty would be constitutionally acceptable. True to the Canadian approach to constitutional interpretation, the judges did not go beyond what was absolutely necessary to resolve the issues before the Court. The failure of the Supreme Court of Canada to demarcate the point at which women's rights may be infringed by the state interest in the foetus should not be interpreted as a rejection of the trimester approach in Roe v. Wade.

Four important principles emerge from the Court's analysis under s. 1. First, the state interest in the foetus can not justify laws completely prohibiting abortion. Justice Beetz makes the point several times during the course of his judgment that however one determines the scope of the state interest in the foetus,

Parliament could never be justified in criminalizing abortion all together. Second, an abortion law any more restrictive of women's rights than s. 251 will be unconstitutional. This principle follows, of course, from rules of stare decisis. Third, abortion laws may not place women's life or health into jeopardy. Any law which, like s. 251, endangers the life or health of pregnant women will not be sustained under s. 1. Finally, both Justice Wilson and Justice Beetz indicated that the state interest in the foetus becomes greater as pregnancy continues. Although she refrained from mandating the exact point at which the state interest in the foetus will justify some restriction on women's rights, Justice Wilson made the following suggestion (at p. 183):

> . . . both traditional approaches to abortion, the so-called "liberal" and "conservative" approaches, fail to take account of the essentially developmental nature of the gestational process. A developmental view of the foetus, on the other hand, supports a permissive approach to abortion in the early stages of pregnancy and a restrictive approach in the later stages. In the early stages the woman's autonomy would be absolute; her decision, reached in consultation with her physician, not to carry the foetus to term would be conclusive. The state would have no business inquiring into her reasons. The precise point in the development of the foetus at which the state's interest becomes "compelling" I leave to the informed judgment of the legislature which is in a position to receive guidance on the subject from all the relevant disciplines. It seems to me, however, that it might fall somewhere in the second trimester.
>
> [emphasis added]

These four principles constitute a declaration that access to safe abortion on terms that do not threaten a woman's life or her physical and emotional health is protected by the constitutional rights of liberty and security of the person. They reveal a recognition of the importance of reproduction, and control over reproduction, to women's lives, and a concern for women consonant with that expressed in Roe v. Wade.

V. REVERSING ROE V. WADE WOULD BE A REGRESSIVE DEVELOPMENT IN AMERICAN LAW

The Morgentaler decision is authority for the proposition that fundamental constitutional rights encompass a woman's decision to choose an abortion. In the Canadian context, whether this right is articulated in terms of security of the person or liberty its essence is the protection of individual autonomy and bodily integrity. In the United States, both these interests are firmly accepted aspects of the liberty guarantee of the fourteenth amendment.

The decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Morgentaler constitutes an independent affirmation of the principles underlying Roe v. Wade. Both decisions recognize a constitutionally protected right of women to terminate a pregnancy. Both decisions also acknowledge that this right may be limited by the state to protect the foetus, but that limitations must be carefully tailored to protect the rights of women.

VI. ACCESS TO ABORTION IS NECESSARY FOR WOMEN'S EQUALITY

The right of a woman to control her reproductive capacity is essential if women are to live as full and equal participants in society. When women cannot determine the situations in which they bear children, women are deprived of equality.

Women often do not control the conditions under which they become pregnant. Because of lack of information, social pressure, and sexual force many women find themselves faced with unplanned pregnancies at a time when for a variety of reasons they are unable to bring a pregnancy to term. As long as contraceptive devices fail, are risky or are unavailable, there will be many women who in the course of living their lives will be confronted by the reality of an unplanned pregnancy. There will be teenage girls, without the skills to provide for a child, who want to finish growing up. There will be single women who cannot carry the emotional, financial and social burdens of being single mothers. There will be married women pregnant either too soon, too late or too often. There will be families already struggling to survive in the face of overwhelming social and economic problems.

Women have traditionally been allocated primary responsibility for the raising of children. Social custom, pressure, economic circumstances and lack of adequate day care (public and private) have meant that women's lives are often severely limited once they bear children. Men as a group are not comparably disempowered by their reproductive capacities and are not generally required by society to spend their lives caring for children to the virtual preclusion of other life pursuits.

The uniqueness of women's reproductive situation does not justify disadvantaging and hence unequal treatment by law. Laws cannot alter the inherent reproductive capacities of men and women, but they can and do prescribe the social and legal consequences which attach to them. Biology may dictate that only women can become pregnant, but legislators have a full range of options on how to treat pregnant women.

Women, like men, should be able to assert control over their reproductive capacities, to claim equal opportunity to plan their lives, and to participate fully in the public domain. The fact that it is women, not men, whose bodies do the major reproductive work for society should not mean that women participate in society as less than equal. Control over reproduction, including abortion, is an essential aspect of women's equality.

VII. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, this Court should affirm Roe v. Wade.

Respectfully submitted,

Martha Shaffer
Faculty of Law
McGill University
3644 Peel Street
Montreal, Quebec
Canada H3A 1W9

For Amici Curiae

Estelle Rogers
2000 P. Street N.W.
Suite 515
Washington, D.C. 20036

Counsel of Record

AMICUS CURIAE

BRIEF

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
MAR 30 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

No. 88-605

In The
Supreme Court of the United States
OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WEBSTER, ET. AL.

APPELLANTS

VS.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, ET. AL.

APPELLEES

On Appeal from the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit

BRIEF FOR ORGANIZATIONS AND NAMED WOMEN AS AMICUS CURIAE SUPPORTING APPELLEE.

CALIFORNIA NATIONAL ORGANIZATION FOR WOMEN
SAN JOSE--SOUTH BAY CHAPTER
NATIONAL ORGANIZATION FOR WOMEN
CALIFORNIA ALLIANCE CONCERNED
WITH SCHOOL AGE PARENTS
LYNNETTE PERKES
CHERIEL JENSEN
PATRICIA SANDERS
SUZANNE JENSEN
GENEVIEVE PERKES
PAMELA HARTER

ROBIN YEAMANS
1475 SARATOGA AVENUE, #140
SAN JOSE, CALIFORNIA
(408) 255-0151
Attorney for Amici Curiae

A & E Print Shop a California Company, 2089 Gartner Avenue, San Jose, 95124

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Page

TABLE OF CONTENTS i

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES iii

Amici Curiae Brief on Behalf of Organizations and Named Women in Support of Appellee
Concern of Amici vi

OPINIONS BELOW. 1

JURISDICTION. 1

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT. 2

ARGUMENT:
THE MISSOURI STATUTES VIOLATE THE THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT GUARANTEE OF FREEDOM FROM INVOLUNTARY SERVITUDE. 2

I. THIS COURT HAS AFFIRMED THE PROMISE OF FREEDOM FOR WOMEN. MISSOURI STATUTES AND THE CHALLENGE TO ROE V. WADE PLACE FREEDOM IN JEOPARDY. 3

II. THE STATE CANNOT ATTEMPT TO BALANCE THE RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN WITH THE RIGHTS OF PERSONS. 3

III. THE STATE CANNOT COMPEL THE SERVICE OF ONE PERSON FOR THE BENEFIT OF ANOTHER. 4

IV. UNDER THE THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT A WOMAN HAS THE RIGHT TO FREEDOM FROM INVOLUNTARY PREGNANCY AND CHILDBEARING IN THE ABSENCE OF DUE CONVICTION FOR A CRIME. 8

A. Scope and Application of the Thirteenth Amendment. 8

TABLE OF CONTENTS

B. Involuntary Pregnancy. 11

1. Contraceptive failure. 11
2. Limitations on the right to refuse. 12

C. Pregnancy as a State of Physical Servitude. 14

1. Pregnancy is work. 14
2. Demands on the heart and lungs.
3. Demands on the reproductive organs. 16
4. Demands on the musculoskeletal system. 17
5. Demand on the circulatory system. 18
6. Impacts on the urinary tract. 19
7. Transfer of the woman's body substance to the conceptus. 20
8. Impacts on the brain. 20
9. Impacts on the alimentary canal. 22
10. Impacts on the skin. 23
11. Impacts on the endocrine system. 24
12. Impacts on the immune system. 24
13. Delayed impacts. 25
14. Summary. 25

V. THE STATE HAS NOT SHOWN A COMPELLING INTEREST FOR SUBORDINATING THE RIGHTS OF A WOMAN TO A CONCEPTUS. 26

A. The Necessity of Showing a Compelling State Interest. 26

B. Areas of Exception Permitting the Imposition of Involuntary Service. 27

C. The Nature of the States Interest in the Abortion Conflict. 29

Pages

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS

United States Constitution:
Amendment XII ..... passim
Amendment XIV 2, 30

STATUTES

Missouri Revised Statutes 4, 14
Uniform Anatomical Gift Act 5, 6

CASES

Allen v. Hixson, 111 Ga. 460, 36 S.E. 810 (1900) .. 7
Arver v. United States, 245 U.S. 366 (1918) 27

Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U.S. 219 (1910) 10
Bates v. City of Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516 (1960) 27
Beltran v. Cohen, 303 F. Supp. 889 (N.D. Cal. 1969) 28

Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940) 27
City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416, (1983) 27
Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S. 3 (1883) 9, 10, 11
Clyatt v. United States, 197 U. S. 207 (1905) 10
re. Conroy, 486 A.2d 1209-1229 (1985) 28
Crews v. Lundquist, 361 Ill. 193, 197 N.E. 768 (1935) 28

Gilbert v. Gwin-McCollum Funeral Home, 268 Ala. 372, 106 So. 2nd 646 (1958) 7

Hodges v. United States, 203 U.S. 1 (1906) 9
Hurley v. Eddingfield, 156 Ind. 416, 59 N.E. 1058 (1901) 7

Johnson v. Henne, 355 F. 2d 129 (1966) 28
Jones v. Mayer, 392 U.S. 409 (1968) 11, 26

London v. Atlanta Transit Company, 91 Ga. App. 753, 87 S.E. 2d 103 (1955) 7

Pages

McCann v. Babbitz, 310 F. Supp. 293 (E.D. Wis. 1970) (per curiam) appeal dismissed, 400 U.S. 1 (1970) (per curiam) 27

N.A.A.C.P. v. Button, 371 U.S. 415 (1963) 27

O'Keefe v. W. J. Barry Company, 311 Mass. 517, 42 N.E. 2d 267 (1942) 7
Osterlind v. Hill, 263 Mass. 73, 160 N.E. 301 (1928) 7

Pollock v. Williams, 322 U.S. 4 (1944) 10

Rennie v. Klien, 653 F2d 836 (3d Cir. 1981) vacated on remand, 720 F2d 266 (3d Cir. 1983) 28
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)..... 2, 3, 4, 14, 27

Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479 (1960) 27
Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963) 27

Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747, 759 (1986],..... 27
Toadvine v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. R. Ry., 20 F. Supp. 226 (E.D. Ky. 1937) 7

Union Pacific Rwy. Co. v. Botsford, 141 U.S. 250 (1891) 26
United States v. Lumsden, 499 F.2d 154 (9th Cir. 1971) 28

LEGAL LITERATURE AND COMMENTARY

Best, F.L. Jr., Transfers of Body Parts under the Uniform Anatomical Gift Act, REAL PROPERTY, PROBATE AND TRUST JOURNAL, 15TH n4 806-836, Wint. 1980 6

Clark, The Law of Domestic Relations (1968) 13
Curran, A Problem of Consent: Kidney Transplantation, 34 N.Y.U.L. REV. 891 (1959) 6

Pages

The New Thirteenth Amendment: A Preliminary Analysis, 82 HARV. L. REV. 1264 (1969) 11

Richards, Medical-Legal Problems of Organ Transplantation, 21 HASTINGS L. J. 77 (1969) 6

Sanders and Dukeminier, Medical Advance and Legal Lag: Hemodialysis and Kidney Transplantation, 15 U.C.L.A. L. REV. 357 (1965) 6

The Failure to Rescue: A Comparative Study, 52 COLUM. L. REV. 631 (1952) 7

MEDICAL LITERATURE AND COMMENTARY

Berkow, R., and Fletcher, A.J., The Merck Manual of Diagnosis and Therapy, 15th Ed., 1987. 16, 17, 21, 24, 25

Chaudhuri, Correlation of Toxemia with Anemia of Pregnancy, 106 AM. J. OST. & GYNEC. 255 (Jan. 15, 1970) 15

Cherry, S.H., et. al., ROVINSKY AND GUTTMACHER'S MEDICAL AND GYNOCOLOGIC COMPLICATIONS OF PREGNANCY, 3RD ED., 1985 ..... 15, 16, 19, 23, 25

Hatcher, R.A., M.D., et. al., CONTRACEPTIVE TECHNOLOGY, 1988-89, 14TH REV. ED..... 12

Hern, Is Pregnancy Really Normal?, 3 FAMILY PLANNING PERSPECTIVES 7 (JAN. 1971) 20, 21, 25

Hopkins, J., Marcus, M., Campbell, S.B., Postpartum Depression: A Critical Review, 95 PSYCHOLOGICAL BULLETIN 3, 1984 22

Kinsey, Pomeroy and Martin, SEXUAL BEHAVIOR IN THE HUMAN MALE (1948) 13

Macy and Huncher, An Evaluation of Maternal Nitrogen and Mineral Needs During Embryonic and Infant Development, 27 AM. J. OBST. & GYNEC. 878 (1934) 20

No. 88-605

In The

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WEBSTER, ET. AL.

APPELLANTS

VS.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, ET. AL.

APPELLEES

On Appeal from the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit

BRIEF FOR ORGANIZATIONS AND NAMED WOMEN AS AMICUS CURIAE SUPPORTING APPELLEE.

CALIFORNIA NATIONAL ORGANIZATION FOR WOMEN
SAN JOSE--SOUTH BAY CHAPTER
NATIONAL ORGANIZATION FOR WOMEN
CALIFORNIA ALLIANCE CONCERNED
WITH SCHOOL AGE PARENTS
LYNNETTE PERKES
CHERIEL JENSEN
PATRICIA SANDERS
SUZANNE JENSEN
GENEVIEVE PERKES
PAMELA HARTER

ROBIN YEAMANS
1475 SARATOGA AVENUE, #140
SAN JOSE, CALIFORNIA
Attorney for Amici Curiae

The attorneys for Appellee and Appellant have consented to the filing of this Amicus Brief on behalf of organizations and individuals listed below:

THE CALIFORNIA NATIONAL ORGANIZATION FOR WOMEN represents 26,000 members in 50 Chapters throughout the State of California. Because the decision to become a parent deeply impacts the economic, medical, and emotional health of women, CALIFORNIA NATIONAL ORGANIZATION FOR WOMEN believes that each woman must remain the final arbitrator of when and whether to become a parent.

THE SAN JOSE-SOUTH BAY CHAPTER OF THE NATIONAL ORGANIZATION FOR WOMEN is located in the San Francisco Bay Area, California. It was founded in 1970 and consists of approximately 500 members dedicated to active work in bringing women into the mainstream of society and affirming a belief in the basic human right to autonomy over one's body.

CALIFORNIA ALLIANCE CONCERNED WITH SCHOOL AGE PARENTS works to assure that teenagers can make informed choices regarding reproductive health services.

LYNNETTE PERKES believes a decision to allow restricted abortion would expose herself, her husband and her children to the consequences of increased population growth at a time when population pressures threaten the land, water and atmosphere of the earth which all must share. A decision which restricts access to abortion would expose her daughter to the same risky accidental pregnancies she faced with two contraceptive failures and to the same unequal treatment in the working world which she faced in the past when women were denied access to education, training and job opportunities because they were constantly at risk of accidental pregnancy.

The concern of CHERIEL JENSEN stems from her commitment to the quality of life for her children and all children. Children must be created only where they have unqualified love and optimum conditions for their growth and development. She expects her government to respect the intellect of women, as they are indeed smart enough to choose the right time for child bearing. She asserts that being human requires active participation to shape the future, more than simple biological imperative.

PATRICIA SANDERS, a Licensed Vocational Nurse, is concerned that no person should repeat her experience of having four children before the age of 22 with the subsequent loss of education and ability to earn a living. She has seen her children go without many things commonly expected and feels great pain at her inability to provide for them. She is concerned that if abortion is restricted the decision as to whether or not an abortion is necessary will be made by someone who inherently cannot and does not know the situation and resources of the person who must bear that child.

The concern of SUZANNE JENSEN stems from her desire to be able to pursue a course of study and a life's work confident in the knowledge that something will come of it and that childbearing will not continually interrupt or alter its course.

The concern of GENEVIEVE PERKES stems from concern that the states not restrict or deny access to abortion because that could deny her the right to make personal health, morality and reproductive decisions.

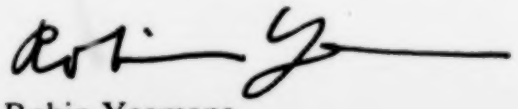
The concern of PAMELA HARTER is the welfare of her entire family when considering the potential impact of a pregnancy and bringing a child into the world. Inadequate birth control options, ie., an allergy to spermicide, previous pelvic inflammatory disease from an IUD--limit her to a barrier method and its attendant high risk of unwanted pregnancy. She must be able to be in control of her life and not be controlled by her reproductive processes.

The organizations and individuals urge upon the court the position that laws restricting or regulating abortion as a special procedure violate the Thirteenth Amendment by imposing involuntary servitude without due conviction for a crime and without the justification of serving any current national public need, and are indeed antithetical to current public need.

Amici believe this Brief raises aspects of constitutional issues before this Court hitherto unexplored by the parties, and that the expressions herein will be of assistance to the Court in the decisions of importance now before it.

For these reasons, we respectfully request leave to file the within Brief Amici Curiae.

Respectfully submitted,



Robin Yeamans
Attorney for Amici

No. 88-605

In The

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WEBSTER, ET. AL.
APPELLANTS
VS.
REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, ET. AL.
APPELLEES

On Appeal from the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit

BRIEF FOR ORGANIZATIONS AND NAMED WOMEN AS AMICUS CURIAE SUPPORTING APPELLEE.

OPINIONS BELOW.

The opinions have been stated in Appellee's Brief and are not repeated herein.

JURISDICTION.

The jurisdiction has been stated in Appellee's Briefs and is not repeated herein.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT.

This Amicus Brief will address itself to two issues in this case and their interaction. We believe the Missouri Statutes under review on appeal, would confer upon the conceptus not only the rights of a person but also rights vastly in excess of those which any live born person has over another person: the right to live inside that person's body, the right to compel the use of that person's labor, body substances and internal organs, and the right to subject that person to pain, suffering and physical injury. We believe these statutes violate the Thirteenth Amendment, by imposing involuntary servitude without due conviction for a crime and the Fourteenth Amendment by depriving the pregnant woman of rights and protections which all others enjoy.

The Solicitor General has requested the court to reconsider Roe. V. Wade at the same time. We believe that the interaction of these two appeals, if granted, would have a severe impact on the constitutional rights and the lives of all women.

ARGUMENT: THE MISSOURI STATUTES VIOLATE THE THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT GUARANTEE OF FREEDOM FROM INVOLUNTARY SERVITUDE

I. THIS COURT HAS AFFIRMED THE PROMISE OF FREEDOM FOR WOMEN. MISSOURI STATUTES AND THE CHALLENGE TO ROE V. WADE PLACE FREEDOM IN JEOPARDY.

Missouri Revised Statutes §§1.205.1(1) and (2) and the request of the Solicitor General to overrule Roe v. Wade (410 U.S. 113) in his Brief For the United States as Amicus Curiae threaten the fundamental rights recognized by this Court in Roe v. Wade. The states would be unrestrained in their attempts to prohibit abortion, and thus to deprive women of their right to choose the timing and numbers of births.

Missouri Statutes §§ 1.205.1(1) and (2), declare fetal rights and thus attempt to grant to the conceptus[1] a right no person has, that is the right to inhabit the body of another unwilling person.

Amici request this Court to consider the impact that validation of these requests would have on the lives of women. Amici request the court consider the effect such a validation would have on relationships of women to their families and of women to the larger community.

---

1 The term "conceptus" is used herein because it is the only term which means entire contents of the uterus at all stages of pregnancy. Medically the term "embryo" refers to the organism from conception through the first three months and "fetus" refers to the organism from the end of the first three prenatal months until birth.

II. THE STATE CANNOT ATTEMPT TO BALANCE THE RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN WITH THE RIGHTS OF PERSONS.

The Missouri Revised Statutes §§1.205.1(1), (2), (3) and §1.205.2 declare:

> (1) The life of each human being begins at conception;
>
> (2) Unborn children have protectable interests in life, health, and well-being;
>
> (3) The natural parents of unborn children have protectable interests in the life, health, and well-being of their unborn child.

1. Effective January 1, 1988, the laws of this state shall be interpreted and construed to acknowledge on behalf of the unborn child at every stage of development, all rights, privileges, and immunities available to other persons, citizens, and residents of this state, subject only to the Constitution of the United States and decisional interpretations thereof by the United States Supreme Court and specific provisions to the contrary in the statutes and constitution of this state.

The Missouri Statutes here at issue confer upon the unborn embryo and fetus all the rights, privileges and immunities available to persons, residents and citizens of the State; and require all Missouri laws to be construed accordingly.

These statutes and the request to overturn Roe v. Wade go well beyond that, however, and award the conceptus rights which no person has.

III. THE STATE CANNOT COMPEL THE SERVICE OF ONE PERSON FOR THE BENEFIT OF ANOTHER.

Even if the position were accepted, arguendo, that a conceptus is a "person" or "potential person," such recognition would not provide the state with a compelling interest to justify encroachment upon the pregnant woman's possession and control of her person.

If the pregnant woman and the conceptus she carries within her body come before the law as equal "persons," and the woman desires an abortion, may the state legitimately intervene to prevent or deter the abortion?

At the present state of medical knowledge the conceptus cannot survive without the contribution of the bodily force of a single female individual. Yet the laws regulating or deterring abortion, unlike all other laws in respect of persons, compel this pregnant woman to breathe, process food and donate blood and other substances from her own body.

The law does not give a person in need of blood the right to receive blood from an unwilling donor; the conclusiveness of the law on this subject being so clearly recognized that it is difficult even to imagine testing such a principle in the courts. There is no legal duty of the parent to contribute blood from his/her body for the donation to the living child even if required to keep a child alive. Living children cannot command any substance from their parents bodies. Although breastfed babies are healthier and more resistant to disease, mothers are not compelled to breast-feed their babies.

The law does not give a person in need of the donation of a kidney, bone marrow or skin graft the right to use another person's body parts. The Uniform Anatomical Gift Act or statutes with similar provisions, are now enacted in all 50 states and Washington D.C.[2] These Statutes recognize that body parts are contributed only by the voluntary act of the donor. These statutes are termed anatomical "gift" acts indicating that lawmakers did not intend to authorize forcible contributions of body parts from one individual to another.

Rather than protecting the interests of potential donees, the state zealously safeguards the rights of the potential organ donors. Legislators, courts and commentators, recognizing that there is no obligation, either legally or morally, for one person to supply another, even a close relative who may be dying, with a healthy organ, turn their attention to the issue of informed consent of the potential donor to make sure that he is acting free from any psychological coercion.[3]

---

2 Best, F. L. Jr., Transfers of Body Parts under the Uniform Anatomical Gift Act, REAL PROPERTY, PROBATE AND TRUST JOURNAL, 15 n4 806-836, Wint, 1980. Statutes based on the Uniform Anatomical Gift Act have been adopted by all 50 states. 806.

3 See Bonner v. Moran, 126 F2d 121 (D.C. Cir. 1941); Curran, A Problem of Consent: Kidney Transplantation, 34 N.Y.U. L. REV. 891 (1959); Richards, Medical-Legal Problems of Organ Transplantation, 21 HASTINGS L. J. 77 (1960); Sanders and Dukeminier, Medical Advance and Legal Lag: Hemodialysis and Kidney Transplantation, 15 U.C.L.A. L. REV. 357 (1968). These authors note that the law permits kidney donation only from adult persons fully informed of the risks and consequences; that the use of prisoners as organ donors has been discontinued on the grounds of possible abuse; that kidney transplantations from living donors are illegal in France because of the fear of moral or psychological coercion. That donors with only one remaining kidney run the risk of shortening their lives should they be afflicted with kidney disease; and conclude by questioning the propriety of allowing any donor to take such risk. Where the life of the kidney donor may be placed in jeopardy by his donation, or where the consent of a minor is involved, courts use extreme care to be sure that knowing and voluntary consent precede the donation.

As a general rule the law has traditionally been reluctant to impose liability on a person who has failed to rescue or aid one in peril as such liability would be an unwarranted limitation on personal freedom. The Failure to Rescue: A Comparative Study, 52 COLUMBIA L. REV. 631, 632 (1952). A person is not required to jeopardize his own safety to rescue another placed in danger by emergency circumstances. London v. Atlanta Transit Company (1965) 91 Ga. App. 753, 87 S. E. 2d 103, 106. This rule has a long history in case law.[4]

While it may be argued that the continuation of pregnancy is a non-active course and therefore lacking in comparison with cases relating to "no duty to act," once conception has taken place there is no non-active course open to the pregnant woman. To abort takes action; to carry and sustain the fetus for nine months, and then to bear it takes far more action. Even if the life support services the woman's body performs for the fetus are largely automatic and non-voluntary, they are not non-services or non-actions. They are, according to medical experts, arduous, tiring and obstructive of other work. The contractions of childbirth are literally "labor." They are the most strenuous work of which a human body is capable.

---

4 Toadvine v. Cincinnati, N.O. & T.R. Ry (E.D. Ky 1937), 20 F. Supp. 226; Allen v. Hixson, 111 Ga. 460, 36 S.E. 810 (1900); Hurley v. Eddingfield, 156 Ind. 416, 59 N.E. 1058 (1901); Gilbert v. Gwin-McCollum Funeral Home, 268 Ala. 372, 106 So. 2d 646 (1958); O'Keefe v. W. J. Barry Company, 311 Mass. 517, 42 N.E. 2d 267 (1942); Osterlind v. Hill, 263 Mass. 73, 160 N.E. 301 (1928).

Only those laws restricting or deterring abortion compel the contribution of one individual's organs, blood, breath and life support system for another entity, either fully or partially formed. Unless the law recognizes the conceptus as more valuable to the state or more worthy of the state's intervention than other potential donees of body organs or unless the state finds the freedom and integrity of pregnant women to be less valuable than that of other potential donors, the state cannot compel the pregnant woman to provide bodily service to a conceptus.

Whenever one person requires an organ donation, or pint of blood, or even the temporary use of the other person's lung power for artificial respiration, the potential donor's right to refuse is not measured by the degree of interest the state may take in the life of the potential recipient. Rather, it is measured against the potential donor's right in his/her own bodily integrity.

If a pregnant woman, as potential donor, and a conceptus, as potential donee, were to come before the law as equal "persons," one could not command the servitude of the other; and so the potential donor would retain her sovereignty over her body and her right to refuse. It follows that a conceptus, a potential person, can have no greater right over a potential donor, the pregnant woman. Unless the state has some other compelling interest in forcing the donation of the pregnant woman's body to the service of a conceptus, the state cannot legitimately intervene to prevent the pregnant woman from withholding her life force from a conceptus or from protecting herself from the damage it would do her body and her life.

IV. UNDER THE THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT A WOMAN HAS THE RIGHT TO FREEDOM FROM INVOLUNTARY PREGNANCY AND CHILDBEARING IN THE ABSENCE OF DUE CONVICTION FOR A CRIME.

A. Scope and Application of the Thirteenth Amendment.

The Thirteenth Amendment provides:

> Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

The Amendment, by its very language, prohibits both slavery and involuntary servitude, and requires due conviction of a crime as a condition precedent to all forms of involuntary servitude.

It is not limited to black slavery. From the outset, the Amendment has been interpreted to apply to all persons without regard to race or class, and to guarantee universal freedom in the United States. Civil Rights Cases of 1883, 109 U.S. 3. "[F]or the amendment is not a mere prohibition of state laws establishing or upholding slavery, but an absolute declaration that slavery or involuntary servitude should not exist in any part of the United States." (Id. at 20)

This Court had defined involuntary servitude as "a condition of enforced compulsory service of one to another." Hodges v. United States, 203 U.S. 1, 1906; and has found the Amendment prohibits many forms of compulsory labor, i.e., involuntary servitude of all kinds:

Laws compelling personal service for repayment of a debt or other obligation are null and void as violative of the Thirteenth Amendment Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U.S. 219 (1910); Clyatt v. United States, 197 U.S. 207 (1905); Pollack v. Williams, 322 U.S. 4 (1944).

Statutes imposing criminal penalties on laborers who fail to perform work necessary to pay off advance wages from an employer, are void as violative of the Thirteenth Amendment, the undoubted aim of the Amendment being, " not merely to end slavery but to maintain a system of completely free and voluntary labor throughout the United States." Pollock v. Williams, supra. at 17.

In this Court's earliest cases on involuntary servitude the court interpreted the Amendment to do more than prohibit slavery. In the first cases on the Amendment, supra, the court interpreted the Amendment as establishing two principles: (1) the prohibition of all forms of slavery, and (2) a guarantee of universal freedom to all persons. The Cases found that just as the opposite of "slavery" is freedom, so this Amendment, by abolishing the conditions of slavery and involuntary servitude, established "freedom" throughout the United States by implication. This Court construed the Amendment as "establishing and decreeing universal civil and political freedom throughout the United States." (Civil Rights Cases of 1883, 109 U.S. at 20).

The Thirteenth Amendment, as revived by this court with new force in Jones v. Mayer, 392 U.S. 409 (1968), reconsidered the early interpretation of the Amendment as set forth in The Civil Rights Cases of 1893. The court recognized within the Thirteenth Amendment the "promise of freedom," turning the focus again from what the Amendment prohibits to what it guarantees, a broader principle of freedom from compulsory service of one person to another. (Note, The New Thirteenth Amendment: A Preliminary Analysis, 82 HARVARD L. REV. 1264, 1307 [1969].

B. Involuntary Pregnancy.

Amici ask this Court to consider the lack of options open to the pregnant woman at the time of onset of her pregnancy.

1. Contraceptive failure.

Advances in contraceptive technology led to premature optimism that at last fertility could be controlled with safety and effectiveness, however it has become increasingly clear that no method is without risk. Any act of intercourse between a fertile man and woman still constitutes some risk of conception, no matter what contraceptives are used. Three women in four using the oral contraceptive "pill," will have one unplanned pregnancy over their 25 year reproductively susceptible years. An average woman using the intrauterine device (IUD) will have 1.5 unplanned pregnancies during her

25 reproductively susceptible years.[5] Even implants and sterilization have failure rates. One woman in ten using one of these methods become pregnant over 25 reproductively susceptible years.[6] The condom results in 3 failures and the diaphragm (with spermicidal cream or jelly) results in 4.5 failures per average woman over her 25-year reproductive life span. Other methods are far less reliable.[7]

"More than half of all pregnancies are reported to be unplanned: about one-quarter are terminated by abortion."[8] The magnitude of the problem of unplanned and unwanted pregnancy affects practically everyone for much of their adult lives. This problem is of enormous magnitude, affecting most women, their lives and families in substantial ways.

Under the present state of contraceptive failure, a woman does not have the option of remaining free of pregnancy by making careful use of contraceptives. She is at some risk in using the most effective methods of contraception available. One woman in 2,520 using the pill and one woman in 4,000 using the IUD over 25 years will die as a result.[9]

---

5 Hatcher, R.A., M.D., et. al., CONTRACEPTIVE TECHNOLOGY, 1988-89, 14TH. REV. ED, 151. Typical failure rates are: the pill, 3 percent; intrauterine device 6 percent. Each woman has 25 reproductively susceptible years. Multiply 25 years times device failure rate per 100 women years.

6 Id., 151.

7 Id.,157. Typical failure rates for the diaphragm = 18 per 100 woman years (4.5 per fertile woman lifetime); the condom = 12 per 100 woman years (3.0 per fertile woman lifetime); withdrawal = 18 per woman years (4.5 per fertile woman lifetime); rhythm = 20 per 100 woman years (5.0 per fertile woman lifetime).

8 Ory, M.D., Forrest, J.D., et. al., MAKING CHOICES, EVALUATING THE HEALTH RISKS AND BENEFITS OF BIRTH CONTROL METHODS, 1983.

9 Id., 157.

2. Limitations on the right to refuse.

The average married American woman expects to bear two children,[10] yet coitus takes place between a couple married during the woman's reproductive years (age 18 to 43) an average of 2,535 times.[11] The frequency of coitus reported is average behavior between married couples. If the woman wishes to remain free of pregnancy for a time or once her desired family size is reached, her only sure method of remaining so free is complete abstinence from sexual intercourse. If she embarks on such a course, will the law uphold her decision?

If a married woman attempts to practice abstinence, the laws of most states treat her behavior as a denial of the marital right of the husband. Some jurisdictions construe refusal of sexual relations as desertion and thus ground for divorce. In some other jurisdictions desertion is held to occur upon cessation of sexual relations notwithstanding that the spouses continue to take meals together, converse and in other ways behave as husband and wife.[12] In some other states in which

---

10 United States Department of Commerce, CURRENT POPULATION REPORTS, POPULATION CHARACTERISTICS, FERTILITY OF AMERICAN WOMEN: JUNE 1982, 1 Series P-20, No. 387 (April,1984) The lifetime births expected among American married women in June 1982 was 2.158.

11 This figure is derived from data provided in the Kinsey Report, SEXUAL BEHAVIOR OF THE HUMAN MALE, showing average marital coitus taking place with a frequency of 2.6 times per week when the male is age 20, and 1.3 times per week when the male is forty-five. As the figures show a straight line decline, the average weekly frequency rate is 1.95. Thus 1.95 times per week times 52 weeks per year times 25 fertile years = 2,535 acts of coitus per married woman's fertile lifetime. Kinsey, Pomeroy, and Martin, SEXUAL BEHAVIOR OF THE HUMAN MALE, at 255, data from Fig. 49 (1948).

12 Clark, THE LAW OF DOMESTIC RELATIONS, (1968) 336.

cruelty is a ground, such refusa! constitutes cruelty, giving the husband cause for divorce. In states now recognizing "no-fault" divorce, or dissolution of marriage, the husband no longer needs to plead or prove specific grounds; his dissatisfaction is thus acceptable as sufficient cause for dissolving the marriage.

Under most state laws, a married woman has two choices: she can attempt to refuse to fulfill the sexual obligations of the marriage and thus risk termination of her marriage; or she can participate in normal marital relations and risk unwanted pregnancy. With a choice of either alternative, she risks the consequence of a legally imposed penalty if Missouri Statutes are upheld and other states follow suit or Roe v. Wade is reversed for a woman is then left with no non-punishable alternative course of action.

C. Pregnancy as a State of Physical Servitude.

1. Pregnancy is work.

If the conceptus could be brought from conception to term outside the uterus, those who supplied its environment, its nutrients, hormones, oxygen and waste disposal would be recognized as having performed work. In natural pregnancy this work takes place inside the woman's body, largely out of sight and without specific willful action, never-the-less it remains arduous and demanding work and labor in every respect. It differs from the hypothetical case described above, however because in addition to the actual work and very real labor, the physical effects are always to the detriment of a woman's body.

We ask the court to consider this work and the costs, in deciding whether the state may refuse abortion and thus require one individual, the woman, to perform this work solely for a future individual against her will and without pay.

2. Demands on the heart and lungs.

Pregnancy presses a woman's entire body into the task of serving the conceptus. "The physical and functional alteration of pregnancy involve all the body systems . .".[13] A pregnant woman's blood volume and cardiac output increase 40 to 50 percent[14] and there is a 15 to 20 percent increase in her heart rate [15] Her lungs respire 45 percent more air in an attempt to obtain the needed oxygen but oxygen absorption is less than normal despite the extra effort of her crowded lungs.[16] Dyspnea (difficult breathing) and hyperventilation begin in midterm and increase as the expanding uterus compresses and displaces her lungs.[17] To breathe, many women find it necessary to sleep sitting up late in pregnancy. Sleep disturbance is common, amplified by the need for frequent urination caused by the increased kidney output especially 13 Hern, W., Is Pregnancy Really Normal?, 3 FAMILY PLANNING PERSPECTIVES 7 (January, 1971).

---

14 McClure, B., et. al., ANTINATAL CARE, London, 1970, 217.

15 Cherry, S.H., et al., ROVINSKY AND GUTTMACHER'S MEDICAL AND GYNECOLOGIC COMPLICATIONS OF PREGNANCY, 3rd Ed., 1985, 88.

16 Taylor, 199: Chaudhuri, Correlation of Toxemia with Anemia of Pregnancy, 106 AM J. OBST. & GYNEC., 255-258 (Jan. 15, 1970).

17 Cherry, S.H., Supra, 88.

when lying in a supine position.[18] Sleep disturbance accounts, in part, for the chronic fatigue characteristic of the third trimester. Thus, the work of gestation continues around the clock. Though frequent daily rest is generally advised,[19] few women today can afford such luxury. Fifty six percent of married women with husbands present are employed, as are 52.6 percent of married women with children one year and under.[20] Because of necessary income, paid work must continue for many pregnant women and the work of maintaining a family and household continues despite the debilitating effects of pregnancy.

3. Demands on the reproductive organs.

The process of giving birth is appropriately called labor. In a first birth, labor averages 12-17 hours, but may persist much longer. The contractions of childbirth are acknowledged to be the most strenuous work of which the human body is capable. According to Robert A. Wilson M.D., obstetrician and gynecologist, "The pressure exerted in this act of birth is at least 80 pounds per square inch. A truly astonishing feat of muscular strength"[21] This force is great enough to tear the woman's flesh. In almost all cases, physicians attempt to forestall tearing into the rectal sphincter and subsequent

18 Berkow, R. and Fletcher,A.J. , THE MERCK MANUAL OF DIAGNOSIS AND THERAPY, 15th Ed., 1987, 1747.

19 McClure Brown, supra, 39.

20 U.S. Department of Commerce, STATISTICAL ABSTRACT OF THE UNITED STATES, 1988, 373.

21 Wilson, Robert A., M.D. FEMININE FOREVER.

incontinence of feces by incision into the perineum (episiotomy).[22]

The historic term "labor pain" is also apt. The pain of labor is ischemic pain, which occurs when the demands on a muscle exceed its oxygen supply, the same kind of pain as that in a heart attack. Most women report labor to be the most severely painful experience of their lives. Attempts to alleviate it are generally not employed until after the most painful part of labor, the end of the first stage, has passed because they tend to stop the contractions.[23]

In America today, about 20 percent of births are by caesarian section.[24] Caesarian section is major abdominal surgery with many attendant risks, including a significant risk of bladder injury, usually through tearing or accidental incision, and increased incidence of thrombosis and infection.[25]

There is no other incidence in free countries, in which one individual can be forced to undergo trauma comparable to major surgery for the benefit of another.

4. Demands on the musculoskeletal system.

The expected weight gain in pregnancy is 25 to 30 pounds.[26] Thus late in pregnancy, a woman must transport a load equal to about one fifth of her total body weight, everywhere she goes. Walking becomes slow and difficult, and 22 Berkow, R. et. al.,supra, 1758..

23 Id., 1787.

24 Berkow, et. al. supra, 1787.

25 Cherry, et .al., supra, 179.

26 Berkow,, et. al. supra, 1750.

often painful as the ligaments in the pelvic joints loosen and she must try to stabilize the joints by muscular action.

The weight causes pressure on the cervical spine with wide ranging effects including numbness and proprioceptive acuity reduction in the hands.[27] This combined with progesterone induced loss of smooth muscle tone and relaxation of the ligaments may impair the function of the hands.

5. Demand on the circulatory system.

Enlargement of the uterus within the abdominal wall displaces and compresses the abdominal organs. Resulting pressure combined with hormone induced elastic tissue fragility leads to varicose veins in about 40 percent of pregnant women. Damage may occur in veins in the legs, the vulva or the rectum. Varicosities often appear to regress after delivery, but the damaged valves in the veins do not recover causing varicosities to extend and increase in subsequent pregnancies and with age. Leg vein stripping is often only a temporary solution as damage tends to move into unstripped areas. It almost impossible to repair varicosities in the vulva.[28]

Women with varicose veins may be required to wear elastic tights the rest of their lives. The pregnant woman is advised to avoid prolonged standing or sitting[29] but since most jobs women do require prolonged standing or sitting this advise can be followed only by women who can afford to lose months of employment.

27 Taylor, supra, 70, 216.

28 Wong, R.C., and Ellis, C.N., Physiologic Skin Changes in Pregnancy, JOURNAL OF THE AMERICAN ACADEMY OF DERMATOLOGY, Vol. 10, No. 6, June 1984, 933-935.

29 Wong, R.C., et. al., supra, 935.

Pulmonary embolism and deep vein thrombosis are 5.5 times as likely during pregnancy and the postpartum period as in a normal nonpregnant state[30] and account for between 7 and 15 percent of maternal deaths. Amniotic fluid embolus (entry of placental fluid into the pregnant woman's blood) is almost always fatal and is reported to account for up to 38 percent of maternal deaths.[31]

6. Impacts on the urinary tract.

The output of the kidneys is increased by up to 50 percent. The weight of the uterus, coupled with the same progesterone-induced muscle relaxation impedes the flow of urine, allowing bacteria to and ascend and become established in the kidneys. Bladder infections occur in 6 to 7 percent of pregnant women, and these in turn can lead to kidney infections.[32]

Severe damage to the woman's lower urinary tract due to prolonged labor has become rare in the United States due to the increase in caesarean births. Surgical bladder injury is now more frequent. The most common type of injury associated with prolonged labor is "a slough of the entire urethra and bladder neck with resultant fistula formation. Repair of these lesions is especially difficult, especially if 30 Cherry, et. al. supra, p.137.

31 Sachs, B.P., and D. Acker, M.D, CLINICAL OBSTETRICS: A PUBLIC HEALTH PERSPECTIVE, PSG Pub.,17. Also see Cherry, et. al. supra, 88.

32 Hern, supra, 8.

continence is to be retained."[33] Bladder control may be permanently lost.[34] "More than 100 different surgical procedures have been recommended to control involuntary loss of urine, attesting to the ineffectiveness of any one."[35]

7. Transfer of the woman's body substance to the conceptus.

Because the conceptus uses almost twice as much calcium as the pregnant woman can assimilate from dietary and administered calcium, she must supply the extra calcium from her own body stores, mostly from her long bones. In young women who have not attained full skeletal growth, permanent bone deformation results.[36] In women over the age of thirty-five, the body is no longer able to deposit new calcium into the bones as required, so calcium loss is permanent, thus late pregnancy hastens the onset and increases the severity of osteoporosis.

Total loss of a woman's iron stores during pregnancy, and delivery is measured at 680 mg.[37] Thus anemia of pregnancy is high. During repeat pregnancies a woman has no iron reserve to fall back on and profound iron deficiencies will rapidly develop.[38] Efforts to correct this condition often fail

33 Marchant D.J., Clinical Evaluation of Urinary Incontinence and Abnormal Anatomy and Pathophysiology, CLINICAL OBSTETRICS AND GYNECOLOGY, VOL. 27 No. 2. June, 1984, 435.

34 Hern, supra, 8.

35 Marchant, supra, 435.

36 Hern, W. supra.

37 Taylor, supra, See also Stevens, M. B., CLINICAL NUTRITION, 1979, 134.

38 McClure Browne, supra, 258.

because she may not be able to tolerate or absorb iron supplements.[39]

8. Impacts on the brain.

The marked increase in thyroid function typical in pregnancy frequently produces the same emotional instability associated with hyperthyroidism.[40] Increased levels of progesterone also lead to irritability, lassitude, severe emotional tension, nervousness, inability to concentrate and inability to sleep.[41]

Post-partum depression affects as many as 20 percent of women in the year following childbirth. Post-partum depression (as distinct from the "maternity blues," a brief episode which affects 80 percent of women shortly after childbirth), is comparable to a major or minor clinical depression: "[The patient] withdraws from social interaction, has difficulty concentrating, and experiences a distressing inability to respond emotionally. . . Performance and productivity are impaired, reflecting the patient's underlying vacillation and lack of drive Psychomotor retardation, manifest as slowing of movement or speech, is a significant central feature."[42] Ten percent of women remain affected after more than a year. Suspicion as to the cause of this extremely prevalent disease centers on observed decrease in levels of certain neurotransmitters, shown to be associated with mood disorders, during

39 Taylor, supra, 255-258.

40 Berkow, et. al. supra, 1748.

41 Hern , 8: Taylor, 73.

42 McClure Browne, supra, 164.

pregnancy and the postpartum period. Since stress is shown to be associated with the development of depression, the role played by the stress of pregnancy is under investigation.[43]

In times of stress and pain, the body secretes and releases into the bloodstream chemicals almost identical to morphine, valium and other psychoactive drugs. A number of these endogenous opiates build up in the pregnant woman's body in response to the stress of pregnancy, peaking at the time of labor and then abruptly falling. The exact effect of months spent under heavy doses of these endogenous opiates and their sudden withdrawal is not known, however, they appear to have a similar effect on cognitive function as other opiates.[44]

9. Impacts on the alimentary canal.

"Pregnancy with its attendant physical, hormonal, and physiologic alterations, significantly affects the gut at many levels. It displaces stomach, small intestine, colon, and biliary tree; it impairs appropriate functioning of the lower easophageal sphincter; it decreases gastric acidity; it is associated with changes in the selective absorption mechanisms of small intestine and colon and probably in pancreatic secretion as well. As a result, history and physical examination of the gravid patient may be misleading and laboratory data . . of little clinical use. The presence of the fetus may restrain the clinician from pursuing a thorough diagnostic evaluation . . . Even if correct diagnosis is made, concerns for progression of pregnancy and fetal development may limit the employment of the entire available therapeutic [arsenal]."[45]

43 Hopkins, J., Marcus, M., Campbell, S.B., Postpartum Depression: A Critical Review, 95 PSYCHOLOGICAL BULLETIN 3, 1984, 498-515.

44 Rauramo, I., Release of Beta Endorphins in Response to Physical Exercise in Non-pregnant Women and Pregnant Women, 65 ACTA, OBST. GYNEC. (1986), 609-615, Scandanavia. Also see Newnham, J.P., et. al., Endogenous Opiod Peptides in Pregnancy, 90 BRITISH J. OF OBST. & GYNEC. June, 1983, 535-538.

Nausea and vomiting affect over half of all pregnant women. These symptoms, which vary in severity in direct proportion to the increased levels of estrogen produced by the placenta, are most severe in but not necessarily confined to morning hours. They subside after 14 weeks in most women, but not all. In 10 per cent, they last twenty weeks or longer, and in some they persist throughout the entire term.[46] In the past pernicious vomiting--vomiting which continues throughout pregnancy--was one of the most common reasons for abortion to save the life of the pregnant woman, severe cases causing death from starvation and dehydration. Today, the woman's life can almost always be saved through hospitalization and intravenous feeding, but physicians hesitate to prescribe any drugs for nausea since the thalidamide tragedy.[47]

Heartburn commonly accompanies nausea of pregnancy, and often returns during the third trimester due to impaired functioning of the esophageal sphincter, caused by pressure on the stomach exerted by the conceptus. Compression and progesterone-induced loss of muscle tone lead to constipation,

45 Cherry, et. al., supra, 196.

46 Id., 196.

47 McClure Browne, et. al., supra, 157.

often compounded by the iron required to relieve anemia,[48] and this in turn leads to hemorrhoids.

10. Impacts on the skin.

Most pregnant women experience skin alteration including; striae gravida--lines on the belly, thighs and breasts where the elastic tissues of the skin has ruptured, excessive hair growth on the face, and hair loss on the scalp, hyperpigmentation--brown patches on the face and elsewhere, spider veins--patches of tiny, broken veins. These changes partially recede after childbirth. Jaundice is also common and gingivitis--inflammation and swelling of the gums--is almost universal.[49] Several rare, but extremely serious and sometimes fatal diseases associated only with pregnancy include prurigo gestatonis, impetigo herpetiforas, and papular dermatitis of pregnancy.[50]

11. Impacts on the endocrine system.

Pregnancy alters the function of most endocrine glands. Thyroid function frequently increases, causing symptoms of hyperthyroidism, including emotional instability, tachycardia, palpitations, perspiration, and enlarged thyroid gland.[51]

At least 40 per cent of pregnant women develop symptomatic edema, distorting the face, hands, ankles and feet due to elevated levels of progesterone. Increased progesterone levels also lead to increased blood pressure, relaxation of the

48 Id.,163.
49 Wong, Ellis, supra, 938.
50 McClure Browne, et. al., supra, 295.
51 Berkow, et. al. supra, 1748.

body's smooth muscle tissue, weight gain, and a variety of adverse symptoms.[52] Increased adrenal hormone levels may also contribute to edema.

Glucose metabolism is modified increasing the need for insulin, causing patients with prediabetis to frequently develop more overt forms of the disease.[53]

12. Impacts on the immune system.

Pregnant women show an increased vulnerability to infection by a wide variety of bacterial, fungal, protozoan and viral diseases. It has recently been discovered that the fetus generates suppressor cells which defend it from rejection by the woman's immune system and, in the process, suppress her immune system's ability to fight off other invaders.[54]

13. Delayed impacts

With such a wide array of symptoms, why are mortality rates not higher? They may be much higher than reported. Deaths after 42 days following delivery are not counted as maternal deaths. In Georgia, 27 percent of pregnancy related deaths occurred after 42 days in 1974-75. Epidemiological studies depend on vital statistics abstracted from death certificates. A large number of maternal deaths are not diagnosed as such. Even maternal deaths diagnosed may not be reported. Only five states have space on death certificates to report recent pregnancy, and no states routinely cross link for maternal deaths. Such a linkage captured 27 percent more 52 Hern, supra, 7; Taylor, supra, 73.

53 Berkow, et. al., supra, 1748.
54 Cherry, et. al. supra, 2.

maternal deaths within the 42 days of delivery and 33 percent additional deaths within the first year (Georgia 1975-76).[55]

14. Summary.

Pregnancy is often called a healthy state. Virtually every one of its usual symptoms, however, is detrimental to the woman's body. Many of the physical damages it causes persist for life. There is no doubt a similar list of symptoms, if applied in any other circumstances, would be considered an illness. A caesarean section is as extreme an invasion of the body as can be imagined and normal delivery, which can be a lengthy and more painful physical trauma, usually results in a wound. Certainly, a trauma of this magnitude, if it were imposed on any other person would be considered an injury. In no other situation may the state compel such an injury.

V. THE STATE HAS NOT SHOWN A COMPELLING INTEREST FOR SUBORDINATING THE RIGHTS OF A WOMAN TO A CONCEPTUS.

A. The Necessity of Showing a Compelling State Interest.

The Thirteenth Amendment guarantees to every person those fundamental rights which are "the essence of civil freedom." (Jones v. Mayer, supra; The Civil Rights Cases, supra. In Union Pacific Railway Company v. Botsford, 141 U.S. 250, 251 (1891), this court recognized:

55 Sachs, B.P., et. al., supra, 5-7.

> No right is held more sacred, or is more carefully guarded, by the common law, than the right of every individual to the possession and control of his own person, free from all restraint or interference of others, unless by clear and unquestionable authority of law.

It is clear that in order to justify the regulation of an individual's fundamental rights of personal liberty, the state must show "a subordinating interest which is compelling." Bates v. City of Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516, 524 (1960).

The state's regulation must be "necessary . . . to the accomplishment of a permissible state policy." (McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184, 196 [1964]; NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 438 [1963]; Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 403 [1963]), and must be narrowly drawn to express only the limited state interests at stake." Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 155 and not of "unlimited and indiscriminate sweep." Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479 (1960). See also Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 308 (1940); McCann v. Babbitz, 310 F. Supp. 293 (E.D. Wis. 1970), (per curiam) appeal dismissed, 400 U.S. 1 (1970) (per curiam)

The same standard is used for state regulation impinging on individual rights to choose an abortion (Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747, 759 [1986], City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416, 420, 426-43, [1983]) as is applied to any regulation that impinges on fundamental rights, Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 at 155-6.

B. Areas of Exception Permitting the Imposition of Involuntary Servitude.

The law has recognized limited exceptions to the Thirteenth Amendment, but such exceptions have been based on the state's compelling interest in serving the common public need.

These exceptions have taken place only in areas of common need; and even then with safeguards for private interests. Arver v. United States (Selective Draft Law Cases,) 245 U.S. 366 (1918); United States v. Lumsden, 449 F.2d 154 (9th Cir. 1971). However, the draftee is not pressed into service if his physical condition is below medical standards determined by physicians. (Selective Service Act of 1967, 50 U.S.C.A. app. Sec. 454 [a]): Moreover, the draftee is paid for his services (Id. Sec. 454 [e]); and is further reimbursed by way of veterans' benefits (38 U.S.C. Sec 101, et seq.).

The compulsory commitment of mentally ill individuals who may be harmful to themselves or to society if allowed to remain at large is an exception to the Thirteenth Amendment, but only if commitment procedures contain sufficient procedural safeguards and if the activities required of the individuals are for therapeutic purposes. Johnson v. Henne, 355 F.2d 129 (1966). But the involuntary committed mental patient retains a right of autonomy over his body, a right to refuse medical treatment. Rennie v. Klien, 653 F2d 836 (3d Cir. 1981) vacated on remand, 720 F.2d 266 (3d Cir. 1983) reaffirm a constitutional right to refuse drugs.

Jury duty is another exception to involuntary servitude, as such service is for the protection of liberty of the citizen.

Crews v. Lundquist, 361 Ill. 193, 197 N.E. 768 (1935). There are safeguards as well. The citizen called for jury duty is excused if personal duties override.

This right has been extended even to the refusal of life-sustaining medical treatment. In re. Conroy, 486 A.2d 1209-1229 (1985) where the court stated that refusal was 'a very personal right to control one's own life."

Payment and reporting of taxes is not regarded as involuntary servitude because the service is for support of the general welfare and not for another individual. Beltran v. Cohen, 303 F.Supp. 889 (N.D. Cal. 1969)

Child support payments are applied in most states, with care not to impose an undue burden on the non-custodial parent. This parent is, in most divorce cases, the father, whose well-being the courts consider so carefully that, on the average, his standard of living rises after divorce (reported in one study to be 43 percent) while that of the mother and children declines (by 73 percent).[56] If a man's circumstances change due to illness or disability, or even job loss, the courts will adjust his payments. No man is required by law to work at a particular job to pay child support. No man has been required to undergo pain or damage to his own body to support a child.

C. The Nature of the States Interest in the Abortion Conflict.

---

56 Weitzman, L.J., 1987.

Today, this country's population has moved far beyond its needed growth, and current government policy is to encourage population control. The state has no compelling need for unwanted births.

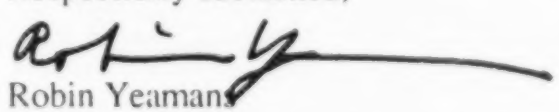
Women have been able to step into the main stream of society because they have been enabled by this court to control their reproduction. This court has not ignored fundamental rights of women.

At this time this court is being asked to confer rights on a conceptus that no person has, and in doing so strip women of their rights recently affirmed under the Fourteenth Amendment. We submit that such an action would not only violate the Fourteenth Amendment but it would violate the Thirteenth Amendment's promise of freedom.

VI. CONCLUSION.

We respectfully request this Court to recognize that anti-abortion laws, such as the Missouri Statutes, which force an unwillingly pregnant woman to continue pregnancy to term are a form of involuntary servitude without due conviction for a crime and without the justification of serving any public need, in violation of the Thirteenth Amendment as well as the Fourteenth Amendment.

Respectfully submitted,



Robin Yeamans

Attorney for Amici Curiae.

AMICUS CURIAE

BRIEF

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
MAR 30 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

No. 88-605

IN THE

Supreme Court Of The United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,

Appellants,

v.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,

Appellees.

On Appeal From the United States
Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit

BRIEF FOR POPULATION-ENVIRONMENT BALANCE, POPULATION COMMUNICATION, SIERRA CLUB, WORLD POPULATION SOCIETY, WORLDWATCH INSTITUTE, JESSIE SMITH NOYES FOUNDATION AND ZERO POPULATION GROWTH AS AMICI CURIAE SUPPORTING APPELLEES

Dina R. Lassow*
Sandra Goldberg

1531 P Street, N.W.
Suite 200
Washington, D.C. 20005
(202) 667-4500

Attorneys for Amici

*Attorney of Record

Balmar Legal Publishing Division, Washington, D.C. 20005 (202) 659-3610

TABLE OF CONTENTS

INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE 1

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT 2

ARGUMENT 3

I. THE WORLD'S RAPIDLY INCREASING POPULATION IS CONSUMING THE EARTH'S RESOURCES AND DESTROYING THE ENVIRONMENT 3

A. Consumption of Resources in Developed Countries is Polluting the Environment 6

B. Destruction of Resources in Developing Countries is Occurring at an Alarming Rate 8

C. Rapidly Growing Urban Areas are Becoming Increasingly Unhealthy 9

D. Society is Threatened by Global Warming and Depletion of the Ozone Layer 10

E. Tropical Rainforests Are Being Destroyed Because of Population Growth 12

II. WOMEN NEED ACCESS TO FULL AND UNCENSORED INFORMATION ABOUT THEIR REPRODUCTIVE CHOICES TO SLOW POPULATION GROWTH AND LIMIT DAMAGE TO THE ENVIRONMENT 13

A. Access to Reproductive Information Throughout the United States Could be Restricted if the Decision Below is Reversed 16

B. Access to Reproductive Information in Developing Countries Could be Restricted if the Decision Below is Reversed 19

CONCLUSION 22

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

Cases: Page

Baggett v. Bullitt, 377 U.S. 360 (1964) 15

Bigelow v. Virginia, 421 U.S. 809, 821-22 (1975) . . . 17

Commonwealth of Massachusetts v. Bowen, 679 F. Supp. 137 (D.C. Mass. 1988), appeal pending, No.88-1279 (1st Cir.) . . . . . 16 n. 25, 17, 18

Consolidated Edison Co. v. Public Service Commission, 447 U.S. 530 (1980) 20

DKT Memorial Fund v. AID, 630 F. Supp. 238 (D.D.C. 1986), reversed and remanded, 810 F.2d 1236 (D.C. Cir. 1987) . . . . . 19-20 n. 28

DKT Memorial Fund v. AID, 691 F. Supp. 394 (D.D.C. 1988), appeal pending, Nos. 88-5243 and 88-5266 (D.C. Cir.) . . . . . 19, 20, 21 n. 29

Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980) 17

Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977) 17

NAACP v. Alabama, 377 U.S. 288 (1964) 20

Perry v. Sindermann, 408 U.S. 593 (1972) 17

Planned Parenthood Federation of America v. Bowen, 670 F. Supp. 538 (S.D.N.Y. 1987), reversed and remanded, 838 F.2d 649 (2d Cir. 1988) . . . . . 20 n. 28

Planned Parenthood Federation of America v. Bowen, 680 F. Supp. 1465 (preliminary injunction), 687 F. Supp. 540 (permanent injunction) (D. Colo. 1988), appeal pending, No. 88-2251 (10th Cir.) . . . . . 16 n. 25, 17, 18, 19

Police Department of Chicago v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92 (1972) 15

Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513 (1958) 15

State of New York v. Bowen, 690 F. Supp. 1261 (S.D.N.Y. 1988), appeal pending, No. 88-6204 (2d Cir.) . . . . . 16 n. 25

Village of Hoffman Estates v. The Flipside, Hoffman Estates, Inc., 455 U.S. 489 (1982) 15

Constitutional Provisions:

First Amendment 14-22

Fifth Amendment 17

Fourteenth Amendment . . . . . 15& n. 24

Statutes and Regulations:

Global Climate Protection Act of 1987, 15 U.S.C.A. § 2901(2) (West. Supp. 1988) 11

Public Health Services Act of 1970, Title X, 42 U.S.C.A. § 300 et seq. (West 1982) 16
42 U.S.C.A. § 300a-6. (West 1982) 17

RSMo. § 188.200(3) (1986) . . . . . 14 n. 22

RSMo. § 188.205 (1986) 14

Title X Regulations, 53 Fed. Reg. 2922 (February 2, 1988) 17-19

Other Authorities:

The Alan Guttmacher Institute, Organized Family Planning Services in the United States, 1981-1983 (December 1984) 18

C. Bartone, "The Value in Wastes," 7 Decade Watch, No. 3, at 1 (United Nations Development Programme, September 1988) 10

L. Brown, et al., State of the World 1988-89, A Worldwatch Institute Report on Progress Toward a Sustainable Society (1989) . . . . . 6 n. 11, 7, 8, 9

S. Camp, The Impact of the Mexico City Policy on Women and Health Care in Developing Countries, 20 N.Y.U. J.Int'l L. & Pol. 35 (1987) 20, 21

M. Chamle, S. Eisman, J.D. Forrest, M.T. Orr, A. Torres, "Factors Affecting Adolescents' Use of Family Planning Clinics," 14 Family Planning Perspectives 126 (1982) 18

Council on Environmental Quality and U.S. Department of State, II The Global 2000 Report to the President, The Technical Report (1980) . . . . 6 & n. 10

Council on Environmental Quality and U.S. Department of State, Global Future: Time to Act, Report to the President on Global Resources, Environment and Population (1981) . . . . . passim

A.H. Ehrlich and P.R. Ehrlich, "Population, Plenty, and Poverty," 174 National Geographic, No. 6, at 914 (December 1988) 6

J.D. Forrest, "Unintended Pregnancy Among American Women," 19 Family Planning Perspectives, No. 2, at 76 (1987) . . . . . 18 n. 27

The Greenhouse Effect and Global Climate Change, Part 2, Hearing Before the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, 100th Cong., 1st Sess. (1988) . . . . . 11 n. 16

S.K. Henshaw, J.D. Forrest, and J. VanVort, "Abortion Services in the United States, 1984 and 1985," 19 Family Planning Perspectives, No. 2, at 63 (1987) . . . . . 4 n. 8

N.Y. Times, Feb. 27, 1989, at A16, col. 4 20

N.Y. Times, March 18, 1989, at 1, col. 2 10

H. Otterstetter and A. Flores, "Water, Source of Life," World Health 11 (World Health Organization, October 1987) 9

W. Petersen, Population (1969) 3

Population Crisis Committee, Access to Birth Control: A World Assessment, Population Briefing Paper No. 19 (October 1987) . . . . . 4 n. 6

R. Repetto, "Population, Resources, Environment: An Uncertain Future," 42 Population Bulletin, No.2 (1987) . . . . . 3 n. 2, 7, 8

S.J. Segal, Contraceptive Innovations: Needs & Opportunities, Presented at 1989 Conference on Demographic & Programmatic Consequences of Contraceptive Innovations, Sponsored by the Committee on Population of the Nat'l Academy of Sciences . . . . . 4 n. 4

J.D. Underwood, "Managing Hazardous Wastes is Not Enough," 11 Industry and Environment, No. 1, at 29 (U.N. Environment Programme, March 1988) . . . . . 7 n. 12

United Nations, Population Bulletin of the United Nations, No. 14 (1983) . . . . . 5 n. 9

United Nations, The Prospects of World Urbanization; Revised as of 1984-1985 (1987) . . . . . 9 & n. 15

United Nations Environment Programme, General Assessment of Progress in the Implementation of the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification (1984) . . . . . 8 n. 14

United Nations Environment Programme, The Ozone Layer (1987) . . . . . 12 & n. 19

U.S. Bureau of the Census, Current Population Reports, series P- 25, Nos. 952 and 1006 . . . . . 4 n. 7

U.S. Bureau of the Census, Historical Abstract of the U.S.: Colonial Times to 1970 (1975) 3

U.S. Department of Agriculture, Economic Research Service, "The Magnitude and Costs of Groundwater Contamination from Agricultural Chemicals," Agricultural Economic Report, No. 576 (October 1987) . . . . . 7 n. 13, 8

U.S. Department of Energy, Energy and Air Quality (December 1981) . . . . . 11 & n. 17

U.S. Department of State, The World's Tropical Forests: A Policy, Strategy and Program for the U.S., Report to the President by a U.S. Interagency Task Force (May 1980) . . . . . 12 & n. 20, 13

U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, Office of Policy, Planning and Evaluation, Greenhouse Effect, Sea Level Rise and Coastal Wetlands (1988) . . . . . 11 n. 18

Washington Post, November 28, 1988, at A1, col. 1 10

World Bank, Poverty & Human Development (1980) 8

World Commission on Environment and Development, Our Common Future (1987) . . . . . 14 n. 21

World Resources Institute, Int'l Institute for Environment and Development, in collaboration with U.N. Environment Programme, World Resources 1988-89 (1988) . . . . . 4 n. 5, 6, 8, 10, 11

21 Zero Population Growth Reporter, No. 1 (February 1989) 7

No. 88-605

IN THE

Supreme Court Of The United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,

Appellants,

v.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,

Appellees.

On Appeal From the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit

BRIEF FOR POPULATION-ENVIRONMENT BALANCE, POPULATION COMMUNICATION, SIERRA CLUB, WORLD POPULATION SOCIETY, WORLDWATCH INSTITUTE, JESSIE SMITH NOYES FOUNDATION AND ZERO POPULATION GROWTH AS AMICI CURIAE SUPPORTING APPELLEES

INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE

Amici are national and international nonprofit organizations that are concerned with promoting responsible use of the earth's resources, and with the interrelationship of population growth and the environment. They are interested in this case primarily because of the potential detrimental impact on family planning programs both here and abroad of the provision of the Missouri statute at issue that prohibits "encouraging or counseling a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life." A description of each amicus appears in the Appendix. Letters of consent to the filing of this brief from all parties have been submitted to the Court.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The environment is now under severe strain. High temperatures and severe drought in the summer of 1988 focused the nation's attention on global warming. New reports about skin cancer made depletion of the ozone layer a subject of public concern. We read daily about drought, famine, toxic wastes, and air and water pollution.

Studies by the United Nations, federal agencies and private organizations show that a major factor underlying environmental problems is the world's rapidly increasing population. While it took 130 years, from 1800 to 1930, for the earth's population to grow from one billion to two billion, it took only thirteen years, from 1974 to 1987, for the population to grow from four billion to five billion.

In the United States and the other developed countries, increases in population mean a highly disproportionate increase in the consumption of resources and the production of waste. In the developing countries, where the population is exploding, the productivity of arable land is being ruined by overuse, and forests needed to maintain the ecological balance are rapidly disappearing.

Enabling women to plan the size of their families is crucial not only to individual women, as others will stress before this Court, but also to the preservation of the global environment. Protecting a woman's fundamental right to choose, without coercion, whether or not to have an abortion, and her right to have access to information about abortion are essential. Regardless of one's personal views, the fact remains that if abortion were not an option, the strains on the environment would be even greater because the population would be increasing substantially faster. In 1986, the world's population increased by about 82 million and approximately 54 million abortions were performed.

The decision in this case could have worldwide ramifications, because the United States seeks to impose restrictions on dissemination of information about abortion in federally funded family planning programs both here and in developing countries. In developing countries, these restrictions have already had a detrimental impact on all aspects of family planning and women's health.

To avoid these adverse effects and promote voluntary efforts to address the problems resulting from population growth, a clear message should be sent that content-based censorship of speech about abortion cannot be tolerated under our Constitution, and the decision below should be affirmed.

ARGUMENT

I. THE WORLD'S RAPIDLY INCREASING POPULATION IS CONSUMING THE EARTH'S RESOURCES AND DESTROYING THE ENVIRONMENT

The world's population is now increasing at an astonishing rate. At the beginning of the nineteenth century, there were one billion people. It took 130 years to reach two billion, but only 30 years — to 1960 — to reach three billion.[1] Four billion was reached more than twice as fast — by 1974 — and, in 1987, only 13 years later, the five billion line was crossed.[2]

Population growth in the United States has also been dramatic. It is believed that there were about one million native Americans north of Mexico in 1492. W. Peterson, Population 359 (1969). In 1790, three centuries later, about 3.9 million people were counted in the first census. U.S. Bureau of the Census, Historical Abstract of the U.S.: Colonial Times to 1970, Table A-1-5 (1975). The increase of three million people that took three hundred years is now achieved in less than two years in the United States.

Slowing the rate of population growth both in the United States and throughout the world is essential for the protection of

---

[1] This is due to the fact that more people reproducing at about the same rate results in exponential population growth.

[2] R. Repetto, "Population, Resources, Environment: An Uncertain Future," 42 Population Bulletin, No.2, at 10 (July 1987).

the environment. As stated in a report to the President by the Council on Environmental Quality and the Department of State:

> There is a great need throughout the world for more people to be aware of the nature of the current population trends and their economic, political, environment and resource implications. . . . [T]he United States should take action to insure that population issues are at the forefront of the world's agenda. [3]

One population issue with broad implications is abortion, for the abortions now being voluntarily sought by women throughout the world have a substantial demographic impact. In many countries, particularly developing countries, contraceptives are difficult or sometimes impossible to obtain. Even if they are available, thirty million pregnancies per year result from contraceptive failure. [4] In 1986, when the world's population grew by about 82 million, [5] approximately 54 million abortions were performed: about 28 million in developing countries (including China), and about 26 million in the developed world. [6] In the United States, which is growing by about 2.2 million each year, [7] 1.6 million women had abortions in 1985. [8]

Moreover, the rate of population growth will make an enormous difference to the state of the world in the next century,

---

[3] Council on Environmental Quality and U.S. Department of State, Global Future: Time to Act, Report to the President on Global Resources, Environment and Population 11-12 (January 1981) (hereinafter Global Future).

[4] S.J. Segal, Contraceptive Innovations: Needs & Opportunities, Presented at 1989 Conference on Demographic & Programmatic Consequences of Contraceptive Innovations, Sponsored by the Committee on Population of the Nat'l Academy of Sciences.

[5] World Resources Institute, Int'l Institute for Environment and Development, in collaboration with U.N. Environment Programme, World Resources 1988-89 246 (1988) (hereinafter World Resources).

[6] Population Crisis Committee, Access to Birth Control: A World Assessment, Population Briefing Paper No. 19 (October 1987).

[7] U.S. Bureau of the Census, Current Population Reports, series P-25, Nos. 952 and 1006.

[8] S.K. Henshaw, J.D. Forrest, & J. VanVort, "Abortion Services in the United States 1984 and 1985," 19 Family Planning Perspectives, No. 2, at 63, 64 (1987).

determining whether 14 billion or 8 billion people will have to be fed and housed:

- if replacement-level fertility is reached in 2010, global population will stabilize at 7.7 billion by 2060;
- if this rate is reached in 2035, population will stabilize at 10.2 billion by 2095;
- if, however, the rate is reached only in 2065, global population in 2100 would be 14.2 billion. [9]

In view of these facts, it must be recognized that if population growth is realistically to be slowed, it is essential that women have full access to information about all their reproductive options, including abortion.

The environmental degradation that is now occurring is an early warning sign of the possibly devastating impact of continued rapid population growth:

> Severe stresses on the earth's resources and environment are apparent. With the persistence of human poverty and misery, the staggering growth of human population, and ever increasing human demands, the possibilities of further stress and permanent damage to the planet's resource base are very real.

Global Future, supra note 3, at ix. Unless population growth can be controlled, efforts to improve living conditions will be seriously undercut:

> explosive population growth . . . is severely hampering development by overwhelming all attempts to educate, house, and employ the population. In addition, attempts by growing numbers of people to wrest a living from the land is undermining the very soil, water, and forest resources on which long-term stability and improvements in the standard of living depend.

Id. at 2. The nature of the stresses which are appearing and the often self-defeating efforts of increasing numbers of people to feed themselves will be discussed below.

---

[9] United Nations, Population Bulletin of the United Nations, No. 14 (1983).

A. Consumption of Resources in Developed Countries is Polluting the Environment

Although the population growth rate in the United States is much lower than that in developing nations, the birth of a baby in this country has been estimated to impose more than a hundred times the stress on the world's resources and environment than a baby born in a developing nation. A.H. Ehrlich and P.R. Ehrlich, "Population, Plenty, and Poverty," 174 National Geographic 914, 917 (December 1988). In 1975, the population of the United States was 214 million.[10] In 1989, it will exceed 246 million, an increase of nearly 15 percent. World Resources, supra note 5, at 246. Because we have the highest per capita energy consumption in the world, this population growth greatly accelerates global environmental degradation. Global 2000, The Technical Report, supra note 10, at 347.

With only 6 percent of the world's population, the United States uses about 30 percent of the fossil fuel energy consumed worldwide. Global Future, supra note 3, at 61. Automobiles, major contributors to air pollution, are overwhelmingly concentrated in the United States and other advanced industrial societies. These societies account for only 16 percent of the world's population but 81 percent of the world's cars. [11]

The burning of coal and oil to generate electricity in the industrial nations emits sulfur and nitrogen oxides that are the major cause of another destructive by-product, acid rain. These emissions "will increase at an unprecedented rate in response to rapid world population growth and to wider application of sophisticated technologies." Global Future, supra note 3, at 142.

In addition to the fossil fuels we burn, hazardous chemicals used to produce products in demand in this country present a serious threat to the environment. Chemical production in the [10] Council on Environmental Quality and U.S. Department of State, II The Global 2000 Report to the President, The Technical Report, 16 (1980) (hereinafter Global 2000, The Technical Report).

[11] L. Brown, et al., State of the World 1989, A Worldwatch Institute Report on Progress Toward a Sustainable Society 100 (1989).

United States has skyrocketed in forty years from 20 to over 220 billion pounds a year, and about 600 million pounds of this ends up as hazardous wastes. [12]

Americans now each produce more than 3.5 pounds of garbage per day, up from 2.5 pounds in 1960. 21 Zero Population Growth Reporter, No.1, at 1 (February 1989). Last year, we produced 160 million tons of waste, more per capita than any country in the world. Id. Disposing of this garbage is an increasingly costly national problem and attempts to deal with it are frustrated by population growth.

Farmland in the United States also faces serious problems related to population growth, including soil erosion, water shortages, and conversion to other uses. In 1986, the Department of Agriculture reported that one quarter of our irrigated cropland was being watered by pulling down groundwater tables. Brown, supra note 11, at 50. However, groundwater supplies are limited and, particularly near the rapidly growing cities of the arid Southwest, farmers must compete with urban residents and industrial users for the limited supply.

In addition to causing competition with farmers for water, population increases and economic growth are forcing the conversion of farmlands to other uses. Recently, the United States has been losing about three million acres of rural land each year, one million of this prime farmland, because of the spread of housing developments, highways, shopping malls and parking lots. Global Future, supra note 3, at xii.

As farmland is lost and population increases, more chemicals are applied to the land to increase its productivity. Since 1964, agricultural use of pesticides in the United States has nearly tripled. [13] Pesticides have already caused contamination problems in groundwater in forty states. World Resources, supra note 5, at 135. Similarly, use of nitrogenous fertilizers in the United States, a major source of groundwater pollution, increased four-fold between 1960 and 1980. "Groundwater Contamination," supra note 13, at 2. Fifty-four million Americans are estimated to get their drinking water from groundwater sources that are potentially contaminated by pesticides, fertilizers or both. Id. at 17.

[12] J. D. Underwood, "Managing Hazardous Wastes is Not Enough,"11 Industry and Environment, No. 1, at 29, 29-30 (U.N. Environment Programme, March 1988).

[13] U.S.Department of Agriculture, Economic Research Service, "The Magnitude and Costs of Groundwater Contamination from Agricultural Chemicals," Agricultural Economic Report, No. 576, at 2 (October 1987) (hereinafter "Groundwater Contamination").

B. Destruction of Resources In Developing Countries Is Occurring at an Alarming Rate

In 1978, the World Bank estimated that 780 million people outside China and the centrally planned economies lived in "absolute poverty, barely able to survive." World Bank, Poverty & Human Development (1980). By 1987, with increases in population and a decrease in per capita grain production, this number probably exceeded one billion. Repetto, supra note 2, at 12; Brown, supra note 11, at 55. This situation is not likely to improve if rapid population growth continues, because throughout the world, "[f]armers can overplow and overpump with impressive results in the short run, but for many the short run is drawing to a close." Brown, supra note 11, at 12.

In many areas, food production is falling because of "desertification," which is severe degradation of the productivity of the land resulting from excessive human pressures. Particularly in developing countries, the expanding population is forced to overuse natural resources for subsistence, cutting trees for fuelwood, overgrazing, growing crops on unstable hillsides and plowing lands too dry to protect from winds. [14]

Desertification alters the hydrologic cycle, because when the land is bare more rainfall runs off and less water is recycled back into the atmosphere to create new rainfall. Thus, desertification exacerbated the 1984 drought in the African Sahel that put 150 million people in twenty-four countries on the brink of starvation. Brown, supra note 11, at 62. In addition, the rapid runoff after a hard rain intensifies downstream flooding, with sometimes tragic results. Id. at 31-32.

[14] Over 60 percent of the world's rangelands and at least 80 percent of African, Asian, and Middle Eastern rangelands have been affected by desertification. Repetto, supra note 2, at 19-20. Worldwide, about 35 percent of the earth's land surface, with an estimated population of 850 million, is at risk of becoming desertified. United Nations Environment Programme, General Assessment of Progress in the Implementation of the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification, (1984).

Unfortunately, irrigation is not a solution to the problem of desertification. Irrigation uses vast amounts of already scarce water and has resulted in damage to about half of the irrigated lands from salinization, alkalinization and waterlogging. Global Future, supra note 3, at 120.

Overpopulation and desertification are taking their toll. In 1988, the United Nation's World Food Council reported that "earlier progress in fighting hunger, malnutrition and poverty has come to a halt or is being reversed in many parts of the world." Brown, supra note 11, at 14, quoting the World Food Council.

C. Rapidly Growing Urban Areas are Becoming Increasingly Unhealthy

As the productivity of rural land is exhausted by the increased demands of a growing population, more and more people are moving to the cities, where they face an array of serious health and environmental problems. In 1985, there were twelve urban "agglomerations" of 10 million or more inhabitants. [15] By the year 2000, if present trends continue, the number of urban areas with similarly huge populations will rise to twenty-three. Id.

Rapid population growth cannot help but further aggravate the already precarious condition of health, water, and sanitation services in urban areas. It is estimated that 40 percent of the world's urban population either totally lacks access to drinking water and sanitation services or relies on rudimentary facilities that are dangerous to health. H. Otterstetter and A. Flores, "Water, Source of Life," World Health 11 (World Health Organization, October 1987).

More people also produce more waste: "Rapid urbanization and industrialization of the developing world has resulted in the generation of urban wastes in quantities that defy the capacity of municipalities to manage them and of the environment to assimilate them." C. Bartone, "The Value in Wastes," 7 Decade Watch, No.3, at 1 (United Nations Development Programme, September 1988).

[15] United Nations, The Prospects of World Urbanization; Revised as of 1984-1985, at 5 (1987).

As the urban population grows, more and more people live in areas where air quality is below acceptable health levels. In southern California, which has the highest pollution levels in the United States, "[d]rastic restrictions on everyday activities to reduce air pollution" were recently announced. N.Y. Times, March 18, 1989, at 8, col. 2.

Air pollution is already causing health problems in Mexico City, which has 20 million people, 35,000 industries and an estimated three million motor vehicles. Washington Post, November 28, 1988, at A1, A14. Headaches, drowsiness, burning eyes, and dizziness from year-round smog are common, and the number of respiratory illnesses doubled between 1982 and 1986. Id. Even more alarming, air pollution has caused lead levels in the blood of newborn babies to come within the range where mental development is slowed, so that 20 percent of the population may be expected to be mentally retarded. Id.

D. Society is Threatened by Global Warming and Depletion of the Ozone Layer

In addition to causing unhealthy air, chemicals and gases released into the atmosphere in increasing quantities as populations increase are upsetting the atmospheric balance. The resulting depletion of the ozone layer and global warming (also known as the "greenhouse effect") seriously threaten the earth's ecosystems.

Global warming is caused primarily by carbon dioxide (CO_2) emissions. CO_2 traps heat radiated from the earth, preventing it from escaping to the upper atmosphere. Between 1950 and 1986, CO_2 emissions resulting from human activity more than tripled. World Resources, supra note 5, at 170. This increase is attributable primarily to the burning of wood and fossil fuels, which releases stored carbon. The burning of wood also means that the trees are no longer there to absorb the CO_2 from the atmosphere. Atmospheric levels of CO_2 have already increased substantially since 1960, [16] and are expected to increase by 20 percent by 2005 due to "world-wide increases in population which will increase energy use and speed deforestation, limiting the control of CO_2 by natural processes." [17]

The United States is a major user of the fossil fuels that cause global warming, leading the world in oil consumption. World Resources, supra note 5, at 110. "Approximately one third of all global man-made CO_2 is emitted in the United States." Energy and Air Quality, supra note 17, at 25. Our responsibility for global warming and the threat it poses to agricultural production and the habitability of coastal areas was recognized by Congress in enacting the Global Climate Protection Act of 1987, 15 U.S.C.A. § 2901(2) (West. Supp. 1988):

> By early in the next century, an increase in Earth temperature could —
>
> (A) so alter global weather patterns as to have an effect on existing agricultural production and on the habitability of large portions of the Earth; and
>
> (B) cause thermal expansion of the oceans and partial melting of the polar ice caps and glaciers, resulting in rising sea levels. [18]

Emissions of other gases are causing the depletion of the ozone layer found 20-25 kilometers above the earth. This layer prevents lethal ultraviolet radiation from reaching the earth's

---

[16] See The Greenhouse Effect and Global Climate Change, Part 2, Hearing Before the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, 100th Cong., 1st Sess. at 33 (1988) (statement of Senator Max Baucus).

[17] U.S. Department of Energy, Energy and Air Quality 25 (December 1981) (hereinafter Energy and Air Quality).

[18] EPA estimates that by the year 2100, if current development and management trends continue, rising sea levels will destroy the majority of U.S. coastal wetlands, which are areas of extremely high biological productivity. U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, Office of Policy, Planning and Evaluation, Greenhouse Effect, Sea Level Rise and Coastal Wetlands 31 (July 1988). Research suggests that during the last interglacial period, which was just one or two degrees warmer than today, the West Antarctic Ice Sheet completely disappeared and sea level was about twenty feet above its present level. Id. at 3.

surface. Breakdown of ozone is accelerated by chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs) used commercially in aerosol propellants, refrigerants, solvents and foam blowing agents, and by other chemicals released into the atmosphere by automobiles, power plants, industrial processes and commercial products. [19] As more people demand more cars, refrigerators, and air conditioners, more long-lived CFCs will be released into the atmosphere.

Loss of ozone will have wide-ranging harmful effects. As the ozone concentration decreases, ultraviolet radiation will cause increased eye disease and skin cancer, and growth of plants and aquatic organisms could be adversely affected. The Ozone Layer, supra note 19, at 6.

E. Tropical Rainforests Are Being Destroyed Because of Population Growth

Just as the importance of tropical rainforests in preventing global warming by absorbing CO_2 is becoming widely recognized, the growing world population is contributing to an increased rate of destruction of these forests. Unless action is taken, much of the world's tropical forests will be scattered and highly degraded remnants by the first quarter of the 21st century. Global Future, supra note 3, at 66. Recently cleared forest areas not only no longer absorb CO_2, they also are prone to rapid erosion and nutrient depletion.

In addition, the tropical forests contain the world's greatest diversity of life, with probably over three million species of plants and animals. [20] This diversity is an invaluable resource that may be permanently lost. Over one-third of all pharmaceuticals were originally derived from plants and numerous little-known or undiscovered plant species are sure to have important uses as crops, medicines, or other products. Tropical Forests, supra note 20, at 36.

---

[19] United Nations Environment Programme, The Ozone Layer 4 (1987) (hereinafter The Ozone Layer).

[20] U. S. Department of State, The World's Tropical Forests: A Policy, Strategy and Program for the U.S., Report to the President by a U.S. Interagency Task Force 12 (May 1980) (hereinafter Tropical Forests).

Destruction of forests results from population growth in both developing and developed countries. Eighty percent of the wood cut in the tropics is used for fuel, mainly household cooking. Id. at 12. The rest is exported, much of it to the United States. In addition to the valuable hardwoods which are sought, "the demand for beef by the United States and other nations is clearly creating pressures to convert forests to pastures in many parts of Central and South America." Id. at 19. Because domestic production cannot keep up with increasing demand, our beef imports from Latin America and the number of large American companies involved in cattle ranching in Latin American countries are rising. Id. at 19-20.

Thus, the environment is being threatened on all sides. The developed nations are consuming the earth's resources and polluting the air and water with the by-products of an industrialized society. The developing nations are destroying their farmland and their forests in a desperate effort to keep up with population growth and provide the exports sought by the United States and other countries.

II. WOMEN NEED ACCESS TO FULL AND UNCENSORED INFORMATION ABOUT THEIR REPRODUCTIVE CHOICES TO SLOW POPULATION GROWTH AND LIMIT DAMAGE TO THE ENVIRONMENT

The decision in Webster will have an impact on the environmental problems discussed above both as a matter of demographics and of human rights. As shown, a constant factor underlying the degradation of the environment is the world's exploding population. If abortion were not an option, the population would be increasing even faster. In addition, allowing women to exercise control over their reproductive lives is essential for the development of the world in a manner which promotes human dignity and is environmentally sound:

> Giving people the means to choose the size of their families is not just a method of keeping population in balance with resources; it is a way of assuring — especially for women — the basic human right of self-deter> mination. The extent to which facilities for exercising such choices are made available is itself a measure of a nation's development. In the same way, enhancing human potential not only promotes development but helps to ensure the right of all to a full and dignified life.[21]

The withdrawal of a woman's fundamental right to choose to have an abortion, urged by the State of Missouri and the United States, will not only set back family planning in this country, it will also discourage efforts in other countries, particularly developing countries that may view the United States as a model, to improve women's and children's health and help to control development and population growth by legalizing abortion.

The free flow of information about all methods of controlling family size, including abortion, is particularly important to amici. Accordingly, this brief will focus on one aspect of Webster, the provision of the Missouri statute which makes it "unlawful for any public funds to be expended for the purpose of . . . encouraging or counseling a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life." RSMo. § 188.205 (1986). [22] Reversing the Eighth Circuit and upholding Missouri's efforts to restrict the flow of information will not only encourage other states to impose similar bars, it will also signal this Court's endorsement of restrictions now being litigated which have been imposed on free speech by the federal government in administering family planning programs both throughout the United States and abroad.

The State of Missouri makes the remarkable claim that Section 188.205 does not forbid speech, and that First Amendment rights are not involved in this case. Brief at 38-40. However, "above all else, the First Amendment means that government has no power to restrict expression because of its message, its ideas,

---

[21] World Commission on Environment and Development, Our Common Future 96 (1987).

[22] "Public funds" are broadly defined to include: "any funds received or controlled by this state or any agency or political subdivision thereof, including, but not limited to, funds derived from federal, state or local taxes, [and] gifts or grants from any source, public or private. . . ." RSMo. § 188.200(3) (1986).

its subject matter, or its content." Police Department of Chicago v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92, 95 (1972). That is exactly what the State is doing here. It seeks to prohibit a physician or other health professional from speaking freely to a pregnant patient, based on the content of the speech. The State also seeks to infringe upon the right of the patient to receive certain information, based on the content of the information. [23]

Along with the First Amendment, the court below also properly found that the ban on "encouraging and counseling" implicates a woman's Fourteenth Amendment right "to knowingly and intelligently choose an abortion after consulting a physician." J.S. App. A67. [24] The prohibition was held to be unconstitutionally vague because "the word 'counsel' is fraught with ambiguity; its range is incapable of objective measurement." J.S. App. A68-69.

Testimony presented in the district court shows that the vagueness of the Missouri statute has already had the "chilling effect" on the exercise of constitutional rights that the vagueness doctrine is intended to preclude. "The Court has long recognized that ambiguous meanings cause citizens to '" steer far wider of the unlawful zone" . . . than if the boundaries of the forbidden areas were clearly marked.'" Village of Hoffman Estates v. The Flipside, Hoffman Estates, Inc., 455 U.S. 489, 494 n. 6 (1982), quoting Baggett v. Bullitt, 377 U.S. 360, 372 (1964), quoting Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513, 526 (1958). For example, the Executive Director of a public hospital in Kansas City instructed all staff and resident physicians that:

> all personnel. . . MUST discontinue all abortion related activity not necessary to save the life of the mother. Since this, of course, includes counseling about abortions and referring patients for abortions to other facilities, there is no alternative but to respond to inquiries about abortion to the effect that Missouri Law

---

[23] Amici here will leave it to appellees and to other amici to fully rebut the State's specious and dangerous argument that no First Amendment rights are threatened by Section 188.205.

[24] A full discussion of the Fourteenth Amendment issues will also be left to others.

> prohibits [the hospital] from performing abortions and further prohibits counseling, referring or any other activity whatsoever relating to abortion not necessary to save the life of the mother. Any other comment relative to abortion is prohibited.

J.S. App. A44 n.49. Therefore, the reversal of the court below would seriously interfere with women's access to information about abortion, resulting in more unwanted births and greater increases in population.

A. Access to Reproductive Information Throughout the United States Could be Restricted if the Decision Below is Reversed

While the number of births affected by the Missouri law at issue will not in itself have a significant impact on the environmental problems discussed above, the decision in this case will affect the outcome of pending challenges to federal regulations and policies restricting the flow of information about abortion throughout the United States and developing nations. These widespread restrictions are likely to have a significant impact not only on individuals and families, but also on population growth and the environment. With regard to the United States, cases involving the issue of whether regulations recently promulgated under Title X of the Public Health Services Act of 1970, 42 U.S.C. A. § 300 et seq. (West 1982), violate the First Amendment and the right to choose to have an abortion are now pending before three courts of appeals. [25] See Brief for the United States as Amicus Curiae Supporting Appellants at 2.

Title X is designed to establish a comprehensive program in the United States to combat the problem of access to family planning services for women with low incomes. Section 1008 of [25] The Title X regulations have been held to violate both congressional intent and the Constitution in Planned Parenthood Federation of America v. Bowen, 680 F. Supp. 1465 (preliminary injunction), 687 F. Supp. 540 (permanent injunction) (D. Colo. 1988), appeal pending, No. 88-2251 (10th Cir.) and Commonwealth of Massachusetts v. Bowen, 679 F. Supp. 137 (D. Mass. 1988), appeal pending, No. 88-1279 (1st Cir.), but were upheld in State of New York v. Bowen, 690 F. Supp. 1261 (S.D.N.Y. 1988), appeal pending, No. 88-6204 (2d Cir.).

this Title provides: "None of the funds appropriated under this subchapter shall be used in programs where abortion is a method of family planning." 42 U.S.C.A. § 300a-6 (West 1982). Until recently, Section 1008 was interpreted to allow the full dissemination of information, including information on "pregnancy termination." See Planned Parenthood Federation of America v. Bowen, 680 F. Supp. 1465, 1470 (D. Colo. 1988). However, regulations promulgated by the Department of Health and Human Services on February 2, 1988, 53 Fed. Reg. 2922, explicitly prohibit a Title X funded clinic from providing any information to women about abortion, including abortion referrals, even if a woman requests such information.[26]

In Planned Parenthood Federation, the district court in Colorado found that the regulations "constitute an 'unduly burdensome interference' with a woman's freedom to decide whether to terminate her pregnancy" in violation of the Fifth Amendment. 680 F. Supp. at 1474, quoting Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297, 314 (1980), quoting Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464, 473-74 (1977). The Title X regulations were further found to impose "content-based censorship which impermissibly impedes a physician's First Amendment freedom to disseminate relevant medical information to his patient." Id. at 1477. In addition to violating a physician's right to speak freely to his or her patients, the regulations impermissibly interfere with the patient's "First Amendment right to receive information about abortion. Bigelow v. Virginia, 421 U.S. 809, 821-22 (1975)." Id. Therefore, the implementation of the regulations was enjoined.

The district court in Commonwealth of Massachusetts v. Bowen, 679 F. Supp. 137 (D. Mass. 1988), focussed almost exclusively on the First Amendment issues, although it also found a violation of the right to privacy. Citing Perry v. Sindermann, 408 U.S. 593, 597 (1972), it found that the regulatory ban on providing [26] In addition, while Title X funded groups were previously simply required not to use federal funds to perform abortions, the new regulations define "Title X project funds" to include "all funds allocated to the Title X program, including, but not limited to grant funds, grant-related income or matching funds," and a Title X project must be organized so that it is physically and financially separate from all abortion-related activities.

abortion counseling and referral "constitute[s] an unconstitutional penalty for the exercise of First Amendment rights." 679 F.Supp. at 145. It was particularly concerned that the regulations are "specifically designed to suppress speech, and particularly directed at the suppression of one viewpoint." Id. at 146.

The court also discussed other portions of the regulations which prohibit lobbying for legislation and other advocacy activities to increase the availability of abortion. It noted that the government had conceded that these activities "are at the 'core' of the First Amendment." 679 F. Supp. at 146. Even if the right to have an abortion is controversial, "the right to talk about abortion is firmly and expressly guaranteed." Id.

Upholding the Title X regulations and allowing content-based censorship to be imposed would seriously hinder family planning efforts in the United States. In 1983, approximately 5 million low income women were served in federally funded family planning clinics. The Alan Guttmacher Institute, Organized Family Planning Services in the United States, 1981-1983, at 34 (December 1984). The basic purpose of these clinics is to help women avoid unintended pregnancies. However, contraceptives are not 100 percent effective, and sometimes they are not sought until it is too late. One-half of the pregnancies in the United States are unintended. [27] One out of five teenagers come to Title X clinics for a pregnancy test, and thirteen percent of all clinic visits involve a pregnancy test. M. Chamle, S. Eisman, J.D. Forrest, M.T. Orr, A. Torres, "Factors Affecting Adolescents' Use of Family Planning Clinics," 14 Family Planning Perspectives 126 (1982).

The new Title X regulations would not only deny women who are found to be pregnant access to reliable medical information about all their options, including abortion, they would also interfere with services to women seeking contraceptives and general reproductive health care, all to the detriment of women, the rate of population growth and the environment. Plaintiffs in Planned Parenthood Federation "submitted numerous declarations from practitioners at Title X facilities detailing the catastrophic effect that implementation of the regulations will have upon their ability to serve the entire range of their patients' needs." 687 F. 2d 540, 544 (D. Colo. 1988). Plaintiffs also submitted evidence that some clinics would completely terminate their Title X programs. Id.

[27] J.D. Forrest, "Unintended Pregnancy Among American Women," 19 Family Planning Perspectives, No.2, at 76 (1987).

B. Access to Reproductive Information in Developing Countries Could be Restricted if the Decision Below is Reversed

A second set of cases now before the courts involve restrictions which the federal government has imposed on family planning programs in developing nations. Family planning organizations which receive and distribute funds of the Agency for International Development (AID) have challenged clauses added by AID to its grants and agreements to implement the "Mexico City Policy," a Policy Statement issued by the United States at the United Nations International Conference on Population in Mexico City in August 1984. Under this Policy, the United States will not contribute funds to foreign nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) that perform or actively promote abortion as a method of family planning abroad, even if these abortion-related activities are carried out with non-AID funds.

The AID clauses require every foreign NGO seeking American funding to "certify in writing that it does not perform or actively promote abortion as a method of family planning in AID-recipient countries and does not provide financial support to any other foreign NGO that conducts such activities." The phrase "actively promot[ing] abortion" is defined to include "providing advice and information regarding the benefits and availability of abortion," "encouraging abortion," and "[l]obbying a foreign government to legalize or make available abortion." These clauses have been held to violate the First Amendment by the only court which has reached the issue. DKT Memorial Fund v. AID, 691 F. Supp. 394 (D.D.C. 1988), appeal pending, Nos. 88-5243 and 88-5266 (D.C. Cir.). [28]

[28] DKT and another case in the Southern District of New York were initially dismissed by the district courts on the ground, inter alia, that nonjusticiable political questions had been presented. DKT Memorial Fund v. AID, 630 F. Supp.

In DKT, the court stated that "[a]lthough the government may promote childbirth over abortion, it 'may not be achieved by means which sweep unnecessarily broadly and thereby invade the area of protected freedoms.' NAACP v. Alabama, 377 U.S. 288, 307 (1964)." 691 F. Supp. at 404. The AID clauses were found to be unlawful because they "are based on the subject matter of abortion," and "[a] regulation of speech that is motivated by nothing more than a desire to curtail expression of a particular point of view on controversial issues of general interest is the purest example of a 'law . . . abridging the freedom of speech.' " Id. at 405, quoting Consolidated Edison Co. v. Public Service Commission, 447 U.S. 530, 546 (1980), (Stevens, J., concurring). The AID clauses were also found to impair the freedom of DKT, a nonprofit organization in the United States, to associate with the foreign NGOs of its choice. 691 F. Supp. at 405.

The chilling effects of the AID clauses have already been felt. For example, one AID cooperating agency was afraid to accept the offer of a large supply of recently out-of-print medical textbooks for distribution abroad because the books included coverage of pregnancy termination. Thousands of the $75 textbooks were ultimately destroyed by the publisher. S. Camp, The Impact of the Mexico City Policy on Women and Health Care in Developing Countries, 20 N.Y.U. J. Int'l L. & Pol. 35, 46-47 (1987). The gathering of complete medical data about clients by some NGOs has been stopped because of the NGOs' fear of even having information on abortion in their files. Id. at 47.

An organization in Bangladesh "not only stopped performing early abortions [which are legal] in 1985, but now turns away women suffering the after-effects of self-induced abortion, even when they might die without medical treatment." N.Y. Times, Feb. 27, 1989, at A16, col. 4. In many countries, people learning to be technicians in family planning clinics "are often given no information at all on how to handle complications from abortions." Id.

238 (D.D.C. 1986); Planned Parenthood Federation v. AID, 670 F. Supp. 538 (S.D.N.Y. 1987). These findings were reversed by both Courts of Appeals, and the cases were remanded. DKT Memorial Fund v. AID, 810 F.2d 1236 (D.C. Cir. 1987); Planned Parenthood Federation v. AID, 838 F.2d 649 (2nd Cir. 1988). The decision on remand is still pending in New York.

American efforts to contribute to effective family planning programs in key countries are being blocked by the AID clauses. An influential women's organization in Brazil which does not provide either abortion services or referrals turned down AID funds because it could not accept being precluded from using other funds to participate in Brazil's ongoing debate over abortion reform. The private organization distributing the AID funds did not even try to approach similar women's groups in Brazil and other Latin American countries which would have been worthy recipients of family planning funds. S. Camp, supra p. 20, at 44.

The work of AID cooperating agencies in India has been virtually foreclosed by the AID clauses. Abortion is legal in India, and many effective family planning groups also provide abortions and abortion counseling with funds from the Indian government. Id. Not being able to assist these groups is particularly significant because India increases the world's population by 1.4 million every month, which is more than any other country. Id. at 45.

The content-based censorship being imposed by AID will have a significant effect on efforts to curb population growth in developing countries. Through AID, the United States is the largest single donor of international population assistance in the world, contributing more than 40 percent of the total $500 million provided by all donors in 1986. [29] Requiring censorship and the limitation of basic democratic rights, such as advocacy of the legalization of abortion, to accompany these dollars will not only mean that women with unplanned pregnancies will be denied accurate information about all their options, but also that the overall provision of safe and effective family planning services will be adversely affected.

As discussed above, voluntary efforts to slow population growth are essential to the preservation of the domestic and the global environment. Therefore, Missouri's prohibition on the use of public funds for "encouraging and counseling" should be declared unlawful in order to send a strong message that content-based censorship of speech about abortion will not be tolerated. Women need access to full information about their reproductive choices so that they can control their lives, which will in turn slow population growth and make it possible to protect the environment.

[29] Affidavit of John J. Dumm, Deputy Director of the Office of Population of AID ¶ 7, submitted in DKT v. AID, Nos. 88-5243 and 88-5266 (D.C. Cir.) J.A. 123.

CONCLUSION

The judgment of the court of appeals should be affirmed.

Respectfully submitted,

Dina R. Lassow*
Sandra Goldberg

1531 P Street, N.W.
Suite 200
Washington, D.C. 20005
(202) 667-4500

Attorneys for Amici

*Attorney of Record

March 30, 1989

APPENDIX

APPENDIX

1. Population-Environment Balance is a nonprofit membership organization dedicated to safeguarding the "carrying capacity" of the United States — the number of individuals that can be supported without reducing the ability of the environment to sustain our quality of life over the long term — by stabilizing population size and protecting the environment.

2. Population Communication is an international, nonprofit organization which communicates population and environment messages to world leaders through books, reports, mailings, news releases and motion pictures. During the last twelve years, it has obtained the support of 48 world leaders for a Statement of Population Stabilization.

3. The Sierra Club, founded in 1892, is a nonprofit conservation organization with approximately 500,000 members nationwide. The goals of the Sierra Club are, among others, to practice and promote responsible uses of the earth's ecosystems and resources, and to educate and enlist all people to protect and restore the quality of the natural and human environment.

4. The World Population Society is a nonprofit organization primarily dedicated to implementing the World Population Plan of Action which is supported by 147 nations. The Society is active in assisting developing nations formulate national population policies and action programs to reduce maternal and child mortality, provide family planning services, improve the status of women, and provide information and education on population matters.

5. Worldwatch Institute is an independent, nonprofit research organization established to alert decision-makers and the general public to emerging global trends in the availability and management of both human and natural resources. Population and family planning issues have been a central concern at Worldwatch since its founding in 1974.

6. Zero Population Growth is a national, nonprofit organization with 25,000 members. Founded in 1968, it is working to achieve a sustainable balance between the earth's population, environment and resources. The organization supports voluntary efforts to stabilize population growth through education and advocacy programs.

7. The Jessie Smith Noyes Foundation is a private foundation committed to preventing irreversible damage to the natural systems upon which all life depends. The Foundation makes grants in the closely interrelated areas of environment and population. The Foundation, therefore, believes that reproductive rights are essential to achieving a balance between environment and population as well as for the individual dignity of women.

AMICUS CURIAE

BRIEF

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
MAR 30 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

No. 88-605

In the Supreme Court
OF THE United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,
Appellants,

v.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.
Appellees.

On Appeal from the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit

BRIEF OF AMICI CURIAE ON BEHALF OF 608 STATE LEGISLATORS FROM 32 STATES

HERMA HILL KAY *
336 Boalt Hall
University of California, Berkeley
Berkeley, California 94720
Telephone: (415) 642-0259

JAMES J. BROSNAHAN
JACK W. LONDEN
MORRISON & FOERSTER
345 California Street
San Francisco, California 94104-2675
Telephone: (415) 434-7000

* Denotes Counsel of Record

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Page

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES iii

STATEMENT OF INTEREST 1

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT 1

I. THE SCOPE OF THE RIGHT TO PRIVACY AS IT APPLIES TO ABORTION MUST BE DEFINED BY THIS COURT 2

A. It Begs the Constitutional Question To Propose That State Legislators Be Allowed To Balance the Competing Interests Without Judicial Constraints..... 2

B. This Court Cannot Be Asked To Abdicate Its Judicial Role in the Face of Popular Controversy 4

C. This Court's Prior Holdings Are Properly Protected from Political Pressure by the Doctrine of Stare Decisis 6

II. THE RECORD OF STATE LEGISLATION ON ABORTION CONTRADICTS ANY CONTENTION THAT CONSTITUTIONAL PROTECTION IS UNNECESSARY FOR THE PRIVACY RIGHTS AT STAKE 8

A. State Legislatures Have Demonstrated That The Legislative Process Will Not Uniformly Protect Reproductive Privacy Rights with Statutes That Accommodate Competing Interests 8

B. Abrogating Constitutional Protections Would Not, in Practice, Leave Most State Legislatures In a Position To Regulate Abortion Effectively 11

III. THE BURDEN ON THE FEDERAL JUDICIARY WILL NOT BE EASED IF ROE V. WADE IS OVERRULED 13

CONCLUSION 16

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

Page(s)

Cases

Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health,
462 U.S. 416 (1983) 6 n.2,7

Bigelow v. Virginia,
421 U.S. 809 (1975) 14

Brown v. Board of Education,
347 U.S. 483 (1954) 5

Crandall v. State of Nevada,
73 U.S. 35 (1868) 12 n.10

Doe v. Bolton,
410 U.S. 179,
reh. den., 410 U.S. 959 (1973) 12 n.10

Johnson v. Transportation Agency,
480 U.S. 616 (1987) 7

Roe v. Wade,
410 U.S. 113,
reh. den., 410 U.S. 959 (1973) ..... passim

Schweiker v. Wilson,
450 U.S. 221 (1981) 3

United States v. Scott,
437 U.S. 82 (1978) 6

West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1942) 6

Statutes

Cal. Civ. Code (West Supp. 1989)
§ 34.5 ..... 10 n.6

Cal. Health & Safety Code (West Supp. 1989)
§ 25958 ..... 10 n.6

Fla. Stat. Ann. (West Supp. 1988)
§ 797-02 13

Haw. Rev. Stat. (1985)
§ 43-161(A)(3) 14

Idaho Code (1988)
§ 18-604 ..... 9 n.5

Ill. Ann. Stat. (Smith-Hurd Supp. 1988)
ch. 38, para. 81-82 ..... 10 n.6

La. Rev. Stat. (West 1987)
§ 1299.35.0 ..... 9 n.5

Mass. Gen. Laws Ann. (West 1983)
ch. 272 § 20 13

Model Penal Code (American Law Institute 1980)
§ 230.3 ..... 8 n.3

S.D. Codified Laws Ann. (1988)
§ 34-23A-21 ..... 9 n.5

Vermont House Bill 714 (1988) 10 n.6

Other Authorities

Americans United for Life Legal Defense Fund, Permissable Parental Involvement in the Minor's Abortion Decision (1986) (unpublished manuscript) 10 n.6

Beale, Sara Sun, Reconsidering Supervisory Power in Criminal Cases: Constitutional and Statutory Limits on the Authority of Federal Courts, 84 Colum. L. Rev. 1433 (1984) 15 n.13

Monagham, Decisis and Constitutional Adjudication,
88 Colum. L. Rev. 723 (1988) 7

NY Times
Jan. 26, 1970, at 20, col. 4 14
Feb. 3, 1970, at 40, col. 2 14
Feb. 8, 1970, at 10, col. 8 14
April 3, 1970, at 24, col. 2, 3 14
Oct. 6, 1971, at 93, col. 6 14
Oct. 10, 1971, at 75, col. 2 14
Nov. 12, 1971, at 94, col. 1 14
Dec. 11, 1971, at 36, col. 1 14
Sept. 1, 1972, at 23, col. 1 ..... 12 n.9
Jan. 20, 1989, at 21, col. 1 ..... 11 n.7

Posner, Richard, The Federal Courts: Crisis and Reform,
Harvard Univ. Press, 1985 ..... 15 n.13

Rehnquist, James, Note: The Power that Shall Be Vested in a Precedent: Stare Decisis, the Constitution and the Supreme Court, 66 B.U.L. Rev. 345 (1986)..... 5

Tetz, C. et al., Abortion 1974-1975: Needs and Services in the United States (1976).....11 n.8

U.S. Department of Commerce, Statistical Abstracts of the United States 1988 (Dec. 1987)..... 12

Witherspoon, The New Pro-Life Legislation: Patterns & Recommendations, 7 St. Mary's L.J. 637 (1975-76) 10 n.6

STATEMENT OF INTEREST

This brief is submitted on behalf of over six hundred state legislators from 32 states who, as amici curiae, are united in the belief that it is the unique function of the judiciary to define and preserve individual rights. (The legislators are identified in Appendix A.) As legislators, amici depend on the judiciary to define the constitutional boundaries within which to legislate. Amici submit this brief steadfast in the conviction that identifying and defining the scope of constitutional protection for fundamental individual rights is the role of the judiciary, and not that of elected officials in the legislative branch.

Amici have a direct interest in upholding Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, reh. den., 410 U.S. 959 (1973), and in urging this Court to continue, regardless of political pressures, to recognize the constitutional protections due a woman's right to choose whether or not to terminate her pregnancy according to the criteria articulated in the Roe v. Wade decision.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

This Court's function properly includes the identification and definition of the scope of individual rights protected by the Constitution. Where rights so identified and defined conflict with other interests, the legislative function of balancing and compromising interests is necessarily subject to this Court's rulings on the reach of constitutional protections. Thus, invoking the legislative function of achieving an accommodation of competing interests through the political process is simply irrelevant to the quite different constitutional task already performed by this Court.

Moreover, those opponents of abortion who criticize the constitutional balance struck by Roe v. Wade on the ground of the legitimacy of the legislative function cannot in good faith carry out their purported commitment to balancing the competing interests in a responsible way, for they completely ignore the privacy right threatened by unchecked state regulation of abortions.

Furthermore, those who assert that state-by-state regulation of abortions will remove the issue of abortion rights from this Court's docket are mistaken, for the regulation of abortion necessarily implicates constitutional rights other than privacy. Overruling Roe v. Wade would merely re-open the abortion question in a host of other constitutional contexts. Not only the right to privacy, but also legislative threats to free speech and the right to travel will raise the issue of a woman's right to decide whether to terminate her pregnancy, and the protection of those rights will continue to require the attention of this Court.

I. THE SCOPE OF THE RIGHT TO PRIVACY AS IT APPLIES TO ABORTION MUST BE DEFINED BY THIS COURT

A. It Begs the Constitutional Question to Propose that State Legislators Be Allowed to Balance the Competing Interests Without Judicial Constraints

State legislatures depend on the judiciary to define the constitutional protections that contain political compromises between competing interests. The Constitution is our basic law, and the courts have the duty and the authority to interpret it. Despite the fact that questions of a woman's reproductive rights and the state's interests in restricting abortion present a "divisive conflict," such questions must be addressed from the constitutional perspective, and must be adjudicated by the courts.

The Brief for the United States as Amicus Curiae Supporting Appellants advocates leaving it to "the political process" to "reach an accommodation among the competing interests involved." (Id. at 20-21.) Appellants' Amici Curiae 127 Members of the Missouri General Assembly ("127 Missouri Assembly Members") similarly argue that absent the nationwide regulation of abortion pursuant to Roe v. Wade, "the law might come to reflect a tolerable accommodation of competing views . . . ." (Amicus Brief for 127 Missouri Assembly Members at 21; citations omitted.) In encouraging this Court to turn the regulation of abortion over to state legislatures, however, the opponents of Roe v. Wade ignore the constitutionally mandated division of duties between the legislative and judicial branches. Where a statute "impinges on fundamental rights, . . . the judiciary then has a duty to intervene in the democratic process . . . ." Schweiker v. Wilson, 450 U.S. 221, 230 (1981). No elected representative can lawfully regulate the exercise of a fundamental right without reference to constitutional constraints, as determined by the judiciary, regarding the nature and scope of that right.

The argument purportedly based on judicial and legislative functions advanced by many opponents of Roe v. Wade is little more than a doctrinal veil, obscuring their determination to eliminate access to abortions for women. While urging this Court to allow state legislatures to balance the interests involved, they fail to provide this Court with anything approaching principled criteria to serve as the basis for a balance of interests different from that defined by Roe v. Wade and its progeny. Indeed, the 127 Missouri Assembly Members refuse to acknowledge that women have any interest in controlling their reproductive functions. While posturing as enthusiastic proponents of the legislative process as the proper means to balance competing interests, those urging this Court to overrule Roe v. Wade must be recognized for who they are: opponents of abortion rights, plain and simple.

If the opponents of the Roe v. Wade decision indeed intend to balance competing interests, let them advance an argument that recognizes a woman's right to privacy and justifies a different framework from that of Roe v. Wade for weighing that right against the state's interest in regulating abortion. This Court and the courts below have spent the last 16 years carefully assessing the proper balance among those competing interests. The opponents of Roe v. Wade demonstrate no commitment to faithful performance of a balancing function. Instead they wish simply to abrogate women's reproductive rights.

The 608 state legislators who join in this brief reject the arguments made by opponents of Roe v. Wade that the issues raised by abortion can be resolved simply by deference to federalist principles or to the legislative process. Amici respectfully urge this Court to reaffirm the holdings of Roe v. Wade and its progeny. Those decisions are essential to the legislative process, in that they recognize that competing interests exist and establish constitutional criteria that legislators may use in regulating and advancing those interests.

B. This Court Cannot Be Asked to Abdicate Its Judicial Role in the Face of Popular Controversy

Opponents of Roe v. Wade cite the existence of political controversy and even acts of civil disobedience opposing the right to abortion in an effort to persuade this Court that state legislatures should be granted an unrestrained hand in resolving the abortion issue. (Amicus Brief for 127 Missouri Assembly Members at 14.) But the strength of feeling of those with opposing views cannot determine the issue. Clearly, this Court must categorically reject the notion that abortion clinic sidewalks constitute the proper forum for shaping the contours of a fundamental right.

Similarly, the lack of unanimity of popular opinion does not undermine the validity of Roe v. Wade. Its opponents argue that the existence of state and federal legislation purporting to curtail reproductive rights reflects a lack of national consensus on the abortion issue, and that the absence of consensus in turn requires that constitutional constraints on regulation of abortion should be eliminated. The existence of anti-abortion legislation, however, cannot undercut the decision that reproductive rights merit constitutional protection. That a constitutional right exists contrary to legislation – even widespread legislation – is proof of the vitality of the Constitution, not the invalidity of the right. In the aftermath of Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), "(a)lmost every southern state enacted laws ordering disobedience to the Supreme Court's desegregation decisions." Rehnquist, Note: The Power that Shall Be Vested in a Precedent: Stare Decisis, the Constitution and the Supreme Court, 66 B.U.L. Rev. 345 (1986). Yet the local preferences represented by legislation defying desegregation could not defeat the constitutional imperative recognized in Brown.

This Court has held that "[the] right to privacy . . . founded in the Fourteenth Amendment's concept of personal liberty . . . is broad enough to encompass a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy." Roe v. Wade at 153 (1973). In locating a woman's right of choice within the perimeters of the Fourteenth Amendment, this Court deliberately established a limit on the extent to which public debate over the abortion issue could undermine that right.

> The very purpose of a Bill of Rights was to withdraw certain subjects from the vicissitudes of political controversy, to place them beyond the reach of majorities and officials and to establish them as legal principles to be applied by the courts.

West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 638 (1942). The role of this Court is not to tally votes for and against abortion rights, but rather is to provide legislators with clear guidance as to the nature and scope of the constitutional rights implicated in decisions about abortion.

C. This Court's Prior Holdings Are Properly Protected from Political Pressure by the Doctrine of Stare Decisis

Only when experience and new facts dictate the overruling of a precedent does this Court "bow to the lessons of experience and the force of better reasoning . . . ." United States v. Scott, 437 U.S. 82, 100 (1978). No new arguments are advanced today that were not considered at the time Roe v. Wade was decided.[1] Further, the post-Roe v. Wade experience has been considered by this Court repeatedly in many decisions reaffirming Roe v. Wade.[2]

This Court has articulated its compelling reasons for adhering to stare decisis in applying the principles of Roe v. Wade:

> That case was considered with special care. It was first argued during the 1971 Term, and reargued – with extensive briefing – the following Term. The decision was joined by the Chief Justice and six other Justices.

[1]The Court in Roe v. Wade discussed at length the profound divisions in society on the question of what significance to attach to the interest in fetal life and when to attach it. Roe v. Wade at 156-62.

[2]See, e.g., Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416, 420 n.1 (1983) [noting that "arguments continue to be made . . . that we erred in interpreting the Constitution," the Court adhered to the doctrine of stare decisis and reaffirmed Roe v. Wade].

> Since Roe v. Wade was decided in January 1973, the Court repeatedly and consistently has accepted and applied the basic principle that a woman has a fundamental right to make the highly personal choice whether or not to terminate her pregnancy.

Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416, 420 n.1 (1983). Thus, nothing new has been added to the debate surrounding the abortion issue.

Moreover, where, as in this case, the issue turns on the criteria for resolving conflicting interests, it is of particular importance to follow the principle of stare decisis rather than interpreting the matter as if the Court were writing on a clean slate. See Johnson v. Transportation Agency, 480 U.S. 616, 648-50 (1987) (O'Connor, J., concurring). Indeed, the Court would render itself vulnerable and risk illegitimacy by repudiating an established right previously recognized as fundamental under our Constitution. Where "expectations, tangible and symbolic, have developed around [this Court's] critical decisions, a successful attack on such decisions threatens the viability of the constitutional order itself." Monagham, Stare Decisis and Constitutional Adjudication, 88 Colum. L. Rev. 723, 750 (1988).

Neither "better reasoning" nor "lessons of experience" exist to justify undermining the fundamental right established in Roe v. Wade. The existence of serious public debate on abortion does not justify repudiating a line of precedents that have protected reproductive rights for nearly two decades. To the contrary, departure from precedent because of popular controversy would threaten the institutional respect this Court has traditionally received and deserved.

II. THE RECORD OF STATE LEGISLATION ON ABORTION CONTRADICTS ANY CONTENTION THAT CONSTITUTIONAL PROTECTION IS UNNECESSARY FOR THE PRIVACY RIGHTS AT STAKE

A. State Legislatures Have Demonstrated that the Legislative Process Will Not Uniformly Protect Reproductive Privacy Rights with Statutes that Accommodate Competing Interests

State legislatures have not proved by the statutes they have enacted that they should be given unrestricted scope to achieve a political accommodation of competing interests. Opponents of Roe v. Wade do not advance their argument by citing the legislative record.

Before Roe v. Wade, state legislatures were beginning to repeal their statutes prohibiting abortions and to authorize abortions under certain specified situations.[3] By 1972, thirty-one states permitted abortion only where necessary to preserve the life of the woman. (See Appendix B.) The nineteen remaining states had additional and often less restrictive grounds. (See Appendix B.) One of the major factors behind the reform movement was the need to ensure uniformity of state law in an area in which differences in state laws had produced extremely undesirable consequences.[4]

[3]During 1971 and 1972 many states enacted laws patterned after the American Law Institute's Model Penal Code, to permit abortions where: continuance of the pregnancy would gravely impair the physical or mental health of the woman; the child would likely be born with grave physical or mental defect; or the pregnancy resulted from rape, incest, or other felonious intercourse, including illicit intercourse with a girl below the age of 16. See Model Penal Code § 230.3 (American Law Institute 1980); Roe v. Wade at 140 (noting that the Model Penal Code served as a model for fourteen states' legislation during the period immediately preceding Roe v. Wade).

The record of state legislation since Roe v. Wade reveals a consistent pattern of attempts to overturn or restrict the fundamental right established in Roe v. Wade and its progeny. State legislatures have sought to abrogate or limit reproductive rights by imposing performance requirements, viability and post-viability restrictions, informed consent requirements, parental consent requirements, spousal notification provisions, and other regulations, often in violation of Supreme Court precedent in this area. (See Appendix D.)

Inevitably, once states have the option to determine through legislation the scope of the right to privacy, some states will refrain from protecting that right altogether.[5] Most states have already demonstrated through their restrictive laws regulating abortion that they will not give any protection whatsoever to a woman's reproductive rights. (See Appendices B and D.)

[4]In the years immediately preceding Roe v. Wade, although abortions were forbidden in most states, the procedure was legalized in a number of others, most notably New York and California. The result of these differing laws was that literally hundreds of thousands of pregnant women went to these two states to have abortions. See § II.B, infra. Additionally, because abortions were permitted in only a small number of states, restrictive abortion laws denied safe and legal abortions to women too poor to travel.

[5]In fact, various state legislatures have stated, on the record, that if Roe v. Wade were overturned and the right to abortion given back to the states to regulate, they would not protect that right. See, e.g., Idaho Code § 18-604 (1988) [stating that the legislative intent, if regulation of abortion is returned to the states, would be to criminalize abortion]; La. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 1299.35.0 (West 1987) ["If the decisions of the Supreme Court are reversed or modified or the United States Constitution is amended . . . then the former policy of this state (prohibiting abortion) shall be enforced"]; S.D. Codified Laws Ann. § 34-23A-21 (1988) ["This chapter is repealed on the specific date upon which the states are given exclusive authority to regulate abortion"].

Many of the state laws leave no room for effective protection of the right. (See Appendix D.) Nor do these laws reflect a consensus on definition of the right. To allow state legislatures to determine the right of privacy by a balancing of local interests is, effectively, to eliminate the right.

Moreover, imposing on state legislatures sole responsibility for appropriately balancing the competing interests would be misguided because those bodies are often the focus of pressures mounted by well-organized interest groups. Legislative bodies, by design, reflect the views of vocal and politically potent interests. In many instances, some groups have better and more varied opportunities to influence the legislative branch than others do. This point is aptly demonstrated by the post-Roe v. Wade period, where current laws appear to reflect the agenda of a small but powerful minority determined to abolish the fundamental right.[6] Courts must play their proper constitutional role in protecting the rights of the individual, if necessary in the face of organized political opposition.

[6]For example, the group Americans United for Life Legal Defense Fund wrote a manual aimed at state legislators drafting parental consent statutes, entitled "Permissible Parental Involvement in the Minor's Abortion Decision" (1986). Attached to the manual is a Model Parental Consent Statute and instructions to state legislatures as to how to draft such a statute. The preambles to most of the parental consent statutes are identical to, or almost identical to, the language in the preamble to the Model Parental Consent Statute. The preamble in the Model Parental Consent Statute has preceded statutes requiring parental consent prior to abortion, Cal. Health and Safety Code § 25958 (West Supp. 1989), and Cal. Civil Code § 34.5 (West Supp. 1989); parental notification prior to abortion, Ill. Ann. Stat. ch. 38, para. 81-82 (Smith-Hurd Supp. 1988); and parental notification prior to both abortion and the minor's receipt of sex education and contraceptives, Vermont House Bill 714 (1988). Witherspoon, The New Pro-life Legislation: Patterns & Recommendations, 7 St. Mary's L.J. 637 (1975-76.

B. Abrogating Constitutional Protections Would Not, in Practice, Leave Most State Legislatures in a Position to Regulate Abortion Effectively

Granted the unfettered ability to legislate on the abortion issue, state legislatures would undoubtedly take different approaches. Inevitably, some states would enact outright prohibitions against abortion, while others would not.[7] But the goal of achieving local control of abortion regulations would not be achieved, in practice, by overturning Roe v. Wade. In fact, most state legislatures would lack the ability to regulate the reproductive choices made by their residents.

Legislatures would be deprived of this ability for two reasons. First, those women in states prohibiting abortion would engage in interstate travel on a massive scale to obtain abortions elsewhere. Because the number of women of child-bearing age has grown, the number of women who would travel out of state for access to the full range of options would be far greater even than in 1972, prior to this Court's decision in Roe v. Wade. In 1972, one of the primary effects of state laws banning abortions was to motivate large numbers of women living in those states to go to another state to obtain an abortion, not to induce them to carry their pregnancies to term. (See Appendix C.) By 1972, abortion had been legalized in a limited number of states, most notably California and New York.[8] As a consequence, 40 percent of all legal abortions in the United

[7]As Surgeon General Koop recently observed, such action would "open Pandora's box, because we'll have 50 problems instead of one . . . certain states will opt to be very liberal about abortions and others will clamp down." N.Y. Times, January 20, 1989, § A, at 21, col. 1.

[8]In 1972, 75% of all legal abortions in the United States were performed in just two states, New York and California. By 1974, that figure had fallen to 37%. C. Tetz, et al., Abortion 1974-75: Needs and Services in the United States (1976).

States (approximately 200,000) were performed on women who had left their state of residency to have the procedure performed elsewhere. (See Appendix C.) Further, in a number of states all residents who obtained legal abortions got them out of state. (See Appendix C.)

As a practical matter, then, overturning Roe v. Wade would not endow each state legislature with authority over the regulation of abortion. It could, instead, relegate to New York regulation of abortion for Connecticut, New Jersey, Vermont, and a host of other states.[9] California could in practice regulate abortion for the citizens of its neighboring states. Even if only New York and California retained legalized abortion, over 60 percent of the population of the country would be within 250 miles of a jurisdiction – New York, California, Canada, or Mexico – in which abortion was legal. U.S. Department of Commerce, Statistical Abstract of the United States 1988 (Dec. 1987). Thus, those states permitting abortion would have the responsibility of providing for the health not only of their own residents seeking abortion but also of those non-residents coming into the state for that purpose.[10]

Second, in those states prohibiting abortion, many women unable to travel to other states for abortions would instead take the dangerous route of obtaining illegal abortions in their home state. The legislatures of those states would be faced with massive public health problems arising from illegal abortions. Thus, by leaving 50 states to "balance competing interests" regarding abortion, a decision to overrule Roe v. Wade would effectively leave legislators in most states unable in practice to further the states' interest in regulating the conduct of a large number of their residents.

---

[9]Women from Canada and the five states bordering New York accounted for 44% of the non-resident abortions in New York. See New York Times Article, September 1, 1972, p. 23 col. 1.

[10]The decision which strips states of the power to prevent abortion is not Roe v. Wade, but Crandall v. State of Nevada, 73 U.S. 35 (1868). The very nature of a federal system with open interstate borders places inescapable constraints on the powers of the constituent states. See Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179, 200, reh. den., 410 U.S. 959 (1973) (invalidating Georgia's attempt to limit the abortion procedure to its own residents).

III. THE BURDEN ON THE FEDERAL JUDICIARY WILL NOT BE EASED IF ROE V. WADE IS OVERRULED

Opponents of Roe v. Wade suggest that if abortion is regulated by the states, the pressure on the federal judiciary to restore abortion issues will be eased. See, e.g., Brief of 127 Missouri Assembly Members at 15 n.33. This assertion is wrong in two respects. First, if Roe v. Wade and its progeny are overruled, the issue of abortion will continue to find its way to this Court and other federal courts. Inevitably, as they have attempted to do in the past, some state legislatures will seek to abridge other constitutional rights in the effort to prohibit abortion. As this occurs, once again the courts will be called on to adjudicate the abortion controversy. Second, as a practical matter, criminal prosecutions of women and their doctors will strain already overburdened federal and state court systems.

Even with Roe v. Wade and its progeny as guideposts, state legislatures have attempted to regulate abortion in ways that implicate other constitutional rights. Twenty states have laws restricting speech regarding abortion. See Appendix D. One state prohibits the dissemination of any information regarding abortion. See Mass. Gen. Laws Ann. ch. 272 § 20 (West 1983). See also Fla. Stat. Ann. § 797-02 (West Supp. 1988) and Appendix D generally. Some states purport to require recipients of legal abortions to establish domicile in their state as a precondition to the exercise of privacy rights. See, e.g., Hawaii Rev. Stat. § 43-161(a)(3) (1985), Appendix D generally.

If Roe v. Wade and its progeny were overruled, in all likelihood assaults on other fundamental freedoms would continue. Prior to Roe v. Wade, the right to travel and the right to free speech were both vulnerable to infringement by abortion regulation. In Florida, a newspaper editor was prosecuted for printing a story describing abortion clinics. N.Y. Times, October 6, 1971, at 93, col. 6; N.Y. Times, October 10, 1971, at 75, col. 2; N.Y. Times, December 12, 1971, at 94, col. 1; N.Y. Times, November 11, 1971, at 36, col. 1. In Minnesota, a student newspaper in a private college was closed for publishing an ad for a New York abortion clinic. N.Y. Times, February 8, 1970, at 10, col. 8. And in Virginia, a newspaper was convicted for carrying an advertisement for a New York abortion clinic. Bigelow v. Virginia, 421 U.S. 809 (1975).

Further, some states attempted to restrict a woman's right to travel to obtain an abortion. In Massachusetts, a travel agent was indicted for arranging out-of-state trips for women seeking abortions. N.Y. Times, January 26, 1970, at 20, col. 4; N.Y. Times, February 3, 1970, at 40, col. 2; N.Y. Times, April 3, 1970, at 24, col. 2; N.Y. Times, April 3, 1970, at 24, col. 3.

If Roe v. Wade and its progeny were overruled, the judiciary would be inundated not only with constitutional adjudication arising from attempts to restrict travel and expression related to abortion, but with the criminal prosecutions of those performing or obtaining illegal abortions as well.[11] If anything can be gleaned from our experience with Prohibition it is that to criminalize once-legal behavior does not put an end to it, but merely drives it underground. If Roe v. Wade were overruled and abortion made illegal again in some states, women in those states would continue to obtain abortions. If they could not afford to travel or if their travel to a state with legalized abortion were prohibited, they would obtain illegal abortions. As in the case of Prohibition, the end result for law enforcement officials and for local and federal courts will be massive increases in the number of criminal prosecutions for this once-legal behavior.[12]

[11]That abortion would be outlawed in some states if Roe v. Wade were overruled is not idle speculation. At least four state legislatures have enacted laws that will automatically prohibit abortion if Roe v. Wade is overruled. See footnote 5, supra.

If abortion regulation were relegated solely to the states, the controversy would once again wend its way to this Court's docket. This Court would once again find itself having to define the parameters of constitutionally permissible abortion regulation. As more and more women were prosecuted for obtaining abortions that were once legal but would then be prohibited, the abortion-related caseloads of the federal and state court systems would grow, not diminish. Thus, overruling Roe v. Wade and its progeny would substantially increase, and certainly not reduce, burdens on the judiciary.

[12]In the 1920s and 1930s, Prohibition alone caused a steep rise in criminal and civil cases in the federal courts. Richard Posner, The Federal Courts: Crisis and Reform, Harvard Univ. Press, 1985, at 60-61, 76. "Between 1901 and 1932, the number of federal criminal prosecutions increased more than five fold. In 1932, there were more than 92,000 federal prosecutions, including more than 65,000 involving prohibition offenses." Sara Sun Beale, "Reconsidering Supervisory Power in Criminal Cases: Constitutional and Statutory Limits on the Authority of Federal Courts," 84 Colum. Law Rev. 1433, 1441 (October 1984).

CONCLUSION

The 608 state legislators named below respectfully submit that this Court should once again reaffirm the protection given to women's reproductive rights embodied in Roe v. Wade.

Respectfully submitted,

Herma Hill Kay

James J. Brosnahan
Jack W. Londen

Attorneys for the Following State Legislators Listed in Appendix A, as Amici Curiae

Appendix A

AMICI

Alaska	Sen. Pat Pourchot Sen. Bettye Fahrenkamp Sen. Arliss Sturgulewski Rep. Mark Boyer Rep. Kay Brown Rep. Cliff Davidson Rep. Mike Davis Rep. Johnny Ellis, Jr. Rep. Peter Goll Rep. Niilo E. Kaponen Rep. Mike Navarre Rep. Ann M. Spohnholz
Arizona	Sen. Jamie P. Gutierrez Rep. Benjamin Hanley Rep. Bobby Raymond Rep. Peter Goudinoff Rep. Sandra D. Kennedy Rep. Susan Gerard Rep. Patricia Noland Rep. Bob Williams Rep. Ruth Solomon Rep. Earl V. Wilcox
Arkansas	Rep. Jim Lendall
California	Sen. Leroy Greene Sen. Barry Keene Sen. Rebecca Morgan Sen. Dan McCorquodale Sen. Nicholas Petris

State	Senator or Representative
	Sen. Herschel Rosenthal
	Sen. Diane Watson
	Sen. Milton Marks
	Asbmn. Tom Bates
	Asbmn. John L. Burton
	Asbmn. Elihu M. Harris
	Asbmn. Dan Hauser
	Asbmn. Johan Klehs
	Asbmn. Burt Margolin
	Asbmn. Gwen Moore
	Asbmn. Willard Murray
	Asbmn. Jackie Speier
	Asbmn. Curtis R. Tucker, Jr.
	Asbmn. Maxine Waters
	Asbmn. Delaine Eastin
	Asbmn. Jerry Eaves
	Asbmn. Ted Lempert
	Asbmn. Terry B. Friedman
	Asbmn. Patrick Johnston
Connecticut	Sen. John Atkin
	Sen. Richard Blumenthal
	Sen. Margaret Morton
	Sen. Cynthia Matthews
	Sen. Amelia P. Mustone
	Rep. Ernest E. Newton II
	Rep. Joseph D. Courtney
	Rep. George Jepsen
	Rep. David Oliver Thorp
	Rep. Norma Gyle
	Rep. Elinor F. Wilber
	Rep. Gary W. Berner
	Rep. Adele Kusnitz

State	Senator or Representative
	Rep. Miles Rappaport
	Rep. Nancy Wyman
	Rep. Lynn Taborsak
	Rep. Jonathan Pelto
	Rep. Vincent C. Mazzotta
	Rep. Joseph S. Gragarz, Jr.
	Rep. Edith Prague
	Rep. William Dyson
	Rep. Michael P. Lawlor
	Rep. Jay B. Levin
Florida	Sen. Jack D. Gordon
	Sen. Eleanor Weinstock
	Sen. Helen Gordon Davis
	Sen. Gwen Margolis
	Rep. Elaine Bloom
	Rep. Lois J. Frankel
	Rep. Susan Guber
	Rep. Carrie P. Meek
	Rep. Steve Press
	Rep. Anne Mackenzie
Georgia	Rep. Jim Martin
	Rep. Mary Margaret Oliv
	Rep. Nan Orrock
	Rep. Eleanor Richardson
	Rep. Mable Thomas
Hawaii	Sen. Mary George
	Rep. Roland M. Kotani
	Rep. Karen K. Horita
	Rep. Mike O'Kieffe
	Rep. Rosalyn Baker

State	Senator or Representative
	Rep. Peter K. Apo
	Rep. Barbara Marumoto
	Rep. David Y. Ige
	Rep. Joan Hayes
	Rep. Carol Fukunaga
	Rep. Jerry L. Chang
Illinois	Sen. Ethel Skyles Alexander
	Sen. William A. Marovitz
	Sen. Arthur L. Berman
	Rep. Shirley M. Jones
	Rep. Terry A. Steczo
	Rep. Woods Bowman
	Rep. John J. Cullerton
	Rep. Barbara Flynn Currie
	Rep. Monique Davis
	Rep. Mary E. Flowers
	Rep. Gene L. Hoffman
	Rep. Lovana Jones
	Rep. James M. Kirkland
	Rep. Louis I. Lang
	Rep. Robert LeFlore, Jr.
	Rep. Ellis B. Levin
	Rep. Charles G. Morrow, III
	Rep. Helen Satterthwaite
	Rep. William Shaw
	Rep. Grace Mary Stern
	Rep. Donne E. Trotter
	Rep. Calvin R. Sutker
	Rep. Arthur Turner
	Rep. Jesse White, Jr.
	Rep. Anthony L. Young

State	Senator or Representative
	Rep. Wyvelter H. Younge
	Rep. Paul Williams
Indiana	Sen. Virginia M. Blakenbaker
	Sen. Louis J. Mahern, Jr.
	Sen. William Dennis McCarty
	Sen. Julia Carson
	Rep. Barbara L. Engle
Iowa	Sen. Charles Bruner
	Sen. Joy Corning
	Sen. Julia Gentleman
	Sen. Jean Hall Lloyd-Jones
	Sen. Elaine Szymoniak
	Rep. Betty Jean Clark
	Rep. Jane Teaford
	Rep. Dorothy F. Carpenter
	Rep. Kathleen H. Chapman
	Rep. Johnie Hammond
	Rep. Maggie Tinsman
	Rep. Joyce Nielsen
	Ralph Rosenberg
Kansas	Rep. Kathleen Sebelius
	Rep. Wanda Fuller
	Rep. Joan Wagnon
	Rep. Dianne Gjerstad
Maryland	Sen. Troy F. Brailey
	Sen. Howard A. Denis
	Sen. John W. Derr
	Sen. Arthur Dorman
	Sen. Idamae Garrott

State	Senator or Representative
	Sen. Barbara A. Hoffman
	Sen. Paula C. Hollinger
	Sen. Nathan C. Irby, Jr.
	Sen. Julian L. Lapides
	Sen. Laurence Levitan
	Sen. Frederick C. Malkus
	Sen. Catherine I. Riley
	Sen. Ida G. Ruben
	Sen. Charles H. Smelser
	Sen. Decatur W. Trotter
	Rep. Leon Albin
	Rep. John C. Astle
	Rep. William C. Bevan
	Rep. Patricia H. Billings
	Rep. Rosa Lee Blumenthal
	Rep. Mary H. Boergers
	Rep. Frank D. Boston, Jr.
	Rep. Susan R. Buswell
	Rep. James W. Campbell
	Rep. Joel Chasnoff
	Rep. Gene W. Counihan
	Rep. Elijah E. Cummings
	Rep. Ulysses Currie
	Rep. Clarence Davis
	Rep. Louis L. DePazzo
	Rep. Dana Lee Dembrow
	Rep. John W. Douglass
	Rep. Nathaniel Exum
	Rep. Jennie M. Forehand
	Rep. Peter Franchot
	Rep. Brian E. Frosh
	Rep. Tony E. Fulton
	Rep. Gilbert J. Genn

State	Senator or Representative
	Rep. Michael R. Gordon
	Rep. Sheila Ellis Hixson
	Rep. William S. Horne
	Rep. W. Ray Huff
	Rep. Ralph M. Hughes
	Rep. John D. Jeffries
	Rep. Nancy K. Kopp
	Rep. Barbara Osborn Kreamer
	Rep. Donald E. Lamb
	Rep. Lawrence A. LaMotte
	Rep. Gloria G. Lawlah
	Rep. Theodore Levin
	Rep. George H. Littrell, Jr.
	Rep. Anne Mackinnon
	Rep. E. Farrell Maddox
	Rep. Pauline H. Menes
	Rep. R. Clayton Mitchell, Jr.
	Rep. Kenneth C. Montague, Jr.
	Rep. Margaret H. Murphy
	Rep. Samuel M. Parham
	Rep. Anne S. Perkins
	Rep. Carol S. Petzold
	Rep. Paul G. Pinsky
	Rep. Howard P. Rawlings
	Rep. Eileen M. Rehrmann
	Rep. Samuel I. Rosenberg
	Rep. Richard Rynd
	Rep. David Benjamin Shapiro
	Rep. Patricia R. Sher
	Rep. Royd Smith
	Rep. Virginia M. Thomas
	Rep. C. Lawrence Wiser
	Rep. Sylvania W. Woods, Jr.

State	Senator or Representative
Massachusetts	Sen. Sal R. Albano
	Sen. Carol C. Amick
	Sen. Frederick E. Berry
	Sen. Richard A. Kraus
	Sen. Michael Lopresti, Jr.
	Rep. John C. Bartley
	Rep. Patricia G. Fiero
	Rep. Augusto Grace
	Rep. Sherwood Guernsey
	Rep. David B. Cohen
	Rep. Mary Jane Gibson
	Rep. Joan M. Menard
	Rep. Suzanne M. Bump
	Rep. Marjorie A. Clapprood
	Rep. Eleanor Myerson
	Rep. Mark Roosevelt
	Rep. Susan D. Schur
Michigan	Lt. Gov. Martha W. Griffiths
	Sen. John F. Kelly
	Sen. Jack Faxon
	Sen. Jackie Vaughn III
	Sen. Virgil C. Smith, Jr.
	Sen. Joe Conroy
	Sen. Lana Pollack
	Rep. David C. Hollister
	Rep. Debbie Stabenow
	Rep. Frank M. Fitzgerald
	Rep. Sharon L. Gire
	Rep. Alma G. Stallworth
	Rep. Justine Barnes
	Rep. Carolyn C. Kilpatrick

State	Senator or Representative
	Rep. Maxine Berman
	Rep. W. Perry Bullard
	Rep. Nancy Crandall
	Rep. Robert L. Emerson
	Rep. Donald H. Gilmer
	Rep. David M. Gubow
	Rep. Charlie J. Harrison, Jr.
	Rep. Teola P. Hunter
	Rep. Shirley Johnson
	Rep. H. Lynn Jondahl
	Rep. M.L. Mickey Knight
	Rep. Susan G. Munsell
	Rep. Raymond M. Murphy
	Rep. Mary C. Brown
	Rep. Kay M. Hart
Minnesota	Sen. Linda Berglin
	Sen. Richard Cohen
	Sen. Nancy Brataas
	Sen. Allan H. Spear
	Rep. Lee Greenfield
	Rep. Andy Dawkins
	Rep. Wayne Simoneau
	Rep. Peter McLaughlin
	Rep. Phyllis Kahn
	Rep. Dave Bishop
	Rep. Dee Long
	Rep. Gloria Segal
Missouri	Sen. John F. Bass
	Rep. Louis H. Ford
	Rep. Paula J. Carter
	Rep. Larry Thomason

State	Senator or Representative
	Rep. O. L. Shelton
	Rep. John A. Birch
	Rep. Ken Jacob
	Rep. Christopher S. Kelly
	Rep. Mary Groves Bland
	Rep. Martha Jarman
	Rep. Jacqueline McGee
	Rep. Phil Tate
	Rep. Sue Shear
	Rep. Sandra Reeves
	Rep. Annette N. Morgan
	Rep. William L. Clay, Jr.
	Rep. Mark A. Youngdahl
	Rep. Karen McCarthy
	Rep. Charles (Quincy) Troupe
	Rep. Fletcher Daniels
Montana	Sen. Chet Blaylock
	Sen. Dorothy Eck
	Sen. Pat Reegan
	Sen. Michael Walker
	Sen. Cecil Weeding
	Rep. Kelly Addy
	Rep. Jan Brown
	Rep. Vivian M. Brooke
	Rep. Ben Cohen
	Rep. Mary Ellen Connelly
	Rep. Ervin Davis
	Rep. Jerry Driscoll
	Rep. Stella Jean Hansen
	Rep. Mike Kadas
	Rep. Mark D. O'Keefe
	Rep. Angela Russell

State	Senator or Representative
	Rep. Bill Strizich
	Rep. Diana E. Wyatt
	Dorothy Bradley
	Vicki J. Cocchiarella
	Hal Harper
	Robert R. Ream
New Hampshire	Sen. Elaine S. Krasker
	Sen. Susan McLane
	Rep. Deborah L. Arnesen
	Rep. Bill Boucher
	Rep. Marion Copenhaver
	Rep. Ned Densmore
	Rep. Katherine D. Foster
	Rep. Gary R. Gilmore
	Rep. Scott E. Green
	Rep. Caroline L. Gross
	Rep. Elizabeth Hager
	Rep. Douglas E. Hall
	Rep. Beverly Hollingworth
	Rep. Robert A. Johnson
	Rep. William F. Kidder
	Rep. Elizabeth D. Lown
	Rep. William R. Matson
	Rep. William McCain
	Rep. William H. McCann, Jr.
	Rep. Cynthia A. McGovern
	Rep. Jeffrey Miller
	Rep. Otto H. Oleson
	Rep. Toni Pappas
	Rep. Janet R. Pelley
	Rep. Debora Becker Pignatelli
	Rep. Irene A. Pratt

State	Senator or Representative
	Rep. Ellen-Ann Robinson
	Rep. Patricia Sanderson
	Rep. Merle W. Schotanus
	Rep. Merilyn P. Senter
	Rep. Mary Jane Wallner
	Rep. Jeffrey R. Woodburn
New Jersey	Sen. Matthew Feldman
	Sen. Wynona M. Lipman
	Sen. Richard Van Wagner
	Rep. Walter M. D. Kern, Jr.
	Rep. Gerard S. Naples
	Rep. D. Bennett Mazur
	Rep. Rodney P. Frelinghuysen
	Rep. Elizabeth Randall
	Rep. John S. Watson
	Rep. Barbara Faith Kalik
	Rep. Byron M. Baer
	Rep. Alan J. Karcher
	Rep. Arthur R. Albohn
	Rep. Stephanie R. Bush
	Rep. Robert G. Smith
	Rep. David C. Schwartz
	Rep. Maureen B. Ogden
New Mexico	Sen. Thomas T. Rutherford
	Sen. Victor R. Marshall
	Sen. Ken Kamerman
	Sen. Janice D. Paster
	Sen. Shannon Robinson
	Rep. Robert M. Hawk
	Rep. Delbert F. Sundberg
	Rep. Max Coll

State	Senator or Representative
New York	Sen. Mary B. Goodhue
	Sen. Eugene Levy
	Sen. Roy M. Goodman
	Sen. Howard E. Babbush
	Sen. Abraham Berstein
	Sen. Joseph L. Galiber
	Sen. Andrew Jenkins
	Sen. Franz S. Leichter
	Sen. Marty Markowitz
	Sen. Anthony M. Masiello
	Sen. Velmanette Montgomery
	Sen. Manfred Ohrenstein
	Sen. Suzi Oppenheimer
	Sen. David A. Paterson
	Sen. Ada L. Smith
	Sen. Martin M. Solomon
	Rep. Melvin H. Miller
	Rep. Richard N. Gottfried
	Rep. Albert Vann
	Rep. William E. Passannante
	Rep. Samuel Colman
	Rep. Mary M. McPhillips
	Rep. Ronald Canestrari
	Rep. Paul Harenberg
	Rep. Lewis J. Yevoli
	Rep. Earlene H. Hill
	Rep. Arthur O. Eve
	Rep. David F. Gantt
	Rep. Thomas F. Catapano
	Rep. James F. Brennan
	Rep. Alexander (Pete) Grannis
	Rep. Barbara M. Clark

State	Senator or Representative
	Rep. Roger Green
	Rep. Angelo Del Toro
	Rep. Nettie Mayersohn
	Rep. Gloria Davis
	Rep. Helene Weinstein
	Rep. Audrey I. Pheffer
	Rep. Steven Sanders
	Rep. Hector L. Diaz
	Rep. G. Oliver Koppell
	Rep. Morton C. Hillman
	Rep. Clarence Norman, Jr.
	Rep. Saul Weprin
	Rep. John Brian Murtaugh
	Rep. Cynthia Jenkins
	Rep. Edward Abramson
	Rep. Jerrold Nadler
	Rep. Eileen C. Dugan
	Rep. Rhoda Jacobs
	Rep. Larry Seabrook
	Rep. Edward C. Sullivan
	Rep. Aurelia Greene
	Rep. Frank Barbaro
	Rep. Catherine Nolan
	Rep. Geraldine L. Daniels
	Rep. George Friedman
	Rep. Audra T. (Pinny) Cooke
	Rep. George H. Winner, Jr.
	Rep. Cecile D. Singer
	Rep. Patricia K. McGee
	Rep. Richard L. Brodsky
	Rep. Gregory P. Young
	Rep. Maurice D. Hinchey
	Rep. Helen M. Marshall

State	Senator or Representative
	Rep. Herman D. Farrell, Jr.
	Rep. Mark Alan Siegel
	Rep. William F. Boyland
	Rep. Alan G. Hevesi
	Rep. Anthony Genovesi
	Rep. Martin Luster
North Carolina	Sen. Lura S. Tally
	Sen. Wanda H. Hunt
	Sen. Ralph Hunt
	Sen. Marvin Ward
	Sen. Frank W. Ballance, Jr.
	Sen. Joseph E. Johnson
	Sen. Ted Kaplan
	Sen. James Franklin Richardson
	Sen. William N. Martin
	Rep. Sharon Thompson
	Rep. Marie Colton
	Rep. Nick Jeralds
	Rep. Howard C. Barnhill
	Rep. Milton Fitch, Jr.
	Rep. H. M. Michaux
	Rep. Thomas Hardaway
	Rep. Ruth Easterling
	Rep. Bertha M. Holt
	Rep. W. Pete Cunningham
	Rep. Herman C. Gist
	Rep. Annie Brown Kennedy
	Rep. Logan Burke
	Rep. Frank E. Rhodes
	Rep. Helen Rhyme Marvin

State	Senator or Representative
Ohio	Sen. William F. Bowen
	Sen. Michael R. White
	Rep. David Hartley
	Rep. Judy Sheerer
	Rep. June H. Lucas
	Rep. Jane Campbell
	Rep. Vernon L. Sykes
Oregon	Sen. Joyce Cohen
	Sen. Frank L. Roberts
	Sen. Jane Hardy Cease
	Sen. Dick Springer
	Rep. Beverly Stein
	Rep. Tom L. Mason
	Rep. Judith C. Bauman
	Rep. Jim Edmunson
	Rep. Dave McTeague
	Rep. Nancy Peterson
	Rep. Margaret Carter
	Rep. Ron Cease
	Rep. Sam Dominy
	Rep. Mary Alice Ford
Pennsylvania	Sen. James C. Greenwood
	Sen. H. Craig Lewis
	Sen. Hardy Williams
	Rep. Andrew J. Carn
	Rep. Roy W. Cornell
	Rep. John S. Davies
	Rep. H. William DeWeese
	Rep. Dwight Evans
	Rep. Lois Sherman Hagarty
	Rep. Ruth B. Harper

State	Senator or Representative
	Rep. David W. Heckler
	Rep. Vincent Hughes
	Rep. Ivan Itkin
	Rep. George W. Jackson
	Rep. Harold James
	Rep. Babette Josephs
	Rep. Allen G. Kukovich
	Rep. Gordon J. Linton
	Rep. Connie G. Maine
	Rep. Nicholas B. Moehlmann
	Rep. Frank Oliver
	Rep. Max Pievsky
	Rep. Joseph Preston, Jr.
	Rep. David P. Richardson, Jr.
	Rep. Karen A. Ritter
	Rep. James R. Roebuck
	Rep. Anthony H. Williams
Texas	Sen. Craig Washington
	Rep. Ernestine Glossbrenner
	Rep. Debra Danburg
	Rep. Nancy McDonald
	Rep. Libby Linebarger
Vermont	Sen. Sally Y. Conrad
	Rep. Vi Luginbuhl
	Rep. Doris Lingelbach
	Rep. Richard D. Hausman
	Rep. K. Micque Glitman
	Rep. Margaret F. Martin
	Rep. Toby Young
	Rep. Bennett S. Truman
	Rep. Andrew Christiansen

State	Senator or Representative
	Rep. Linda Almy
	Rep. Julie Peterson
	Rep. Sally Fox
	Rep. Alice Cook Bassett
Virginia	Sen. Clive L. DuVal, II
	Sen. Elliot S. Schewel
	Sen. Thomas J. Michie, Jr.
	Sen. Frank W. Nolen
	Sen. Edward M. Holland
	Rep. Bernard S. Cohen
	Rep. Marian Van Landingham
	Rep. Mitchell Van Yahres
	Rep. Leslie L. Byrne
	Delegate James F. Almand
Washington	Sen. Frank "Tub" Hansen
	Sen. George Fleming
	Sen. Rick S. Bender
	Sen. Paul H. Conner
	Sen. Arlie U. DeJarnatt
	Sen. Nita Rinehart
	Sen. R. Lorraine Wojahn
	Sen. Ray Moore
	Sen. Patty Murray
	Sen. Janice Niemi
	Sen. Al Williams
	Rep. Calvin B. Anderson
	Rep. Marline J. Appelwick
	Rep. Forrest Baugher
	Rep. Jennifer M. Belcher
	Rep. Joanne Brekke

State	Senator or Representative
	Rep. Jean Marie Brough
	Rep. Maria Cantwell
	Rep. Grace Cole
	Rep. David R. Cooper
	Rep. Dennis A. Dellwo
	Rep. Brian Ebersole
	Rep. Karen Fraser
	Rep. Ken G. Jacobsen
	Rep. Joseph E. King
	Rep. Richard A. King
	Rep. June E. Leonard
	Rep. Gary F. Locke
	Rep. Dick Nelson
	Rep. Helen Sommers
	Rep. George L. Raiter
	Rep. Busse Nutley
	Rep. Fred O. May
	Rep. Ron Meyers
	Rep. Louise Miller
	Rep. Betty Sue Morris
	Rep. Larry Phillips
	Rep. Margarita Prentice
	Rep. Eugene A. Prince
	Rep. R. Wesley Pruitt
	Rep. Margaret S. Rayburn
	Rep. Nancy Rust
	Rep. Patricia Scott
	Rep. Arthur C. Sprenkle
	Rep. Georgette Valle
	Rep. Max Vekich
	Rep. Art Wang
	Rep. Karla Wilson
	Rep. Jesse C. Wineberry

State	Senator or Representative
West Virginia	Rep. Patricia H. White
Wisconsin	Sen. Joe Strohl
	Sen. Charles J. Chvala
	Sen. Russell D. Feingold
	Sen. Mordecai Lee
	Sen. Barbara L. Ulichny
	Sen. Fred A. Risser
	Rep. Spencer Black
	Rep. Marcia Coggs
	Rep. Shirley Krug
	Rep. Peter Bock
	Rep. Rebecca Young
	Rep. David Clarenbach
	Rep. Barbara Notestein
	Rep. Kimberly M. Plache

Appendix B

ABORTION LAWS, MAY 1, 1970

Jurisdiction	Decision of Woman and Physician	Necessary to Preserve Life of Mother Plus Other Grounds*	Necessary to Preserve Life of Mother (Only)
Alabama		X
Alaska	X
Arizona			X
Arkansas		X
California		X
Colorado		X
Connecticut			X
Delaware		X
District of Columbia		X
Florida			X
Georgia		X
Hawaii	X
Idaho			X
Illinois			X
Indiana			X
Iowa			X
Kansas		X
Kentucky			X
Louisiana			X
Maine			X
Maryland		X
Massachusetts		X

*Other grounds included where (1) continuation of the pregnancy was likely to result in death of the woman or impairment of her physical or mental health; (2) the child would probably have serious physical or mental defects; and (3) pregnancy resulted from rape or incest.

ABORTION LAWS, MAY 1, 1970 (cont'd)

Jurisdiction	Decision of Woman and Physician	Necessary to Preserve Life of Mother Plus Other Grounds*	Necessary to Preserve Life of Mother (Only)
Michigan			X
Minnesota			X
Mississippi		X
Missouri			X
Montana			X
Nebraska			X
Nevada			X
New Hampshire			X
New Jersey			X
New Mexico		X
New York	X
North Carolina		X
North Dakota			X
Ohio			X
Oklahoma			X
Oregon		X
Pennsylvania		X
Rhode Island			X
South Carolina		X
South Dakota			X
Tennessee			X
Texas			X
Utah			X

*Other grounds included where (1) continuation of the pregnancy was likely to result in death of the woman or impairment of her physical or mental health; (2) the child would probably have serious physical or mental defects; and (3) pregnancy resulted from rape or incest.

ABORTION LAWS, MAY 1, 1970 (cont'd)

Jurisdiction	Decision of Woman and Physician	Necessary to Preserve Life of Mother Plus Other Grounds*	Necessary to Preserve Life of Mother (Only)
Vermont			X
Virginia		X
Washington			X
West Virginia			X
Wisconsin			X
Wyoming			X

Source: Women's Bureau Bulletin on Abortion Laws (May 1970)

*Other grounds included where (1) continuation of the pregnancy was likely to result in death of the woman or impairment of her physical or mental health; (2) the child would probably have serious physical or mental defects; and (3) pregnancy resulted from rape or incest.

Appendix C

WOMEN OBTAINING OUT OF STATE ABORTIONS: 1972

BY STATE OF RESIDENCE

State	Proportion of State Residents Obtaining Their Abortions Out of State	Number of State Residents Obtaining Out of State Abortions
New Jersey	100.00%	22,832
Ohio	100.00%	16,666
Texas	100.00%	16,022
Michigan	100.00%	14,626
Illinois	100.00%	14,091
Missouri	100.00%	6,953
Indiana	100.00%	5,481
Kentucky	100.00%	3,132
Oklahoma	100.00%	2,843
Iowa	100.00%	2,356
Minnesota	100.00%	2,227
Rhode Island	100.00%	1,869
Maine	100.00%	1,690
Nevada	100.00%	1,630
West Virginia	100.00%	1,491
New Hampshire	100.00%	1,483
Louisiana	100.00%	1,210
Utah	100.00%	730
Wyoming	100.00%	269
Montana	100.00%	172
North Dakota	100.00%	148
South Dakota	100.00%	116

WOMEN OBTAINING OUT OF STATE ABORTIONS: 1972

BY STATE OF RESIDENCE (cont'd)

State	Proportion of State Residents Obtaining Their Abortions Out of State	Number of State Residents Obtaining Out of State Abortions
Idaho	100.00%	20
Tennessee	99.8%	4,279
Mississippi	93.0%	809
Arizona	90.4%	2,590
Vermont	81.7%	859
Massachusetts	80.7%	14,187
Wisconsin	76.0%	2,347
South Carolina	72.3%	2,208
Florida	70.9%	8,246
Connecticut	69.1%	5,757
Georgia	64.5%	4,561
Pennsylvania	62.5%	14,232
Virginia	60.0%	6,707
Nebraska	56.1%	1,008
Arkansas	49.0%	762
Alabama	45.1%	948
Delaware	41.7%	914
Maryland	40.3%	6,002
North Carolina	30.0%	3,539
Colorado	10.6%	573
Kansas	6.8%	311
New Mexico	5.1%	100
District of Columbia	2.0%	145

WOMEN OBTAINING OUT OF STATE ABORTIONS: 1972

BY STATE OF RESIDENCE (cont'd)

State	Proportion of State Residents Obtaining Their Abortions Out of State	Number of State Residents Obtaining Out of State Abortions
Alaska	0.8%	9
Oregon	0.7%	49
Hawaii	0.3%	12
Washington	0.2%	42
California	0.1%	152
New York	0.0%	44
Total		199,489

Source: Hearings on Constitutional Amendments Relating to Abortion before the Subcommittee on the Constitution of the Senate Judiciary Committee, 97th Cong., 1st sess. (1981).

Appendix D

This appendix is a compilation of abortion-related statutes passed by the states since Roe v. Wade was decided. There are six substantive categories of statutory regulations: trimester/health; viability/post-viability; informed consent; spousal consent; and private advertising, promotion and speech restrictions. The appendix notes where a court has ruled on the constitutionality of a statute or where an attorney general has issued an advisory opinion regarding the statute's constitutionality. In addition, if a statute violates basic Supreme Court tenets about constitutionally permissible abortion regulation, this too has been noted. Finally, where the constitutionality of the statute has not been ruled upon or where constitutional defects are not readily apparent, the statute has been described.

I. Trimester/Health Regulations

Alaska

Alaska Stat. § 18.16.010(a)(1) (1986)
Statute provides that abortion must be performed by licensed surgeon or physician.

Alaska Stat. § 18-16.010(a)(2) (1986)
Statute provides that abortion must be performed in a hospital or other approved facility. Would not satisfy criteria under Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179 (1973); Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416 (1983)

Alaska Stat. § 08.64.105 (1987)
Statutes provides that State Medical Board must regulate abortions.

Arizona

Ariz. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 36-2301 (1975)
Statute provides that practitioner must promote life of fetus if born alive.

Arkansas

Ark. Stat. Ann. § 20-9-302 (1987)
Statute provides that certain clinics must be registered with the State Department of Health.

Ark. Stat. Ann. § 5-61-101 (1987)
Statute provides that only licensed medical practitioners may perform abortions.

Ark. Stat. Ann. § 5-61-102 (1987)
Held unconstitutional in part under May v. State, 254 Ark. 194 cert. denied 414 U.S 1024 (19973); Smith v. Bentley, 493 F. Supp. 916 (E.D. Ark. 1980).

Ark. Stat. Ann. § 20-18-603 (1987)
Statute provides that certain pregnancy terminations must be registered.

California

Cal. Health S. Code § 25951 (West 1984)
Held unconstitutional under People v. Barksdale, 8 Cal. 3d 320, 105 Cal. Rptr. 1, 503 P.2d 257 (1972). California Attorney General has ruled that statute requirement that therapeutic abortions be performed only in accredited hospital is a reasonable classification which does not result in unconstitutional discrimination, 50 Ops. Atty. Gen. 114, 11-21-67. Would not satisfy criteria under Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179 (1973), to prohibit abortions except where continuation of pregnancy would physically or mentally impair women or in cases of rape or incest.

Cal. Health and S. Code § 25952 (West 1984)
Held unconstitutional under People v. Barksdale, 105 Cal. Rptr. 1, 503 P.2d 257 (1972). Provision violates due process.

Cal. Health and S. Code § 25953 (West 1984)
Would not satisfy criteria of Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976), to prohibit abortion after 20th week. California Attorney General has ruled that prohibition of all abortions after 20th week is constitutional. 65 Ops. Atty. Gen. 261. 4-27-82.

Cal. Health and S. Code § 25954 (West 1984)
Held unconstitutional under People v. Barksdale, 105 Cal. Rptr 1, 503 P.2d 257 (1972). Definition of mental health violates due process.

Cal. Health and S. Code § 25955.5 (West 1984)
Records required by statute concerning therapeutic abortions information on individual hospitals, but not individual persons, usually must be available to public and media. 55 Ops. Atty. Gen. 369 9-29-72.

Colorado

Colo Rev. Stat § 18-6-101 (1986)
Language of statute requiring parental consent or spousal consent to abortions is similar to language held unconstitutional in Danforth. Portions of this statute were held unconstitutional in People v. Norton, 507 P.2d 862 (1973), e.g., prohibition against abortion of fetuses more than 16 weeks old.

Colo. Rev. Stat. § 25-1-666 (1982)
Statute provides that drugs which induce abortions may be sold by prescription with the name of the purchaser and name and residence of physician recorded in book for that purpose. May not satisfy criteria under Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986).

Delaware

24 Del. Code Ann. § 1790(a) (1987)
Would not satisfy criteria under Roe as it prohibits abortions except where necessary for mother's health, fetal health or in cases of rape and incest.

24 Del. Code Ann. § 1790(b)(1) (1987)
Would not satisfy criteria under Roe v. Wade and Danforth, as it prohibits abortion after 20 weeks of gestation.

24 Del. Code Ann § 1790(c) (1987)
Statute provides reporting provisions. See Thornburgh.

24 Del. Code Ann. § 1795 (1987)
Statute provides that if fetus is born alive after abortion, must exercise same degree of care as if born alive after natural birth.

Florida

Fla. Stat. Ann. § 390.001(2) (West 1986)
Prohibits abortions in the last trimester except where necessary to preserve health of woman. Would not satisfy criteria under Roe or Bolton.

§ 390.001(3) (West 1986)
Statute provides that only physicians may perform abortions.

§ 390.001(4)(c) (West 1986)
Requiring corroboration if medical emergency exists. Would not satisfy criteria under Bolton.

§ 390.002 (West 1986)
Statute requires reporting provision. See Thornburgh.

§ 797.03(1)(2)
Statute prohibits performing abortions outside of licensed facilities except in emergencies.

§ 797.03(3)
Statute prohibits third trimester abortions outside of hospital; would not satisfy criteria under Roe since regulates by trimester rather than viability.

Georgia

Ga. Code Ann. § 16-12-141(a) (1988)
Statute provides that abortions be performed only by licensed physicians for medical necessity.

§ 16-12-141(b) (1988)
Abortions after the first trimester may be performed only in licensed hospital or health facility licensed as an abortion facility by the Department of Human Resources. Would not satisfy criteria under Planned Parenthood of Kansas City v. Ashcroft, 462 U.S. 476 (1983).

§ 16-12-141(c) (1988)
Prohibits second trimester abortions unless physician and two consulting physicians certify that it is necessary to save life or health of woman, and if fetus is viable, aid must be rendered. Would not satisfy criteria under Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179 (1973).

§ 16-12-141(d) (1988)
Statute provides reporting provision consistent with privacy of the woman.

§ 15-11-116 (1985)
Statute provides definition of medical emergency.

Hawaii

Haw. Rev. Stat. § 453-16(a)(1) (1985)
Statute provides that only licensed physicians or surgeons may perform abortions.

§ 453-16(a)(2) (1985)
Attorney General found that statutory requirement that abortion be performed in hospital is not enforceable during first trimester of pregnancy.

§ 453-16(a)(3) (1985)
Requirement tha. abortions be performed only on women who have been physically present in the state for 90 days was found unconstitutional by Hawaii Attorney General.

§ 338-9 (1985)
Statute provides that fetal death certificates be issued.

Idaho

Idaho Code § 18-608(1) (1987)
Allows first trimester abortions only after physician considers various factors and deems abortion appropriate. Abortions lawful in hospitals or clinics.

§ 18-608(2) (1987)
Limits second trimester abortions to hospitals and also requires physician to consider factors enumerated in § 18-608(1). Would not satisfy criteria under Ashcroft.

§ 18-609(3) (1987)
Statute provides limits to third trimester abortions. Requires corroborating physician. Allows abortions only if necessary to preserve life of mother or fetus. Third trimester abortions are to be performed with survival of the child in mind. Would not satisfy criteria of Thornburgh.

§ 39-261 (1985)
Statute requires reporting and records but preserves woman's anonymity.

Illinois

Ill. Ann. Stat. Ch. 38 para. 18-231 (Smith-Hurd 1975)
No abortion may be performed unless medically necessary. Would not satisfy criteria under Roe.

para. 81-30, 30.1 (1975)
Statute requires reporting if woman has complications.

para 81-32 (1975)
Statute provides an analysis of fetal tissue.

Indiana

Ind. Code Ann. § 35-1-58.5-2(1)(A) (1986)
Requires first trimester abortions to be performed by a physician.

§ 35-1-58.5-2(2) (1986)
Requires beyond first trimester abortions to meet criteria in (1) supra and to be performed in hospital or ambulatory outpatient surgical center. Would not satisfy criteria under Ashcroft.

§ 35-1-58.5-3 (1986)
Statute provides that physician must determine fetal viability and if viable, abortion must meet criteria above and be necessary to prevent substantial permanent impairment to life or health of woman.

§ 35-1-58.5-5 (1986)
Statute requires reporting of all abortions. Preserves anonymity of mother but requires name of father, if known.

Iowa

§ 707.10 (1978)
Would not satisfy criteria under Danforth to impose duty to preserve live fetus.

§ 707.8, § 707.7 (1978)
Prohibits second trimester abortions; unconstitutional under Roe.

Kansas

Kan. Stat. Ann. § 21-3407(2)(a) (1981)

Would not satisfy criteria under Roe. Limits abortion to cases in which mother's life is in danger, fetal health is in jeopardy or pregnancy is result of incest or rape.

Held unconstitutional in Poe v. Menghini, 339 F. Supp. 986 (1972). Requires that abortion be performed in state accredited hospital and that three physicians attest to its necessity.

Kentucky

Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 311.723 (Michie/Bobbs-Merrill 1983)
Held unconstitutional in Eubanks v. Brown, 604 F. Supp. 141 (W.D. Ky. 1984). Requiring consultation between physician and patient which is sufficiently long to enable the physician to determine whether the abortion is necessary and requiring physician to write out description of basis for decision.

§ 311.750 (1983)
No person other than a licensed physician may perform an abortion.

§ 311.770 (1983)
Prohibiting the saline abortion after the first trimester. Held invalid in Wolfe v. Schroering, 541 F.2d 523 (6th Cir. 1976).

§ 213.055 (1982)
Statute requires that records be kept. Woman is not identified by name. All records are to be kept confidential.

Louisiana

Lou. Stat. Ann. Rev. Stat. 40:1299.35.3
Abortion performed or induced after the first trimester of pregnancy shall be performed or induced in a licensed hospital. Would not satisfy criteria under Bolton and City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416 (1983).

Maine

Me. Rev. Stat. Ann. 1596(2) (1964)
Abortion must be reported by physician to the Dept. of Human Services. Report forms shall not identify woman by name.

1598(3) (1964)
Statute provides that only licensed medical or osteopathic physicians may perform abortions.

Maryland

Md. Health-Gen. Code Ann. § 20-208(a)
Portion of section requires that an abortion be performed in an accredited and licensed hospital. This section held unconstitutional. 62 Op. Atty. Gen. 3 (1977), 70 Opp. Atty. Gen. 12/3/85. Statute violates Roe v. Wade, in that it prohibits abortions except where mother or fetus is in danger or where pregnancy is the result of rape. See Coleman v. Coleman, 57 Md. App. 755, 741 A.2d 1115 (1984).

20-208(b)(1) (1987)
Subsection (b) held unconstitutional insofar as it prohibits abortion after 26 weeks' gestation (except in the limited circumstances referred therein). 62 Op. Atty. Gen. 3 (1977).

20-208(c) (1987)
Subsections (b) and (c) held unconstitutional to the extent that they require approval of a hospital abortion review committee. 62 Op. Atty Gen. 3 (1977).

Statute provides that abortion can be authorized only by hospital abortion review authority appointed by the hospital. An order of a juvenile court directing that an abortion be performed would be beyond the power of the court; termination of a human pregnancy can be authorized only by the abortion review authority appointed by an accredited hospital. In re Smith, 16 Md. App. 209, 295 A.2d 238 (1972).

Portion of this section that requires abortions to be performed by physicians licensed by the State is valid. 62 Op. Atty. Gen. 3 (1977).

Statute provides that violations of the section's provisions are not crimes and carry no criminal sanctions. State v. Hardy, Civil No. 514, 308 A.2d 223 (1973). Vuitch v. Hardy, Civil No. 71-1129-Y (D. Md. filed June 22, 1972), aff'd, 473 F.2d 1370 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 414 U.S. 824 (1973).

Minnesota

Minn. Stat. Ann. § 145.413 (West 1989)
Statute provides reporting provision consistent with preserving woman's anonymity.

145.412 Subd. 1(1)
Statute prohibits any but licensed physicians or physicians in training under the supervision of a licensed physician from performing abortions. Post-first trimester abortions must be performed in a hospital or abortion facility.

145.412 Subd. 2
Statute provides that it is unlawful to perform abortion on an unconscious woman.

145.412 Subd. 3(1)
Statute provides that post-first trimester abortions must be performed in hospital. Would not satisfy criteria under Ashcroft.

Only doctors may perform abortions.

Mississippi

Miss. Code Ann. § 97-3-3(1) (1972)
Prohibits abortions except where done by a licensed physician, where (a) necessary for the preservation of the mother's life, or (b) where pregnancy was caused by rape. Subsections (a) and (b) held unconstitutional in Spears v. State, 278 So. 2d 443 (1973).

Missouri

Mo. Ann. Stat. § 188.020
Statute provides that only physicians may perform abortions.

§ 188.025
Challenged in this case, requirement that abortions at sixteen weeks' gestation or later be performed in a hospital.

§ 188.052
Statute requires reporting of abortions.

§ 188.055
Statute requires that records of abortions be kept.

Montana

§ 50-20-109(1)(a) (1987)
Statute provides that abortion must be performed by a licensed physician.

§ 50-20-109(1)(b) (1987)
Statute requires that abortion after first trimester be performed in a licensed hospital. Would not satisfy criteria under Bolton or Akron.

§ 50-20-110 (1987)
Statute requires reporting of abortions.

Nebraska

§ 28-335 (1985)
Statute provides that abortion must be by licensed physician.

§ 28-336 (1985)
Statute provides that abortion must be conducted by acceptable medical procedure.

§ 28-343
Statute provides reporting provisions. Section was held unconstitutional insofar as it requires physicians to make an official report of "prescribed" abortions. Womens Services, P.C. v. Thone, 483 F. Supp. 1022., vacated and remanded 452 U.S. 911 (1981), aff'd 636 F.2d 206.

28.345
Statute provides public records provision. See Thornburgh.

Nevada

442.250(1)(a) (1987)
Statute provides that only licensed physicians may perform abortions.

442.250(1)(b) (1987)
Would not satisfy criteria under Roe. Danforth, as it regulates by week of gestation rather than viability.

442.250(2) (1987)
Statute requires hospitalization for abortions after the 24th week of pregnancy.

442.256 (1987)
Statute requires that physician must maintain a record of the abortion for five years.

442.265 (1987)
Statute requires hospital to submit monthly report of abortion complications to state registrar of vital statistics.

442.260
Statute requires Health Division to adopt regulations governing performance and reporting of abortions.

New Jersey — 30.4D-6.1
Statute requires all abortions to be performed in hospitals. Does not satisfy criteria under Ashcroft.

New York — 125.05(3) (1984)
Statute requires that abortions be performed by duly licensed physician, and within 24 week after conception or if necessary to preserve the woman's life. Does not satisfy criteria under Roe, Danforth, as it prohibits abortions after 24th week except where necessary to preserve woman's life.

North Carolina — 14-45.1(a) (1986)
Statute requires that abortion be performed in a certified hospital or clinic in first trimester. Challenged by Corkey v. Edwards, 322 F. Supp. 1248 (WDNC 1971), judgment vacated, 410 U.S. 959 (1973) for reconsideration in light of Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 and Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179 (1973).

14-45.1(b)
Statute prohibits abortions after twenty weeks unless in licensed hospital and there is substantial risk to life or health of female. Does not satisfy criteria under Roe v. Wade, Danforth.

14-451(c)
Statute provides reporting provision.

Pennsylvania — Penn. Stat. Ann. § 3207 (1975)
Statute provides reporting provision upheld in Thornburgh, 737 F.2d 283 (3d. Cir. 1984).

§ 3214 (1975)
(a) and (h) held unconstitutional by Thornburgh, 476 U.S. 747 (1986).

South Carolina — § 44-41-20 (1976)
Section (c) of statute is unconstitutional as it requires spousal consent to third trimester abortions; see Danforth.

§ 44-41-60
Statute provides reporting provisions.

§ 44-41-70
Statute provides minimum licensing standards for abortion clinics.

South Dakota — § 34-23A-4 (1986)
Statute provides abortions following twelfth week and through the twenty-fourth week to be performed only by a physician in a licensed hospital or if hospital facilities are unavailable, in a clinic facility meeting specified conditions. Does not satisfy criteria under Akron.

§ 34-23A-19 (1986)
Statute provides reporting provisions.

Tennessee

Tenn. Code Ann. § 39-4-201(c)(1)
Statute requires that first trimester abortion be obtained with woman's consent and pursuant to attending licensed/certified physician's judgment.

§ 39-4-201(c)(2)
Statute provides that abortion of post-first trimester, pre-viable fetus must be performed with pregnant woman's consent and in a licensed hospital. Does not satisfy criteria under Akron, Ashcroft and Doe v. Bolton.

§ 39-4-203 (1986)
Statute provides reporting provision.

Texas

Tx. Rev. Civ. Stat. Ann. art. 4512.8
Statute requires Texas Board of Health to adopt necessary rules and set minimum standards.

Utah

Ut. Code Ann. § 76-7-302
Statute provides that abortion must be done by physician and in hospital if 90 days or more after conception. Does not satisfy criteria under Akron, Ashcroft.

§ 76-7-309
Statute requires human tissue removed during abortion to be submitted to pathologist for report re: whether there was pregnancy and, if so, whether it was aborted by evacuating the uterus.

§ 76-7-313
Statute provides physician to report age, marital status, county of residence, number of previous abortions, hospital or facility where abortion performed, weight of unborn child, pathological description of unborn child, menstrual age of fetus, measurements, and medical procedure used. May violate Thornburgh.

§ 26-2-23(3) (1953)
Statute provides that institutions submit information to local departments and register all information re: induced abortions occurring at the institution.

Virginia

Va. Code Ann. § 18.2-72 (1988)
Statute conforms to Roe v. Wade. Any licensed physician can perform abortion in first trimester. Applied in Northern Va. Women's Medical Center v. Balch, 617 F.2d 1045 (1980).

§ 18.2-73 (1988)
Statute requires that second trimester abortions be performed in licensed hospital (clinic); upheld in Simopoulos v. Virginia, 462 U.S. 506 (1983).

§ 18.2-74
Statute unconstitutionally vague under Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379 (1979).

§ 18.2-74.1 (1988)
Statute provides medical emergency exception.

§ 82.1-264 (1985)
Statute provides reporting provision.

Washington

Wash. § 9.02.060 (1987)
Statute provides abortion of nonviable fetus by physician.

§ 9.02.070 (1987)
Held unconstitutional as requires spousal consent, abortion to be performed in a hospital, and that woman be resident of state; see State v. Koome, 84 Wn. 2d 901 (1975).

§ 43.20A.625 (1982)
Statute mandates record-keeping of "fetal deaths."

West Virginia

West Virginia Code Annotated § 16-2F-6 (1984)
Statute provides that physician must report performing an abortion.

Wisconsin

§ 69.186 (West Supp. 1988)
Statute provides reporting requirement.

Wyoming

Wyoming Statutes Ann. § 35-6-107 (1988)
Statute requires the preparation and filing for 7 years of compilations of information submitted on abortion reporting forms.

§ 35-6-108 (1988)
Statute provides reporting requirement.

§ 35-6-111 (1988)
Statute requires that only licensed physicians perform abortions.

II. Viability and Post-Viability Regulations

Alaska

Alaska Stat. § 18.16.010(d) (1962)
Statute defines abortion as an operation or a procedure terminating the pregnancy of a nonviable fetus.

Arizona

Ariz. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 36-2301.01 (1956)
In requiring physicians to try to preserve life of fetus, statute does not satisfy criteria under Danforth, Colautti.

Arkansas

Ark. Stat. Ann. § 20-16-703 (1987)
In fixing viability at 25 weeks, statute goes against statement in Danforth that this is not a proper legislative function.

§ 20-16-705
Statute prohibits abortion of viable fetus unless necessary to preserve health or life of woman.

§ 20-16-707(a)
Statute provides physician must use abortion method designed to preserve life of viable fetus unless doing so would endanger woman.

§ 20-16-707(a)-(b)
Statute requires attendance of second physician in abortion of viable fetus.

Hawaii — Haw. Rev. Stat. tit. 25 § 453-16(b)
Statute defines abortion as intentional termination of "the pregnancy of a nonviable fetus."

Idaho — Idaho Code § 18-608(3) (1987)
Statute prohibits third trimester abortions except where necessary to preserve woman's life. Violates Roe.

Illinois — Ill. Ann. Stat. Ch. 38 para 81-25 (Smith-Hurd 1975)

§ 81-26
Statute does not satisfy criteria under Thornburgh to require preservation of life and health of viable fetus without an emergency exception.

§ 81-26(2)(a)
Statute provides no abortion of viable fetus unless second physician is present. Emergency exception.

Indiana — Ind. Code Ann. § 35-1-58.5-2(3) (1986)
Statute requires physician to certify in writing that abortion of viable fetus is necessary for the woman's health.

§ 35-1-58.5-7 (1986)
Statute provides abortions of viable fetuses to be performed in hospitals as well as a second physician to be present. If fetus is viable, must take steps to preserve its life and health. Emergency exception.

Kentucky — Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. Title 18 § 311.780 (1983)
Statute prohibits abortion of viable fetuses except where necessary to preserve mothers life or health.

Louisiana — La. Rev. Stat. Ann. A-§ 14:87.5 (1985) § 40:1299.35.4 (1989 Supp.)
Statute prohibits abortions of viable fetuses except where necessary to preserve mother's health.

Maine — Me. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 22 § 1598(4)(1964) Supp. 1988
Statute prohibits abortions where knowingly disregard viability and knew not necessary for preservation of the life or health of mother.

Minnesota

§ 145.411, subd. 2
Defines "potentially viable" as second trimester. Does not satisfy criteria under Colautti or Danforth.

Minn. Stat. Ann. § 145.415 (West 1989)
Statute prohibits abortion of a potentially viable fetus which is alive following birth.

§ 145.412, subd. 3
Statute prohibits abortion when fetus "potentially viable" unless performed in hospital; doctor certifies in writing that abortion is necessary to preserve life of woman and procedure reasonably assures live birth of fetus. May violate Thornburgh.

Missouri

Mo. Ann. Stat. § 188.029
Challenged in this case.

Montana

Montana Stat. Ann. § 50-20-108 (1987)
Statute prohibits causing death of premature infant born alive, if viable.

§ 50-20-109(c) (1987)
Statute prohibits abortions of viable fetuses except to preserve life or health of mother.

Nebraska

Neb. Rev. Stat § 28-329 (1985)
Statute prohibits abortion after viability except when necessary to preserve health of mother. Viability determination left to medical judgment of attending physician.

§ 28-330 (1985)
Statute requires procedures to be taken to insure protection of viable unborn child compatible with preserving the life or health of the mother in any abortion performed.

New York

N.Y. Pub. Health Law § 4164 (McKinney 1984)
Statute requires abortions after 12th week to be performed in hospital. Does not satisfy criteria under Akron, Ashcroft.

Statute requires physician who performed abortion after twentieth week to corroborate judgement with opinion of another physician. Does not satisfy criteria under Doe v. Bolton.

North Dakota

14-02.1-04(1)
Statute provides abortion procedure to be performed by licensed physician.

14-021-04(2)
Statute provides that after the first 12 weeks, but before viability, abortion must be performed in licensed hospital.

14-02.1-04(3)
Statute provides that after viability, abortion be performed only in a hospital, and only where necessary to preserve life of woman. Unconstitutionally vague under Colautti ("may reasonably be expected to have reached viability").

14-02.1-05
Statute provides that abortion of a viable child can only be performed with a second physician who must take "reasonable steps" to preserve unborn child. No medical emergency exception. Unconstitutionally vague, Leigh v. Olson, 497 F. Supp. 1340 (1980).

14-02.1-07
Statute requires all facilities and hospitals to keep records for 27 years. The records shall remain confidential and be used only for statistical purposes and to ensure compliance. Record-keeping requirements not unconstitutional. (Leigh v. Olsen, 497 F. Supp. 1340 (1980)). But see Thornburgh.

14-021-07.1
Statute provides that North Dakota department of health provide all required forms for compliance with statutory reporting requirements.

Ohio

3701.341
Statute provides requiring Public Health Council to adopt rules relating to abortions.

Oklahoma

Statutes Annotated Tit. 63 1-731
Statute allows any licensed physicians to perform abortions.

1-731(B)
Statute provides that after first trimester, abortion must be in a hospital. Does not satisfy criteria under Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft, 462 U.S. 476 (1983).

1-733
Statute requires self-induced abortions to be performed only under supervision of licensed physician.

1-737
Statute requires abortion procedure to be performed in hospital. Does not satisfy criteria under Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft.

1-738
Statute provides requires reporting requirement.

1-739
Statute provides that records shall be kept by hospitals and facilities.

1-732
Statute provides that no person shall obtain abortion after viability, unless necessary to prevent death of mother or impairment of her health. (emergency exception).

Statute provides that performing physician determines viability and must take care to preserve child. Does not satisfy under Colautti.

Statute presumes viability at 24 weeks. Does not satisfy the Supreme Court's desire for flexibility in defining viability expressed in Danforth.

1-734
Statute provides care and treatment for live-born fetuses. No person shall take the life of viable child, "reasonable measures" must be taken to preserve.

Oregon

Or. Rev. Stat. 435-496
Statute provides that there be a report to the vital statistics unit.

Pennsylvania

Pa. Stat. Ann. Tit. 18, § 3210 (Purdon 1975)
Held unconstitutional under Thornburgh, which invalidates regulations that prohibit post-viable abortions and do not also include an emergency exception.

Tit. 18, § 3211 (Purdon 1975)
Held unconstitutional under Thornburgh. Provision required physician to report basis for determination that fetus is not viable if abortion after first trimester.

Utah

§ 76-7-302 (Supp. 1988)
Statute prohibits abortion except where performed by physician within first two trimesters and where fetus is viable prohibits abortion unless it is necessary to save woman's life. Does not satisfy criteria under Roe or Akron.

§ 76-7-308 (1953)
Statute provides that physician must use all his medical skills to save life of unborn child. Does not satisfy criteria under Danforth.

Wisconsin

Wis. Stat. Ann. § 940.11(2), (3) (West Supp. 1988)
Statute prohibits abortion after viability; includes emergency exception.

§ 940.15(4)
Statute requires post viability abortion to be performed in a hospital.

§ 940.15(6)
Statute requires physician to use abortion method likely to preserve life of fetus. Does not satisfy criteria under Thornburgh.

Wyoming

Wy. O. Stat. § 35-6-102 (1988)
Statute prohibits post viability abortions. Does not satisfy criteria under Thornburgh.

§ 35-6-103 (1988)
Statute provides that physician may not terminate the viability of unborn infant.

III. Informed Consent Regulations

Delaware	Del. Code Ann. tit. 24 § 1794 (1974 rev.) Statute requires mother to give written consent. Does not satisfy criteria under Akron as it requires practitioners to tell women details of fetal development.
Florida	Fla. Stat. Ann. § 390.001(4) (West 1986) Statute requires written informed consent of pregnant woman. If woman is married, requires that husband be given notice of the abortion. Spousal notice provision violates Danforth. § 390.025(2) (West 1986) Statute provides that abortion referral or counseling agency shall furnish pregnant woman with full and detailed explanation of abortion – including effects and alternatives. May violate Akron, Thornburgh.
Idaho	Idaho Code § 18-609 (1987) Statute provides that hospital must give detailed descriptions of physical characteristics of fetus and abortion procedures. Does not satisfy criteria under Akron.

	§ 18-610 (1987) Statute provides that the mother's refusal to consent is grounds for not performing abortion.
Illinois	Ill. Ann. Stat. Ch. 38 para 81-26 § 6(b) (Smith-Hurd 1975) Statute requires practitioner to inform woman of pain reliever for fetus. Does not satisfy criteria under Akron .
Iowa	Iowa Code Ann. § 707.8 (1978) Statute prohibits non-consensual termination of pregnancy except where to preserve life or health of mother or fetus.
Kentucky	Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 311.726 (1983); § 311.729 (1983) Statute requires that every abortion patient receive materials describing alternatives to abortion and describing fetus at various stages. Held unconstitutional. Eubanks v. Brown, 604 F. Supp. 741 (W.D. Ky. 1984).
Pennsylvania	Pa. Stat. Ann. Tit. 18, § 3208 Statute provides that the Department of Health publish information to inform women of services available to assist them through pregnancy, childbirth, and while the child is dependent. The Department of Health must also provide materials designed to inform women of the anatomical and physiological characteristics of the unborn child in two-week gestational increments from fertilization to full term. The material must be objective and convey accurate scientific information. Held unconstitutional under Thornburgh.

Rhode Island

R.I. Gen. Laws § 23-4.7-2, § 23-4.7-3, § 23-4.7-5
Statute provides informed consent provisions. Does not satisfy criteria under Thornburgh as they require the physician to inform the woman of the gestational age of the fetus and of the availability of foster care and adoption.

South Carolina

S.C. Code Ann. § 44-41-20
Statute requires consent of woman for first and second trimester abortions; requires additional consents of her spouse and a consulting physician for third trimester abortions. Does not satisfy criteria under Danforth.

S.C. Code Ann. § 44-41-30(a)
Statute provides that the pregnant woman's consent is required prior to the abortion unless there is a medical emergency involving the woman's life or if the woman is judged mentally incompetent.

South Dakota

S.D. Codified Laws Ann. § 34-23A-7
Statute provides that prior to an abortion, the pregnant woman shall give written consent to such an abortion stating she is having the abortion of her own free will. The physician or facility will retain the consent. If the woman is an unmarried minor, prior written consent is required from her parent or person in loco parentis. If the woman is a married minor, prior written consent must be obtained from her spouse. Spousal consent provision does not satisfy criteria under Danforth. Parental consent provision does not satisfy Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622 (1977) ("Bellotti II").

S.D. Codified Laws Ann. § 34-23-A-10
Statute provides that all physicians and facilities performing abortions provide upon request, information on services and counseling which provide alternate solutions for "problem pregnancies." Does not satisfy criteria under Thornburgh.

S.D. Codified Laws Ann. § 34-23A-10.1
Statute requires that at least 24 hours before an abortion is scheduled, unless there is an emergency situation, the physician will request that the woman sign a form informing her about adoption and financial assistance. Does not satisfy criteria under Thornburgh.

Tennessee

Tenn. Code Ann. § 39-4-201(c)
Statute requires obtaining woman's consent before abortion.

Section 2, which provides that abortions performed after first trimester but before viability of fetus may be performed only in a licensed hospital, or a hospital operated by the state or federal government, by the woman's attending physician, does not satisfy criteria based on Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416 (1983).

Tenn. Code Ann. § 39-4-202
Statute provides that informed consent of a pregnant woman is required prior to abortion; certain information including information about adoption, must be provided by physician; there must be a waiting period of two days between the time the information is given and the time the consent is signed; the physician will inform a minor's parents two days prior to the operation that an abortion is to be performed on the minor, but this section is not designed to authorize parental objection or to alter or prevent the decision with the abortion. Information requirements do not satisfy criteria under Thornburgh. Waiting period does not satisfy criteria based on Akron.

Utah

Utah Code Ann. § 76-7-305.5
Statute provides the Department of Health will publish information regarding available services, descriptions of physical characteristics of a normal unborn child during various stages of development and descriptions of abortion procedures. Facilities will provide this information upon request. They will inform every patient that these materials are available. The Department of Health will compile and report information about the consent materials. Statute does not satisfy criteria under Thornburgh.

Virginia

VA. Code Ann. § 18.2-76
Statute provides that before performing an abortion the physician will obtain informed written consent of the pregnant woman unless she is incompetent. If she is incompetent, the parent, guardian, committee, or person in loco parentis must provide written consent. The physician must inform the woman about the procedure and its risks.

Washington

Wash. Rev. Code Ann. § 9.02.070
A woman "not quick with child" and not more than four months pregnant may have an abortion with her prior consent and, if married and residing with her husband, with her husband's prior consent, or, if under 18 only (a) with parental consent, (b) if she has resided in the state for 90 days, and (c) if the abortion is performed in a hospital or approved medical facility unless in an emergency. The spousal consent provision does not satisfy criteria based on Danforth. The residency requirement violates Doe v. Bolton. Requiring all first trimester abortions to be performed in a hospital violates Akron.

Wisconsin

Wis. Stat. Ann. § 146-78
Statute provides that prior to performing an abortion the physician or assistant must provide the woman with, unless it is an emergency constituting an immediate threat and grave risk to the life and health of the woman, certain accurate information, including information about her condition, the procedure, available services providing birth control, and agencies providing during pregnancy and after birth services. If the woman is a minor the physician must discuss the availability of services to assist a minor contemplating an abortion who wishes to notify her parents or guardian of the contemplated abortion. The physician must inform the woman of possible risks. The physician may inform the woman of probable physical characteristics of the child. Upon request, the physician shall supply written information regarding, among other things, services available to assist the woman during pregnancy and after the birth of the child, including adoption agencies. After receiving information the woman must sign a statement that she received the information and stating she consents to the abortion. The hospital or clinic must have a written policy regarding notification of a minor's parent or guardian. The clinic cannot notify a minor's parents of the minor's intent to have an abortion. Does not satisfy criteria under Thornburgh.

IV. Parental Notice/Consent Regulations

Arizona	Ariz. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 36-2152 (1987 Supp.) Statute requires that one parent or legal guardian of unemancipated or unmarried minor be notified prior to minor's abortion. Written notice must be given at least 24 hours before the abortion. Notice requirement is waived if minor receives a judicial order that she is mature enough to make the abortion decision or that her best interests would be served. Notice requirement may also be waived if there is an emergency need for the abortion or if the parent/legal guardian cannot be contacted and physician certifies that either of these is the case.
Arkansas	Ark. Stat. Ann. § 41-2555 (1977) Requires that prior written permission by the parents or guardian of an unmarried minor be given. If the minor is married, written permission must be given by her husband. Spousal consent provision held in Smith v. Bentley, 493 F. Supp. 916 (E.D. Ark. 1980).
California	Cal. Health & Safety Code § 25955 (1988 Supp.) Statute requires parental consent of one parent before an abortion may be performed upon a minor except where there is a medical emergency. Provides for an expedited judicial bypass procedure to determine if the minor is sufficiently mature to consent to her own abortion.

Preliminary injunction issued pending trial, American Academy of Pediatrics v. John Van De Kamp, No. 884574, Cal. Superior Court Dec. 28, 1987.

Delaware

Del. Code Ann. tit. 13 § 708 (1981)
Statute requires prior written consent of the parents/guardians with whom the unmarried minor resides or if she does not reside with either of her parents or guardians, then the statute requires the written consent of one parent or guardian. Does not satisfy criteria under Bellotti v. Baird ("Bellotti II"), 443 U.S. 622 (1979) as does not include judicial bypass provision.

Florida

Fla. Stat. Ann. § 390.001(4)(a) (West 1985 Supp.)
Statute prohibits abortion, on an unmarried pregnant woman under 18 unless the physician has first obtained the prior written, informed consent of her parent, custodian, or guardian. Includes judicial bypass option.

Held unconstitutional under Scheinberg v. Smith, 659 F.2d 476 (5th Cir. 1981).

Georgia

Ga. Code Ann. § 15-11-110 to 15-11-118 (1987)
Requires that notice be given to a parent, guardian, or person standing in loco parentis prior to an abortion. Minor must submit written statement from parent/guardian to that effect or "actual" notice in person or by phone by the physician must be given at least 24 hours before the abortion or notice may be given by mail at least 48 hours before the scheduled abortion. Enjoined as unconstitutional, Planned Parenthood Ass'n of Atlanta v. Harris, 691 F. Supp. 1419 (N.D. Ga. 1988).

Idaho

Idaho Code § 18-609(6) (1987)
Requires notice to both parents or legal guardian of unmarried pregnant woman under 18 of pending abortion at least 24 hours prior to performance of the abortion. Opinion letter from Attorney General – constitutional under H.L. v. Matheson, 450 U.S. 398 (1981). However, does not satisfy criteria under Bellotti II as does not include waiver provision.

Illinois

Ill. Rev. Stat. ch. 38 § 81-61 et. seq. (1984 Supp.)
Waiting period held unconstitutional in Zbaraz v. Hartigan, 763 F.2d 1532 (7th Cir. 1985), aff'd by an equally divided court, 108 S. Ct. 429 (1987), rehearing denied, 108 S. Ct. 1064 (1988).

Indiana

Ind. Code Ann. § 35-1-58.5-2.5 (Burns 1985 Supp.)
Statute requires physician to obtain the prior written consent of one parent or guardian if unemancipated pregnant woman under 18. Physician or minor may seek judicial waiver.

Consent provision does not apply in an emergency.

Kentucky

Ky. Rev. Stat. § 311.732, 311.990 (1988)
Dual parental informed consent provision and bypass procedure enjoined as unconstitutional until promulgation of Supreme Court rules. Eubanks v. Wilkinson, Civ. No. 82-03260-; Slip. op. (W.D. Ky. August 23, 1988); appeal filed 88-6085 (6th Cir); statute due to go into effect.

Louisiana

La. Rev. Stat. § 40: 1299.35.5 (West 1985 Supp.)
Statute provides consent provision. Upheld as constitutional, Margaret S. v. Treen, 597 F. Supp. 636 (E.D. La. 1984) aff'd 794 F.2d 994 (5th Cir. 1986).

Maine

Me. Rev. Stat. Ann. tit. 22 § 1597 (1980)
Requires physician to notify both parents or guardian of an unemancipated minor of his intention to perform the abortion or to notify the Department of Human Services of his inability to obtain notice. Actual notice must be given 24 hours before the abortion. Mail notice must be given at least 48 hours before the abortion. Requires physician who is unable to notify parents/guardian to delay performing abortion for 24 hours after notifying Dept. of Human Services. No judicial bypass provision is included.

Preliminarily enjoined as unconstitutional under Women's Community Health Center v. Cohen, 477 F. Supp. 542 (D. Me. 1979).

Maryland

Md. Health-Gen. Code Ann. § 20-103 (1982)
Statute requires physician to notify parent/guardian of unmarried minor prior to performing abortion. No notice required if minor does not live with a parent or guardian or if physician is unable to reach parent/guardian. No judicial bypass provision. Attorney General opinion is that statute is unconstitutional. 70 Op. Atty. (Maryland) Gen. (Dec. 31, 1985).

Held unconstitutional by Opinion from Atty. Gen. re: Provisions requiring notice to parents.

Mass.

Mass. Gen. Laws Ann. ch. 112 § 12 (1982)
Requires prior consent of both parents or legal guardian (unless parent has died or is otherwise unavailable, in which case one parent consent will suffice) of unmarried woman under 18 before abortion may be performed. Includes judicial bypass option.

Statute challenged by Planned Parenthood League v. Bellotti, 641 F.2d 1006 (1st Cir. 1981). Facially constitutional; still in courts but presently enforceable/operative.

Minnesota

Minn. Stat. Ann. § 144.343(2)-(7) (West 1985 Supp.)
Statute requires minor to notify both her parents at least 48 hours before a planned abortion or demonstrate to a court that she is mature enough to make the abortion decision or that the abortion is in her best interests.

Upheld as unconstitutional in Hodgson v. Minnesota, 853 F.2d 1452 (8th Cir. 1988) (holding).

Mississippi

Miss. Code Ann. § 41-41-53 (Supp. 1988)
Requires written consent of both parents or legal guardian of unemancipated minor. Both parents need not consent in specific circumstances including when minor's pregnancy was due to incest. Includes judicial waiver provision. (41-41-55.)

Statute enjoined pending final determination on merits. Barnes v. Mississippi, No. J86-0458(W) (S.D. Miss. July 2, 1986) (TRO entered until S. Ct. rules issued) Miss. S. Ct. Rules issued Nov. 1986.

Missouri

Mo. Ann. Stat. § 188.028 (Vernon 1982)
Requires physician to secure written informed consent of the minor and one parent or guardian. Parental consent is not required if minor is emancipated or has obtained court order granting minor the right to self-consent.

Inlcudes judicial bypass option; considered by two justices in Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft, 462 U.S. 476 (1983); enjoined in T.L.J. v. Ashcroft, 585 F. Supp. 712 (W.D. Mo. 1983); injunction lifted T.L.J. v. Webster, 792 F.2d 734 (8th Cir. 1986).

Montana

Mont. Code. Ann. § 50-20-107 (1983)
Statute requires written notice to parent or legal guardian of minor. Does not satisfy criteria under Bellotti II as it does not include a judicial bypass procedure.

Nebraska

Neb. Rev. Stat. § 28-347 (1984 Supp.)
Requires 24-hour actual notice to one parent or legal guardian of minor prior to performing abortion or 48-hour mail notice. Includes judicial bypass option.

Statute challenged by Orr v. Knowles, No. CV 81-0-301 (D. Neb. Sept. 19, 1983). See also, Orr v. Knowles, 337 N.W. 3d 699 (Neb. 1983). Prior consent provision struck; present notice provision enjoined.

Nevada

Nev. Rev. Stat. ch. 442.255
Prohibits abortions upon unmarried, unemancipated women under 18 unless one parent or guardian is personally notified before the abortion. Provision is waived if abortion is immediately necessary to preserve minor's life or health. Includes judicial waiver option.

Glick et al. v. McKay et al., 616 F. Supp. 322 (D. Nev. 1985) interlocutory appeal pending 9th Cir. No. 85-2335; presently enjoined.

North Dakota

N.D. Cent. Code § 14-02.1-03.1 (1981)
Statute prohibits abortions upon women under 18 unless both parents provide written consent; if the minor is married, parental consent is not required. Includes judicial bypass option.

Statute held unconstitutional, prior notice statute struck. Leigh v. Olson, 497 F. Supp. 1340 (D.N.D. 1980); no known challenge to present consent statute.

Ohio

Ohio Rev. Code Ann. § 2919.12 (1987)
Statute prohibits abortions upon unmarried, unemancipated women under 18 unless 24-hour prior notice to one parent or guardian has been given. Notice may be given to a grandparent or sibling if woman signs affidavit stating she fears abuse from the parent. Notice provision is waived if one parent provides written consent or if juvenile court authorizes abortion. 48-hour notice by mail may be given if relative or guardian cannot be contacted.

Statute held unconstitutional under Akron Center for Reprod Health v. Rosen, 633 F. Supp. 1123 (N.D. Ohio 1986) aff'd sub nom Akron Center for Reprod. Health v. Slaby, 854 F.2d 852 (1988)

Pennsylvania

18 Pa. Cons. Stat. Ann. § 3206 (Purdon 1983)
Injunction against enforcement of statute issued because statute lacked detailed provisions ensuring confidentiality and dispatch, and establishing a clear procedure.

A.C.O.G. v. Thornburgh, 656 F. Supp 879 (E.D. Pa. 1987). Pennsylvania Supreme Court, directed by statute to promulgate rules to implement statute, adopted such rules in 1986. Preliminary injunction continued because certain implementing rules did not satisfy constitutional requirements. A.C.O.G. v. Thornburg, 656 F. Supp. 879 (E.D. Pa. 1987).

Rhode Island

R.I. Gen. Laws § 23-4.7-6 (1984 Supp.)
Statute prohibits abortion upon unmarried, unemancipated women under 18 without the consent of the woman and one of her parents unless a family court judge determines that the minor is mature and is capable of giving informed consent or determines that an abortion is in the minor's best interest.

Prior statute held unconstitutional under Women's Medical Center of Providence v.

Roberts, 530 F. Supp. 1136 (D.R.I. 1982); new statute enacted after court decision; no challenge of new statute; presently operating.

South Carolina — S.C. Code Ann. § 44-41-30 (Law. Co-op. 1985)
Statute requires parental consents.

Statute held unconstitutional under Floyd v. Anders, 440 F. Supp. 535 (D.S.C. 1977) vacated and remanded, 440 U.S. 445 (1979) rehearing denied, 441 U.S. 928 (1979)

South Dakota — S.D. Codified Laws Ann. § 34-23A-7 (1977)
Statute requires written parental consent for unmarried minors. Married minors must obtain written consent from husband. Does not satisfy criteria under Danforth, and also under Bellotti II because no waiver provision.

Tennessee — Tenn. Code Ann. § 39-4-202(f) (1982)
Statute held unconstitutional Planned Parenthood of Nashville v. Alexander, No. 79-843, Slip op. (Chancery Ct. 1979).

Utah — Utah Code Ann. § 76-7-304 (1978)
Statute held unconstitutional as applied to unemancipated dependent and immature minors. H.L. v. Matheson, 450 U.S. 398 (1981).

West Virginia — W. Va. Code § 16-2F-3 (1985)
Statute provides parental notification/waiver; notice to minor of right to petition court; minor to be referred for counseling upon notification to parents; parental notification waived where independent physician not to perform abortion, finds minor mature enough to make decision or finds that notification is not in minor's best interests.

V. Spousal Consent/Participation Requirements

Colorado — Colo. Rev. Stat. § 18-6-101(1) (1986)
Prohibits, among other things, performing abortions upon married women who live with their husbands unless husband and wife both request it. Does not meet the criteria of Danforth.

Florida — Fla. Stat. Ann. § 390.001(4)(b) and (1) (West 1986)
Statute requires that if a woman is married and living with her husband, that he must be notified and given an opportunity to consult with her. To comply with this section, the woman may give a written statement that such notice and opportunity has been given. If a medical emergency exists, this section may be waived if physician obtains one corroborative medical opinion attesting to the medical necessity of the abortion. Held unconstitutional in Scheinberg v. Smith, 550 F. Supp. 1112, S.D. Fla. (1982).

Kentucky

Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 12 § 311.735 (1983)

Statute requires physician or his agent to notify husband prior to performing abortion, if this is "reasonably possible." If it is not "reasonably possible," notice must be given to husband within 30 days after the abortion. Section requiring pre-abortion notice to husband does not apply if couple has filed for dissolution of marriage, or if there is a medical emergency. Failure to comply with this section creates tort liability. Held unconstitutional under Eubanks v. Brown, 604 F. Supp. 141 (W.D. Ky 1984).

Montana

Mont. Code Ann. §§ 50-20-107(a) (1987)

Statute provides that no abortion may be performed on woman without written notice to husband, unless husband is voluntarily separated from her. Does not satisfy criteria under Danforth.

Rhode Island

R.I. Gen. Laws § 23-4.8-2

Statute provides that if a married woman consents to an abortion, the physician who will perform the abortion must notify the husband, if possible, prior to the abortion. Does not satisfy criteria under Danforth.

South Carolina

S.C. Code Ann. § 44-41-20(c)

Statute provides that during the third trimester, the abortion must be performed with the woman's consent, and if married and living with the husband, with the husband's consent. Does not satisfy criteria under Danforth.

South Dakota

S.D. Codified Laws Ann. § 34-23A-7

Statute provides that prior to any abortion, the pregnant woman must sign a written consent stating she is having the abortion of her own free will. The physician or the facility where the abortion is performed shall retain the consent. If the woman is a married minor consent must be obtained from her husband as well as herself. Does not satisfy criteria under Danforth.

Utah

Utah Code Ann. § 76-7-304

Statute provides that the physician must consider all factors relevant to the pregnant woman's well-being including: physical, emotional and psychological health, age, familial situation. The physician, if possible, must notify a minor's parents or guardian or a husband if the woman is married. Does not satisfy criteria under Danforth.

Washington

Wash. Rev. Code Ann. 9.02.070(a)

Statute provides that a woman "not quick with child" and not more than four months pregnant may have an abortion if she consents, and if she is married and living with her husband or unmarried and under 18 she must get the consent of her husband or parent or legal guardian. Does not satisfy criteria under Danforth and Bellotti II.

VI. Private Advertising, Promotion, Speech Restrictions

Arizona

Ariz. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 13-3605 (1986)
Statute makes it a misdemeanor to willfully write, compose or publish a notice of advertisement of any medicine or means for producing or facilitating a miscarriage or abortion. Statute held unconstitutional in State v. N.Y. Times, 20 Ariz. App. 183, 511 P.2d. 196 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1973).

California

Cal. Bus. & P. Code § 601 (West 1974)
Statute prohibits writing, composing, publishing any notice or advertisement of medicine or means of producing or facilitating an abortion or miscarriage. Held unconstitutional by People v. Orser, 31 Cal. App. 3d 528, 107 Cal. Rptr. 458 (Cal. Ct. App. 1973).

Colorado

Colo. Rev. Stat. § 25-1-665 (1982).
Statute prohibits advertisement, sale or public exposure for sale of products designed expressly to induce abortions. Does not meet criteria under Bigelow v. Virginia, 421 U.S. 809 (1975).

Connecticut

Conn. Gen. Stat. Ann. § 53-31 (1958 rev.)
Prohibits the publication, lecture, advertisement or any other means of encouraging illegal abortions (as defined by C.G.S. § 53-29, 53-30). Also prohibits sale or advertisement of medicines that induce abortions, except to licensed physicians or approved hospitals. Finally, statute prohibits advertisement of "monthly regulator[s]" for women. Statute enjoined as unconstitutional, Abele v. Markle, 369 F. Supp. 807 (D. Conn.).

Florida

Fla. Stat. Ann. § 797-02 (West Supp. 1988)
Statute criminalizes advertisement, distribution, circulation of any written document containing language that conveys any "hint" or reference to where, from whom or how one may obtain an abortion. Does not satisfy criteria under Bigelow.

Idaho

Idaho Code § 18-607 (1987)
Statute provides that only physicians and druggists may sell or advertise anything designed to terminate a pregnancy. Others are permitted to advertise/sell if ad or sale is not likely to reach the general public.

Maryland

Md. Health-Gen. Code Ann. § 20-201 (1987)
Statute prohibits advertisement of abortion referrals. Does not meet criteria under Bigelow.

Massachusetts — Mass. Gen. Laws Ann. Ch. 272 § 20 (West 1983)
Statute prohibits dissemination of any printed information about abortion services. Does not meet criteria under Bigelow.

Michigan — Mich. Comp. Laws Ann. § 750.15 (West 1968) § 750.40 (West 1968) § 750.34 (West 1968)
Statute makes it a misdemeanor to disseminate advertisement of abortion services; upheld by Larkin v. Cahalon, 208 N.W.2d 176 (1973). Does not meet criteria under Bigelow.

Minnesota — Minn. Stat. Ann. § 617.25 (West 1986) § 617.26 (West 1986)
Statutes prohibit dissemination, written and oral, of information pertaining to procuring an unlawful abortion. Does not meet criteria under Bigelow.

Mississippi — Miss. Code Ann. § 97-3-5 (1972)
Statute prohibits advertisement of unlawful abortions. Does not meet criteria under Bigelow.

Montana — Mont. Code Ann. § 50-20-109(4) (1987)
Statute prohibits physician and others from affirmatively seeking patients for abortions. Does not meet criteria under Bigelow.

Nevada — Nev. Rev. Stat. § 202.200 (1987)
Statute prohibits advertisement of abortion. Does not meet criteria under Bigelow.

North Dakota — N.D. Cent. Code § 14-02.1.-06 (1981)
Statute prohibits physicians and hospitals from advertising or participating in any form of communication for the purpose of inviting or inducing a woman to undergo an abortion.

Held unconstitutional under Leigh v. Olson, 487 F. Supp. 1340 (1980) as unconstitutionally vague.

Oklahoma — Okla. Stat. Ann. Tit. 63 § 1-736 (West 1983)
Statute prohibits hospitals from advertising performance of abortions. Does not meet criteria under Bigelow.

Virginia — Va. Code. Ann. § 18.2-76.1 (1988)
Statute prohibited all forms of encouragement for procuring an abortion by advertisement.

Held unconstitutional by Bigelow v. Virginia, 421 U.S. 809 (1975).

Wyoming — Wyo. Stat. § 35-6-116 (1988)
Statute prohibits advertisement of abortion services. Does not meet criteria under Bigelow.

AMICUS CURIAE

BRIEF

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
MAR 30 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

No. 88-605

In the Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,
APPELLANTS,

v.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,
APPELLEES.

On Appeal from the United States Court of Appeals For the Eighth Circuit

BRIEF FOR BIOETHICISTS FOR PRIVACY AS AMICUS CURIAE SUPPORTING APPELLEES

GEORGE J. ANNAS*
LEONARD H. GLANTZ
WENDY K. MARINER
80 E. Concord Street
Boston, Massachusetts 02118
(617) 638-4626

*Counsel of Record

Dated: March 30, 1989

Blanchard Press, Inc., Boston, Mass. — Law Printers [617] 426-6690

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

Should personal medical decisions, such as abortion, that currently are made by the individual patient in the privacy of a doctor-patient relationship, be made instead by state legislatures?

Should a state be able to require physicians to withhold information from their patients that is essential for their patients to make informed medical decisions?

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Page
Interest of Amicus	1
Summary of Argument	2
Argument	4
I. The Constitutional Right of Privacy Which Protects the Right To Make Medical Decisions Is a Fundamental Right and a Central American Value Which Is "Implicit in the Concept of Ordered Liberty" and the Court Should Continue To Protect It	4
II. The Right of Privacy Protects the Rights of Individuals To Make Personal Medical Decisions in a Doctor-Patient Relationship	11
A. The Doctor-Patient Relationship, Not the Legislature, Is the Proper Locus for Medical Decisions	11
B. States Should Not Be Permitted To Dictate or Censor the Content of Discussions That Occur in a Doctor-Patient Relationship	13
C. Overruling the Constitutional Right of Privacy Would Seriously Undermine Individual Autonomy and Would Permit the State To Make Medical Care Decisions That Belong to Individuals	19
Conclusion	24

Table of Authorities

Cases

Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416 (1983)	7
Betesh v. United States, 400 F.Supp. 238 (D.D.C. 1974)	18
Cruzan v. Harmon, 760 S.W.2d 408 (Mo. 1988)	22

Page

Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179 (1973) 5, 6, 10, 11
Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972) 4
Goldberg v. Ruskin, 128 Ill. App. 3d 1029, 471 N.E.2d 530 (1984), aff'd, 113 Ill.2d 482, 499 N.E.2d 406 (1986) 16
Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965) 4, 5, 19
In re A.C., 533 A.2d 611 (App. D.C. 1987), vacated 539 A.2d 203 (App. D.C. 1988) 22
In the Matter of Jobes, 108 N.J. 394, 529 A.2d 434 (1987) 23
In the Matter of Martin Klein, Supreme Ct. of New York, Nassau Cty. No. 1736/89 (Feb. 7, 1989) 19
In re Quinlan, 70 N.J. 10, 355 A.2d 647 (1976), cert. den. sub nom. Garger v. New Jersey, 429 U.S. 922 (1976) 11, 20, 22
In the Matter of Spring, 389 Mass. 629, 405 N.E.2d 115 (1980) 23
In re Yetter, Northampton Co. Orphans Ct. No. 1973-533 (Williams, J.) (Pa. 1973) 23
Jacobs v. Theimer, 519 S.W.2d 846 (Tex. 1975) 16
Jewson v. Mayo Clinic, 691 F.2d 405 (8th Cir. 1982) 18
Lane v. Candura, 376 N.E.2d 1232 (Mass. App. 1978) ... 23
Manion v. Tweedy, 257 Minn. 59, 100 N.W.2d 124 (1959) 18
Massachusetts v. Bowen, 679 F.Supp. 137 (D. Mass. 1988) 14
Matter of Nancy Klein, New York Appellate Division, Second Department, New York Law Journal, Feb. 14, 1989 19
Planned Parenthood Federation v. Bowen, 680 F.Supp. 1465 (D. Colo. 1988) 14
Planned Parenthood of Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976) 7, 10
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973) 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 11, 13, 19

Page

Satz v. Perlmutter, 362 So.2d 160 (Fla. App. 1978), aff'd, 379 So.2d 359 (Fla. 1980) 23
Smith v. Cote, 128 N.H. 231, 513 A.2d 341 (1986) 16
State of New York v. Bowen, 690 F.Supp. 1261 (S.D.N.Y. 1988), aff'd, 863 F.2d 46 (2d Cir. 1988) 14
Steele v. United States, 463 F.Supp. 321 (D. Alaska 1977) 18
Superintendent of Belchertown v. Saikewicz, 373 Mass. 728, 370 N.E.2d 417 (1977) 11, 23
Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986) 7, 8, 10, 11, 24
Wells v. Billars, 391 N.W.2d 668 (S.D. 1986) 18
Whalen v. Roe, 429 U.S. 589 (1977) 9
Wickline v. California, 192 Cal. App. 3d 1630, 228 Cal. Rptr. 661 (1986), app. dism'd, 239 Cal. Rptr. 805, 741 P.2d 613 (1987) 18

Regulations

20 C.F.R. 310.50(b)(1) 16
53 Fed. Reg. 2922 (Feb. 2, 1988) 14

Miscellaneous

Ad Hoc Committee on Medical Ethics, American College of Physicians Ethics Manual, Part I, 101 Annals of Internal Medicine, 129 (1984) 12
A. Jonsen, M. Siegler & W. Winsdale, Clinical Ethics 62 (2nd ed. 1986) 14
Annas, Protecting the Liberty of Pregnant Patients, 316 New Eng. J. Med. 1213 (1987) 22
Annas, The Insane Root Takes Reason Prisoner, 19 Hastings Center Report 29 (Jan./Feb. 1989) 22
Annas, Webster and the Politics of Abortion, 19 Hastings Center Report 36 (March/April 1989) 7

Page

American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, Standards for Obstetric-Gynecologic Services 18-19 (5th ed. 1985) 16
R. Faden & T. Beauchamp, A History and Theory of Informed Consent (1986) 13
S. Elias and G. J. Annas, Reproductive Genetics and the Law (1987) 16, 17
T. Engelhardt, The Foundations of Bioethics 224 (1985). 22
Glantz, "Abortion: A Decade of Decisions" Genetics and the Law III 305 (A. Milunsky & G. Annas, eds. 1985) .. 7
R. Goldstein, Mother-Love and Abortion: A Legal Interpretation 81 (1988) 14
Gumbel, Villagers Suffering Chernobyl's Fallout Face Soviet Silence, Wall Street J., March 6, 1989 15
Hohler, State Policy, Human Tragedy, Boston Globe, Feb. 26, 1989 21
Kolder, Gallagher & Parsons, Court-Ordered Obstetrical Interventions, 316 New. Eng. J. Med. 1192 (1987) 22
Nelson & Milliken, Compelled Medical Treatment of Pregnant Women, 259 J.A.M.A. 1060 (1988) 22
Plato, Laws, 4.720b-e 12
President's Commission for the Study of Ethical Problems in Medicine, Screening and Counseling for Genetic Conditions 22-31 (1983) 16
President's Commission for the Study of Ethical Problems in Medicine and Biomedical and Behavioral Reseach, Making Health Care Decisions 2-3 (1982) 13

In the
Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

No. 88-605

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,
APPELLANTS,

v.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,
APPELLEES.

On Appeal from the United States Court of Appeals For the Eighth Circuit

BRIEF FOR BIOETHICISTS FOR PRIVACY AS AMICUS CURIAE SUPPORTING APPELLEES

Interest of Amicus

Amicus is an ad hoc group of 57 philosophers, theologians, attorneys, and physicians from 20 states and the District of Columbia who teach medical ethics to medical students and/or physicians, or who have a major professional interest in medical ethics. Although the precise beliefs and practices of the members of this group vary, as do their professional and religious backgrounds, the members believe that permitting competent adults to make important, personal medical decisions in consultation with their physician is a fundamental principle of medical ethics, and that the doctor-patient relationship deserves the constitutional protection this Court has afforded it under the right of privacy. Medical ethics, individual autonomy, and professional accountability will all be fostered by preserving the right of privacy. Compromising the right of privacy, and substituting the state as the decision-maker in the doctor-patient relationship, would undermine principles of medical ethics and compromise principles of good patient care and good medical practice to the detriment of physicians and patients alike.

Summary of Argument

I

Missouri asks this Court to renounce a right of privacy which this Court has described as "older than the Bill of Rights." This Court has provided lawmakers with a consistent and coherent set of parameters for identifying what the right of privacy protects, especially with respect to decisions about abortion. Abandonment of the right of privacy would permit state legislatures to control personal decisions that are now made in the doctor-patient relationship. Without the protection of the right of privacy, each legislature would be free to impose its values by dictating the outcome of what are and should be personal medical care decisions.

II

A. As this Court has recognized, a woman's right to decide to terminate a pregnancy is exercised within the context of the doctor-patient relationship. The ancient tradition of safeguarding the privacy and freedom of unfettered communication between doctor and patient is embodied in ethical precepts which the law recognizes and supports. The Missouri legislation is a direct, governmental attack on this relationship, thereby jeopardizing patients' rights, and compromising physicians' ethical obligations to their patients.

B. Both legal and ethical principles require physicians to discuss health risks that are caused or exacerbated by pregnancy and information concerning possible fetal genetic or congenital disorders. The Missouri statutes prohibit such discussions by publicly-funded physicians if they may lead to a decision to abort. Physicians' speech is censored and patients are deprived by the state of critical information on which to base decisions about pregnancy. The ethical practice of medicine is made unlawful and the health and well-being of pregnant patients is likely to be seriously jeopardized as a result. Missouri gives "any taxpayer" of the state standing to enforce its restrictions in the courts. Thus, whatever is said or done in the privacy of the doctor-patient relationship is subject to public scrutiny at any time.

C. Without the constitutional right of privacy, there would be no constitutional principle that would prevent a state from prohibiting patients from using any medically recognized and accepted treatments which a majority of the legislature happens to disfavor. Worse, a state would be free to prevent physicians from even telling their patients about such treatment. This differs dramatically from a state's merely refusing to pay for certain treatments.

Advances in medical science have made possible new methods of treatment for a wide variety of medical conditions, often controversial, and with the potential for profound consequences for the patient. Scientific progress has increased the importance of the doctor-patient relationship, for it is only in this context that difficult personal medical decisions can be made taking into consideration all of the medical and personal consequences that may ensue. Thus there is even more reason today to uphold the constitutional protection of decisions made in the privacy of the doctor-patient relationship than when Roe v. Wade was decided. For these reasons the decision of the court of appeals should be affirmed.

Argument

I. The Constitutional Right of Privacy Which Protects the Right To Make Personal Medical Decisions Is a Fundamental Right and a Central American Value Which Is "Implicit in the Concept of Ordered Liberty" and the Court Should Continue To Protect It.

In Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), this Court, in striking down a state statute forbidding married couples from using contraceptives, stated, "We deal with a right of privacy older than the Bill of Rights—older than our political parties, older than our school system." Id. at 486. In explaining this fundamental constitutional right of privacy the Court recognized that there are decisions that are so personal, so private, and that so profoundly affect the individuals who must live with the consequences, that the state has no power to interfere in those decisions, absent a compelling interest. Since Griswold, this Court has applied the right of privacy to protect an unmarried person's right to decide "whether to bear or beget a child," Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438, 453 (1972), and decisions whether or not to terminate a pregnancy. Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973).

When the State of Missouri and the United States as amicus curiae ask this Court to overrule Roe v. Wade, they are asking that the most private decision that can be made by any individual be removed from that affected individual and turned over to a state legislature. We respectfully submit that this Court should not take such action.

In Griswold this Court recognized that the private relationship between a husband and wife prevented the state from intruding on their contraceptive decisions. In Roe the Court recognized the privacy of the doctor-patient relationship. While Roe further defined a woman's right to make reproductive decisions, it also recognized that the pregnant woman required the advice and counsel of a licensed physician. Thus, in Roe the Court concluded that during the first trimester "the attending physician, in consultation with his patient, is free to determine, without regulation by the State, that, in his medical judgment, the patient's pregnancy should be terminated." 410 U.S. at 163. Later the Court stated that during the first trimester "the abortion decision and its effectuation must be left to the medical judgment of the pregnant woman's attending physician." Id. at 164. The Court also pointed out that its decision "vindicates the right of the physician to administer medical treatment according to his professional judgment" up until the point that compelling state interests justify intervention. Id. at 165-66. Finally, the Court pointed out that the abortion decision is "inherently, and primarily, a medical decision" for which "basic responsibility" rests with the physician. Id. at 166.

Thus, as Griswold protected the privacy of the marital relationship, Roe protected the privacy of the physician-patient relationship. "The right of privacy has no more conspicuous place than in the physician-patient relationship..." Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179, 219 (1973) (Douglas, J., concurring). In this relationship both the physician and the pregnant woman must agree that termination of pregnancy is appropriate in order to have this medical procedure performed. Whether abortion is an appropriate option for a particular patient is, by definition, a decision that must be made by the doctor and the patient in each case. It is the right to make particularized personal decisions that is at the core of Roe and its progeny, and it is this right that Missouri and the United States desire to destroy.[1]

---

[1] Justice Douglas, concurring in Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. at 211, described the right of privacy as "freedom of choice in the basic decisions of one's life respecting marriage, divorce, procreation, contraception, and the education and upbringing of children." He also thought of it as "freedom to care for one's health and person, [and] freedom from bodily restraint or compulsion..." Id. at 213.

In Doe v. Bolton, the court found that the restrictions Georgia had placed on abortion violated both the patient's and physician's freedom. For example, Georgia's requirement that two licensed physicians must agree with a woman's personal physician's judgment that an abortion is appropriate, and that a hospital committee of at least three other doctors must concur in the abortion decision violated the privacy protection of both the doctor and patient. In the Court's words, "The woman's right to receive medical care in accordance with her licensed physician's best judgment and the physician's right to administer it are substantially limited by this statutorily imposed overview." 410 U.S. at 197.

Since Roe this Court has reviewed a large body of legislation designed to deny patients and physicians their right to make personal and professional judgments about how best to deal with a patient's pregnancy. As even the United States concedes, "Roe and its progeny have resolved most of the central questions about the permissible scope of abortion regulation. . . ." Brief for the United States as Amicus Curiae Supporting Appellants at 21, n. 15. Through sixteen years of constitutional adjudication this Court has provided lawmakers with a consistent and coherent set of constitutional guidelines in this area.[2] Laws that recognized and protected the physi-

[2] A review of the Court's abortion decisions indicate that it has used the following "tests" in various combinations to evaluate the constitutionality of abortion statutes:

1. Has the state placed an obstacle in front of the woman or otherwise significantly burdened the pregnant woman's ability to choose or obtain an abortion?
2. Is abortion being treated differently from other similar medical or surgical procedures?
3. Does the regulation interfere with the treating physician's exercise of professional judgment?
4. Does the regulation conflict with, or is it stricter than, accepted medical and scientific norms?
5. Is the regulation designed to protect maternal health where no less intrusive or less expensive alternative will do?
6. If a postviability rule, does the regulation protect the fetus without putting the mother in jeopardy?

Annas, Webster and the Politics of Abortion, 19 Hastings Center Report 36 (March/April 1989), citing Glantz, "Abortion: A Decade of Decisions," in Genetics and the Law III 305 (A. Milunsky & G. Annas, eds. 1985).

cian-patient relationship have been upheld, and laws designed to weaken or destroy that decision-making unit have been struck down. Thus, in Planned Parenthood of Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976), the Court readily upheld a general informed consent provision, even as it applied to the first trimester, because not only did it not burden the abortion decision, it enhanced the physician-patient relationship. On the other hand, the Court has struck down a provision requiring physicians to recite a "parade of horribles" because it intruded "upon the discretion of the pregnant woman's physician." Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416, 445 (1983). Under this statute every physician was made an agent of the state who was required to recite the state's anti-abortion message to every patient, regardless of her individual need or desire.

A similar statute was involved in this Court's most recent case on abortion law. The Court reiterated that forcing a physician to provide prescribed information "makes him or her in effect an agent of the State in treating the woman and places his or her imprimatur upon both the materials and the list." Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747, 763 (1986). The Court summarized the situation aptly: "All this is, or comes close to being, state medicine imposed upon the woman, not the professional medical guidance she seeks, and it offically structures—as it obviously was intended to do—the dialogue between the woman and her physician." Id.

The controversy that ranges over abortion is not resolvable through reason, logic, or majority vote. It is an emotional issue governed by one's background, religious upbringing, and moral beliefs. The post-Roe state statutes were not health or safety laws, but rather means to control physicians and their patients so that a particular legislature's philosophical position could be imposed on pregnant women and their physicians. The Court in Roe recognized this problem when it pointed out that there is great diversity of opinion among philosophers, theologians and scientists about when life begins. It further recognized that the judiciary is certainly in no position to resolve this issue. 410 U.S. at 159. This is equally true of legislatures. As a result, the Court concluded that "we do not agree that, by adopting one theory of life Texas may override the rights of the pregnant woman that are at stake." Id. at 162.

Justice Stevens, concurring in Thornburgh, made a similar point: "In a sense, the basic question is whether the 'abortion decision' should be made by the individual or by the majority 'in the unrestrained imposition of its own, extraconstitutional value preferences.'" 476 U.S. at 777-78. That is also the issue posed in this case. Justice Stevens was correct in pointing out that without the safeguards in Roe, there is essentially no way to restrain what the state may do in imposing its value judgments on the individual:

> . . . if federal judges must allow the State to make the abortion decision, presumably the State is free to decide that a woman may never abort, may sometimes abort, or, as in the People's Republic of China, must always abort if her family is already too large. In contrast, our cases represent a consistent view that the individual is primarily responsible for reproductive decisions, whether the state seeks to prohibit reproduction or to require it.

Id. at 778, n. 6 (emphasis in original, citations omitted).

The pre-Roe world to which Missouri and the United States would like us to return is a world in which the State would have essentially absolute discretion to permit or outlaw abortions. Thus, women who were pregnant as a result of rape could be required to maintain their pregnancies and be forced to go through labor and delivery with the rapist's unwanted child. Women who would become blind, paralyzed or suffer other grave injury as a result of the continuation of their pregnancy could be compelled by state legislatures to suffer such harm. Parents who, as a result of genetic counseling and testing, know that their child will be born with a genetic disease that will cause it to die a slow, painful death, could be required to carry that pregnancy to term. These examples are not based on wild speculation about what the state of the law might be if Roe were overruled—it is based on what the state of the law actually was at the time of Roe. Prior to Roe, abortions were outlawed in a majority of states unless the life (not health) of the pregnant woman was jeopardized by the continuation of the pregnancy. Roe, 410 U.S. at 118.[3]

The abortion cases are not just about abortion, but about the very basis of what it means to be a free person in a free society.[4] If the state can make reproductive decisions on behalf of any individual, what decision is it precluded from making? If legislatures are allowed to impose without restraint value judgments that deeply and directly affect individual citizens, what is left of personal freedom? Without the right of privacy,

---

[3] In its brief, the United States readily admits that states have passed "inflammatory" abortion statutes since Roe was decided. Brief for the United States as Amicus Curiae Supporting Appellants at 21, n.15. What is remarkable is that the United States blames the existence of Roe for the "inflammatory" nature of these statutes, rather than legislators' hostility to the right of pregnant women and their physicians to make decisions concerning termination of pregnancy. Should Roe be overruled, the tendency of legislatures to pass such inflammatory statutes will continue. What will be absent is the constitutional protection from such legislative excesses.

[4] In Whalen v. Roe, 429 U.S. 589, 599-600 (1977), the Court noted that the constitutional right of privacy protects an individual's "interest in independence in making certain kinds of important decisions." In that case the Court upheld a New York statute requiring physicians to report to a state agency the prescription of certain controlled substances, because under the statute "the decision to prescribe, or to use, is left entirely to the physician and the patient." Id. at 603.

what constitutional principle would prevent states from reimposing restrictions on contraceptive distribution and use, since unfertilized ova constitute potential human life? Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. at 217 (Douglas, J. concurring). Indeed, since both Missouri and the United States argue that the state should be free to determine when life begins, a state could choose any point in time it pleases-conception, live birth, the time the ovum develops, or three years of age.[5] Since there is no scientific answer to this question, any value judgment on this point is as "rational" as any other. However, just as this Court found that "Constitutional rights do not mature and come into being magically only when one attains the state-defined age of majority," Planned Parenthood v. Danforth, 428 U.S. at 74, it should also conclude that one's constitutional rights are not destroyed magically because of an arbitrarily state-defined point at which "life begins."

The problem with providing the state with the essentially unlimited power sought by Missouri and the United States is that the state's actions have such a potentially profound impact on the lives of citizens. It must be kept in mind that the State is attempting to impose its values on individual citizens in order to control their decisional rights. Under Roe no one's values are imposed on anyone else; people are free to make the decisions that they believe are best for themselves. As Justice Stevens put it,

> In the final analysis, the holding in Roe v. Wade presumes that it is far better to permit some individuals to make incorrect decisions than to deny all individuals the right to make decisions that have a profound effect upon > their destiny. Arguably a very primitive society would have been protected from evil by a rule against eating apples; a majority familiar with Adam's experience might favor such a rule. But the lawmakers who placed a special premium on the protection of individual liberty have recognized that certain values are more important than the will of a transient majority.

[5] See, Brief for The New England Christian Council as Amicus Curiae at 12. Therein is described an effort to place on the ballot in Massachusetts the following referendum question: "In Biological Terms, when does an individual human life begin?" The choices the voters could check off included "A. Conception" "B. Viability" "C. Birth" "D. Write In - specify a different term____."

Thornburgh, 476 U.S. at 781-82 (concurring opinion).

II. The Right Of Privacy Protects The Rights Of Individuals To Make Personal Medical Decisions In A Doctor-Patient Relationship

A. The Doctor-Patient Relationship, not the Legislature, is the Proper Locus for Medical Care Decisions

The central question before the Court is whether personal medical care decisions should be made by patients and their physicians, or by the state. The doctor-patient relationship is highly valued in our society.[6] The importance of the doctor-patient relationship to individual citizens increases in proportion to advances in medical science. These advances have made the consequences of many medical interventions increasingly dramatic in the lives and deaths of individual citizens and their families. The importance of who makes the treatment decision increases as the complexity of the options and the severity of the impact of treatment on the individual patient increases. Roe properly took full account of changing medical science. The central premise of Roe and Doe, that inherently personal medical decisions, including those involving abortion, should be made in the context of a doctor-patient relationship protected from governmental dictates, remains sound jurisprudence.

[6] Indeed, protecting the ethical integrity of the medical profession in ways consistent with the individual autonomy of patients has been deemed a "compelling state interest" by courts since Roe v. Wade. E.g., In re Quinlan, 70 N.J. 10, 355 A.2d 647 (1976), cert. den. sub nom. Garger v. New Jersey, 429 U.S. 922 (1976); Superintendent of Belchertown v. Saikewicz, 373 Mass. 728, 370 N.E.2d 417 (1977).

The doctor-patient relationship has been a privileged and protected one throughout the history of Western civilization. Plato, for example, describes how in Ancient Greece slaves were treated as objects and that therefore no conversation between them and the physician occurred. The relationship between a free physician and a free citizen, by contrast, fit what it means to be a free person; that is, physicians talked to their patients:

> The free practitioner who, for the most part, attends free men, treats their disease by going into things thoroughly from the beginning in a scientific way, and takes the patient and his family into his confidence . . . He does not give his presciptions until he has won the patient's support . . .

Laws, 4.720b-e.

The doctor-patient relationship between two free citizens that has become the cornerstone of Western medical ethics begins with an individual who determines that a condition requires medical attention. Medical attention is voluntarily sought, and the physician makes a decision as to whether or not medical care can be of benefit to the patient, and if so, recommends one or more alternatives. The doctor and patient then discuss these alternatives. Together they decide what course of action to pursue based on their perceptions of benefit in a private, confidential relationship which ethical principles of autonomy, beneficence and justice have structured and the law has fostered and protected.[7]

[7] See, e.g., Ad Hoc Committee on Medical Ethics, American College of Physicians, American College of Physicians Ethics Manual, Part I, 101 Annals of Internal Medicine 129, 130 (1984).

The decision to continue or terminate a pregnancy is just one example, albeit a dramatic one, of important, personal medical decisions made in this relationship. To insure that a mutually-acceptable decision is arrived at with full understanding, the common law has required physicians to share information with their patients under the doctrine of "informed consent."[8] Law and ethics, therefore, have now effectively merged. As the President's Commission for the Study of Ethical Problems in Medicine and Biomedical and Behavioral Research concluded,

> Although the informed consent doctrine has substantial foundations in law, it is essentially an ethical imperative. . . . Ethically valid consent is a process of shared decisionmaking based upon mutual respect and participation. . . adults are entitled to accept or reject health care interventions on the basis of their own personal values in furtherance of their own personal goals.

Making Health Care Decisions 2-3 (1982).

B. States Should Not be Permitted to Dictate or Censor the Content of Discussions that Occur in a Doctor-Patient Relationship

It is in the informed consent context, and its respect both for the rights of individual patients and the integrity of the medical profession, that Roe's placement of the abortion decision with "the woman and her physician" is properly understood. Neither party has total or arbitrary power, but both must agree and consider the decision appropriate and reasonable before it can be acted on. Roe properly assumed that "states would subject the woman's wishes to interpersonal testing within a clinical relationship, by treating abortion as a medical procedure. . . A medical decision, at its best, is made between a patient and a doctor who acts pursuant to professional values, ones developed out of clinical encounters and subjected to peer criticism within a regimen of professional education, research, and ethical study." R. Goldstein, Mother-Love and Abortion: A Legal Interpretation 81 (1988); see also A. Jonsen, M. Siegler & W. Winslade, Clinical Ethics 62 (2d ed. 1986).

[8] Legal action to remedy instances of nondisclosure developed where the Platonic ideal was not being followed and physicians were withholding important information from their patients. R. Faden & T. Beauchamp, A History and Theory of Informed Consent (1986).

Of course, such an interpersonal dialogue can only take place in an atmosphere in which the physician is free to exercise his or her best professional judgment and discuss with a patient all of the information, including treatment options, relevant to the patient's decision. Section 188.205 of the Missouri statute before this Court, however, would prohibit such dialogue. That section makes it "unlawful for any public funds to be expended. . . for the purpose of encouraging or counseling a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life." The term "encourage or counsel" is so vague that reasonable people would be unable to distinguish between lawful and unlawful behavior. It does not merely prohibit coercing a woman to have an abortion. Rather, the state uses words that describe the personal discussions between a woman and her physician about the management of her pregnancy. Other courts have agreed that this language prohibits physicians from talking to their patients.[9]

[9] Two federal district courts found that the Department of Health and Human Services regulations prohibiting family planning programs funded under Title X from counseling or referring for abortion, 53 Fed. Reg. 2922 (Feb. 2, 1988), violated the First Amendment rights of the programs and enjoined their enforcement. Massachusetts v. Bowen, 679 F. Supp. 137 (D. Mass. 1988), appeal docketed, No. 88-1279 (1st Cir. Mar. 24, 1988); Planned Parenthood Federation v. Bowen, 680 F. Supp. 1465 (D. Colo. 1988). A third district court agreed that the prohibition forbade speech but concluded (erroneously we believe) that granting Title X funds to support one idea and not another did not infringe free speech. State of New York v. Bowen, 690 F. Supp. 1261 (S.D.N.Y. 1988), aff'd., 863 F.2d 46 (2d Cir. 1988).

In section 188.210, Missouri attempted to make it "unlawful" for a publicly-employed physician or other health care personnel to "counsel or encourage a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life." In this appeal, Missouri has abandoned any defense of this direct prohibition against counseling of patients by physicians. Instead Missouri seeks to achieve the same result by a different means in section 188.205. This section certainly prohibits any publicly-employed physician from counseling or encouraging abortions because it is unlawful to expend public funds for that purpose, and the physician's salary is derived from state funds. Thus, its impact is identical with the second sentence of section 188.210. In fact this section has an even wider impact than 188.210 because it applies not just to public employees, but to anyone who receives state funds.

The statute both silences physicians and forces patients to remain ignorant, erecting a state-created barrier between a woman and her physician. Under the stature, for example, a physician, public or private, who receives state funds would be unable to honestly respond to a pregnant woman whose health is endangered by the pregnancy when she asks, "Doctor, what do you think I should do?", if the honest answer were, "I would recommend you have an abortion."[10]

Prohibiting physicians who receive state funds from "encouraging or counseling" pregnant women consistent with their best medical judgment is contrary to good medical practice and jeopardizes patients' rights. Information concerning health risks that are caused or exacerbated by pregnancy and information concerning possible fetal genetic or congenital disorders are squarely among the categories of information that a physician is obligated by law and ethics to disclose to a pregnant woman in order to facilitate knowledgeable decisions about managing her pregnancy.[11] It is good and accepted medical practice to inquire into the genetic and medical history of a prospective mother and father who consult any physician for advice or care concerning family planning, contraception, and pregnancy evaluation. See American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, Standards for Obstetric-Gynecologic Services 18-19 (5th ed. 1985); S. Elias and G.J. Annas, Reproductive Genetics and the Law (1987); President's Commission for the Study of Ethical Problems in Medicine, Screening and Counseling for Genetic Conditions 23-31 (1983).

[10] An analogous "gag rule" is apparently in effect in the Soviet Union in the area surrounding Chernobyl where it is reported that government authorities assure everyone that all is normal, "and then advise villagers not to bear children or eat locally grown mushrooms." When the villagers take their children to special government clinics in Kiev for regular medical tests, "the doctors refuse to disclose the results." Gumbel, Villagers Suffering Chernobyl's Fallout Face Soviet Silence, Wall Street J., March 6, 1989, at 1, col. 4.

By attempting to silence certain physicians, Missouri seeks to prevent them from performing their ethical and legal obligations to their patients consistent with existing medical science, and thereby deprive patients of information they need in order to decide whether to have a child. In this regard the state of Missouri promotes ignorance, viewing an uninformed patient as a desirable result. There are medical conditions for [11] The Federal Food and Drug Administration itself requires manufacturers of intrauterine devices to inform physicians that if a woman becomes pregnant with an I.U.D. in place, and removal of the I.U.D. is difficult, "termination of the pregnancy should be considered and offered the patient as an option . . ." 21 C.F.R. 310.502(b)(1). The physician's counseling obligation includes informing parents of the availability of prenatal diagnosis of genetic abnormalities. E.g., Goldberg v. Ruskin, 128 Ill. App. 3d 1029, 471 N.E. 2d 530 (1984), aff'd, 113 Ill. 2d 482, 499 N.E. 2d 406 (1986) (failure to advise parents of tests designed to detect Tay-Sachs disease). Physicians also have an obligation to diagnose abnormalities with due care and disclose their findings. E.g., Smith v. Cote, 128 N.H. 231, 513 A.2d 341 (1986) (failure to timely diagnose rubella and inform parents of consequences). So strongly have courts insisted on counseling, that they have held physicians liable for failing to offer information which might lead a patient to consider abortion even when abortion was statutorily proscribed in most states. See, e.g., Jacobs v. Theimer, 519 S.W. 2d 846 (Tex. 1975) (physician's failure to diagnose rubella in pregnant woman in 1958 and to advise her of risks to fetus held actionable wrong even though abortion was illegal in Texas).

which abortion is one of the reasonable medical procedures that should be discussed. For example, Tay-Sachs disease is a genetic disorder that occurs in one in four pregnancies when both husband and wife are carriers of the gene. The disease "is characterized by motor weakness, usually beginning between 3 and 6 months of age. . . deafness, blindness, convulsions, and generalized spasticity are usually in evidence by 18 months of age. . . the child develops a state of decerebrate rigidity, with death usually resulting. . . by 3 years of age. No specific therapy for Tay-Sachs disease is available." S. Elias & G. Annas, Reproductive Genetics and the Law 63 (1987) and sources cited therein. Since abortion is the only way to prevent this tragedy, a physician who informs a couple of the existence of prenatal testing to detect it, and discusses the option of abortion with them would be violating the proscription against "counseling or encouraging" abortion. Without the option of prenatal screening, many at risk couples would simply choose to abort all pregnancies. "In fact, since more than 95% of all prenatal diagnostic tests are negative, the overwhelming majority of such testing helps lead to the birth of children that might not otherwise have been born." Id. at 83. Thus the irony is that any law that inhibits physicians from counseling pregnant women about the availability of genetic testing and the option of abortion may actually increase the number of abortions performed.

Since section 188.210 prohibits publicly-employed physicians from performing abortions, it is essential that they be permitted to refer a patient in need of abortion to a physician who is willing and able to do so. Yet, such a medically appropriate referral would violate the proscription against encouraging and counseling, since abortion is a probable outcome of the referral. At the same time, failure to refer the patient to the second physician would be negligent medical practice which could harm the patient.[12]

The fact that the physicians currently targeted by the Missouri statute are paid with state funds does not lessen either the extent of the invasion or the obligation such physicians have to counsel their patients.[13] Government-employed physicians who were not expected or obliged to render ongoing care to individuals have been found to owe a duty of disclosure to persons they examine. For example, in Betesh v. United States, 400 F. Supp. 238 (D.D.C. 1974), a selective service physician was found liable for failing to disclose a chest abnormality in a recruit during a pre-induction physical. The recruit later died of Hodgkins disease, which might have been successfully treated had treatment begun when the abnormality was first discovered. Even in the absence of a consensual doctor-patient relationship, concealment of the information was actionable, the court found, because "the Government physicians were under a duty to act carefully, not merely in the conduct of the examination, but also in subsequent communications to the examinee." Id. at 246. Thus, the legal and ethical obligation to counsel does not depend upon the nature of the physician's employer or source of payment.

The Missouri legislation not only interferes with honesty on [12] See, e.g., Jewson v. Mayo Clinic, 691 F.2d 405 (8th Cir. 1982). If a physician determines, in the exercise of sound clincal judgment, that the pregnancy poses a threat to the health or well-being of his patient, he is not excused from disclosing that judgment simply because he may be unable to perform an abortion. If he is unwilling or unable to perform an abortion that he believes is medically indicated, he must also disclose that fact to the patient. Manion v. Tweedy, 257 Minn. 59, 100 N.W.2d 124, 128 (1959). In addition, the physician must immediately refer the patient to an appropriate provider, because delay could cause harm and make further treatment, including later termination of pregnancy, more risky and harmful. See, e.g., Steele v. United States, 463 F. Supp. 321, 330 (D. Alaska 1977); Wells v. Pillars, 391 N.W.2d 668 (S.D. 1986).

[13] The source of payment does not excuse a physician from fulfilling his obligations to his patient. As the California Appeals Court said in Wickline v. California, 192 Cal. App. 3d 1630, 1645, 228 Cal. Rptr 661 (1986), app. dism'd, 239 Cal. Rptr. 805, 741 P.2d 613 (1987): "[T]he physician who complies without protest with the limitations imposed by a third party payor, when his medical judgment dictates otherwise, cannot avoid his ultimate responsibility for his patient's care."

the part of the physician, it does so in the most intrusive fashion, sundering the curtain of privacy from the physician-patient relationship. Not only does the state claim the right to control what doctors say to patients, it encourages strangers to police what is said. Section 188.220 of the Missouri statute grants standing to "any taxpayer of [the] state" to enforce the provisions which prohibit encouraging or counseling a woman to have an abortion. Thus, perfect strangers are given the power of private attorneys general to scrutinize the highly personal information discussed in a physician's office. The statute can only be enforced by requiring physicians and their patients to publicly disclose the content of their discussions held in the privacy of the doctor-patient relationship. Having strangers invade this relationship is every bit as offensive and chilling as permitting "police to search the sacred precincts. . .of marital bedrooms." Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. at 485.[14]

C. Overruling the Constitutional Right of Privacy Would Seriously Undermine Individual Autonomy and Would Permit the State To Make Medical Care Decisions That Belong to Individuals

A consistent series of decisions since Roe v. Wade permit individuals to refuse various medical interventions. Many of [14] A recent New York case underscores the inappropriateness of encouraging strangers to intervene in these private decisions. The case, In the Matter of Martin Klein, Supreme Ct. of New York, Nassau Cty. No. 1736/89 (Feb. 7, 1989), involved a 32-year-old woman who was 17 weeks pregnant, and comatose as a result of an automobile accident. Her husband was advised by her physician that continuation of her pregnancy presented a serious threat to her life, and that termination of the pregnancy was indicated. He then petitioned the court for an order that he be appointed his wife's temporary guardian for the purpose of authorizing her physician to perform such medical procedures, including abortion, as may be necessary to preserve her life. Two total strangers with an anti-abortion agenda petitioned the court requesting to be made the guardian of the woman and the non-viable fetus, in an attempt to exclude the patient's husband and parents from making these decisions. Both trial court and Appellate Division decided for the husband. As the Appellate Division stated, "these absolute strangers to the Klein family, whatever their motivations, have no place in the midst of this family tragedy." Matter of Nancy Klein, New York Appellate Division, Second Department, New York Law Journal, Feb. 14, 1989, at 21.

these decisions are based in part on the constitutional right of privacy which enables individuals to make important personal medical decisions for themselves. In a widely cited case, for example, the New Jersey Supreme Court decided that, were she competent, Karen Ann Quinlan, a young woman in a permanent coma, would have the authority under the constitutional right of privacy to decide to have the mechanical ventilator that sustained her life removed. In re Quinlan, 70 N.J. 10, 355 A.2d 647, 663 (1976), cert. den. sub nom. Garger v. New Jersey, 429 U.S. 922 (1976). Since she was incompetent, the court ruled that her parents could act in her behalf. In Quinlan, as in many similar cases decided since, the state argued that it, not the patient, should make the decision whether or not to employ an intrusive, and often futile, medical intervention.

Without the shield of the constitutional right of privacy, citizens would have no protection from such state interventions in private medical matters, because states would be free to legislate virtually any restrictions on individual treatment decisions that even a bare majority of legislators wished. This is particularly important today when new forms of medical treatment and knowledge require patients to make controversial choices. Since 1973, physicians have learned to fertilize human eggs in a petri dish and transfer the resulting embryo to the wife for gestation; to accurately detect severe fetal handicaps such as anencephaly and neural tube defects; and to maintain patients who cannot breathe on their own in a permanent coma for months and even years.

It would not be far-fetched to hypothesize a state that would choose to outlaw the use of all prenatal diagnostic techniques by both public and private physicians. Legislators may feel that such tests lead couples either not to have children or to abort their pregnancies. Without the protection of the constitutional right of privacy, state legislatures would be empowered to control the knowledge and use of such medical techniques, and require couples to make their child-bearing decisions in ignorance.[15] What would prohibit states from outlawing new and "unnatural" means of conceiving a child such as in vitro fertilization techniques? What would prohibit states from requiring that every medical intervention must be used to keep a dying person alive as long as biologically possible, regardless of the desires of the patient or family, and no matter that the patient's physician agrees that this would not be good medical practice? No constitutional principle, other than the right of privacy, would protect these decisions, and others like them, from being made for patients by the state. Unfettered by the constitutional right of privacy, states would have virtually unlimited power both to prohibit citizens from obtaining basic medical care from their physicians, and to require them to undergo medical procedures against their will.

We have already witnessed examples of how state power can be misused in a way that increases the suffering of its citizens when the right to make personal medical decisions is not treated as a fundamental constitutional right. In one example, a competent pregnant woman who was dying of cancer was forced to endure a cesarean section against her will, and that of her family and physicians, by a judge who thought that the state's interest in potential fetal life outweighed any interest she might have in refusing surgical intervention. In re A.C., 533 A.2d 611 (App. D.C. 1987), vacated 539 A.2d 203 (App. D.C. 1988).[16] After the forced surgery—which was, in effect, a forced abortion of a non-viable fetus—both mother and child died.

[15] Prohibitions against payment for treatment should not be confused with prohibitions against providing information about treatment. For example, the state of New Hampshire has the right not to pay for bone marrow transplants, as evidenced by its initial decision in the case of a six-year-old boy in February 1989. Hohler, State Policy, Human Tragedy, Boston Globe, Feb. 26, 1989, at 1. It would be astonishing, however, to even suggest that New Hampshire should be able to forbid the boy's physician, even if the physician were a state employee, from telling him that he needed a transplant and could get it elsewhere. Yet this is what Missouri claims it may do.

In a second example, with facts virtually identical to those in Quinlan, a Missouri trial court found that it had sufficient evidence, based on the patient's prior statements and her family's testimony, that the patient would not wish to receive treatment if she were in a permanent coma, and ruled that treatment should therefore be stopped in accordance with her "constitutionally guaranteed liberty." Cruzan v. Harmon, 760 S.W.2d 408 (Mo. 1988). The Missouri Supreme Court overruled the trial court's finding and, disregarding the patient's previous statements and her parent's wishes, turned over her medical treatment decisions to employees of the state. This means that for the rest of her life the people who know and love her most are relegated to the role of passive observers. See, generally, Annas, The Insane Root Takes Reason Prisoner, 19 Hastings Center Report 29 (Jan./Feb. 1989). The [16] There are at least twenty-one orders by lower court judges that have required competent adult women to undergo cesarean section operations (a major surgical procedure which is substantially more life-threatening than abortion) instead of the normal delivery that they wished to have. Kolder, Gallagher & Parsons, Court-Ordered Obstetrical Interventions, 316 New Eng. J. Med. 1192 (1987). These orders were based on the notion that the state, through its judges, has a greater interest in the potential life of the fetus and the method of childbirth than the woman herself, and demeaned and dehumanized the pregnant woman by denying her the right to voluntarily choose the method of childbirth. Continued discussion with her physician, rather than hasty resort to emergency decisions by judges, is properly encouraged by recognizing the right to privacy in the doctor-patient relationship. Indeed, "By protecting the liberty of the pregnant patient and the integrity of the voluntary doctor-patient relationship, we not only promote autonomy; we also promote the well-being of the vast majority of fetuses." Annas, Protecting the Liberty of Pregnant Patients, 316 New. Eng. J. Med. 1213, 1214 (1987). And see T. Engelhardt, The Foundations of Bioethics 224-27 (1985); and Nelson & Milliken, Compelled Medical Treatment of Pregnant Women, 259 J.A.M.A. 1060 (1988).

Missouri Supreme Court's decision was based in part on its reading of the preamble of the abortion statute at issue in this case.

These examples demonstrate that state interference is not hypothetical. State medical treatment decisions are at best arbitrary and impersonal, and at worst cruelly at odds with a patient's wishes and well-being. This leads inexorably to the conclusion that personal medical decisions should be made by those who are most affected by them, in the context of a constitutionally-protected doctor-patient relationship.[17]

If the state is given absolute control of a decision as personal and private as the decision whether or not to continue a pregnancy, based on its interest in "potential human life," then it could certainly control these other decisions. If this Court adopts such a statist notion of decisionmaking then the value of "personhood" will have been significantly demeaned for all citizens. Having control over these most important and private decisions is an essential element not only of freedom, but of being a person. As the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court put it: "The constitutional right to privacy, as we conceive it, is an expression of the sanctity of individual free choice and self-determination as fundamental constituents of life." Saikewicz, 370 N.E.2d at 426.

Missouri does not claim that its power is limited to prohibiting abortion. Their sole interest is in protecting potential life, rather than existing human life. What is most remarkable about virtually all of the briefs submitted to this Court on behalf of Missouri is that they imply that the United States is composed exclusively of state governments and fetuses; women and their physicians are treated as almost irrelevant, and the relationship between a pregnant woman and her physician is ignored.

[17] Unlike the Missouri Supreme Court, in the vast majority of cases decided since Roe, courts have recognized that the constitutional right of privacy places control of personal medical decisions in the hands of patients or their guardians if the patient is incompetent. For example, courts have upheld the patient's right to decide whether to accept or reject medical treatments such as surgery for breast cancer, In re Yetter, Northampton Co. Orphans Ct., No. 1973-533 (Williams, J.) (Pa. 1973); amputation, Lane v. Candura, 376 N.E.2d 1232 (Mass. App. 1978); kidney dialysis, In the Matter of Spring, 389 Mass. 629, 405 N.E.2d 115 (1980); respirators, Satz v. Perlmutter, 362 So.2d 160 (Fla. App. 1978), aff'd, 379 So.2d 359 (Fla. 1980); and artificial nutrition and hydration, In the Matter of Jobes, 108 N.J. 394, 529 A.2d 434 (1987)

Missouri seeks to reintroduce the Platonic ideal in a particularly pernicious manner: men are to be treated as "free citizens"; women are to be treated in a manner similar to the way "slaves" were treated by free physicians in ancient Greece: conversation is to be censored and treatment decisions made without regard for the wishes of the patient. Such a situation is incompatible with both liberty and equal protection. As this Court has properly emphasized: "Our cases long have recognized that the Constitution embodies a promise that a certain private sphere of individual liberty will be kept largely beyond the reach of government . . . That promise extends to women as well as to men." Thornburgh, 476 U.S. at 772 (1986).

Conclusion

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the court of appeals should be affirmed.

Respectfully submitted,

GEORGE J. ANNAS*
LEONARD H. GLANTZ
WENDY K. MARINER
80 E. Concord Street
Boston, Massachusetts 02118
(617) 638-4626
Counsel for Amicus Curiae

*Counsel of Record

MEMBERS OF BIOETHICISTS IN SUPPORT OF PRIVACY*

Fredrick R. Abrams, M.D., Assoc. Director, Biomedical Ethics Center
University of Colorado at Denver, Denver, CO

George J. Annas, J.D., M.P.H.
Boston University Schools of Medicine and Public Health
Boston, MA

Paul W. Armstrong, J.D., LL.M.
Bridgewater, NJ

John D. Arras, Ph.D.
Albert Einstein College of Medicine, Montefiore, Medical Center, Bronx, NY

Robert Baker, Ph.D.
Union College, Schenectady, NY

Terry R. Bard, Rabbi
Beth Israel Hospital, Boston, MA

Jane Boyajian, B.A., D.Min., Executive Director Emeritus
Northwest Institute of Ethics and the Life Sciences
Seattle, WA

Ronald A. Carson, Ph.D., Director, Institute for Medical Humanities University of Texas, Galveston, TX

Ronald E. Cranford, M.D.
Hennepin County Medical Center, Minneapolis, MN

Charles M. Culver, M.D.
Dartmouth Medical School, Hanover, NH

William J. Curran, J.D., LL.M., S.M. Hyg.
Harvard University School of Public Health
Boston, MA

Norman Daniels, Ph.D.
Tufts University, Medford, MA

*NOTE: Institutional affiliations listed for identification only.

Anne J. Davis, R.N., Ph.D.
University of California, San Francisco, CA

Rebecca Dresser, J.D.
Case Western Reserve University, Cleveland, OH

Nancy Neveloff Dubler, LL.B., Director
Division of Law and Ethics
Albert Einstein College of Medicine, Bronx, NY

Sherman Elias, M.D.
University of Tennessee Medical Center, Memphis, TN

Janet Fleetwood, Ph.D., Co-Director, Program in Medical Humanities
Medical College of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, PA

John C. Fletcher, Ph.D.
University of Virginia, Charlottesville, VA

Willard Gaylin, M.D., President
The Hastings Center, Briarcliff Manor, NY

Leonard H. Glantz, J.D.
Boston University Schools of Medicine and Public Health
Boston, MA

Susan L. Goldberg, J.D.
Widener University School of Law, Wilmington, DE

Jane Greenlaw, J.D.
University of Rochester Medical Center, Rochester, NY

Michael Grodin, M.D., Director of Program in Medical Ethics
Boston University School of Medicine, Boston, MA

Joseph Healey, J.D.
University of Connecticut Medical School
Farmington, CT

Ruth Hubbard, Ph.D.
Harvard University, Cambridge, MA

Mary E. Hunt, Ph.D., Co-Director
Women's Alliance for Theology, Ethics and Ritual
Silver Springs, MD

Irwin H. Kaiser, M.D.
Albert Einstein College of Medicine, Bronx, NY

Patricia A. King, J.D.
Georgetown University Law Center, Washington, D.C.

Carol Levine, Executive Director
Citizens Commission on AIDS, New York, NY

Bernard Lo, M.D.
University of California School of Medicine
San Francisco, CA

Joanne Lynn, M.D.
George Washington University, Washington, D.C.

Ruth Macklin, Ph.D.
Albert Einstein College of Medicine, Bronx, NY

Alan J. Margolis, M.D.
University of California, San Francisco, CA

Russell L. McIntyre, Th.D.
Robert Wood Johnson Medical School, Piscataway, NJ

Donald N. Medearis, Jr., M.D.
Massachusetts General Hospital, Boston, MA

Ken S. Meece, Executive Director
Hospital Chaplaincy Services, Santa Rosa, CA

Nancy Milliken, Ph.D.
University of California, San Francisco, CA

Thomas H. Murray, Ph.D.
Director, Center for Biomedical Ethics
Case Western Reserve University, Cleveland, OH

Lawrence J. Nelson, J.D., Ph.D.
University of California, Berkeley, CA

Robert M. Nelson, M.Div., M.D.
University of California, San Francisco, CA

Robert C. Neville, Ph.D., Dean
Boston University School of Theology, Boston, MA

Lois LaCivita Nixon, Ph.D.
College of Medicine, University of South Florida, Tampa, FL

Ruth B. Purtilo, Ph.D.
MGH Institute of Health Professions, Boston, MA

Thomas A. Raffin, M.D.
Stanford University Medical Committee on Ethics
Stanford, CA

Nancy Rhoden, J.D.
University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, NC

Brian S. Saunders, M.D.
Southern California Permanente Medical Group
San Diego, CA

Rochelle N. Shain, Ph.D.
University of Texas Health Science Center, San Antonio, TX

Evelyne Shuster, Ph.D.
Villanova University, Villanova, PA

Judith P. Swazey, Ph.D., President
The Acadia Institute, Bar Harbor, ME

Lawrence P. Ulrich, Ph.D.
University of Dayton, Dayton, OH

Harold Y. Vanderpool, Ph.D., Th.M.
University of Texas Medical Branch, Galveston, TX

Robert Veatch, Ph.D.
Kennedy Institute of Ethics
Georgetown University, Washington, DC

Herman S. Wigodsky, M.D., Ph.D.
University of Texas Health Science Center, San Antonio, TX

Daniel Wikler, Ph.D.
University of Wisconsin, Madison, WI

Nachama L. Wilker, Executive Director
Committee for Responsible Genetics, Inc., Boston, MA

Ernle W. D. Young, Ph.D.
Stanford University Hospital, Stanford, CA

Stuart J. Younger, M.D.
Case Western Reserve University, Cleveland, OH

AMICUS CURIAE

BRIEF

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
MAR 30 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

No. 88-605

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,

Appellants,

—v.—

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,

Appellees.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS
FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT

BRIEF OF AMICI CURIAE INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S HEALTH ORGANIZATIONS IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEES

KATHRYN KOLBERT
261 West Pastorius Street
Philadelphia, PA 19144
(215) 849-6770

Counsel of Record

REBECCA J. COOK
BERNARD M. DICKENS
Of the Inner Temple (England),
Barrister at Law, and of the
Ontario (Canada) Bar

Faculty of Law
University of Toronto
Toronto, Canada M5S 2C5
(416) 978-4446

TABLE OF CONTENTS

PAGE

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES iii

STATEMENT OF INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE ... 1

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT 1

ARGUMENT 2

I. ALL WESTERN DEMOCRACIES SUBJECT LEGISLATION AFFECTING ACCESS TO ABORTION TO JUDICIAL SCRUTINY WHICH INSURES RESPECT FOR THE HEALTH AND WELFARE OF WOMEN 7

II. IN ORDER TO PROTECT WOMEN'S REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH, MANY WESTERN COUNTRIES HAVE LIBERALIZED THEIR ABORTION LAWS IN A MANNER CONSISTENT WITH ROE V. WADE 13

III. RESTRICTING PUBLIC FACILITATION OF ABORTION ENDANGERS WOMEN'S HEALTH AND IS "OUT OF STEP" WITH PRACTICE IN OTHER WESTERN COUNTRIES 17

IV. ABORTION LAWS IN MANY WESTERN COUNTRIES USE FRAMEWORKS COMPARABLE TO THE TRIMESTER APPROACH OF ROE V. WADE 20

V. ROE V. WADE, WHICH PROTECTS PRIVATE REPRODUCTIVE DECISIONS FROM COERCIVE STATE INTERFERENCE, MUST BE MAINTAINED 24

PAGE

CONCLUSION 24

APPENDIX 1a

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

Cases: PAGE

A.G. (S.P.U.C.) v. Open Door Counselling, 1987 I.L.R.M. 477 (Ir.H.Ct.) 6

Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416 (1983)..... 19

Attorney-General for Queensland: Ex rel. Kerr v. I, 46 A.L.R. 275 (Austl. 1983) 12

Bruggeman and Scheuten v. Federal Republic of Germany, 3 Eur. Human Rights Rep. [E.H.R.R.] 244 (Eur. Comm'n H.R. 1977)..... 6

C. v. S. [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1108 (Court of Appeals, England) 13, 17

Case 2141, Inter-American Comm'n on Human Rights, OEA/ser. L./V./1154, doc. 9 rev. 1 (1980) 20

Gillick v. West Norfolk and Wisbeck Area Health Auth., [1985] 3 A11 E.R. 402 (UK House of Lords for Eng.) 13

Hickman v. Group Health Plan, Inc., 396 N.W.2d 10 (Minn. 1986) 20

In Re A.C., 533 A.2d 611 (D.C. App. 1987) reh'g granted and opinion vacated, No. 87-609 (March 17, 1988)..... 23

Jefferson v. Griffin Spaulding County Hospital Authority, 274 S.E.2d 457 (Ga. 1981) 23

Judgment of Court of Insurance, BGE 108 V 35 (Switz.) 14

Judgment of October 11, 1974, Constitutional Court, [1974] Erklarungen des Verfassungsgerichtshofs 221 (Austria)..... 5, 11

PAGE

Judgment of January 15, 1975, Conseil Constitutionnel, 1975 Recueil Dalloz-Sirey [D.S.Jur.] 529, Journal Officiel, Jan. 16, 1975 (France)..... 11

Judgment of February 18, 1975, Corte Costituzionale [Corte Cost.], no. 27, 98 Foro It. I, Giurisprudencia Costituzionale e Civile [Giur. Cost. e Civ.] 515 (Italy) 11

Judgment of February 25, 1975, Bundesverfassungshericht (Constitutional Court) 39 BVerfGE 1 (W. Germany)..... 6

Judgment of October 31, 1980, Conseil d'Etat [D.S.Jur.] 19732 (Fr. 1982)..... 8, 13

Judgment No. 108/81 of June 25, 1981, Corte Cost., 57 Raccolta Ufficiale della Corte Costituzionale [Rac. uff. corte cost.] 823 (Italy)..... 12

Judgment of November 8, 1982, Tribunal pour les Enfants D'Evry, 15 [D.S. Jur] 218 (Fr. April 12, 1983) 13

Judgment of April 11, 1985, Constitutional Court, STC 53/1985 (Pleno), 119 Boletin Official del Estado 10 (Supplemento, May 18, 1985) (Spain)..... 12

Judgment of February 12, 1988, Tribunal Correctionel de Gand (Belgium)..... 6

Judgment No. 389 of March 31, 1988, Corte Cost., Gazzetta Ufficiale [Gaz. Uff.] 1 serie speciale, April 13, 1988, n.15; Giur. Cost. e Civ. 2110 (Italy)..... 13

Judgment of November 14, 1988, Cour d'Appel de Gand (Belgium)..... 6

Massachusetts v. Bowen, 679 F.Supp. 137 (D. Mass) (permanent injunction), appeal pending, No. 88-1279 1st Cir..... 10

PAGE

Morgentaler, Smoling and Scott v. The Queen, [1987] 44 D.L.R. (4th) 385 (Canada)..... 11, 17, 18

New York v. Bowen, 690 F. Supp. 1261 (S.D.N.Y. 1988), appeal pending, Nos. 88-6204/06 (2d Cir.)..... 10

Paton v. Trustees of the British Pregnancy Advisory Service, [1978] 2 A11 E.R. 987 (Eng.)..... 13

Paton v. UK, 3 E.H.R.R. 408 (Eur. Comm'n Hum. Rts. 1980)..... 5, 6, 13, 17, 20

Planned Parenthood Fed'n of Am. v. Bowen, 680 F.Supp. 1465 (preliminary injunction) (D. Colo. 1988), appeal pending, No. 88 2251 (10th Cir.)..... 10

The Queen v. Bayliss and Cullen, [1986] 9 Q. Law. Rep. 8 (Queensland, Austl.)..... 12, 17

R. v. Davidson, [1969] V.R. 667 (Victoria, Austl.)..... 12

R. v. Wald [1971] 3 D.C.R. (N.S.W.) 25 (New South Wales, Austl.)..... 12

R. v. Woolnough, Court of Appeal [C.A.], 2 N.Z.L.R. 508 (1977)..... 12

Re Medhurst and Medhurst, 45 O.R.(2d) 575 (Ontario Supreme Ct. 1984); Medhurst v. Medhurst, 46 O.R. (2d) 263 (Ont. Sup. Ct. 1984)..... 13

Reproductive Health Services v. Webster, 851 F.2d 1071 (8th Cir. 1988)..... 15, 16

Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)..... 2, 17

X v. United Kingdom (Re Detention of a Mental Patient), 4 E.H.R.R. 188 (Eur. Ct. of Hum. Rts., 1981)..... 4, 5

PAGE

Statutory Provisions:

Australia, Commonwealth Health Insurance Act 1982, item 6469 (funding) 7, 14
Capital Territory, Crimes Act, 1900 § 82-84..... 7
New South Wales, Crimes Act, § 82-84..... 7
Northern Territory, Criminal Law Consolidation Act, Ordinance 1876-1974, § 78-79A..... 7
Queensland, Criminal Code § 224-226, 282 7
South Australia, 1969 Criminal Law Consolidation Act 7
Victoria, Crimes Act § 10, 65-66..... 7

Austria, Federal Law of 23 Jan. 1974.....8, 9, 19

Britain, Abortion Act 1967.....5, 8, 9, 15
National Health Service Act 1977, § 1 (funding)..... 14

Denmark, Law 350 of 1973 ..... 8, 9
Social Assistance Act of 1984 14

Finland, Law 239 of 24 March 1970, as amended by Law 564 of 14 Jul 1979, and Law 572 of 12 Jul 1985 ..... 9, 10, 16, 18

France, Decree No. 80-285 of 17 April 1980, Decree No. 82-1826 of September 1982 (hospitals)..... 10
Law 75-17 of 17 Jan 1975 ..... 9, 10
Law 79-1204 of 31 Dec 1979 18
Law No. 82-1172 of 31 Dec. 82 (funding)..... 14

Greece, Law 1609 of 28 June 1986..... 8, 18
Law No. 11609/86 § 1(3) 7

Germany (Fed. Rep. of), Law 15 of 18 May 1976 ....8, 9, 19
Reichsversicherungsordnung, § 200f (funding)..... 14

Greenland, Law of 12 June 1975 ..... 8, 9

Iceland, Law of 22 May 1975 on Counselling & Education Concerning Sex and Childbirth and on Termination of Pregnancy and Sterilization 8, 9, 10

PAGE

Italy, Law 194 of 22 May 1978.....8, 9, 10, 11, 14, 18

Luxembourg, Law of 15 Nov 1978.....8, 9, 10, 14, 18

Netherlands, Law of 7 May 1981 .....8, 9, 10, 19

New Zealand Crimes Act 1961, § 183-187, as amended 1977 (abortion)..... 8, 19

Contraception, Abortion and Sterilization Act 1977 as amended..... 9

Norway, Law 66 of 16 June 1978 .....8, 9, 14, 18

Portugal, Law 6 of 11 May 1984 7

Spain, Organic Law 9 of 5 July 1985..... 18

Sweden, Abortion Law 595 of 14 June 1974 ..... 8, 14
Law 1962-381 amended by Law 1982-120..... 14

Switzerland, Law of 9 Oct. 1986..... 14

United States, 42 U.S.C. §§ 300-300a-41 (1982)..... 10
Minnesota, Stat. Ann. § 145.424 20
Missouri, Stat. Ann. § 188.130 20
Utah, Stat. Ann. § 76.7-305.5 20

International Declarations and Treaties:

American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man, Organization of American States, OEA/ser.L./V./1.4 Rev. (1948), reprinted in OAS, Handbook of Existing Rules Pertaining to Human Rights, OEA/ser.L./V.11.50 doc. 6 (1980) 20

European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Europ. T.S. No. 5, 213 U.N.T.S. 222 .....3, 5, 6

Universal Declaration of Human Rights, G. A. Res. 216, U.N. doc. A/810 at 71 (1948) 3

PAGE

Legislative History, U.S.:

S. Rep. No.82, accompanying H.R. 2577, 99th Cong. 1st Sess., (1985) 23

131 Cong. Rec. H5335 23

Other Authorities:

Alan Guttmacher Institute, Abortions and the Poor: Private Morality, Public Responsibility (1979) 17

Buquicchio-De Boer, Children and the European Convention on Human Rights, in Protecting Human Rights: The European Dimension (F. Matscher and H. Petzold eds. 1988) 4

M. Cappelletti & W. Cohen, Comparative Constitutional Law (1979).....11, 22

Committee on Terminology of the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, Obstetric-Gynecological Terminology (1972) 19

Cook, Regional Developments in Abortion Laws: 1967-1988, 15 People (chart) (Int'l Planned Parenthood Fed. 1988) 7

Cook & Dickens, A Decade of International Change in Abortion Law: 1967-1977, 68 Am. J. Pub. Health 637 (1978) 7

Cook & Dickens, International Developments in Abortion Laws: 1977-1988, 78 Am. J. Pub. Health 1305 (1988) 7

Couzinet, et al, Termination of Early Pregnancy by the Progesterone Antagonist RU 486 (Mifepristone), 315 New Eng. J. Med. 1565 (1986) 11

PAGE

David, Fleischhacker and Höhn, Abortion and Eugenics in Nazi Germany, 14 Population and Development Rev. 81 (1988)..... 22

Der Spiegel, October 20, 1986..... 22

A. Eser and H.G. Koch, Schwangerschaftaabbruch im Internationalen Vergleich (Termination of Pregnancy in International Comparison) (1988) 14

European Convention on Human Rights, Collected Texts (1987) 4

M. Glendon, Abortion and Divorce in Western Law: American Failures, European Responses (1987)..... 2

H. Golsong, The European Court of Human Rights and the National Law-maker, in Protecting Human Rights: The European Dimension 239 (F. Matscher and H. Petzold eds. 1988) 4

Greenberg, Impact of Prenatal Care in Different Social Groups, 145 Am. J. of Obstet. & Gyn. 797 (1983)... 15

Grossman & Jacobowitz, Variations in Infant Mortality Rates Among Counties of the United States: The Roles of Public Policies and Programs 18 Demography (1981) 695 17

The International Bill of Rights (L. Henkin ed. 1981).. 3

Jonas and Gorby, West German Abortion Decision—A Contrast to Roe v. Wade, 9 J. Mar. J. Prac. & Proc. 551 (1976) 6

E. Ketting and P. Van Praag, Schwangerschaftaabbruch: Gesetz und Praxis im Internationalen Vergleich (Termination of Pregnancy: The Law and Practice in International Comparison) (1985) 14

Kolder, Gallagher & Parsons, Court-ordered Obstetrical Interventions, 317 New Eng. J. Med. 1192 (1987).... 23

PAGE

National Center for Health Statistics, 37 Advanced Report on Final Mortality Statistics 6, Monthly Vital Statistics Reports Supp. 42 (1988)..... 15

National Commission to Prevent Infant Mortality, Death Before Life: The Tragedy of Infant Mortality (1988). 17

Population Reports, Healthier Mothers and Children Through Family Planning, Series J No. 27 (May-June 1984)..... 15

Rodger & Baird, Induction of Therapeutic Abortion in Early Pregnancy with Mifepristone in Combination with Prostaglandin Pessary, [1987] ii Lancet 1415.... 11

Rubenfeld, The Right of Privacy, 102 Harv. L. Rev. 737 (1989)..... 21

Savage, The Law of Abortion in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the People's Republic of China: Women's Rights in Two Socialist Countries, 40 Stan. L. Rev. 1027 (1988)..... 21

P. Sieghart, The International Law of Human Rights (1983)..... 4

Stith, New Constitutional and Penal Theory in Spanish Abortion Law, 35 Am. J. Comp. L. 513 (1987)..... 12

L. Sumner, Abortion and Moral Theory (1981)..... 19

C. Tietze and E. Henshaw, Induced Abortion: A World View 1986, (6th ed. 1986)..... 14

Wilcox, et al, Incidence of Early Pregnancy Loss, 319 N.Engl. J. Med. (1988)..... 19

STATEMENT OF INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE

Amici are twenty-two international women's health or population organizations and fourteen individuals, actively involved in promoting the health and well-being of women on five continents. Their activities range from health care delivery in small villages to the planning and implementation of global programs and include education, research, and providing accessible, meaningful health care for women. All are committed to insuring that a full range of reproductive health services, including abortion, be available to all women who want and need them. The individual statements of interest of each amici are attached in an Appendix to this brief. Through their counsel, both parties have consented to the filing of this amici curiae brief.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Contrary to the Government's contention, Western democracies, with which the United States shares a common cultural, moral and political tradition, do not entrust fundamental questions of reproductive freedom to the unfettered discretion of national legislatures. In fact, the European Commission of Human Rights has found that legislative decisions regarding reproductive freedom which fail to safeguard the liberty, health and welfare of women violate International Conventions, including the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. The domestic courts of Western nations incorporate these same principles in their own adjudications regarding reproductive freedom.

In recent years, Western democracies have consistently promoted both the health and welfare of women and their families by liberalizing abortion laws. Reflecting a common awareness that a denial of reproductive health services would greatly increase maternal and infant mortality, especially among poor women, these laws have safeguarded a wide range of reproductive choices and have mandated publicly-funded counseling, contraceptive and abortion services.

The trimester-based framework of Roe v. Wade is reflected in the decisions of courts and legislatures throughout the Western world. These legislative and judicial bodies, like this Court, have uniformly rejected the notion that potential human life is qualitatively the same throughout all the stages of gestation, and therefore have rejected attempts to enact into law recognitions of fetal personhood from the moment of conception.

Recent history and current events have shown that governments can and will fashion abortion regimes that seek to coerce reproductive choice as official state policy. The nightmarish policies of criminalized abortion in Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union on the one hand and forced abortion in China on the other, are chilling reminders that women must be afforded the ability to make fundamental reproductive decisions free of governmental interference. Recent developments in the United States which raise the specter of coerced sterilization and abortion can only be halted by an affirmation of the opinion of the Eighth Circuit and a reaffirmation of Roe v. Wade.

ARGUMENT

I. ALL WESTERN DEMOCRACIES SUBJECT LEGISLATION AFFECTING ACCESS TO ABORTION TO JUDICIAL SCRUTINY WHICH INSURES RESPECT FOR THE HEALTH AND WELFARE OF WOMEN.

The United States government relies upon the European model of legislative decision-making when it argues that the legality of abortion should be determined by the individual states.[1] The Government's reliance upon the "European model" distorts the reality of that model and is misplaced. The contention that Roe v. Wade[2] "has shut down the legislative process of bargaining, education, and persuasion on the abortion issue,"[3] in contrast to the supposedly congenial legislative resolution of these issues in Europe, ignores the fact that legislation affecting human rights on the European Continent is subject to judicial supervision.

1 Brief for the United States as Amicus Curiae Supporting Appellants at 23 [hereinafter "U.S. Brief"].

2 Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973).

The European nations and the United States share common legal and constitutional traditions. The United States is not unique in subjecting state legislation to the overview of a higher supra-state institution empowered to identify violations of individual freedoms. European nations also reverse their own state legislation when it fails to protect the health and welfare of women under the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.[4]

The European Convention was adopted in 1953 to give effect to the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights[5] and to curtail the capacity of state legislatures, whether democratically or otherwise constituted, to pass legislation that violates human rights and fundamental freedoms. Europeans approach the Convention with the same respect and admiration granted the Bill of Rights in the United States.[6] It represents the will of countries with which the United States "shares a common cultural tradition"[7] to subject state legislation to a judicial institution empowered to identify and correct violations of human rights. The Government ignores the fact that seventeen of the eighteen European countries it proffers as examples of indepen-

3 U.S. brief at 23, citing M. Glendon, Abortion and Divorce in Western Law: American Failures, European Challenges 2 (1987).

4 European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, opened for signature, Nov. 4, 1950, Europ. TS No. 5, 213 U.N.T.S. 222 (hereinafter referred to as the European Convention).

5 Universal Declaration of Human Rights, G.A. Res. 216, U.N. Doc. A/810 at 71 (1948). References to the importance of the Declaration pervade the Preamble of the European Convention, supra note 2, which concludes: "Being resolved, as the governments of European countries which are likeminded and have a common heritage of political traditions, ideals, freedom and the rule of law to take the first steps for the collective enforcement of certain of the Rights stated in the Universal Declaration."

6 Henkin, Introduction, in The International Bill of Rights 27 (L. Henkin ed. 1981).

7 U.S. Brief at 23.

dent legislative authority, actually subscribe to the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and are subject to the jurisdiction of the European Commission and the European Court of Human Rights.[8]

Much like the United States Constitution, the European Convention insures uniform minimum legislative standards for member nations, and protects the fundamental rights of all their citizens. In each country, the legislative process of bargaining, education, and persuasion proceeds much as it does in the United States. Such legislation is amenable to review under the European Convention in a manner similar to review of legislation in the United States under the United States Federal Constitution.

The European Commission and Court of Human Rights circumscribe the scope of legislative activity at the state level.[9] According to the Court of Human Rights, legislative powers are directed to achieve those results compelled by the European Convention.[10] For example, the Court in X. v. United Kingdom condemned certain English laws regulating English mental health care. In so doing, it observed that "[c]ertainly, the 8 These seventeen countries are Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, United Kingdom: European Convention on Human Rights, Collected Texts 68 (1987). As of 1987 Finland had not acceded to the European Convention.

9 For helpful surveys, see Buquicchio-De Boer, Children and the European Convention on Human Rights, in Protecting Human Rights: The European Dimension 73 (F. Matscher and H. Petzold eds. 1988), and H. Golsong, The European Court of Human Rights and the National Lawmaker, id, 239.

10 "Since [The European] Convention on Human Rights entered into force in 1953, [The Commission] and [The Court] have developed a substantial and extensive jurisprudence in the interpretation and application of its provisions, often resulting in changes in the legislation or the administrative arrangements of the State Parties concerned . . . In addition, recourse to the Commission has led in many cases to 'friendly settlements' between the victim and the State Party, often again involving changes in the State Party's internal arrangements for the future."

P. Sieghart, The International Law of Human Rights 27 (1983).

domestic law itself must be in conformity with the Convention, including the general principles expressed or implied therein."[11] Further, each state which is party to the European Convention undertakes to explain "the manner in which its internal law ensures the effective implementation of . . . the provisions of this Convention."[12] National legislatures do not exercise unrestrained sovereignty over issues affected by the European Convention. They are held accountable under the European Convention and often must implement new legislation in conformity with the decisions of the Court.

The internal courts of the individual European nations regularly evaluate their own national legislation in conformance with the European Convention and with decisions of the European Commission and Court of Human Rights.

For instance, in its decision to uphold the Austrian Penal Code's 1974 provision permitting abortion on request during the first trimester, and on specified grounds thereafter, the Constitutional Court of Austria based its reasoning on Article 2 of the European Convention, which provides that "everyone's right to life shall be protected by law." Id., Art. 2. The Court held that this Article does not recognize a right to life before live birth.[13] A similar interpretation of Article 2 was applied in a review of an English High Court decision on the legality of abortion practice under the British Abortion Act 1967.[14] The European Commission of Human Rights affirmed this decision and concluded that ". . . both the general usage of the term "everyone" in the Convention and in the context in which 11 X. v. United Kingdom (Re Detention of a Mental Patient), 4 E.H.R.R. [European Human Rights Reporter] 188, 203 (Eur. Ct. of Hum. Rts.) (1981).

12 European Convention, Art. 57. Europ. T.S. No. 5, 213 U.N.T.S. 222.

13 Judgment of October 11, 1974. Constitutional Court, Erklarungen des Verfassungsgerichtshofs 221 (Aus.).

14 The United Kingdom Legislature enacted the Abortion Act 1967 to apply to England and Wales and to Scotland (that is, Britain) but not to Northern Ireland. Accordingly, the Act is described here as the British Abortion Act.

it was employed in Article 2 tend to support the view that it does not include the unborn."[15] In a different context, the European Commission upheld a 1976 West German abortion law, which permits abortion for reasons of distress during the first trimester, and for specified criteria of mental and physical health thereafter, as not being violative of the right to respect protected by Article 8 of the Convention.[16]

The vision advanced by the Government of European state legislatures each conducting their own unfettered democratic discourse on the legality of abortion is fundamentally inaccurate and misstates the European practice. Europe is advancing towards universal acceptance of fundamental rights already recognized in the United States. For the United States Supreme Court now to abandon the protection of individual rights expressed in Roe v. Wade for variable and potentially invasive state legislation would be a historical error of immense proportions.

---

15 Paton v. United Kingdom, 3 E.H.R.R. 408, 413 (1980) (Eur. Comm'n Hum. Rts.).

16 Bruggeman and Scheuten v. Federal Republic of Germany, 3 E.H.R.R. 244 (Eur. Comm'n Hum. Rts.) (1977). The 1976 West German Abortion Law conformed to broad guidelines for legislation on abortion laid down by the Constitutional Court of the Federal Republic of Germany in Judgment of February 25, 1975 Bundesverfassungsgericht, 39 BVerfGE 1, translated in Jonas & Gorby, West German Abortion Decision—A Contrast to Roe v. Wade, 9 John Marshall J. Prac. & Proc. 551 (1976), which held the earlier 1974 law permitting abortion on request during the first trimester unconstitutional.

The Commission is likely to consider in due course appeals from the highest courts of the Republic of Ireland and of Belgium on abortion-related issues. The decision of the High Court of Ireland, holding that to advertise in Ireland the availability of abortion services in England constituted the crime of conspiracy to corrupt public morals, A.G. (S.P.U.C.) v. Open Door Counselling, 1987 I.L.R.M. 477 (Ir. H. Ct.) is being appealed to the European Commission of Human Rights. The decision of Nov. 14, 1988 of the Cour d'Appel de Gand overturning the acquittal of individuals for performing abortions (Judgment of Feb. 12, 1988 Tribunal Correctionnel de Gand) is being appealed to the highest Belgian Court, the Cour de Cassation. Once domestic remedies are exhausted it is likely to be appealed to the European Commission of Human Rights.

II. IN ORDER TO PROTECT WOMEN'S REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH, MANY WESTERN COUNTRIES HAVE LIBERALIZED THEIR ABORTION LAWS IN A MANNER CONSISTENT WITH ROE V. WADE.

In recent years, the liberalization of abortion laws in numerous Western jurisdictions has improved women's reproductive health and family well-being.[17] These countries have developed a variety of different legislative approaches to improving women's reproductive health by requiring non-directive counseling, by facilitating women's access to abortion at the earliest possible stage of pregnancy, and by providing a full range of contraceptive information and services. Many of these countries have decriminalized abortion in the early stages of pregnancy and permit abortion thereafter according to specified criteria.

All of these countries allow and facilitate abortion at any stage of gestation when continuation of the pregnancy would endanger a woman's life. Seven Western countries permit abortion on request during the early stages of pregnancy and sometimes thereafter, while nine other Western countries permit

---

17 In the past 20 years 26 Western jurisdictions, including the United States, have liberalized their abortion laws either through legislation or court decisions. These jurisdictions are Australia (six jurisdictions: Capital Territory, New South Wales, Northern Territory, Queensland, South Australia and Victoria), Austria, Britain, Canada, Denmark, Federal Republic of Germany, Finland, France, Greece, Greenland, Iceland, Italy, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, New Zealand, Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and the United States; see Cook, Regional Developments in Abortion Laws: 1967-1988, 15 People (International Planned Parenthood Federation), chart 1988. See also, Cook & Dickens, A Decade of International Change in Abortion Law: 1967-1977, 68 Am. J. Pub. Health 637 (1978); Cook & Dickens, International Developments in Abortion Laws: 1977-1988, 78 Am. J. Pub. Health 1305 (1988). English translations available in U.N. Population Fund and Harvard Law School Library, Annual Review of Population Law (1974-85); World Health Organization, International Digest of Health Legislation.

abortion under specific health and social criteria.[18] However, in practice, these laws accommodate abortion on request early in pregnancy, since either the woman herself[19] or the woman in consultation with her doctor, are the sole determinors of whether the statutory criteria are met.[20]

For example, the British Abortion Act 1967 may appear restrictive because, except in case of emergency, it allows abortion only when two physicians form the opinion "that the continuance of the pregnancy would involve risk to the life of the 18 Western countries other than the U.S. that permit abortion on request or on broad grounds early in pregnancy.

Country	Grounds	*Duration of Pregnancy
Austria	On request § 97(1)	first trimester § 97(1) (after implantation)
Britain	Broad criteria § 1(1)(2)	until viability § 5
Canada	On request	until viability
Denmark	On request § 1	12 weeks § 1
Finland	Broad criteria § 1	12 weeks § 5
France	Broad criteria § 1	10 weeks § 1 (from conception)
Germany (Fed. Rep.)	Broad criteria § 218(a)	12 weeks § 218(a)(3) (after implantation)
Greece	On request § 304(4)(1)	12 weeks § 304(4)(1)
Greenland	On request	12 weeks § 1
Iceland	Broad criteria § 9(1)	12 weeks § 10
Italy	Broad criteria § 4	90 days § 4
Luxembourg	Broad criteria	12 weeks § 353(1)
Netherlands	Broad criteria § 5	Until viability § 1 after implantation
New Zealand	Broad criteria § 187(a)	Not more than 20 weeks § 187(a) (after implantation)
Norway	On request § 1	12 weeks § 1
Sweden	On request § 1	12 weeks § 1

* For purposes of abortion, pregnancy is generally measured from the first day of the last menstrual period in accordance with standard medical practice, except where otherwise indicated. With the exception of Canada, all section numbers refer to the respective abortion laws listed in the Table of Authorities.

19 In France, for example, the woman herself decides whether she satisfies the "in distress" indication. This is a "notion purement subjective que la femme apprecie souverairement," (purely subjective notion that the woman sovereignly appreciates); Judgment of October 31, 1980, Conseil d'Etat Recueil Dalloz-Sirey [D.S.Jur.] 19732 (France 1982).

20 In the Netherlands, for example, the woman together with her doctor decide whether she is "in distress," Law of 7 May 1981, § 5.

pregnant woman, or of injury to the physical or mental health of the pregnant woman or any existing children of her family, greater than if the pregnancy were terminated."[21] In practice, this formula presents no real obstacle to abortion since, in modern medicine, continuing a pregnancy is invariably of greater risk than terminating a pregnancy in early stages. The British Act also provides that, when determining the risk of injury to health, "account may be taken of the pregnant woman's actual or reasonably foreseeable environment."[22]

In many Western countries, abortion legislation is framed primarily in terms of women's reproductive health and family well-being. Many laws require non-directive counseling, and impose an affirmative duty upon the government to provide reproductive health services, including contraception and abortion. For instance, the Italian law of 1978 emphasizes promotion of women's reproductive health and the related prevention of unwanted pregnancy.[23] This legislation facilitates access to contraception and voluntary sterilization, both by requiring that local and regional governmental authorities promote contraceptive services, and by requiring that abortion providers counsel women on family planning methods.[24]

Consistent with Western ethical doctrines on informed consent to medical treatment, at least thirteen countries require that women seeking abortions be provided with non-directive counseling.[25] This is in marked contrast to the censorship of

21 § 1 (1) (a).

22 § 1(2). § 1(1) (b) of the British Act also permits abortion if there is "a substantial risk that if the child were born it would suffer from such physical or mental abnormalities as to be seriously handicapped."

23 § 15 of Law No. 194 of 22 May 1978 on the Social Protection of Motherhood and the Voluntary Termination of Pregnancy requires that health regions provide refresher training courses for health and allied health personnel in contraception.

24 Id. § 14.

25 These countries are Austria § 97, Denmark § 8, Finland § 4, France § 3, Germany (Federal Republic of) § 218 b, Greenland § 8, Iceland § 12, Italy § 5, Luxembourg § 353 (1)(d)(1), Netherlands § 5, New Zealand § 35, Norway § 1, Sweden—paid for as a matter of government policy. With the exception of Sweden all section numbers refer to the respective abortion laws listed in the table of authorities.

abortion speech which the United States is seeking to impose on physicians in publicly-funded clinics in the United States,[26] and which Missouri seeks to impose here. Several of the countries that require such counseling, such as France,[27] Italy,[28] Iceland,[29] and the Netherlands,[30] also mandate that physicians provide a full range of contraceptive information and services. Some countries, such as Luxembourg,[31] require the use of public funds to provide contraceptives to teenagers.

Finland,[32] France,[33] and Italy[34] impose an affirmative duty upon governmental agencies to provide pregnancy counseling and abortion services. Some countries emphasize the obligation to provide such services at the earliest possible stage of pregnancy.[35] Other countries, such as Italy, require "the use of modern techniques of pregnancy termination, which are physi-

26 42 U.S.C. §§ 300-300a-41 (1982). See New York v. Bowen, 690 F. Supp. 1261 (S.D.N.Y. 1988), appeal pending, Nos. 88-6204/06 (2d Cir.); Planned Parenthood Fed'n of Am. v. Bowen, 680 F. Supp. 1465 (preliminary injunction), 687 F. Supp. 540 (permanent injunction) (D. Colo. 1988), appeal pending, No. 88-2251 (10th Cir.); Massachusetts v. Bowen, 679 F. Supp. 137 (D. Mass.) (permanent injunction), appeal pending, No. 88-1279 (1st Cir.).

27 § 4, Law 75-17 of 17 Jan. 1975 (Fr.)

28 § 2 of Law 194 of 22 May 1978 (Italy).

29 § 16 of Law of 22 May 1975 (Ice.).

30 § 5(1)(d) of Law of May 1981 (Neth.).

31 § 9 of Law of 15 November 1978 (Lux.).

32 § 11 of Law 2439 of 24 March 1970 (Fin.) requires that the "State Medical Board shall take measures to ensure that there are a sufficient number of physicians with authority to render opinions, and a sufficient number of abortion hospitals, in all parts of the country, and that physicians with authority to render opinions, and operating physicians make every effort to adopt an impartial and consistent approach." Moreover, § 5 of the same law imposes a duty upon the State Medical Board to perform abortions "at the earliest possible stage of pregnancy."

33 Decree No. 80-285 of 17 April 1980 (Fr.) and Decree No. 82-1826 of September 1982 (Fr.) obligate regional and general hospitals and all public establishments equipped with surgical and maternity services to carry out voluntary interruptions of pregnancy.

34 § 15 of Law 194 of 22 May 1978 (Italy).

35 § 5 of Law 239 of 24 March 1970 (Fin.).

cally and mentally less damaging to the woman and are less hazardous."[36]

This legislative trend in western democracies toward liberalization of abortion laws has been reinforced by judicial action. In January 1988, the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that the Canadian federal Criminal Code provision restricting abortion violated women's rights to liberty and security of the person protected by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.[37] This rendered the law inoperative. The Constitutional Court of Austria sustained the legality of that country's liberal abortion law of 1974.[38] France's liberal abortion law, which permits therapeutic abortion in broadly defined terms, including a woman's distress, was sustained by the French Conseil Constitutionnel in 1975 as consistent with "the principle of liberty stated in Article 2 of Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen."[39]

In 1975, the Constitutional Court of Italy declared the abortion provision of the Italian Criminal Code unconstitutional because it restricted lawful abortion to life-threatening pregnancies.[40] New legislation, more protective of women's health

36 § 15 of Law 194 of 22 May 1978. The development of antiprogestin drugs provides the prospect of abortion done by medical, as opposed to surgical, means, which may, in time, prove to fulfill these criteria. See Rodger & Baird, Induction of Therapeutic Abortion in Early Pregnancy with Mifepristone in Combination with Prostaglandin Pessary, [1987] ii Lancet 1415; Couzinet, et al, Termination of Early Pregnancy by the Progesterone Antagonist RU 486 (Mifepristone), 315 New Eng. J. Med. 1565 (1986).

37 Morgentaler, Smoling and Scott v. The Queen, [1988] 44 D.L.R. (4th) 385. See Brief of Canadian Women's Health Organizations as Amicus Curiae in support of Appellees.

38 See Note 13 and accompanying text, supra.

39 Judgment of January 15, 1975, Conseil Constitutionnel, [1975] D.S.Jur. 529, Journal Officiel, Jan. 16, 1975.

40 Judgment of February 18, 1975, Corte Costituzionale [Corte Cost.], no. 27, 98 Foro It. I, Giurisprudencia Constituzionale e Civile [Giur. Cost. e Civ.] 515 (Italy), translated in part in M. Cappellotti & W. Cohen, Comparative Constitutional Law: Cases and Materials 612-14 (1979). The Court observed that women's health prevails over fetal life, because "there is no equivalence between the right not only to life but also to health of one who—like the pregnant woman—is already a person, and the safeguard of an embryo which has yet to become a person." Id. at 613.

interests, was reviewed by the Italian Constitutional Court and upheld under various articles of the Constitution, including Article 2 which protects human life.[41]

Rather than focusing on either women's health or on fetal interests, Constitutional Courts in West Germany and Spain have approached abortion legislation in the context of "communitarian values," which are based on sentiments within the community affected by the law in question. A commentator has observed, however, that "at the same time that they (i.e., the Spanish and German decisions) base the protection of fetal life on the importance of public values they withdraw that protection when continuation of a pregnancy is 'too much to demand' or 'nondemandable' ["inexigible" and "unzumutbar", in the words of the Spanish and German courts respectively] of the individual pregnant woman."[42]

Moreover, courts have protected a woman's decision to have an abortion over claims of spousal and parental veto in, among other countries, Australia,[43] Canada,[44] England,[45] France,[46] and Italy.[47]

---

41 Judgment No. 108/81 of June 25, 1981, Corte Costituzionale, 57 Raccolta Ufficiale della Corte Constituzionale [Rac. uff. corte cost.] 823 (1981).

42 Stith, New Constitutional and Penal Theory in Spanish Abortion Law, 35 Am. J. Comp. L. 513, 514 (1987). The author further observes that "The 1973 U.S. Supreme Court abortion decision, Roe v. Wade, is in surprisingly many ways similar to the Spanish and German decisions." Id. at 528. See Table of Authorities for German and Spanish case citations.

43 In Attorney-General for Queensland: Ex rel. Kerr v. I, 46 A.L.R. 275 (1983) the High Court of Australia confirmed a decision of the Queensland State Court that an injunction could not be granted to an unmarried man to restrain the woman he had made pregnant from having an abortion. Moreover, there is a consistent trend in Australia for their state courts to recognize legitimacy of abortion on grounds of preservation of physical or mental health as determined by a physician acting in good faith; New South Wales—R. v. Wald, [1971] 3 D.C.R. (N.S.W.) 25; Queensland—The Queen v. Bayliss and Cullen, [1986] 9 Q. Law. Rep. 8; Victoria—R. v. Davidson, [1969] V.R. 667. See also the consistent New Zealand decision R. v. Woolnough, 2 N.Z.L.R. 508 (1977).

(footnotes 44, 45, 46 and 47 appear on following page)

In sum, Roe v. Wade and its progeny are consistent with legislation and jurisprudence in at least sixteen Western countries. The Government's claim that, under the abortion jurisprudence established by Roe v. Wade, ". . . we have less regulation of abortion in the interest of the fetus than any other Western nation . . ."[48] cannot be sustained.

III. RESTRICTING PUBLIC FACILITATION OF ABORTION ENDANGERS WOMEN'S HEALTH AND IS "OUT OF STEP" WITH THE PRACTICE OF OTHER WESTERN COUNTRIES.

The Government's claim that a legal regime that is "out of step with the legislative judgment of virtually every other country with which we share a common cultural tradition by itself suggests that the decision ought to be reconsidered"[49] in fact compels that the decision of the Eighth Circuit in Reproductive Health Services v. Webster, 851 F.2d 1071 (8th Cir. 1988), be affirmed.

---

44 Re Medhurst and Medhurst, 45 O.R. (2d) 575 (1984 Ontario S.C.); Medhurst v. Medhurst, 46 O.R. (2d) 263 (1984 (Ont. S.C.) (husband's attempt to enjoin his wife from having an abortion rejected).

45 Paton v. Trustees of British Pregnancy Advisory Service, [1978] 2 A11 E.R. 987, affirmed by the European Commission on Human Rights—Paton v. U.K., 3 E.H.R.R. 408 (1980) (husband's attempt to enjoin his wife from having an abortion rejected); Gillick v. West Norfolk and Wisbeck Area Health Authority, [1985] 3 A11 E.R. 402 (parents' attempt to enjoin their minor daughter from having an abortion rejected); C. v. S., [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1108 (putative father denied injunction to restrain a mother's abortion). Ct. App. Eng.)

46 Judgment of October 31, 1980, Conseil d'Etat D.S.Jur. 19732 (1982) (husband's attempt to enjoin his wife from having an abortion rejected); Judgment of November 8, 1982, Tribunal pour les Enfants d'Evry, 15 D.S.Jur. 218, (April 12, 1983) (parents' attempts to enjoin their minor daughter from having an abortion rejected).

47 Judgment of March 31, 1988, Corte Cost., Gazzetta Ufficiale, 1 serie speciale, April 13, 1988, n.15; Giur. Cost. e Civ. 2110 (1988) (husband's attempt to enjoin his wife from having an abortion rejected).

48 U.S. Brief at 23.

49 Id.

In contrast to the Missouri statute, which prohibits persons who receive public funds or work in public facilities from performing or providing counseling for abortion, the prevailing legislative and judicial judgment of Western democracies is that government has an affirmative obligation to provide medical services, including abortions, that protect personal health. Accordingly, legally sanctioned abortion is provided through public facilities and publicly paid personnel in seventeen Western countries.[50] Where health services are funded on a fee-for-

50 See § II, supra. Western countries that provide for or subsidize all legally indicated abortions from public funds:

Country	Payment plan and reference
Australia	100% state: Commonwealth Health Insurance Act 1982, scheduled medical service (item 6469)
Austria	100% state: A. Eser & H. Koch, Schwangerschaftaabbruch im Internationale Vergfleich (Termination of Pregnancy in International Comparison) 1122 (1988)
Britain	100% state: Nat'l Health Svce. Act 1977, § 1(2)
Canada	100% state: scheduled medical services
Denmark	100% state: Ministry of Justice guidelines on the termination of pregnancy of 24 Mar 1976; Social Assistance Act of 1984; E. Ketting & P. van Praag, Schwangerschaftaabbruch: Gesetz und Praxis im Internationalen Vergleich (Termination of Pregnancy: Law and Practice in International Comparison) 106 (1985)
France	75% state: Law No. 82-1172 of 31.12.82; Eser & Koch, id. at 531
Germany (Fed)	100% state: Reichsversicherungsordnung, § 200 f; Eser & Koch, id. at 126; Ketting and van Praag id. at 108
Greece	100% state: Law No. 1609/86 § 1(3); Eser and Koch id. at 600
Italy	100% state: Law No. 194 of 22 May 78 § 10(1)
Luxembourg	100% state: Law of 15 November 78 § 13
Netherlands	100% state: Ketting & van Praag at 107
New Zealand	100% state: C. Tietze & E. Henshaw Induced Abortion: A World View 1986 126, (6th ed. 1986)
Norway	100% state: Tietze & Henshaw, id. at 126
Portugal	100% state: Eser & Koch, id. at 1298
Spain	100% state: Social security coverage
Sweden	40 kroner deductible: Law 1962-381 amended by Law 1982-120: Eser & Koch, id. at 1432; Ketting & van Praag, id. at 106
Switzerland	100% state: Law of 9 Oct. 1986; Judgment of Court of Insurance, BGE 108 V 35; Eser & Koch, id. at 1515 and Ketting & van Praag, id. at 110 service basis, abortion is included in schedules of fees paid to health personnel or reimbursed to patients, while physicians who are paid on a salary or per capita basis are permitted and often required to perform medically and legally indicated abortions.[51]

The Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit rightfully held that the prohibition against the use of public funds, facilities or employees to perform abortion or counsel women regarding the full range of reproductive choice unconstitutionally restricts women's access to abortion.[52] Such denial violates the health interests of women, their dependent children and their families.[53]

In the United States, the incidence of maternal mortality associated with pregnancy is far higher among disadvantaged women than among women with adequate financial and health resources.[54] Those rates could be lowered, as the Western expe-

51 A number of countries offer conscientious exemptions from abortion laws, except in the case of emergency, to physicians. See, e.g. Brit. Abortion Act 1967 § 4.

52 Reproductive Health Services v. Webster, 851 F. 2d 1071, 1083 (8th Cir. 1988).

53 Paradoxically, although the Missouri statute contains an exception for "the life of the mother," it prohibits the one health measure shown to be effective in reducing both maternal and infant mortality among low-income women, i.e., access to safe and legal abortion. See Greenberg, Impact of Prenatal Care in Different Social Groups, 145 Am. J. Obstet. & Gyn. 797 (1983).

54 There is a high risk of death from pregnancy and childbirth when women experience pregnancy too early (before age 18), or too late (after age 35) in their reproductive lives and when they exeperience repeated pregnancy (more than four births), particularly at intervals of less than 24 months. Population Reports, Healthier Mothers and Children Through Family Planning, Series J No. 27 (May-June 1984). In contrast to these restrictive policies in the United States, many Western countries permit lawful abortion when continuation of a woman's pregnancy involves risk of injury to the physical or mental health of the pregnant woman "or any existing children of her family". (emphasis added) (British Abortion Act 1967 § 1(1)(a)). In 1986, maternal mortality for white women was 4.9 deaths per 100,000 live births and for black women, it was 18.8 per 100,000 live births; National Center for Health Statistics, Advanced Report on Final Mortality Statistics 37:6 Monthly Vital Statistics Reports Supp. 42 Table 16 (1988)

rience has shown, by greater access to abortion or to paid or subsidized medical care throughout pregnancy—neither of which are available under the Missouri statute.

American abortion policies do not reflect the reality that unmet health needs in the United States lead to sickness and premature deaths, particularly among poor women living in inner cities and rural areas.[55] Public facilities and personnel are virtually the only available health resource to those sectors of American society lacking private and employer-based health insurance.

Restrictions on abortion information cause delay in obtaining care, thus fostering the additional hazards of late abortions. By contrast, in most other Western countries, legislation provides that abortions be performed with dispatch and with appropriate counseling regarding the procedure. For example, legislation in Finland expressly provides that abortions should be performed as early as possible,[56] and places a duty on the State Medical Board to ensure availability of services.[57]

Prohibiting, or obstructing, access to abortion information and services exposes children as well as women, to risk of death or sickness. The Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit perceptively observed that such risk is a product, not of social forces that the state government bears no legal duty to relieve, but of policies that the state has decided itself to implement.[58] It has been established that the increase in the legal abortion rate is the single most important factor in reductions in both white and nonwhite neonatal mortality rates.[59]

---

55 Greenberg, supra, note 53.

56 Law No. 239 of 24 Mar 1970; § 5 (Fin.).

57 Id., § 11.

58 "Just as a statutory prohibition on access to public facilitates for privately-paid abortions constitutes such a government-created obstacle [in the path of a woman's exercise of her freedom of choice], so too does Missouri's ban on public employees performing or assisting abortions": Webster, 851 F.2d at 1083.

59 Infant mortality rates among the poor are a major contribution to the U.S. rank of 19th in the world in infant mortality, a decline from its 15th ranking twenty years ago; National Commission to Prevent Infant Mortality Death Before Life: The Tragedy of Infant Mortality (1988). See also Grossman & Jacobowitz, Variations in Infant Mortality Rate Among Countries of the United States: The Roles of Public Policies and Programs 18 Demography 695 (1981). Alan Guttmacher Institute, Abortions and The Poor: Private Morality, Public Responsibility (1979).

The effect of restrictive abortion policies on maternal and infant mortality and morbidity is clear. Therefore, a decision by the Supreme Court to uphold Missouri's restrictions on publicly funded services would endanger the health and lives of many women, children and families in the United States.

IV. ABORTION LAWS IN MANY WESTERN COUNTRIES UTILIZE FRAMEWORKS COMPARABLE TO THE TRIMESTER-BASED APPROACH OF ROE V. WADE

The trimester-based framework of Roe v. Wade is compatible with the laws of Western countries generally, and should be sustained against the Missouri statute's proposal to treat all stages of unborn life equally from conception. In many Western nations, laws establishing legal and medical criteria for abortion incorporate rational distinctions based on stages of gestational development, reflecting the jurisprudence of Roe v. Wade.[60]

Both appellants' brief and the Government's brief reject the proposition that a state's interest in protecting prenatal life is qualitatively different at different periods of pregnancy and defend the Missouri statute's recognition of legal personhood from the moment of conception.[61] This is in marked contrast to the stance of the legislatures and Supreme Courts in most Wes-

---

60 Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973) has been cited with approval by courts in Great Britain, Canada, Europe, and Australia: C. v. S. [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1108, 1239 (English Court of Appeal) (House of Lords refused leave to appeal); Morgentaler, Smoling and Scott v. The Queen, [1987] 44 D.L.R. (4th) 393, 445, 489 (Supreme Court of Canada); Paton v. U.K. [1980] 3 E.H.R.R. 408, 1239 (Eur. Comm'n. Hum. Rts.); The Queen v. Bayliss and Cullen [1986] 9 Q. Law. Rep. 8, 10, 49, 54-56 (Dist. Ct. of Queensland, Australia).

61 The expression "fetus" is a biological misnomer at this stage; the word is now used uncritically to cover different stages of biological development of a conceptus from the union of an ovum and a sperm to live birth of a fetus of full gestational age.

tern countries, who reject as irrational the notion that potential human life is of equal legal significance at all gestational stages.

This idea was fully expressed when the Supreme Court of Canada struck down all restrictions on abortion in Morgentaler, Smoling and Scott v. The Queen.[62] In her concurring opinion Madame Justice Wilson observed that:

> "The undeveloped foetus starts out as a newly-fertilized ovum; the fully developed foetus emerges ultimately as an infant. A developmental progression takes place in between these two extremes and, in my opinion, this progression has a direct bearing on the value of the foetus as potential life . . . I agree . . . that the foetus is potential life from the moment of conception . . . in balancing the state's interest in the protection of the foetus as potential life under Section 1 of the Charter [of Rights and Freedoms] against the right of the pregnant woman under Section 7 greater weight should be given to the state's interest in the later stages of pregnancy than in the earlier. The foetus should accordingly . . . be viewed in differential and developmental terms."[63]

Many laws place controls on abortion according to the different stages of gestation. Other countries approximate the American notion of viability and limit late abortions if a woman's life or permanent health would not be endangered by continuation of pregnancy. For example, legislation in Finland,[64] France,[65] Greece,[66] Italy,[67] Luxembourg,[68] Norway[69] and Spain[70] requires

62 [1988] 44 D.L.R. (4th) 385.

63 Id. at 499 (Wilson, J., concurring).

64 Law 239 of 24 Mar 1970 as amended by § 5.

65 Law 79-1204 of 31 Dec 1979, § 12.

66 Law 1609 of 28 Jun 1986, § 304 (4)(1), (4).

67 Law 194 of 22 May 1978, § 6.

68 Law of 15 Nov 1978, § 353(3).

69 Law 66 of 16 Jun 1978, § 2.

70 Organic Law 9 of 5 July 1985, § 417(3).

stronger medical evidence that the criteria for abortion are satisfied in later pregnancy than in early pregnancy.

While the fetus is indeed "potential life . . . in the first weeks of pregnancy,"[71] by the same token so are each sperm and ovum.[72] The laws of most Western countries are responsive to the evidence of biological science that even after conception there is a significant rate of spontaneous pre-embryonic, embryonic and fetal wastage, both through failure of the conceptus to implant in the uterus, and following implantation as well.[73]

Applying the same standards of protection to unborn life at all stages of development would blithely ignore the nature of human reproductive biology. Accordingly, a number of nations clearly accommodate contraception which operates to prevent implantation of a fertilized egg into the uterine wall.[74]

Courts at international and national levels have resisted claims that fetuses have a right to life from conception in ways that would limit access to abortions, consistent with this Court's holding in Roe v. Wade.[75] Instead they have held that 71 Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416, 461 (1983) (O'Connor, J. dissenting).

72 L. Sumner, Abortion and Moral Theory 104-05 (1981).

73 Wilcox, et al, Incidence of Early Pregnancy Loss, 319 N. Engl. J. Med. at 189 (1988).

74 Some abortion laws, such the 1974 Austrian law, the 1981 law of The Netherlands, the 1977 New Zealand law and the 1976 West German law, expressly decriminalized medical interventions for the period between fertilization and completion of implantation of the fertilized ovum. This is a period of up to about 21 days since fertilization or, whether fertilization is difficult to pinpoint, up to about 35 days since the last menstrual period. In such countries the use of birth control methods during this period such as antiprogestins, contraceptives or post-ovulatory methods does not need to meet the requirements of the respective abortion laws. Accordingly, the use of such methods is medically encouraged in order to prevent occurrence of pregnancy which biologically is generally accepted to begin at completion of implantation; see Committee on Terminology of the American College of Obstetricians & Gynecologists: Obstetric-Gynecological Terminology 327 (1972).

75 See notes 13-16 and accompanying text, supra.

the welfare of women is no less significant than that of fetuses, and that the balance of competing interests favors women and their families. For example, the European Commission on Human Rights has declined to extend human rights provisions to the unborn,[76] and the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights has interpreted the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man 1948 to uphold a woman's right to abortion over any putative right of the unborn.[77] This Court, too, must and reject Missouri's attempt to define human life from the moment of conception.

V. ROE V. WADE, WHICH PROTECTS PRIVATE REPRODUCTIVE DECISIONS FROM COERCIVE GOVERNMENTAL POLICIES, MUST BE MAINTAINED.

Historical and contemporary experience demonstrate that, given the opportunity, governments often attempt either to promote childbirth or suppress it through abortion legislation. Protection of individual reproductive choice against state coercion is compelled by the most enduring values of individual liberty. The Court's decision in Roe v. Wade, which safeguards individual choice from coercive intervention, must be maintained.

---

76 Paton v. United Kingdom, 3 E.H.R.R. 408 (1980).

77 Case 2141, Inter-American Comm'n on Human Rights, OEA/ser.L./V./1154, doc. 9 rev. 1 (1980). American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man, Organization of American States, OEA/ser.L./V./1.4 Rev. (1948), reprinted in OAS, Handbook of Existing Rules Pertaining to Human Rights, OEA/ser.L./V.11.50 doc. 6 (1980).

In the United States, a state supreme court has upheld the constitutionality of a legislative provision that prevents a child born alive from pursuing a "wrongful life" action for prenatal injuries, Hickman v. Group Health Plan, Inc., 396 N.W.2d 10 (Minn. 1986). Such a provision may be enacted to remove any incentive for a potential medical defendant to advise or perform an abortion on a fetus so afflicted in order to forestall such a suit.

Legislation to this effect exists, for instance, in Minnesota: Stat. Ann. § 145.424; Missouri: Stat. Ann. § 188.130; and Utah: Stat. Ann. § 76.7-305.5.

The U.S. Supreme Court may in time be called upon to assess state legislation that denies individuals such rights of action claimed to arise from prenatal conduct.

Some may argue that a woman who is compelled against her wishes to continue a pregnancy initiated through her voluntary conduct is not suffering any legislative "invasion."[78] When one considers, however, what a restrictive abortion law affirmatively brings about, rather than what it prohibits, namely involuntary gestation and childbirth, the invasiveness of the law is apparent. It has recently been observed that:

> Even if the propensity of anti-abortion laws to exert power over the body and to instrumentalize women is discounted, it remains the case that such laws radically and affirmatively redirect women's lives. Indeed it is difficult to conceive of a particular legal prohibition with a more total effect on the life and future of the one enjoined. It is no exaggeration to say that mandatory childbearing is a totalitarian intervention into a woman's life. With regard to the occupation and direction of lives, the positive ramifications of anti-abortion laws are unparalleled.[79]

In totalitarian countries, abortion legislation has routinely been used to force women to bear children or refrain from childbirth according to the dictates of state policy. In 1920, the Soviet Union decriminalized abortion. But, by 1936, anticipating a renewed World War and the prospect of devastating population loss, the Soviet Union adopted a pro-natalist population policy. This policy was implemented by the removal of contraceptives and the recriminalization of abortion. The Decree of 1936 described the fundamental duty of "woman, as a mother and a citizen who bears the great and responsible duty of giving birth to and bringing up citizens."[80] At the end of the Stalin era, in 1955, abortion was again decriminalized. Rumania, in order to counter its declining population, introduced restrictive abortion legislation in 1985, along with highly directive provisions on prenatal care. President Ceausescu proclaimed in 1986 that 78 See, e.g. U.S. Brief at 26.

---

79 Rubenfeld, The Right of Privacy, 102 Harv. L. Rev. 737 (1989).

80 Savage, The Law of Abortion in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the People's Republic of China: Women's Rights in Two Socialist Countries, 40 Stan. L. Rev. 1027 (1988).

"the fetus is the socialist property of the whole society. Giving birth is a patriotic duty, determining the fate of our country."[81]

The use of coercive legislation to achieve state population policies is not confined to communist regimes. Within four months of Hitler becoming Chancellor of Germany's Third Reich in 1933, laws restricting abortion were introduced, and a month later the newly created Ministry of Propaganda established an Office for Exploring Population Policies. A Gestapo-led antiabortion campaign intensified in 1937, when nine times as many abortionists were charged as in 1936.[82] During the Second World War, tribunals in Vichy France and Germany were authorized to impose the death penalty for illegal abortion, and carried out their mandate.[83] In Germany, however, it was an accepted defense to a charge of illegal abortion that the woman was Jewish, because the termination of unborn Jewish life did not offend the principle of the abortion prohibition.[84] Even before its political association with Germany, Italy had legislation prohibiting abortion, which the King of Italy explained protected "the demographic interest of the State."[85] This reflected a pervasive view that the reproductive potential of its women was an asset of the state and could be legislatively deployed for nationalist ends. Nazi Germany also considered women's reproductive capacity a state asset, and increased population by providing facilities for breeding racially "pure" children.

In countries where government is not subject to the processes of Western-style democracy, states can use legislative fiat to suppress or to compel abortion and women and their families may be forced to sacrifice their physical integrity to serve the purposes of the state. In China, for instance, evidence of mandatory abortion has persuaded the United States government to 81 Ceausescu, N., cited in Der Spiegel, Oct. 20, 1986.

82 David, Fleischhacker & Hohn, Abortion and Eugenics in Nazi Germany, 14 Population and Development Rev. 81 (1988).

83 Id. at 81.

84 Id. at 94.

85 Cappelletti & Cohen, supra note 40, at 612.

terminate funding for reproductive health care undertaken through the United Nations Fund for Population Activities.[86]

At first, the state-sanctioned coercion in other countries may seem alien to the situation in the United States. But the United States itself has also begun to witness judicially-sanctioned coercion of reproductive choices. In a series of cases, beginning with Jefferson v. Griffin Spalding County Hospital Authority,[87] courts have forced mentally competent women to undergo Caesarean delivery despite their refusal. The District of Columbia Court of Appeals, currently considering the case of a terminally ill woman forced to undergo Caesarean surgery, will decide whether the reproductive choice guaranteed in Roe v. Wade precludes this massive bodily intrusion.[88]

The climate of fear surrounding the AIDS virus is already raising discussion of the possibility of coerced abortions or sterilizations as a condition of treatment. The possibility that state legislatures in the United States will mandate or accommodate pressure for termination of pregnancy cannot be precluded.

In the face of these truly chilling developments, Roe v. Wade safeguards women's fundamental freedom to decide whether and when to bear children against the coercive and intrusive power of government. Respect for human integrity and dignity embodied in reproductive choice must be preserved, and the decision of the Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit should be affirmed.

86 The United States President is empowered to certify when China ceases to employ abortion powers coercively. S. Rep. No. 82 to accompany H.R. 2577 (1985); 131 Congressional Record H5335-5355.

87 274 S.E. 2d 457 (Ga. 1981); see generally Kolder, Gallagher & Parsons, Court-ordered Obstetrical Interventions, 317 New Eng. J. Med. 1192 (1987).

88 In Re A.C., 533 A.2d 611 (D.C. App. 1987) reh'g granted and opinion vacated, No. 87-609 (March 17, 1988).

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, amici respectfully request that this Court affirm the decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit holding Missouri's law unconstitutional.

Respectfully submitted,

REBECCA J. COOK
BERNARD M. DICKENS
Of the Inner Temple (England),
Barrister at Law, and of the
Ontario (Canada) Bar

Faculty of Law
University of Toronto
Toronto, Canada M5S 2C5
(416) 978-4446

KATHRYN KOLBERT
261 West Pastorius Street
Philadelphia, PA 19144
(215) 849-6770

Counsel of Record

March 30, 1989

APPENDIX

APPENDIX

Organizational Amici

Abortion Rights Coalition is a coalition of organizations and individuals committed to providing information regarding the safety and availability of abortion. It was formed in 1956 and is based in New South Wales, Australia.

The Association for the Legal Right to Abortion (Western Australia), formed in 1965, is a non-partisan, non-sectarian, organization of Western Australians dedicated to womens' rights to safe, legal abortion.

The D.K.T. Memorial Fund is a private organization based in Washington, D.C. which supports and supervises family planning projects, primarily in developing countries, including the provision of birth control options for men. The DKT Memorial Fund is dedicated to the furtherance of a woman's right to reproductive freedom, including the right to choose abortion.

The Family Planning Association of New South Wales has provided fertility control, sex education and reproductive health care services for over fifty years. With over 26 clinics in the Sydney Metropolitan area, the Association provides clients with direct clinical services which include advice on birth control, preventive health care, medical gynecology and specialized counseling on pregnancy, menopause, infertility and sexual difficulties, as well as providing advocacy for its clients in matters relating to reproduction and sexuality education. As a result, the Association is well aware of the need for women to have access to legal, medically safe abortions.

The International Fund for Health and Family Planning (IFHFP) is a private foundation based in Washington, D.C., which supports and supervises family planning projects, primarily in developing countries. These programs include the provision of a wide variety of contraceptive and birth control options for women and men around the world. The IFHFP is dedicated to the furtherance of women's rights to reproductive freedom, including the right to choose abortion.

International Projects Assistance Services (IPAS) is a non-governmental, charitable organization based in Carrboro, North Carolina that works around the world, and especially in developing countries, toward safe reproductive health care for women. It provides training, information and other educational services regarding access to and delivery of comprehensive health services, especially abortion. In countries where abortion is restricted, IPAS works within prevailing cultural, legal and social contexts to reduce the maternal morbidity and mortality associated with unsafe abortion practices. In countries where abortion services are not so restricted, IPAS works to improve access to safe abortion services.

The International Women's Health Coalition (IWHC) is a private, non-profit organization, based in New York City. Founded in 1980, IWHC promotes improvement in women's reproductive health in the Third World. IWHC supports innovative health care projects, policy-oriented field research, and public education, through 35 projects in 11 countries. IWHC also serves as an advocate for U.S. and International population and health policies and programs to insure that women can exercise their internationally recognized right to control the number and spacing of their children, and that they may have access to the safe abortion services that are essential for the exercise of this right.

Marie Stopes International, founded in 1973, is the largest non-governmental provider of family planning services in Britain, and supports full-service birth control programs in fifteen other countries, including India, Sri Lanka, Indonesia, the Philippines, Bangladesh and Kenya. In all the countries in which it works the organization is deeply concerned with the administrative, legislative and judicial issues that restrict the fundamental human right of the individual to all forms of birth control.

The National Abortion Campaign of Britain is a nationwide, non-partisan, membership organization which seeks to preserve access to safe, legal abortions in Britain. It is based in London, England.

The Pathfinder Fund, founded in 1957 and based in Watertown, Massachusetts, is dedicated to ensuring the availability of family planning services throughout the developing world. Its activities include the development of new service delivery mechanisms, local institution building, training health care providers, and providing contraceptive supplies. In both the United States and overseas, it addresses public policy issues that affect the availability of safe and effective family planning services.

Population Crisis Committee (PCC), based in Washington, D.C., seeks to increase public awareness of the need for the reduction of population growth rates through voluntary family planning. PCC supports privately funded projects in developing countries that provide medical training in the treatment of abortion complications and menstrual regulation procedures. PCC conducts authoritative analyses of U.S. population assistance programs, one of which has been a comprehensive study of the impact of current U.S. abortion restrictions on family planning programs overseas.

The Population Council, an international, nonprofit organization established in 1952, undertakes social and health science programs and research relating to developing countries and conducts biomedical research to develop and improve contraceptive technology. The Council provides advice and technical assistance to governments, international agencies, and nongovernmental organizations, and disseminates information on population issues through publications, conferences, seminars, and workshops. It is based in New York City.

Population Planning Associates (PPA) is a non-profit private voluntary organization which implements family planning programs in developing countries. PPA is dedicated to the furtherance of programs and of policies which advance free choice by private citizens in the area of contraception and reproduction.

Population Services International (PSI) is a non-profit organization that provides contraceptive and health marketing and communications services in several developing countries. As such, it has a particular concern for the limitations that prevent individuals from learning about, or choosing, family planning.

PRETERM Foundation, founded in 1974, provides population control services, research and education. It operates professional clinics providing lawful medical treatments and surgical operations, including termination of pregnancy. It is based in Surry Hills, Australia.

Program for the Introduction and Adaptation of Contraceptive Technology (PIACT) is a non-profit, non-governmental organization whose goal is to improve the effectiveness, safety, availability, and acceptance of reproductive health products and technologies in developing countries. Since its incorporation in 1976, PIACT has managed nearly 100 family planning projects in 30 developing countries. PIACT is particularly interested in projects that contribute to the well-being of both mothers and children. It is based in Seattle, Washington.

TOLERATION is a coalition of organizations and individuals (including the New South Wales Council for Civil Liberties, New South Wales Humanist Society and Women in Education) whose purpose is to promote laws which increase individual freedom of choice. It was founded in 1981 and is based in Glebe, Australia.

Transnational Family Research Institute (TFRI) is a multidisciplinary, nongovernmental, and nonprofit research organization in the behavioral sciences. TFRI develops and conducts research in reproductive behavior, often in cooperation with colleagues abroad. Research interests focus on the behavioral regulation of fertility, motivations for pregnancy resolution, and the decision-making process. TFRI currently has offices in Palo Alto, California; Copenhagen, Denmark; Mexico City, Mexico; and Bangkok, Thailand. Since 1972, the Institute has publisned Abortion Research Notes, reviewing scientific literature related to pregnancy termination.

Women's Abortion Action Campaign, (WAAC) is a national organization based in Sydney, Australia. Since its founding in 1972, WAAC has consistently campaigned for the continued availability of abortion in Australia.

Women's Economic Network (WEN), based in Glebe, Australia, is an organization that shares skills and information to help women achieve economic independence. WEN is concerned that any restriction of the right to seek and obtain medically safe abortion would restrict women's ability to gain economic independence, limiting their life chances in education, training and employment and disadvantaging them socially, economically and psychologically.

Women's Electoral Lobby Australia (WEL Australia), formed in 1972, is a voluntary organization of women committed to the goal of achieving economic, educational and sexual equality for women. It is represented officially at the national level on the National Women's Consultative Council, and on the international level through affiliation with the International Alliance of Women, which has consultative status with the United Nations. WEL Australia is committed to promoting the status of women and regards the right to fertility control, including safe abortion, as fundamental to women's ability to live healthy and meaningful lives.

Women's Global Network on Reproductive Rights (WGNRR) is an autonomous network of groups and individuals in 90 countries who are working for women's rights to decide whether, when, and how to have children. Based in Amsterdam, the Netherlands, WGNRR is in the midst of an international campaign for the prevention of maternal mortality and morbidity, much of which is caused by the inevitable complications and deaths resulting from unsafe and clandestine abortion.

Individual Amici

Peter John Bayliss
Director
Fertility Control Clinic
Queensland, Australia

Etienne Emil Baulieu
Professor, Faculté de Médecine
Université de Paris
Member of French Academy of Sciences
Kremelin-Bicetre, France

Marc Bygeman, MD
Professor, Dept. of Obstetrics and Gynecology
Karolinska Hospital
Stockholm, Sweden

Senator Irina Dunn
Australian Federal Parliament
Canberra, Australia

Arvonne Fraser
Senior Fellow
Humphrey Institute of Public Affairs
Minneapolis, MN

Renee J. Holt, RN, JD, MPH
Staff Attorney
Development Law & Policy Program and
Assistant Professor of Clinical Public Health
Columbia University
New York, N.Y.

Stephen L. Isaacs, JD.
Director
Development Law & Policy Program and
Professor of Public Health
Columbia University
New York, N.Y.

Sir Malcolm MacNaughton
Professor of Obstetrics and Gynecology
Royal Infirmary
Glasgow, Scotland

Deborah Maine, MPH
Associate Research Scientist
Center for Population and Family Health
New York, N.Y.

James McCarthy, Ph.D.
Director
Center for Population and Family Health
Columbia University
New York, N.Y.

Stefania Siediecky
Retired Medical Practitioner
Previous Advisor to Australian Government on Family Planning and Women's Health (1974-1986)
Consultant to UNFPA
Member, Family Planning Association of New South Wales, Australia
Sydney, New South Wales
Australia

Patricia van der Esch-Mitchell
The Religious Society of Friends
Brussels, Belgium

Joe Wray, M.D.
Professor
Columbia University School of Public Health
New York, N.Y.

Diana Wyndham
Board, Family Planning Association of New South Wales
McMahons Point
New South Wales, Australia

AMICUS CURIAE

BRIEF

FILED
MAR 30 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

No. 88-605

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,
Appellants,

v.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,
Appellees.

On Appeal from the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit

---

BRIEF OF THE AMERICAN NURSES' ASSOCIATION AND THE NURSES' ASSOCIATION OF THE AMERICAN COLLEGE OF OBSTETRICIANS AND GYNECOLOGISTS AS AMICI CURIAE IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEES

E. CALVIN GOLUMBIC *
SUSAN HARRIS
NANCY S. HEERMANS

ARENT, FOX, KINTNER, PLOTKIN & KAHN
1050 Connecticut Avenue, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20036-5339
(202) 857-6000

Counsel for Amici Curiae American Nurses' Association and Nurses' Association of the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists

* Counsel of Record

Dated: March 30, 1989

WILSON - EPES PRINTING CO., INC. - 789-0096 - WASHINGTON, D.C. 20001

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Page
TABLE OF AUTHORITIES	ii
INTEREST OF THE AMICI CURIAE	1
SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT	2
ARGUMENT	3
I. THE MISSOURI STATUTE'S BAN ON THE USE OF PUBLIC FUNDS FOR THE PURPOSE OF COUNSELING 'A WOMAN TO HAVE AN ABORTION NOT NECESSARY TO SAVE HER LIFE VIOLATES THE CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS OF HEALTH CARE PROVIDERS AND THEIR CLIENTS	3
A. Health Care Providers Have A Constitutionally-Protected Right To Fully And Freely Inform Clients Of Available Health Care Options	3
B. Health Care Clients Have A Constitutionally-Protected Right To Receive Complete And Accurate Information About All Available Health Care Options	6
II. THE MISSOURI STATUTE'S LIMITATIONS ON THE PERFORMANCE OF ABORTIONS BY PUBLIC EMPLOYEES AND ON THE USE OF PUBLIC FACILITIES THEREFOR CREATE UNCONSTITUTIONAL BARRIERS TO A WOMAN'S RIGHT TO TERMINATE HER PREGNANCY FOR MEDICAL REASONS	8
CONCLUSION	10

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

CASES	Page
Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983)	4, 5, 9
Baggett v. Bullitt, 377 U.S. 360 (1964)	6
Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379 (1979)	9
Cramp v. Board of Public Instruction, 368 U.S. 278 (1961)	6
Keyishian v. Board of Regents, 385 U.S. 589 (1967)	4
Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563 (1968)	4
Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976)	7
Reproductive Health Services v. Webster, 851 F.2d 1071 (8th Cir. 1988)	4, 6, 8
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)	8
Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986)	4, 5, 9
STATUTES
Mo. Rev. Stat.
§ 188.205 (1986)	3
§ 188.210 (1986)	8
§ 188.215 (1986)	8
MISCELLANEOUS
American Nurses' Association, Code for Nurses With Interpretive Statements (1985)	6, 7

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

No. 88-605

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,
Appellants,
v.
REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,
Appellees.

On Appeal from the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit

BRIEF OF THE AMERICAN NURSES' ASSOCIATION AND THE NURSES' ASSOCIATION OF THE AMERICAN COLLEGE OF OBSTETRICIANS AND GYNECOLOGISTS AS AMICI CURIAE IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEES

INTEREST OF THE AMICI CURIAE

Amici curiae are the American Nurses' Association ("ANA") and the Nurses' Association of the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, also known as NAAGOG: the Organization for Obstetric, Gynecologic and Neonatal Nurses ("NAACOG"). The ANA is an association of registered nurses that is dedicated to the advancement of the goals and interests of registered nurses and of the nursing profession generally. Founded in 1897, the ANA is comprised of fifty-three constituent member organizations. NAACOG is a 22,000-member professional organization for nurses who provide health care for women and infants. Founded in 1969, NAACOG's purpose is to establish relevant nursing standards and to assist its members in supplying the highest quality nursing care to their clients.

Registered nurses constitute the largest group of health care providers in this country; there presently are approximately two million registered nurses in the United States. The role of the registered nurse in providing professional care includes the responsibility of furnishing information and assistance to clients to enable them to make informed decisions regarding their health care. These responsibilities are incumbent upon the registered nurse regardless of the social or economic status, life style or individual value system of the clients involved or the nature of their health problems.

The ANA's and NAACOG's interest in the instant case is related to the unique role of registered nurses in the provision of health care. In order to fulfill nurses' responsibilities to their clients, to their profession, to society and to themselves, they must have the freedom to speak to clients freely and openly about the full range of available health care options, as well as the potential benefits and risks inherent in those options, given the clients' circumstances. Concomitantly, clients must be given all the relevant information necessary for them to make fully-informed decisions regarding their health care. Finally, ANA and NAACOG are committed to the principle that all persons have the right to reasonable access to health care. Because amici herein believe that the Missouri statute in issue in this case infringes on these inalienable rights, they are submitting this brief to the Court as amici curiae in support of Appellees.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The State of Missouri has enacted a law proscribing the use of public funds to, among other things, counsel a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life. As the court of appeals held, that provision is unconstitutionally vague because the line between permitted discussion and prohibited counseling is not clear. Further, the Missouri law effectively precludes all public health care providers, including registered nurses, from fulfilling their professional obligations and exercising their constitutional rights to speak freely and openly to clients about their health care.

The same provision violates the clients' rights under the Fourteenth Amendment to obtain full and complete information about all available health care options. All persons, including pregnant women, have an alienable right to make a fully-informed choice about their health care in conjunction with confidential, unfettered communications with their providers.

The Missouri statute also limits the performance of abortions by public employees and on the use of public facilities therefor except where necessary to save the life of the mother. In doing so, the state has, through legislative fiat, subordinated the health of mothers to potential fetal life, thereby creating unconstitutional barriers to a woman's right to terminate her pregnancy for medical reasons.

ARGUMENT

I. THE MISSOURI STATUTE'S BAN ON THE USE OF PUBLIC FUNDS FOR THE PURPOSE OF COUNSELING A WOMAN TO HAVE AN ABORTION NOT NECESSARY TO SAVE HER LIFE VIOLATES THE CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS OF HEALTH CARE PROVIDERS AND THEIR CLIENTS.

A. Health Care Providers Have A Constitutionally-Protected Right To Fully And Freely Inform Clients Of Available Health Care Options.

Section 188.205 of the Revised Statutes of Missouri provides in part that "[i]t shall be unlawful for any public funds to be expended . . . for the purpose of . . . counseling a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life." MO. REV. STAT. § 188.205 (1986).

The United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit held this provision to be unconstitutionally vague, because, inter alia, health care providers could be "chilled into avoiding even speech that is normally afforded the utmost protection under the Constitution." Reproductive Health Services v. Webster, 851 F.2d 1071, 1078 (8th Cir. 1988) (footnote omitted). That conclusion is undoubtedly correct.

Public employees do not, by virtue of their employment alone, forfeit all of their constitutional rights to freedom of speech. See, e.g., Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563 (1968); Keyishian v. Board of Regents, 385 U.S. 589 (1967). In no area is this right of free speech more fundamental and more worthy of protection than in the area of personal and confidential communications between health care providers and their clients. Without the provider's ability to speak to the client freely and openly about all available health care options, as well as their ramifications, the care rendered would be ineffective and inadequate.

This Court has repeatedly recognized and protected the communications between physician and patient concerning the possible termination of a pregnancy. In Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416, 443 (1983), for example, the Court stated that, in exploring the possibility of terminating a pregnancy, "[i]t remains primarily the responsibility of the physician to ensure that appropriate information is conveyed to his patient, depending on her particular circumstances." Similarly, the importance of fostering open dialogue between physician and patient, and ensuring that physicians can exercise their discretion and professional judgment, was specifically protected in the same context by this Court in Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747, 762-63 (1986).

Those protections accorded the physician-patient relationship by this Court are equally critical to the confidential relationship between nurses and clients and to nurses' fulfillment of their professional responsibilities. A crucial element of a nurse's relationship with all clients, including a pregnant woman, involves the disclosure of all relevant information and the exploration of every medical option, given the state of the client's individual health. Indeed, often a client relies primarily on the nurse for this facet of her health care. In fact, this Court has recognized that health care providers other than physicians often are responsible for much of the counseling and advice given to clients. See Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. at 447-49.

Neither physicians nor nurses can render effective health care while saddled with the limitations contained in Section 188.205 of the Missouri statute. The effect of that provision is to prohibit health care professionals from informing pregnant women of one option that may be significant to preserving their health—that of terminating their pregnancy. Not only is that prohibition professionally unethical, it is clinically inadequate and constitutes a denial of the provider's right to free speech in a context no different from the one recognized by this Court in Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. at 444, and Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. at 762-63.

Moreover, the point at which information supplied by the health care provider constitutes "counseling," within the meaning of Section 188.205, is neither readily discernible nor capable of a bright-line distinction. And, as this Court has stated in this regard:

> 'The vice of unconstitutional vagueness is further aggravated where, as here, the statute in question op> erates to inhibit the exercise of individual freedoms affirmatively protected by the Constitution.' . . . We are dealing with indefinite statutes whose terms, even narrowly construed, abut upon sensitive areas of basic First Amendment freedoms.

Baggett v. Bullitt, 377 U.S. 360, 372 (1964) (quoting Cramp v. Board of Public Instruction, 368 U.S. 278, 287 (1961)). Accordingly, the court of appeals' decision that Section 188.205 is unconstitutionally vague should be affirmed. In doing so, this Court should also make clear that all health care providers, including nurses, have a constitutionally-protected right to free speech.

B. Health Care Clients Have A Constitutionally-Protected Right To Receive Complete And Accurate Information About All Available Health Care Options.

The Missouri statute's stricture against the use of public funds to counsel a woman to have an abortion in a situation that is not life-threatening not only violates the free speech rights of health care providers, it also violates the clients' constitutional right to receive information essential to an informed decision about their health care. Recognizing that right, the court of appeals concluded that "[w]e can perceive of few obstacles more burdensome to the right to decide [whether to terminate a pregnancy] than a state-imposed blackout on the information necessary to make a decision." Reproductive Health Services v. Webster, 851 F.2d at 1080. ANA and NAACOG agree with the court's conclusion.

ANA's Code for Nurses with Interpretive Statements (1985) (pp. 2-3) is premised on "[t]he fundamental principle of . . . respect for the inherent dignity and worth of every client," regardless of the nature of the client's health problem. To that end, registered nurses are committed to the concept that:

> Truth telling and the process of reaching informed choice underlie the exercise of self-determination, which is basic to respect for persons. Clients should be as fully involved as possible in the planning and implementation of their own health care. Clients have the moral right to determine what will be done with their own person; to be given accurate information, and all the information necessary for making informed judgments; to be assisted with weighing the benefits and burdens of options in their treatment; to accept, refuse, or terminate treatment without coercion; and to be given necessary emotional support.

ANA's Code for Nurses, p. 2.

Every person seeking health care has the right to receive complete and accurate information from the provider about all available medical options in order to make a rational and informed decision about his alternatives. This right extends equally to women who are pregnant and who must decide whether to exercise their option to terminate that pregnancy. As this Court stated in Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52, 67 (1976), "it is desirable and imperative that it [the decision to abort] be made with full knowledge of its nature and consequences."

Section 138.205 of the Missouri statute effectively precludes pregnant women who, through necessity or otherwise, rely on public health care providers from being able to make a truly informed decision about their health care for the simple reason that one option, abortion, cannot be fully explored and discussed. The court of appeals decided that this result was contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. For the reasons set forth herein, that decision should be sustained.

II. THE MISSOURI STATUTE'S LIMITATIONS ON THE PERFORMANCE OF ABORTIONS BY PUBLIC EMPLOYEES AND ON THE USE OF PUBLIC FACILITIES THEREFOR CREATE UNCONSTITUTIONAL BARRIERS TO A WOMAN'S RIGHT TO TERMINATE HER PREGNANCY FOR MEDICAL REASONS.

Section 188.210 of the Missouri Statute states in part that "[i]t shall be unlawful for any public employee within the scope of his employment to perform or assist an abortion, not necessary to save the life of the mother." MO. REV. STAT. § 188.210 (1986). Similarly, Section 188.215 provides that "[i]t shall be unlawful for any public facility to be used for the purpose of performing or assisting an abortion not necessary to save the life of the mother . . . ." MO. REV. STAT. § 188.215 (1986). Thus, Missouri has prohibited all abortions in public facilities and by public employees except in those very limited situations where it is necessary to save the life of the mother As the court of appeals correctly found, such limitations, which effectively bar public access to abortions by women who may need to terminate their pregnancies in order to preserve their health, are unconstitutional because they constitute "unduly burdensome state interference with their [women's] right to decide . . . ." Reproductive Health Services v. Webster, 851 F.2d at 1083. Amici herein agree.

In doing so, the ANA and NAACOG do not contest the legitimacy of Missouri's interest in protecting potential fetal life. As this Court has recognized, however, that interest cannot be elevated, by legislative fiat, over at least equally-important concerns regarding the health of the mother: "If the State is interested in protecting fetal life after viability, it may go so far as to proscribe abortion during that period, except when it is necessary to preserve the life or health of the mother." Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 163-64 (1973) (emphasis added). See also Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. at 768-69; Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379, 400 (1979). Here, the state has subordinated the health of the mother in all situations that are not life-threatening, without consideration of the individual circumstances involved. This it cannot do.

All people, including pregnant women, must be free to exercise their constitutionally-protected right to make and effectuate choices affecting their health. Sometimes health considerations dictate, for any number of reasons, the decision to terminate a pregnancy. As difficult as that decision may be, a state may not impose impermissible barriers to a woman's right to make it and have it implemented in order to preserve her health. See Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. at 387.

By prohibiting the use of public facilities and the participation of public employees in all abortions except those necessary to save the life of the mother, Missouri has created unconstitutional obstacles to the right of a great number of women to terminate their pregnancies in order to preserve their health. This, as the court of appeals properly found, it cannot do. See Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. at 768-69 (Court agreed that abortion-related restriction "was unconstitutional because it required a 'trade-off' between a woman's health and fetal survival . . ."); Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. at 427 ("restrictive state regulation of the right to choose abortion, as with other fundamental rights subject to searching judicial examination, must be supported by a compelling state interest"). Accordingly, the court of appeals' decision in this regard should be affirmed.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated, it is respectfully submitted that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

Respectfully submitted,

E. CALVIN GOLUMBIC *
SUSAN HARRIS
NANCY S. HEERMANS

ARENT, FOX, KINTNER, PLOTKIN
& KAHN
1050 Connecticut Avenue, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20036-5339
(202) 857-6000

Counsel for Amici Curiae
American Nurses' Association and Nurses' Association of the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists

Dated: March 30, 1989

* Counsel of Record

AMICUS CURIAE

BRIEF

No. 88-605

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
MAR 30 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,

Appellants,

vs.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,

Appellees.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS
FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT

BRIEF OF THE ATTORNEYS GENERAL OF THE STATES OF CALIFORNIA, COLORADO, MASSACHUSETTS, NEW YORK, TEXAS, VERMONT AND [redacted] AS AMICI CURIAE IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEES

JAMES M. SHANNON
Attorney General of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts
One Ashburton Place
Boston, Massachusetts 02108
(617) 727-2200

SUZANNE E. DURRELL
MADELYN F. WESSEL
Assistant Attorneys General

ROBERT ABRAMS
Attorney General of the State of New York
120 Broadway
New York, New York 10271
(212) 341-2242

O. PETER SHERWOOD
Solicitor General

SUZANNE M. LYNN
MARLA TEPPER
Assistant Attorneys General

(For Further Appearances See Inside Cover)

JOHN VAN DE KAMP
Attorney General of California
1515 K Street, Suite 638
Sacramento, California 95814
(916) 445-9555

DUANE WOODARD
Attorney General of Colorado
1525 Sherman Street
Second Floor
Denver, Colorado 80203
(303) 866-5005

JIM MATTOX
Attorney General of Texas
Capitol Station, P.O. Box 12548
Austin, Texas 78711
(512) 463-2100

JEFFREY L. AMESTOY
Attorney General of Vermont
Pavilion Office Building
Montpelier, Vermont 05602
(802) 828-3171

[redacted]

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Page
INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE	1
SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT	3
ARGUMENT	4
I. NO CIRCUMSTANCES JUSTIFY REEXAMINING ROE V. WADE	4
II. COURTS, NOT STATE LEGISLATURES, ARE THE PROPER ARBITERS OF WOMEN'S FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS AND THE STATE'S COMPELLING INTERESTS.	9
III. A REVERSAL OR MODIFICATION OF ROE V. WADE WOULD JEOPARDIZE THE PUBLIC HEALTH, SAFETY AND WELFARE AND UNDERMINE STATE LAW ENFORCEMENT EFFORTS	13
A. Health Consequences of a Reversal of Roe v. Wade	13
1. States Where Abortion Remains Legal Can Expect An Influx of Out-of-State Residents Seeking Medical Services	15
2. The Burden on Health Care Systems	16
3. The Increased Burden on Enforcement and Regulatory Agencies	17
B. The Burden On Law Enforcement Will Also Increase Where Abortion is Prohibited	21
CONCLUSION	24

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

	Page
Aradia Women's Health Center v. Operation Rescue, No. C88-1539R (W.D. Wash. Jan. 10, 1989)	20
Arizona v. Rumsey, 467 U.S. 203 (1984)	5
Beal v. Doe, 432 U.S. 438 (1977)	4
Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622 (1979)	4
Bering v. Share, 106 Wash. 2d 212, 721 P.2d (1986), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1050 (1987)	20
Bd. of Educ. v. Pico, 457 U.S. 853 (1982)	11
Brown v. Bd. of Educ., 347 U.S. 483 (1954)	11
Brown v. Bd. of Educ., 349 U.S. 294 (1955)	8
Carey v. Population Serv. Int'l, 431 U.S. 688 (1977)	4
City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416 (1983)	4, 8, 17
Clinic for Women, Inc. v. Citizens for Life, No. C83-2657 (Cir. Ct., Indiana, Marion Cty., August 31, 1984)	20
Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379 (1979)	4
Connecticut v. Menillo, 423 U.S. 9 (1975)	4
Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1 (1958)	9
Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179 (1973)	6, 16, 17
Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972)	6

	Page
Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968)	11
Fargo Women's Health Org., Inc. v. Larson, 381 N.W. 2d 176 (N.D.), aff'd, 391 N.W. 2d 627 (N.D.), cert. denied, 476 U.S. 1108 (1986)	19
Finkel v. Birthright Center, No. C-3266-83 (Super. Ct., N.J. Aug. 21, 1985)	20
Florida Dep't of Health v. Florida Nursing Homes Ass'n, 450 U.S. 147 (1981)	5, 8
Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)	11
Garcia v. San Antonio Metro. Transit Auth., 469 U.S. 528 (1985)	5, 9, 10, 12
Green v. United States, 355 U.S. 184 (1957)	5
Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)	6
Guardianship of Roe, 383 Mass. 415, 421 N.E.2d 40 (1981)	7
Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980)	4, 17
H.L. v. Matheson, 450 U.S. 398 (1981)	4
In Re Quinlan, 70 N.J. 10, 355 A.2d 647, cert. denied, 429 U.S. 922 (1976)	7
Kugler v. Ryan, 682 S.W. 2d 47 (Mo. App. 1984)	20
Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)	11
Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977)	4
Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137 (1803)	9

	Page
Massachusetts v. Bowen, No. 88-1279 (1st Cir. argued July 28, 1988)	2
Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923)	6, 11
Milliken v. Bradley, 418 U.S. 717 (1974)	11
Moe v. Sec'y of Admin. & Fin., 382 Mass. 629, 417 N.E. 2d 387 (1981)	13, 16
Moragne v. States Marine Lines, 398 U.S. 375 (1970)	4
Moyal v. Thompkins, No. 278465 (Super. Ct. Cal. May 16, 1986)	20
Nat'l Abortion Fed'n, v. Operation Rescue, No. 89-1189 AWT (BX) (C.D. Cal. March 15, 1989)	20
New State Ice Co. v. Liebmann, 285 U.S. 262 (1932)	12
New York v. Bowen, No. 88-701 (2d Cir. argued Jan. 4, 1989)	2
New York State Nat'l Org. for Women v. Terry, 88 Civ. 3071 (S.D.N.Y. 1989) (1989 WL 5742)	20
Oakland Feminist Women's Health Center v. Thompkins, No. 276031 (Super. Ct. Cal. Aug. 16, 1985)	20
O.B.G.Y.N. Ass'n v. Birthright of Brooklyn & Queens, Inc., 64 A.D. 2d 894, 407 N.Y.S. 2d 903 (2d Dept. 1978)	20
Oregon v. Kennedy, 456 U.S. 667 (1982)	5

	Page
Parkmed Co. v. Pro-Life Counseling, 91 A.D.2d 551, 457 N.Y.S.2d 27 (1st Dept. 1982)	20
People v. Barksdale, 8 Cal. 3d 320, 503 P.2d 257 (1972)	14
People v. Belous, 71 Cal. 2d 954, 458 P.2d 194 (1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 915 (1970)	14
Phonetele v. AT&T, 664 F. 2d 716 (9th Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1145 (1983)	5
Planned Parenthood v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976)	4
Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497 (1961)	6
Reeves, Inc. v. Stake, 447 U.S. 429 (1980)	12
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)	passim
Rogers v. Okin, 478 F. Supp. 1342 (D. Mass.) aff'd in part, rev'd in part, vacated in part, 634 F.2d 650 (1st Cir. 1980) remanded sub nom. Mills v. Rogers, 457 U.S. 29 (1982), certified questions answered sub nom. Rogers v. Comm'r of Mental Health, 390 Mass. 489, 458 N.E.2d 308 (1983), remanded, Rogers v. Okin, 738 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1984)	7
Schulman v. New York City Health & Hosp. Corp., 38 N.Y. 2d 234, 342 N.E.2d 501 (1975)	20
Simopoulos v. Virginia, 462 U.S. 506 (1983)	4
Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942)	12

	Page
State v. Abortion Info. Agency, Inc., 69 Misc. 2d 825 (Sup. Ct. N.Y. Co. 1971), aff'd, 37 A.D. 2d 144 (1st Dept. 1971), aff'd, 30 N.Y. 2d 779, 285 N.E.2d 317 (1972)	18
Superintendent of Belchertown v. Saikewicz, 373 Mass. 728, 370 N.E.2d 417 (1977)	7
Thornburgh v. Am. College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986)	passim
United States v. Carolene Prod. Co., 304 U.S. 144 (1938)	11
Vasquez v. Hillery, 474 U.S. 254 (1986)	5
Westchester Women's Health Org. v. Whalen, 475 F. Supp. 734 (S.D.N.Y. 1979)	20
West Virginia Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)	8, 9, 10, 11
CONSTITUTION, STATUTES AND REGULATIONS
U.S. Const. Amend. I	11
U.S. Const. Amend. V	passim
U.S. Const. Amend VIII	11
U.S. Const. Amend. XIV	passim
Public Health Service Act of 1970, Title X, 42 U.S.C. 300, et seq.	2
Mo. Stat. § 188.205 (Vernon Supp. 1989)	2

Page

N.Y. Penal Law § 125.05(3) (McKinney 1987) ... 11, 15

OTHER SOURCES

Abortion Clinics Find Insurance Difficult to Obtain, Am. Bus. News, Feb. 8, 1985, at 20, col. 1 21

Alan Guttmacher Institute, Abortion Services in the United States, Each State and Metropolitan Area, 1984-1985 (S. Henshaw, J. Van Vort, eds. 1988) 16

Alan Guttmacher Institute, Safe and Legal: 10 Years' Experience with Legal Abortion in New York State (S. Henshaw, J. Van Vort, eds. 1980) 14, 17

Bus. Ins., Jan. 21, 1985, at 3, col. 2 21

Centers For Disease Control, Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report, vol. 37, no. 47, "Abortion Surveillance: Preliminary Analysis–United States, 1984, 1985" (Nov. 25, 1988), U.S. Dep't. of Health & Human Serv./ Pub. Health Serv. HHS Pub. No. (CDC) 89-8017 ... 14, 16

Constitutional Aspects of the Right to Limit Childbearing, A Report of the United States Comm'r on Civil Rights (April 1975) 22

N. Davis, From Crime to Choice: The Transformation of Abortion in America (1985) . 20

Edmiston, Report on the Abortion Capital of the Country: New York City, N.Y. Times, Apr. 11, 1971 (Magazine), at 11 ..... 18, 19

Page

The Federalist No. 51, (J. Madison) (Mentor ed. 1961) 9

Fineman, Book Review, 55 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1431 (1988) 10

F. Frankfurter, J. Landis, The Business of Supreme Court: A Study in the Federal Judicial System 65 (1927) 9

M.A. Glendon, Abortion and Divorce In Western Law; American Failures, European Challenges (1987) 10, 21

Governor's Veto Messages (1972), reprinted in N.Y.S. Legis. Annual–1972 12

Grimes, Second Trimester Abortions in the United States, 16 Fam. Plan. Persp. 260 (Nov./Dec. 1984) 17

Harris, O'Hare, Patker, Nielson, Legal Abortion 1970–1971–the New York City Experience, 63 Am. J. Pub. Health 409 (1973) 16

Henshaw, Forrest, Blaine, Abortion Services in the United States, 1981-1982, 16 Fam. Plan. Persp. 119 (May/June 1984) 17

Henshaw, Forrest, Van Vort, Abortion Services in the United States, 1984 and 1985, 19 Fam. Plan. Persp. 63 (Mar./Apr. 1987) 17, 19

Howard, Garcia and the Values of Federalism: On the Need for a Recurrence to Fundamental Principles, 19 Geo. L. Rev. 789 (1985) 10

L. Lader, Abortion II: Making the Revolution (1973) 18

	Page
Lebolt, Grimes, Cates. Mortality From Abortion and Childbirth, 248 J. A.M.A. 188 (July 9, 1982)	14
J. Legge, Abortion Policy: An Evaluation of the Consequences for Maternal and Infant Health (1985)	13, 14, 16, 17
Levane, The Birth of American Alcohol Control: Prohibition, the Power Elite, and the Problem of Lawlessness, 12 Cont. Drug Problems 63 (Spring 1985)	23
A. Morton, Enemies of Choice: The Right to Life Movement and its Threat to Abortion (1981)	18
Nat'l Comm'n on Law Observance and Enforcement, Report on the Enforcement of the Prohibition Laws of the United States, no. 722, 71st Cong., 1st Sess. (Jan. 7, 1931)	23
Newsweek, July 19, 1971, at 51	18
N.Y. Times, Sept. 29, 1988, § B at 11, cols. 4-5	22
N.Y. Times, Oct. 6, 1988, § B, at 18, col. 1	16
N.Y. Times, Feb. 10, 1971, at 45, col. 1	18
Patker, O'Hare, Nielson, Suigir, Two Years' Experience in New York City with the Liberalized Abortion Law – Progress and Problems, 63 Am. J. Pub. Health 524 (1973)	15, 16, 19
The President's Comm'n on Law Enforcement & Admn. of Justice, Task Force Report: The Courts (1967)	14, 21, 22, 23

	Page
R. Riddick, Making Choices: The Abortion Experience of Irish Women (1988)	15, 16
Schur, Crimes Without Victims (1965)	22
Schwartz, Morals Offenses and the Model Penal Code 63 Colum. L. Rev. 682 (1963)	21
Torres, Forrest, Why Do Women Have Abortions? 20 Fam. Plan. Persp. 169 (July/Aug. 1988)	17
Wessel, Segal, Book Review, 8 Prob. L.J. 349 (1988)	10, 21
J. Wilson, R. Carrington, E. Reid, Obstetrics and Gynecology (8th ed.1987)	17
H. Ziff, Recent Abortion Law Reforms (Or Much Ado About Nothing), 60 J. Crim. L. and Criminology and Police Sci. 3 (1969)	14, 15, 21, 22, 23

No. 88-605

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,

Appellants,

vs.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,

Appellees.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS
FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT

BRIEF OF THE ATTORNEYS GENERAL OF THE STATES OF CALIFORNIA, COLORADO, MASSACHUSETTS, NEW YORK, TEXAS VERMONT AND [redacted] AS AMICI CURIAE IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEES

INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE

The Attorneys General of California, Colorado, Massachusetts, New York, Texas, Vermont and [redacted] submit this brief as amici curiae in support of appellees Reproductive Health Services, et al. They respond to appellants William Webster, et al., and amicus curiae Solicitor General of the United States, who request this Court to overrule or to radically modify Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973). Amici Attorneys General urge this Court not to reexamine Roe or, in the alternative, to reaffirm Roe as striking a proper balance between the fundamental constitutional privacy right of a woman to decide whether or not to bear a child and the state's compelling interests.

As the chief law enforcement officers of their respective states, and as representatives of state government, amici are charged with a number of duties and responsibilities which bear on the question presented. These include: (1) protecting the fundamental individual rights and liberties of the people of their state under the federal and state constitutions; (2) protecting the state's sovereign interests and role in our constitutional system; (3) protecting the health, safety and well-being of the people of their state; (4) enforcing state criminal and civil laws, including those that may regulate abortion; (5) enforcing state regulatory schemes involving health care and consumer protection; and (6) advising other branches of state government on the legality of state regulation of abortion, and defending any such regulation under Roe and its progeny.

Amici have a strong interest in the doctrine of stare decisis. It ensures stability in the law, prevents the relitigation of issues, and infuses citizens with confidence that laws will be interpreted and applied fairly, consistently, and objectively.

Amici also have a fundamental interest in protecting the most basic tenets of our constitutional form of government, namely, the reservation of certain powers and rights to the individual free from infringement by either the state or the national government, the allocation of powers not so reserved between the state and national governments, and the separation of powers among branches of government.

Because of their roles and responsibilities, amici believe they are compelled, and uniquely qualified, to address the question presented.[1]

---

[1] Because of their involvement in two lower court cases challenging the validity of certain federal regulations promulgated under Title X of the Public Health Service Act of 1970, 42 U.S.C. 300, et seq., amici Attorneys General of New York and Massachusetts, like the Solicitor General, also have an interest in the challenge to that part of the Missouri statute that forbids the expenditure of public funds "for the purpose of encouraging or counselling a women to have an abortion not necessary to save her life." Mo. Stat. § 188.205 (Vernon Supp. 1989). Solicitor General's Brief at 1-2, 25-29 [hereinafter S.G. Br.]. See Massachusetts v. Bowen, No. 88-1279 (1st Cir. argued July 28, 1988); New York v. Bowen, No. 88-701 (2nd Cir. argued Jan. 4, 1989). That issue is not addressed in this brief, however, because separate amici curiae briefs on the public funding issue are being submitted

(Footnote continued)

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

In Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, this Court properly recognized that a woman's decision whether to bear a child is encompassed in the fundamental constitutional right to privacy. For the past sixteen years, the states and countless individuals have relied on the rights secured by Roe and its progeny in structuring their affairs and lives. There have been no changes in the law or society to justify a reexamination of Roe. Roe established a predictable, workable framework within which abortion regulations may be reviewed by the courts. An overturning of Roe, or the substitution of a more deferential "rational basis" or "undue burden" standard will not end the abortion debate, but simply create new problems.

In our system of government, it is the courts and not the state legislatures that are the proper arbiters of individual rights and liberties. Fundamental rights cannot be left to the vagaries of public opinion. While federalism is a cornerstone of our constitutional system, states may not experiment with rights that are so central to the personality and dignity of the individual as the right to choose whether to bear a child.

Retreating from Roe and permitting the states to determine the parameters of the right to choose abortion will significantly jeopardize the public health and welfare. Experience shows that women seek abortion in substantial numbers regardless of the state of the law, exposing themselves to great risk in the process. A recriminalization of abortion will thus drive abortion back underground, resulting in an increase in maternal mortality and morbidity and an overburdening of state health care systems.

Allowing states to recriminalize abortion will also undermine law enforcement efforts, since such laws are extremely difficult to enforce and will divert resources from protecting the public from other crimes. History teaches that the attempt to enforce unpopular laws which are widely disobeyed only undermines the integrity of the criminal justice system.

---

by the Amer. Civil Liberties Union and the Nat'l Ass'n of Pub. Hosps., among others, in support of the appellees.

ARGUMENT

I. NO CIRCUMSTANCES JUSTIFY REEXAMINING ROE v. WADE.

Sixteen years ago the Court held that the constitutional right of personal privacy recognized in a line of cases beginning at least fifty years before, "is broad enough to encompass a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy." Roe, 410 U.S. at 153. The Court reached its decision after considering the case with " special care"; the case was briefed and argued one term, and then reargued with extensive briefing (including by a variety of amici curiae) the following term. See City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416, 420 n.1 (1983) ("Akron"). The Court has adhered to the principle announced in Roe in a multitude of cases in the ensuing years.[2]

The consistency with which this Court and lower courts have followed Roe reflects the extent to which the right to privacy in procreative choice has become an integral part of the law, and of the lives, affairs, and expectations of individuals in our society. Twice before within the last six years, this Court has been asked to reexamine and overrule Roe. Both times this Court rightly has refused to do so, citing "especially compelling reasons for adhering to stare decisis in applying the principles of Roe v. Wade." Akron, 462 U.S. at 420 n.1. See also Thornburgh, 476 U.S. at 759. The Court again should refuse to reexamine Roe.

"Very weighty considerations underlie the principle that courts should not lightly overrule past decisions." Moragne v. States Marine Lines, 398 U.S. 375, 403 (1970). The principle > ensure[s] that the law will not merely change erratically, but will develop in a principled and intelligible fashion.

[2] See Thornburgh v. Am. College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986) ("Thornburgh"); Akron, 462 U.S. 416 (1983); Simopoulos v. Virginia, 462 U.S. 506 (1983); H.L. v. Matheson, 450 U.S. 398 (1981); Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980); Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622 (1979); Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379 (1979); Carey v. Population Serv. Int'l, 431 U.S. 678 (1977); Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977); Beal v. Doe, 432 U.S. 438 (1977); Bellotti v. Baird, 428 U.S. 132 (1976); Planned Parenthood v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976); Connecticut v. Menillo, 423 U.S. 9 (1975).

> [It] permits society to presume that bedrock principles are founded in the law rather than in the proclivities of individuals, and thereby contributes to the integrity of our constitutional system of government, both in appearance and in fact.

Vasquez v. Hillery, 474 U.S. 254, 265-66 (1986) ("Vasquez"). See also Phonetele v. AT&T, 664 F.2d 716, 753 (9th Cir. 1981) (Kennedy, J., dissenting), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1145 (1983) ("[W]e are first and foremost a nation of laws and the principle of stare decisis is the single most important key to the cohesiveness of our society"). Adhering to stare decisis makes it possible for citizens to "have confidence that the rules on which they rely in ordering their affairs ... are rules of law and not merely the opinions of a small group of men who temporarily occupy high office." Florida Dep't of Health v. Florida Nursing Homes Ass'n, 450 U.S. 147, 154 (1981) (Stevens, J., concurring). Respect for this Court's judgments depends as much upon the perception that they are the products of impartial decisionmaking as that they are right. See Oregon v. Kennedy, 456 U.S. 667, 691-92 n.34 (1982) (Stevens, J., concurring); Green v. United States, 355 U.S. 184, 215 (1957) (Frankfurter, J., dissenting).

Because of the important values served by stare decisis, a proponent of overruling a constitutional precedent bears "the heavy burden" of showing that "changes in society or in the law dictate that the values served by stare decisis yield in favor of a greater objective." Vasquez, 474 U.S. at 266. Thus, "any departure from the doctrine of stare decisis demands special justification." Arizona v. Rumsey, 467 U.S. 203, 212 (1984).

The Court has identified a number of circumstances which can constitute "special justification". Among these are that the precedent is "unsound in principle", that there have been "changes in society or in the law", that the precedent is "unworkable in practice" and has led to inconsistent, unforeseen or anomalous results, or that it "disserves principles of democratic self-governance." See Garcia v. San Antonio Metro. Transit Auth., 469 U.S. 528, 546-47 (1985) ("Garcia"); Vasquez, 474 U.S. at 266.

Roe is not unsound in principle or an anomaly on the constitutional landscape. Roe falls squarely within this Court's understanding that the liberty secured under the due process clause is a

"continuum which ... includes a freedom from all substantial arbitrary impositions and purposeless restraints." Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497, 543 (1961) (Harlan, J., dissenting). The constitutional terrain occupied by Roe centers on a "zone of privacy created by several fundamental constitutional guarantees," Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 485 (1965), in matters of marital, familial, and personal privacy relating to child rearing, marriage, and procreation. As this Court stated in Thornburgh: "Our cases long have recognized that the Constitution embodies a promise that a certain private sphere of individual liberty will be kept largely beyond the reach of government." 476 U.S. at 772. See also Roe, 410 U.S. at 152-53; Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179, 209-15 (1973) (Douglas, J., concurring); Thornburgh, 476 U.S. at 772-82 (Stevens, J., concurring). The Roe Court carefully considered the constitutional principles involved, the rationales of the many preceding marital, familial, and personal privacy cases, and other factors before it reached its conclusion.[3]

The changes in the law or in society necessary to provide the "special justification" needed to overcome stare decisis are wholly lacking here. To the contrary, Roe is such an integral thread in our legal and social fabric that principles of stare decisis are especially compelling. As noted above, Roe was the logical expression of a solid line of marital, familial, and personal privacy decisions beginning at least fifty years earlier. Moreover, the right to choose abortion has become an important and settled expectation of men and women alike. To overrule Roe now would call into question the entire line of privacy cases, beginning at least with Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923) and extending to Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972), and the parameters of the sphere of "liberty" under the due process clause. The "strong public interest in stability, and in the orderly conduct of our affairs, that is served by a consistent course of constitutional adjudication" would thus be undermined. Thornburgh, 476 U.S. at 780-81 (Stevens, J., concurring).

[3] The Solicitor General argues that Roe represents a radical departure from older, more deeply rooted doctrine, as evidenced by the prevalence of state criminal abortion laws prior to 1973. S.G. Br. at 13. But the fact that a majority of states had criminal abortion laws on the books was addressed in Roe. In its careful analysis of then existing abortion law, the Roe Court concluded that most of these state laws were of relatively recent vintage, i.e. the latter part of the nineteenth century, 410 U.S. at 138-41, and that the primary concern underlying these statutes was not protection of unborn life, but rather protection of the health of the woman. Id. at 151.

Nor does Roe stand alone now. Since Roe, state and federal courts have founded a variety of decisions on Roe's privacy principles, for example, concerning the right to refuse treatment (including antipsychotic medication),[4] and the right to die.[5] These could all be called into question if Roe were overruled.

Roe has proven to be a workable, predictable framework within which governments can regulate abortion and courts can review such regulations.[6] While it is true that Roe has engendered many lawsuits, it is also true that the results have been fairly consistent and uniform. What appellants and the Solicitor General refuse to acknowledge is that the continuing litigation and debate about abortion arises not from any doctrinal or practical weakness in Roe, but rather from disagreement by some with the principle that a woman has a constitutionally protected right to decide whether or not to terminate her pregnancy. But, it "should go without saying that the vitality of these constitutional principles cannot be allowed to yield simply because of disagreement with [4] See, e.g., Rogers v. Okin, 478 F. Supp. 1342, 1366-68 (D. Mass.), aff'd in part, rev'd in part, vacated in part, 634 F. 2d 650 (1st Cir. 1980), remanded sub nom. Mills v. Rogers, 457 U.S. 291 (1982), certified questions answered sub nom. Rogers v. Comm'r of Mental Health, 390 Mass. 489, 458 N.E.2d 308 (1983), remanded, Rogers v. Okin, 738 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1984); Guardianship of Roe, 383 Mass. 415, 433 n.9, 421 N.E.2d 40, 51 n.9 (1981).

[5] See, e.g., In Re Quinlan, 70 N.J. 10, 355 A.2d 647, cert. denied, 429 U.S. 922 (1976); Superintendent of Belchertown v. Saikewicz, 373 Mass. 728, 370 N.E.2d 417, 424 (1977).

[6] Roe held that the woman's privacy right could not be interfered with absent a showing of compelling state interests, and that the regulations are narrowly drawn to serve those interests. 410 U.S. at 155. Those state interests are: (1) protecting the health of the pregnant woman, which does not become compelling until the end of the first trimester of pregnancy; and (2) protecting potential life, which does not become compelling until the fetus is considered by the physician to be viable, which usually occurs around the end of the second trimester. Id. at 162-63. Therefore, until one of these interests becomes operative, a woman, in consultation with her physician, may effectuate her abortion decision free from interference by the state. Id. at 163.

them." Thornburgh, 476 U.S. at 759, quoting Brown v. Bd. of Educ., 349 U.S. 294, 300 (1955).

Neither appellants or the Solicitor General can point to circumstances justifying the adoption of a new standard of review. As discussed in Point III, infra, returning the law to its pre-Roe status would engender a public health and law enforcement crisis. The alternatives proposed by the appellants and the Solicitor General are no better. Downgrading the privacy right recognized in Roe to a mere "species" of liberty protected by the due process clause, and entitled to minimal scrutiny under a rational basis test, would similarly allow states to adopt widely varying laws, with the same ill effects. The adoption of an intermediate test, whether it be the "unduly burdensome" test articulated by Justice O'Connor in her dissenting opinions in Akron, 462 U.S. at 452-66, and Thornburgh, 476 U.S. at 814-33, or the Solicitor General's new "unduly burdensome" standard under which "[t]he relevant question would be whether a woman has been afforded a meaningful opportunity to avoid an unwanted pregnancy, taking into account all of the options available to her, including abstinence and contraception," S.G. Br. at 22 n.16, is similarly unacceptable. Such a test is inherently subjective, necessitating judicial value judgments about whether particular burdens are "undue." Individuals, government, and the medical profession all operate with the benefit of sixteen years of experience under Roe. Far from lessening litigation or dampening the controversy, a new standard would only increase litigation and fuel controversy.

Nor does Roe "disserve principles of democratic self-governance" through judicial usurpation of the role of the state legislatures. E.g., Appellant's Br. at 18; S.G. Br. at 10, 20-24. Rather, as discussed in Point II, infra, Roe is a classic example of the Court fulfilling its "commission" to determine "when liberty is infringed." West Virginia Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 639-40 (1943).

To overrule a decision so frequently reaffirmed, where nothing has changed but the members of the Court, also would undermine the Court's authority and legitimacy. See generally Florida Dep't of Health, 450 U.S. at 154 (Stevens, J., concurring). This is particularly true where the settled expectation of society is that a woman has a constitutional right to decide whether to terminate her pregnancy. Countless individuals and governments have relied upon the rights recognized by Roe and its progeny in ordering their affairs and lives. By overruling or eroding Roe the Court would unnecessarily cause substantial social and institutional injury and chaos and frustrate justified and settled expectations, as discussed in Point III, infra.

II. COURTS, NOT STATE LEGISLATURES, ARE THE PROPER ARBITERS OF WOMEN'S FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS AND THE STATE'S COMPELLING INTERESTS.

Individual liberties, federalism, and separation of powers are the cornerstones of our constitutional system. E.g., The Federalist No. 51, at 323 (J. Madison) (Mentor ed. 1961); Garcia, 469 U.S. at 568-69 (Powell, J., dissenting, joined by Burger, C.J., Rehnquist and O'Connor, JJ.). Appellants and the Solicitor General try to weaken these cornerstones by arguing that the issue of a woman's fundamental right to choose whether to terminate her pregnancy is one of social policy best resolved by the political process of compromise in state legislatures rather than one of balancing competing interests under the federal constitution best resolved by the courts.

The judiciary, not the legislature, is the branch of government that interprets and applies the Constitution. E.g., Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1, 18 (1958); Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137 (1803).[7] The Court's role assures that the most fundamental aspects of people's lives — their personal sovereignty — are not interfered with by legislative bodies. E.g., West Virginia Bd. of Educ., 319 U.S. at 638:

> The very purpose of the Bill of Rights was to withdraw certain subjects from the vicissitudes of political controversy, to place them beyond the reach of majorities and officials and to establish them as legal principles to be applied by the courts. One's ... fundamental rights may not be submitted to vote; they depend on the outcome of no elections.

---

[7] See also F. Frankfurter, J. Landis, The Business of Supreme Court: A Study In The Federal Judicial System 65 (1927) (federal courts are "the primary and powerful reliances for vindicating every right given by the Constitution, the laws, and treaties of the United States").

See also Garcia, 469 U.S. at 565 n.8 ("One can hardly imagine this Court saying that because Congress is composed of individuals, individual rights guaranteed by the Bill of Rights are amply protected by the political process.") (Powell, J., dissenting, joined by Burger, C.J., Rehnquist and O'Connor, JJ.).[8]

Nevertheless, appellants and the Solicitor General argue that state legislatures are more competent than the Court to resolve the moral, religious, philosophical, social, political, and medical questions implicated by abortion regulation. Yet, there is no reason why state legislators are better suited to the task of determining the parameters of individual rights and liberties than the Court. To the contrary, the legislative branch may be a distinctly less reliable guarantor of individual rights and liberties than the courts.[9]

Moreover, it is well-recognized that the Court's duty to interpret and apply the Constitution does not "depend upon [its] possession of marked competence in the field where the invasion of rights occurs." West Virginia Bd. of Educ., 319 U.S. at 639.

> True, the task of translating the majestic generalities of the Bill of Rights, conceived as part of the pattern of liberal government in the eighteenth century, into concrete restraints on officials dealing with problems of the twentieth century, is one to disturb self-confidence. . . . But we act in these matters not by authority of our competence but by force of our commissions. We cannot, because of modest estimates of our competence in such specialties ... withhold the judgment that history authenticates as the function of this Court when liberty is infringed.

Id. at 639-40. Indeed, the history of the Court is filled with examples of instances where the Court carried out its duty despite such difficulties.[10]

While the complexities of abortion regulation undoubtedly make judicial resolution difficult, see Roe, 410 U.S. at 116, they do not relieve this Court of its constitutional duty. Roe, 410 U.S. at 116-17; Thornburgh, 476 U.S. at 771-72. Rather, the Court's duty reaches its zenith precisely when the issue, as here, is one of a "sensitive and emotional nature," generating heated public debate and controversy, "with vigorous opposing views" and "deep and seemingly absolute convictions." Roe, 410 U.S. at 116. For it is precisely then that majoritarian institutions such as state legislatures are the least reliable guarantors of individual rights and liberties. E.g., Brown v. Bd. of Educ., 347 U.S. 483; United States v. Carolene Prod. Co., 304 U.S. 144, 152 n.4 (1938). The danger of leaving this type of decision to majoritarian institutions is strikingly illustrated by Governor Rockefeller's comments in 1972 when he vetoed the New York Legislature's repeal of its 1970 abortion law reform:[11]

---

[8] The Solicitor General's reliance on a recent book which critically compares American and European abortion regulations is misplaced. See S.G. Br. at 23-24, citing M.A. Glendon, Abortion and Divorce in Western Law; American Failures, European Challenges (1987) [hereinafter Glendon, Abortion and Divorce]. For example, West German constitutional treatment of the abortion question arises out of a civil law culture with fundamentally different conceptions of the rights of individuals vis-a-vis the state. See Wessel and Segal, Book Review, 8 Prob. L.J. 349 (1988). [hereinafter Wessel and Segal]. See also Fineman, Book Review, 55 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1431, 1433, 1438, 1440-43 (1988).

[9] See Howard, Garcia and the Values of Federalism: On the Need for a Recurrence to Fundamental Principles, 19 Geo. L. Rev. 789, 794 (1985) ("The judicial process may have its flaws, but it aspires to a degree of rationality, including analytical reasoning, that one does not associate with the legislative process. The limits of time, the pressures of lobbyists, the temptations of expediency, undue reliance on staff, and other distractions often have more to do with the final shape of legislation than any thinking about constitutional issues").

[10] See, e.g., Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984) (inclusion of Nativity scene in city's annual Christmas display in a park owned by a nonprofit organization does not violate First and Fourteenth Amendments); Milliken v. Bradley, 418 U.S. 717 (1974) (remedy which may be applied by federal court for single school district de jure school segregation); Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972) (death penalty statutes of Texas and Georgia violated Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments); Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968) (Arkansas' "anti-evolution" statute violates First and Fourteenth Amendments); Brown v. Bd. of Educ., 347 U.S. 483 (separate but equal schools for blacks and whites violate Fourteenth Amendment); Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923) (state law forbidding teaching of foreign language in school invades the liberty guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment). See also Bd. of Educ. v. Pico, 457 U.S. 853, 861 (1982) (referring to the "difficult terrain" which Meyer, supra, and Epperson, supra, traversed).

[11] See N.Y. Penal Law § 125.05(3) (McKinney 1987), permitting licensed physicians to provide abortions to consenting women less than twenty-four weeks pregnant.

> [t]he extremes of personal villification and political coercion brought to bear on members of the Legislature raise serious doubts that the votes to repeal the reforms represented the will of the majority of the people of New York State. The very intensity of this debate has generated an emotional climate in which the very truth about abortions and about the present State abortion law have become distorted almost beyond recognition.

Governor's Veto Messages, (1972), reprinted in N.Y.S. Legis. Annual-1972, at 423-24.

As chief law enforcement officers in their respective states, amici are interested in protecting the fundamental rights of the people. By respecting the role of the judiciary, the states help preserve a sphere of personal liberty for the people, free from encroachment by any government. Amici value and often advocate the virtues of federalism,[12] one of which is that states may serve as laboratories for experimenting with new social and economic ideas. See, e.g., Reeves, Inc. v. Stake, 447 U.S. 429, 441 (1980); New State Ice Co. v. Liebmann, 285 U.S. 262, 311 (1932) (Brandeis, J., dissenting). But there is a critical difference between a state experimenting within a sphere of power ceded to government by the individual and the state usurping those powers and rights reserved to the individual.

Thus, a state law infringing a fundamental individual liberty interest under the Fourteenth Amendment cannot be upheld on federalism grounds. See New State Ice, 285 U.S. at 279-80. After all, "[t]here are limits to the extent to which a legislatively represented majority may conduct ... experiments at the expense of the dignity and personality" of the individual. Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535, 546 (1942) (Jackson, J., concurring). Because "[f]ew decisions are more personal and intimate, more properly private, or more basic to human dignity and autonomy, than a woman's decision ... whether or not to end her pregnancy," Thornburgh, 476 U.S. at 772, the matter should not be a candidate for state by state experimentation and should remain within the province of the Court.

[12] See, e.g., brief amici curiae of California, et al. in Garcia, 469 U.S. 528, 529.

III. A REVERSAL OR MODIFICATION OF ROE v. WADE WOULD JEOPARDIZE THE PUBLIC HEALTH, SAFETY AND WELFARE AND UNDERMINE STATE LAW ENFORCEMENT EFFORTS.

Countless individuals have relied upon the rights secured by Roe v. Wade and its progeny in ordering their affairs and lives. The liberalization of abortion laws has brought out of the shadows what was once a furtive and dangerous procedure, making it possible for women to exercise procreative choice safely, with minimal danger to their lives and health. Experience teaches that women who want abortions will not be deterred by restrictive laws. Thus, reversal of Roe will not end abortion, but drive it back underground, with all of the attendant adverse public health effects. Returning abortion to the individual states will result in the emergence of a patchwork of laws,[13] and the imposition of a tremendous burden on those states which would continue to allow women to choose abortion in the face of decisions by other states not to do so. After sixteen years of constitutional protection, judicial invalidation of a right which directly affects a woman in the most private aspect of her life will foster a nation of outlaws illicitly seeking and providing abortion services. Law enforcement officers such as the amici Attorneys General will be placed in the position of having to enforce virtually unenforceable laws.

A. Health Consequences of a Reversal of Roe v. Wade

The consequences for maternal health in this country will be devastating if the Court reverses Roe v. Wade.[14] Women living in [13] See J. Legge, Abortion Policy: An Evaluation of the Consequences for Maternal and Infant Health 118-19, Table 7.1 (1985) (hereinafter Legge) (describing eight types of pre-Roe abortion laws). In addition, post-Roe state court decisions may impose state constitutional requirements on abortion. See, e.g., Moe v. Sec'y of Admin. & Fin., 382 Mass. 629, 417 N.E.2d 387 (1981) (woman has right under due process clause of Massachusetts constitution to choose to terminate her pregnancy).

[14] No country except Rumania, which legalized abortion in 1957 but severely restricted its availability in 1966, has reversed or effectively reversed a liberalized states which severely restrict abortion will not cease to obtain or attempt to obtain abortions; rather they will find ways to circumvent restrictive laws, thereby endangering their health and safety.[15] Abortion-related deaths, injuries and illnesses will surge.[16] abortion policy. Following that shift, Rumania experienced a sharp increase in abortion-related deaths and infant mortality. Legge, supra note 13, at 58-59, 70, 152.

(Footnote continued)

---

[15] The immediate effect of legalization was not to significantly increase the numbers of women obtaining abortions, but rather to guarantee that the number of abortions previously clandestinely obtained, were instead obtained under safe, legal medical conditions. See Alan Guttmacher Institute, Safe and Legal: 10 Years' Experience With Legal Abortion in New York State 17, 23 (S. Henshaw, J. Van Vort, eds. 1980) [hereinafter Guttmacher]. Other states' statistics are similarly revealing. Id.; see also People v. Belous, 71 Cal. 2d 954, 965-966, 458 P.2d 194, 201 (1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 915 (1970) (prior to California's passage of Therapeutic Abortion Act of 1967, between 35,000 and 100,000 criminal abortions were performed annually in California); People v. Barksdale, 8 Cal. 3d 320, 330-31 nn. 7 & 8, 503 P.2d 257, 265 nn. 7 & 8 (1972) (by 1970, approximately 116,749 legal abortions were performed in California – about the same number of abortions, adjusted for population growth, that occurred before legalization). Similarly, only a 10% rise was reported for Oregon. Guttmacher at 23. Nationwide, an estimated one million illegal abortions were performed annually in the years before Roe, two-thirds of which were on married women. See The President's Comm'n on Law Enforcement & Admin. of Justice, Task Force Report: The Courts 105 (1967) [hereinafter Task Force Report]; Centers for Disease Control, Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report, vol. 37, no. 47, "Abortion Surveillance: Preliminary Analysis – United States, 1984, 1985," 713-14 (Nov. 25, 1988), U.S. Dep't of Health and Human Serv./Pub. Health Serv. HHS Pub. No. (CDC) 89-8017 [hereinafter CDC].

[16] Legalization of abortion significantly reduced abortion-related deaths and illness. Studies in California and New York showed that criminal abortion was the leading cause of maternal deaths, the most common victims married women with several children who attempted to self-abort. H. Ziff, Recent Abortion Law Reforms (Or Much Ado About Nothing), 60 J. Crim. L. and Criminology and Police Sci. 3 (1969) [hereinafter Ziff]. After abortion was legalized in New York State, deaths related to abortion declined sharply. Between 1967 and 1969, when abortion was illegal in New York, and 1970-1972, when it was legal, the average annual rate of abortion-related deaths fell by 51 percent. Legalization of abortion in New York State also reduced the number of women admitted for infected, incomplete and spontaneous abortions. Id. Similarly, following Roe, the number of abortion-related deaths nationwide dropped significantly. By 1982 the number of abortion-related deaths had dropped to 50 percent of those in 1972. Lebolt, Grimes, Cates, Mortality From Abortion and Childbirth, 248 J. A.M.A. 188, 191 (July 9, 1982).

Experience shows that poor and minority women will suffer the most.[17]

The adverse health consequences of a reversal of Roe would extend even to the residents of those states that continue to permit women to freely obtain abortions. As discussed below, the health-care systems of these states would be burdened by an influx of non-residents seeking to circumvent the restrictive laws in their own states. Moreover, limited state resources would be diverted to enforce laws protecting women from deceptive, health-endangering schemes that play on the desperation of women seeking to terminate unwanted pregnancies.

1. States Where Abortion Remains Legal Can Expect An Influx of Out-Of State Residents Seeking Medical Services.

An extraordinary burden will fall upon the states that continue to provide women with the right to choose to terminate their pregnancies. Such states can anticipate an influx of non-residents seeking the abortion or related medical services prohibited in their home states. New York State, for example, was flooded with non-residents seeking abortion services following its passage of a bill effective July 1, 1970 permitting licensed physicians to provide these services to consenting women less than twenty-four weeks pregnant. See N.Y. Penal Law § 125.05(3) (McKinney 1987).[18] Between [17] Studies during the 1960's in New York and California (before abortion was legal in either state), show that in New York twice as many abortion related fatalities occurred among nonwhites as among whites, while in California low income women were the most frequent abortion fatalities. Ziff, supra note 16, at 11. What was said in 1969 would be equally true in 1989: "This double standard, nurtured by present statutes, is incompatible with any notion of justice. It reflects poorly on the law's concern with the welfare of disadvantaged citizens at a time when millions of dollars are being spent to equalize the medical care available to all people in this country." Id.

---

[18] Patker, O'Hare, Nielson, Suigir, Two Years' Experience in New York City with the Liberalized Abortion Law-Progress and Problems, 63 Am. J. Pub. Health 524 (1973) [hereinafter Patker]. New York's experience between 1970 and 1973 is not unique; women throughout the world have attempted to circumvent abortion restrictions in their own jurisdictions. See R. Riddick, Making Choices: The Abortion Experience of Irish Women 11-14 (1988) [hereinafter Riddick]. Britain, for example, experienced an influx of foreign women seeking abortion services

(Footnote continued)

July 1970 and June 1972, 65.7% of the approximately 400,000 abortions performed in New York City were performed on non-residents.[19] This number dropped precipitously after Roe.[20] If the Court overturns Roe, an even greater number of out-of-state women can be expected to seek abortions in states that continue to allow it, given the settled expectations about legal abortion since Roe was decided, and its widespread acceptance.[21]

2. The Burden on Health Care Systems

The sheer numbers of non-resident women seeking abortions or related medical services in states where it remains legal will strain already overburdened health care systems.[22] Many out-of-following its liberalized abortion act in 1967. In the early to middle 1970's, an estimated 33% of all abortions in Britain were performed on foreign women from countries prohibiting abortions. Legge, supra note 13, at 79; see, e.g., Riddick at 11 (nearly 4,000 women from the Republic of Ireland, in which abortion is illegal, obtained abortions in England in 1987).

[19] Patker, supra note 18, at 524. Statistics for all of New York State are comparable to those for New York City. According to statistics compiled by the N.Y.S. Department of Health, between 1971 and 1972 a total of approximately 538,000 women obtained abortions, of whom approximately 327,000 — or 60% percent — were non-residents.

[20] Less than half the number of non-residents who obtained abortions in New York State in 1972 obtained abortions in New York State in 1973. Moreover, between 1974 and 1987, non-residents averaged merely 9.8 percent of the total number of women obtaining abortions in New York State.

[21] Nationwide, the number of reported abortions increased from approximately 745,000 in 1973 to 1.58 million in 1981 to 1.6 million in 1985. See Alan Guttmacher Institute, Abortion Services in the United States, Each State and Metropolitan Area, 1984-1985 16 (S. Henshaw, J. Van Vort, ed. 1988) [hereinafter Guttmacher 1984]; CDC, supra note 15. See also N.Y. Times, Oct. 6, 1988, § B, at 18, col. 1 (between 1977 and 1987, nearly 3 out of every 100 American women 15 to 44 had an abortion).

[22] This Court has held that a state where abortion is legal may not deny an abortion, or related medical care, to a non-resident. Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. at 200. During 1970-71, almost 1000 non-residents were treated at New York City hospitals despite hospital residency requirements. Harris, O'Hare, Patker, Nielson, Legal Abortion 1970-71—The New York City Experience, 63 Am. J. Pub. Health 409, 410 (1973). The influx of non-residents could be particularly problematic for a state like Massachusetts where abortion is legal under the state constitution's due process clause, Moe v. Sec'y of Admin. & Fin., 382 Mass. 629, 417 N.E. 2d 387, (Footnote continued) state women will likely seek abortions late in their pregnancies due to their inability to obtain proper counseling in their home states or a lack of resources.[23] Fear of prosecution will likely also contribute to health-endangering delays. As a result, abortion providers will be faced with an increase in the number of late, more complicated, and thus more dangerous abortions.[24] States will also have to handle the emergency medical situations posed by injuries and illnesses suffered by women who attempt to self abort or seek the services of illegal abortionists.

3. The Increased Burden on Enforcement and Regulatory Agencies

If Roe is overturned, it can be anticipated that profiteers in states that permit abortions will exploit the desperation of women seeking abortions or related medical services. For example, after Britain began permitting abortion, taxi drivers in London exacted fees for referring and transporting foreign women to abortion facilities upon the women's arrival in London.[25] Similarly, following the and the state constitution has been interpreted to require public funding, i.e., Medicaid, for abortions. Compare Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297.

[23] Non-residents obtaining abortions in New York, for example, historically have been more likely to obtain abortions after twelve weeks than New Yorkers. Guttmacher, supra note 15, at 19. Inability to locate a provider and make arrangements to obtain an abortion are significant factors leading to delay. Torres, Forrest, Why Do Women Have Abortions? 20 Fam. Plan. Persp. 169, 174-75 (July/Aug. 1988). Delay also escalates costs, thereby resulting in even further delay. Guttmacher, supra note 15, at 19; see also Henshaw, Forrest, Blaine, Abortion Services in the United States, 1981-1982, 16 Fam. Plan. Persp. 119,126 (May/June 1984) (abortion fees are significantly higher for pregnancies past 12 to 14 weeks); Henshaw, Forrest, Van Vort, Abortion Services in the United States, 1984 and 1985, 19 Fam. Plan. Persp. 63 (Mar./Apr. 1987) [hereinafter cited as Henshaw].

[24] See generally J. Wilson, R. Carrington, E. Reid, Obstetrics and Gynecology 207 (8th ed. 1987); Grimes, Second Trimester Abortions in the United States, 16 Fam. Plan. Persp. 260, 263 (Nov./Dec. 1984) (the risk of death from abortions performed at 16 weeks is 24 times greater than from abortions performed at 8 weeks or earlier). Courts have uniformly recognized that "time, of course, is critical in abortion," Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. at 198; see, e.g., Akron, 462 U.S. at 450-51.

[25] Legge, supra note 13, at 79.

adoption of New York's less restrictive abortion law, deceptive referral services multiplied in and out of the state.[26] Unaware of free referral services, including a clergy-run service which operated in twenty states, many women turned to profit-making referral agencies that promised not only referrals to reliable providers at the lowest cost, but transportation services and counseling, as well.[27] None disclosed the excessive portion of the fee the agency retained, or the availability of free referral services.[28]

Not only did the agencies realize exorbitant profits, but they often endangered the health of the women utilizing their services.[29] Personnel at referral agencies without medical training would essentially diagnose the woman – often through a telephone call – and then refer her to a provider, or alternatively, subcontract with a second agency that made the final arrangements with the providers.[30] The provider thus was often not informed of the woman's condition and sometimes was unprepared to assist her.[31]

---

[26] See generally Edmiston, Report on the Abortion Capital of the Country: New York City, N.Y. Times, Apr. 11, 1971 (Magazine), at 11, 37-42 [hereinafter Edmiston]; L. Lader, Abortion II: Making the Revolution 164 (1973) [hereinafter Lader]; N.Y. Times, Feb. 10, 1971, at 20, 45, col. 1. The agencies advertised their services in various ways, including billboards, blimps and banners, on Florida beaches, and classified advertisements in local newspapers. Newsweek, July 19, 1971, at 51.

[27] Lader, supra note 26, at 164.

[28] A. Morton, Enemies of Choice: The Right to Life Movement and its Threat to Abortion 57 (1981) [hereinafter Morton]; N.Y. Times, Feb. 10, 1971, at 45, col. 1; Edmiston, supra note 26, at 42.

[29] Edmiston, supra note 26, at 42.

[30] Id. at 38. As a result of a lawsuit brought by New York's Attorney General, the New York courts found that one such agency was illegally engaged in the practice of medicine in violation of the New York Education Law, as well as illegal fee splitting. State v. Abortion Info. Agency, Inc., 69 Misc.2d 825, 829 (Sup.Ct. N.Y. Co. 1971), aff'd, 37 A.D.2d 142, 145 (1st Dept. 1971), aff'd, 30 N.Y.2d 779, 285, N.E.2d 317 (1972).

[31] Edmiston, supra note 26, at 38. For example, a Michigan woman checked into a hospital near Kennedy airport in August of 1971 after payment of $900 to a referral agency advertised in a national magazine. The referral agency subcontracted the referral to a second agency but failed to advise the second agency that the woman required a saline abortion. Uninformed, the doctor performed an unnecessary hysterectomy. Id. at 38, 42.

Other women paid large fees to referral agencies only to be told by providers that the price was even greater than the payment already rendered.[32]

Although states which continue to allow women to obtain abortions can enact and enforce laws preventing fraudulent advertising and referral, an overturning of Roe would encourage such health-endangering chicanery.[33] In any event, notwithstanding the grave impact such schemes would have on the states that continue to permit abortion, they will have little or no ability to curb deception occurring outside their borders.

It can also be anticipated that a reversal of Roe will increase the demand for abortion services in those states that keep it legal, thus precipitating a proliferation of free-standing abortion clinics in those states.[34] To ensure the competence of these clinics and to safeguard the health and safety of the women relying on them, vigorous enforcement of regulatory requirements will be necessary.[35] Such increased regulation will significantly burden [32] Id. at 37, 42 (18 year old from Boston who had traveled to New York forced to sell blood, sleep in parks and beg after provider informed her that abortion would cost $275 more than she had already paid).

---

[33] See, e.g., note 30, supra (discussing N.Y.S. Attorney General's enforcement of Education Law). It can further be expected that if Roe is reversed, states that continue to permit abortion will also experience an increase in deceptive advertising by clinics claiming to perform abortions, but which only provide antiabortion counseling, and do not so specify in their advertisements. See, e.g., Fargo Women's Health Org., Inc. v. Larson, 381 N.W.2d 176 (N.D.), aff'd, 391 N.W.2d 627 (N.D.), cert. denied, 476 U.S. 1108 (1986).

[34] See Patker, supra note 18, at 525 (in the first year abortion was legalized in New York City, most non-residents received services from proprietary hospitals. In the second year, most obtained abortions from free-standing clinics). Today, free-standing clinics are the major providers of abortions nationwide, with hospitals responsible for only 13 percent of the procedures performed in 1985. Henshaw, supra note 23, at 63. Nevertheless, New York City's experience between 1970 and 1971 suggests that municipal and state hospitals may shoulder some of the increased need. See note 22, supra.

[35] Review and assurances of providers' competence will be particularly important if Roe is overturned, since medical personnel employed in states that permit abortion, but who were trained in hospitals and other medical facilities in states that prohibit abortion, may not receive adequate training in abortion procedures.

(Footnote continued)

limited state health regulatory resources. Moreover, to the extent that current state health planning and regulatory decisions are now predicated on Roe, continuity and effectiveness in future enforcement would be extremely difficult.[36] Women's health and safety may thus be further jeopardized.

Finally, at the same time that an overturning of Roe will cause the number of non-resident women seeking abortions in states that continue to permit the procedure to escalate, so too could it trigger an escalation in violent and illegal activity aimed at the clinics in these states that continue to perform abortions. Amici welcome peaceful and constitutionally protected expression of diverse views but they fear their states becoming focal points for illegal activities, such as bombings, arson and blockades, that courts in many states have deemed necessary to enjoin,[37] that require the expenditure

---

Lack of training can pose grave risks to women's health. See N. Davis, From Crime To Choice: The Transformation of Abortion in America 86 n.4 (1985); see also id. at 77.

[36] See, e.g., Westchester Women's Health Org. v. Whalen, 475 F. Supp. 734 (S.D.N.Y. 1979) (state licensing regulations for ambulatory care clinics providing abortion services are within the guidelines enunciated by the Supreme Court); Schulman v. New York City Health & Hosp. Corp., 38 N.Y.2d 234, 342 N.E.2d 501 (1975) (reporting requirements of the New York City Health Code within the strictures of Roe v. Wade).

[37] See, e.g., New York State Nat'l Org. for Women v. Terry, No. 88 Civ. 3071 (S.D.N.Y. 1989) (1989 WL 5742) (permanently enjoining antiabortion protestors from blockading clinic entrances and awarding $25,000 fines per day for violation of order, in addition to penalities to City of New York for increased costs for failure to notify city in advance of location of demonstration); Nat'l Abortion Fed'n v. Operation Rescue, No. 89-1189 AWT (BX)(C.D. Cal. March 15, 1989) (injunction); Aradia Women's Health Center v. Operation Rescue, No. C88-1539R (W.D. Wash. Jan. 10, 1989) (preliminary injunction); Parkmed Co. v. Pro-Life Counselling, 91 A.D.2d 551, 457 N.Y.S.2d 27 (1st Dept. 1982) (enjoining 11 demonstrators' interference with access to a clinic); O.B.G.Y.N. Ass'n v. Birthright of Brooklyn & Queens, Inc., 64 A.D.2d 894, 407 N.Y.S.2d 903 (2d Dept. 1978); Bering v. Share, 106 Wash. 2d 212, 721 P.2d 918 (1986), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1050 (1987)(upholding injunction); Moyal v. Thompkins, No. 278465 (Super. Ct. Cal. May 16, 1986) (preliminary injunction against trespass, blocking access, harassment); Oakland Feminist Women's Health Center v. Thompkins, No. 276031 (Super. Ct. Cal. Aug. 16, 1985) (preliminary injunction against blocking access and harassment); Finkel v. Birthright Center, No. C-3266-83 (Super. Ct. N.J. Aug. 21, 1985); Kugler v. Ryan, 682 S.W.2d 47 (Mo. App. 1984); Clinic for Women, Inc., v. Citizens for Life, No. C83-2651 (Cir. Ct. Indiana, Marion Cty., Aug. 31, 1984).

of state funds to control, and that further jeopardize the health and safety of women.[38]

B. The Burden On Law Enforcement Will Also Increase Where Abortion is Prohibited.

The evidence from the pre-Roe period suggests that where abortion is illegal, substantial numbers of women seek the procedure in other states where it is legal, as discussed above, or procure illegal abortions or attempt the procedure themselves.[39] The latter alternatives resulted in a substantial number of maternal deaths and injuries in the pre-Roe period.[40] Compliance with new state laws severely restricting or prohibiting abortions may be expected to be even lower than before Roe v. Wade because in the intervening sixteen years women have been able to exercise control over their reproductive capacity.

While wealthier women may be able to seek legal abortions elsewhere, poorer women, a disproportionate share of whom are members of minority groups who do not have the option to travel or the luxury of private physicians, will risk death, mutilation, infections, sterility, and other serious complications at the hands

---

[38] Bomb threats, arson attacks and blockades not only threaten the health and safety of clinic personnel and patients, passersby and neighbors, but have made it difficult, if not impossible, for clinics to obtain insurance coverage. Abortion Clinics Find Insurance Difficult to Obtain, Am. Bus. News, Feb. 8, 1985, at 20, col. 1; Bus. Ins., Jan. 21, 1985, at 3, col. 2.

[39] The experience in European countries, for example, demonstrates that the severity or leniency of a country's abortion law is unrelated to the frequency of abortion. See Wessel and Segal, supra note 8, at 353-54, Glendon, Abortion and Divorce, supra, note 8, at 14-15, 59-60. For example, irrespective of the legality or illegality of abortion, in the countries surveyed, women could obtain first trimester abortions. Wessel and Segal, supra note 8, at 353. In addition, the strictness of a country's law has little to do with rates of abortion. Thus the Netherlands, with a lenient statute, experiences a low rate of abortion, and Rumania with a very strict law, has a rate higher than the U.S. Id. at 353-54; Glendon, Abortion and Divorce, supra note 8, at 59-60.

[40] See, e.g., Task Force Report, supra note 15, at 105-07; Ziff, supra note 16, at 6-8, 11; Schwartz, Morals Offenses and the Model Penal Code, 63 Colum. L. Rev. 682 (1963).

of illegal abortionists or at their own hands. Task Force Report at 105-07; Ziff at 6-9. The widespread demand for abortion will be met both by "some highly respectable physicians [who] regard the law as an injustice and want to protect their patients against incompetent abortionists," and by clandestine, swiftly operating, highly organized abortion "rings" or "mills" with people "ready to run the risk to earn the high fees." Task Force Report at 105; Ziff at 9.[41] Bans on abortion "tend to foster organized forms of criminality which, with alarming business efficiency and the use of systematic means of coercion, violence, and governmental corruption, continue to supply the persistent demand . . . with the loss of a substantial number of lives as a consequence." Task Force Report at 107.

Enforcement of restrictive abortion laws will be difficult for several reasons. Detection, surveillance, apprehension, and proof will be problematic because of the frequent absence of a complaining victim, the private, consensual nature of the crime, the federal and state constitutional privileges against self-incrimination,[42] and new abortifacients such as the morning after pill and R.U. 486.[43] Moreover, the reallocation of the resources necessary to attempt to enforce such laws will divert the resources of the police from protecting the public from other crimes, such as drug use and its attendant violence, and cause a "loss of morale and self-esteem among police who are obligated to engage in tasks which must seem to them demeaning or degrading or of little relevance to the mission of law enforcers." Task Force Report at 107.

---

[41] The prevalence of abortion "mills" and "rings" once led police to consider criminal abortion the third largest illegal endeavor in the country, after only gambling and narcotics. See Schur, Crimes Without Victims 25 (1965), cited in Ziff, supra, note 16, at 5 n.30.

[42] Task Force Report, supra note 15, at 106; Ziff, supra note 16, at 8; Constitutional Aspects of the Right to Limit Childbearing, A Report of the United States Comm'r on Civil Rights, 94-95 (April 1975).

[43] See generally N.Y. Times, Sept. 29, 1988, § B, at 11, cols. 4-5 (describing drugs that induce abortion).

Given divided community opinion prevailing in many states, there may be a lack of uniform enforcement. Selective prosecution and inconsistent jury verdicts will undermine amici's efforts to foster uniform, consistent law enforcement in their states. In addition, selective prosecution and inconsistent verdicts for violation of unpopular laws will foster "cynicism and indifference to the criminal law and its agencies of enforcement," Task Force Report at 106, and it will tend "to contribute to antagonism and resentment toward those who enforce the law." Id. at 105; see also Ziff, at 8-10.[44]

In sum, the heavy social costs of permitting states to recriminalize abortion would undermine the amici's interests in protecting the public health, safety and welfare, and in preserving the integrity of state criminal justice systems.

---

[44] Recent history teaches that laws regulating private behavior where no consensus exists create problems for those that have to enforce them. Finding widespread lawlessness and concluding that Prohibition was unenforceable, a Commission headed by George Wickersham, the U.S. Attorney General under President Taft, which included a former Secretary of War, a former state Chief Justice, a Circuit Judge, two District Judges, three practicing lawyers, the Dean of the Harvard Law School and the President of Radcliffe, wrote > a law will be observed and may be enforced only when and to the extent that it reflects or is an expression of the general opinion of the normally law-abiding elements of the community, ... It is therefore a serious impairment of the legal order to have a national law upon the books theoretically governing the whole land, and announcing a policy for the whole land which public opinion in many important centers will not enforce.

Nat'l Comm'n on Law Observance and Enforcement, Report on the Enforcement of the Prohibition Laws of the United States, no. 722, 71st Cong., 1st Sess. (Jan. 7, 1931), quoted in Levane, The Birth of American Alcohol Control: Prohibition, the Power Elite, and the Problem of Lawlessness, 12 Cont. Drug Problems 63, 75-76 (Spring 1985).

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the amici Attorneys General respectfully request this Court to decline to reexamine Roe v. Wade, or in the alternative, to reaffirm that decision.

Dated: New York, New York
March 30, 1989

Respectfully submitted,

JAMES M. SHANNON
Attorney General of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts
One Ashburton Place
Boston, Massachusetts 02108

SUZANNE E. DURRELL
MADELYN WESSEL
Assistant Attorneys General

ROBERT ABRAMS
Attorney General of the State of New York
120 Broadway
New York, New York 10271

O. PETER SHERWOOD
Solicitor General

SUZANNE M. LYNN
MARLA TEPPER
Assistant Attorneys General

AMICUS CURIAE

BRIEF

No. 88-605

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
MAR 30 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,

Appellants,

—v.—

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,

Appellees.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES
COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT

BRIEF FOR THE AMICI CURIAE WOMEN WHO HAVE HAD ABORTIONS AND FRIENDS OF AMICI CURIAE IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEES

(Names of 2887 Amici Curiae and 627 Friends of Amici Curiae Set Forth in Appendix A)

SARAH E. BURNS
Counsel of Record
HELEN R. NEUBORNE
ALISON WETHERFIELD
NOW Legal Defense and Education Fund
99 Hudson Street
New York, New York 10013
and
1333 H Street, NW
Washington, D.C. 20005

DAWN JOHNSEN
National Abortion Rights
Action League
1101 14th Street, NW
Washington, D.C. 20005

TABLE OF CONTENTS

PAGE

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES..... iv

INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE 1

A. The Amici Curiae 1

B. Friends of the Amici Curiae 3

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT..... 4

ARGUMENT 5

I. As the Experiences of Women Show, Roe v. Wade was a Wise and Just Decision and its Relevance Has Not Altered or Changed 12

A. Criminalization and Excessive Regulation of Abortion Endangered The Lives and Health of Women and Hurt Their Loved Ones 13

B. Before Roe v. Wade, Women Were Punished for Having Abortions, Which Silenced All Women on This Critical Topic 21

C. Since Roe v. Wade, Abortion Has Become an Extremely Safe Procedure and Women Experience It Without Significant Trauma ... 24

II. For a Woman, the Decision Whether to Bear a Child or to Have an Abortion is a Profound Judgment

Reflecting Not Only Responsibility for Herself and to a Potential Life but Also to Loved Ones, to Community and to Spiritual Values; According to Our System of Limited Government, that Decision Must be Left to Her ..26

A. Whether to Bear a Child or Have an Abortion is a Highly Contextualized Uniquely Personal Decision That Is Not Within the Competence of a Legislature to Make or Fairly Control 29

1. Only the Woman Can Determine How Best to Meet the Often Sharply Competing Demands Within Her Family 33

2. Only the Woman Can Determine Whether She is Financially, Educationally, and Emotionally Ready and Able to Assume Responsibility for a Child ... 36

3. Only the Woman Can Determine Whether the Conditions Within Her Life and Family are Healthy Enough to Risk Having a New Child 41

4. Only the Woman Can Determine Whether She Is Healthy Enough to Sustain a Pregnancy and Able to Obtain Adequate Prenatal Care 43

5. Only the Woman Can Weigh Her Ability to Provide for a Child Whose Health May Be Seriously Impaired 46

6. Only the Woman Can Determine Whether Moral or Spiritual Values Compel Her to Terminate Her Pregnancy 48

7. Only the Woman Can Determine Whether She Should Bear a Child for Adoption When She is Unable to Assume Responsibility for Its Care 49

B. Reality for a Pregnant Woman is That Potential Life is a Part of Her Body 51

C. For a Woman to Choose an Abortion is Not Separate or Distinct from Any Other Conduct Protected By the Right of Privacy 54

CONCLUSION 62

APPENDIX A: A1

1. The Names of the Amici Curiae
2. The Names of the Friends of Amici Curiae

APPENDIX B B1

Full Text of Letters of the Amici Curiae Quoted in the Brief

APPENDIX C C1

Full Text of the Letters of the Friends of Amici Curiae Quoted or Cited in the Brief

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

PAGES

CASES

City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416 (1983) 64

Crissman v. State of Texas, 245 S.W. 438 (Tex. Crim. App. 1922) 24

Deaconess Hospital v. Ilester McRoberts and Kevin McRoberts, No. 874-00172 Div. No.2 (Mo. Cir. Ct., St. Louis Cty., May 21, 1987) 54

Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923) . 8

Michael M. v. Superior Court, 450 U.S. 464 (1981) 56

NOW NYS et al. v. Terry et al., 697 F. Supp. 1324 (S.D.N.Y. 1988), appeals consolidated as No. 88-7873 (2d Cir. 1988) 11, 12

NOW v. Scheidler, et al., No. 86 C7888 (N.D. Ill., filed Jan. 30, 1989) 11

People of California v. Stewart, No. M508197, slip op. (Cal. Mun. Ct. San Diego Cty., filed Feb. 26, 1987) 44

Reproductive Health Services v. Webster, 851 F.2d 1071 (8th Cir. 1988) . . . 4, 62

Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973) .4, passim

Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986) 9, 64

West Virginia State Board of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1942) 10

STATUTES

Mo. Stat. Ann. §1.205.1 . . . . . 53, 62

Mo. Stat. Ann. § 188.029 63

Mo. Stat. Ann. § 188.205 63

Mo. Stat. Ann. § 188.210 63

Mo. Stat. Ann. § 188.215 63

LEGISLATIVE SOURCE MATERIALS

Bluebook, Women in the Work Force: Pay Equity: Hearing on S. 98-1050 before the Joint Economic Committee, 98th Cong. 2nd Sess. 9-14 (1984) 37

ADMINISTRATIVE SOURCE MATERIALS

43 Fed. Reg. 4231 (1981) 55

Bureau of Census, U.S. Dep't of Commence, Child Support and Alimony: 1985 Current Popluation Reports, Series P-23, No. 152 (1987). 39

Bureau of the Census, U.S. Dep't of Commerce, Money Income of Families and Persons in the United States: 1979-1980;

Current Population Reports P-60, No. 129, table 53 37

FBI, Uniform Crime Reports for the United States, (1987) 59

U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, A Growing Crisis: Disadvantaged Women and Their Children (1983) 40

U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, 1 Comparable Worth: Issues for the 80's, 200 (1984) 37

U.S. Dep't. of Commerce, Statistical Abstracts of the United States 1987 . . 57

Women's Bureau, U.S. Dep't. of Labor, Facts on Working Women No. 86-2 (1986). . . . 38

OTHER LEGAL AUTHORITIES

Ely, The Wages of Crying Wolf: A Comment on Roe v. Wade, 82 Yale L.J. 920 (1973) 6

S. Estrich, Real Rape (1987) 59

Law, Women, Work, Welfare, and the Preservation of Patriarchy, 131 U. Penn. L. Rev. 1249 (1983) 33

C. MacKinnon, Privacy v. Equality in Feminism Unmodified (1987) 55

Note, Pregnancy Police: The Health Policy and Legal Implications of Punishing Pregnant Women for Harm to Their Fetuses, 16 NYU Rev. L. & Soc. Ch. 277 (1987-88) 44

Regan, Rewriting Roe v. Wade, 77 Mich. L. Rev. 1569 (1979) 52

D. Richards, Toleration and the Constitution 268 (1986) 6

L. Walker, The Battered Woman (1979) . . 42

L. Weitzman, The Divorce Revolution (1985) 39

Williams, Deficiencies in Child Support: Consequences for Children and Implications for Courts, 12 St. Ct. J. 4 (1988). . . . 39

OTHER AUTHORITIES

ACOG Committee Opinion No. 55, "Patient Choice: Maternal-Fetal Conflict" (Oct. 1987) 45

Asch, Reproductive Technology and Disability in Reproductive Laws for the 1990's 59 (N. Taub & S. Cohen eds. 1988) 47

Atrash et al., Legal Abortion Mortality and General Anesthesia, 158 Am. J. Obst. Gyn. 420-424 (1988) 24

Burnhill, Intrauterine Contraception in Fertility Control 271 (Carson et al. eds. 1985) 56

Burros, Women: Out of the House But Not Out of the Kitchen, N.Y. Times, Feb. 24, 1988, at A1 34

Cates & Rochat, Illegal Abortion in the United States: 1972-1974, 8 Fam. Plan. Persp. 2 (1976) 24, 25

Cates et al., Legalized Abortion: Effect on National Trends of Maternal and Abortion-Related Mortality (1940-1976), 132 Am. J. Ob. & Gyn. 211 (1978) . . 17, 18

Cates, Legal Abortion: The Public Health Record, 215 Science 1586 (1982) . . 12, 13

Cruver, Husbands and Housework: It's still an Uneven Load, USA Today, Aug. 20, 1986, at 5D. 34

R. Dobash & R. Dobash, Violence Against Wives (1979) 42

Edelman, Maternal and Child Health Care: A Deepening Crisis, 1985 N.Y.S. J. of Med. 128 44

D. Finklehor & K. Yllo, Licence to Rape: Sexual Abuse of Wives (1985) 59

L. Genevie & E. Margolies, The Motherhood Report: How Women Feel About Being Mothers (1987) 33

C. Gilligan, In a Different Voice: Psychological Theory and Women's Development (1982) 28, 29

Henshaw & Silverman, The Characteristics and Prior Contraceptive Use of U.S. Abortion Patients, 20 Fam. Plan. Persp. 158 (1985) 56, 58

Henshaw et al., A Portrait of American Women Who Obtain Abortions, 17 Fam. Plan. Persp. 90 (1985) 51

Hilberman, Overview: The "Wife Beater's Wife" Reconsidered, in The Gender Gap in Psychotherapy 213 (P. Rieker and E. Carmen eds. 1984) 42

Hofferth & Moore, Women's Employment and Marriage, in The Subtle Revolution: Women At Work (R. Smith ed. 1979) 34

Johnson, Contraception: The Morning After Pill, 16 Fam. Plan. Persp. 2661 (1984) 55

S. Kamerman, A. Kahn & P. Kingston, Maternity Policies and Working Women (1983) 36

Kleiman, "The Last Taboo: Case on L.I. Pierces the Silence on Incest," N.Y. Times, Sept. 28, 1987, at A1 61

Kleinman et al., Use of Ambulatory Medical Care by the Poor: Another Look at Equity, 19 Med. Care 1011 (1981) 44

Kolder et al., Court-Ordered Obstetrical Interventions, 316 New Eng. J. Med. 1192, 1194 (1987) 54

L. Lader, Abortion 2 (1966) 12

R. Langley & R. Levy, Wife Beating: The Silent Crisis (1977) 42

L.A. Times, Oct. 20, 1988 at __, ... 49

J. Legge, Abortion Policy (1985) 24

E. Messer & K. May, Back Rooms: Voices from the Illegal Abortion Era (1988) 12

H. Morgentaler, Abortion and Contraception (1982) 14

Morris & von Wagner, Interception: The Use of Postovulatory Estrogens to Prevent Implantation, 115 Am. J. Obst. & Gyn. 101 (1973) 55

National Abortion Federation, Incidents of Violence Disruption Against Abortion Providers (1977-88) 11

National Women's Political Caucus, National Directory of Women Elected Officials (1987) 9

N.Y. Times, Dec. 4, 1971, at 37 24

N.Y. Times, Mar. 15, 1989 at A16 40

N.Y. Times, May 8, 1962, at 5 24

S.L. Romney, et al., Gynecology & Obstetrics: The Health Care of Women, (2nd ed. 1981) 43

Rosenberg & Rosenthal, Reproductive Mortality in the United States: Recent Trends and Methodologic Considerations, 77 Am. J. Pub. Health 833 (1987) . . . 24, 25

D. Russell, Sexual Exploitation: Rape, Child Sexual Abuse and Workplace Harassment 180-94 (1984) 61

R. Schwarz, Septic Abortion 7 (1968) 12, 13

Spitz et al. "Third--Trimester Induced Abortion in Georgia, 1979 and 1980, 73 Amer. J. of Public Health 594 (1983) . . 52

Tietze & Lewit, Epidemiology of Induced Abortion in, Abortion and Sterilization 17

Torres & Forrest, Why do Women Have Abortions?, 20 Fam. Plan. Persp. 169, (1988) 32

D. Whitcomb, E. Shapiro and L. Stellwagen, When the Victim Is a Child: Issues for Judges and Prosecutors 4-5, 84 (1985) 61

INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE [1]

> I chose an abortion.
>
> I write now, not because my experience was particularly grim - it wasn't and that's the point. I was able to get a safe legal abortion, unlike my maternal great-grandmother who aborted herself with a knitting needle. I got care...counseling... advice from clinic staff. My great-grandmother got none of these. Perhaps the worst part of her experience - the most trenchant lesson - is the silence surrounding it. My mother whispered the story to me late one night, still afraid L-278

A. The Amici Curiae

We, the amici curiae submitting this brief, are not organizations, religious groups or politicians. We are women. We are among the millions of American women who have faced an unplanned or problematic pregnancy and decided that having an abortion, legal or illegal, was the right

---

[1]. The parties have consented to the filing of this brief, and the letters of consent are being filed with the Clerk of the Court pursuant to Rule 36.2 of the Rules of this Court.

choice for us, our loved ones and our lives. Some of us have given our names; others of us have not. Those of us who disclose our names sacrifice our privacy in order to preserve our liberty, and the liberty of all women to choose to have safe, legal abortions. Many of us helped to write this brief by writing the letters[2] which informed it and which are extensively quoted in it. These letters describe our experiences of abortion and our decision-

---

2. The letters of the amici curiae are lodged with the Clerk of this Court. They are filed in categories. The first contains 568 letters written by those of us who have had an abortion and appear before this Court under our real names. The second contains 137 letters written by those of us who have had an abortion and appear under the pseudonym, Jane Roe. The letters as lodged will be referenced by these categories as "Letter" ("L-") and "Roe Letter" ("RL-") respectively. In the lodged letters, the category (L) is coded with sequential numbers and the category (RL) is coded "X" plus a sequential number. Letters quoted in the brief are reproduced in full in Appendix B.

making processes in choosing to have an abortion.

B. Friends of the Amici Curiae

We are individuals, women and men, who have not had abortions but wish to join the courageous women who have, and to explain to the Court how critically important it is to women, their loved ones, friends, colleagues, and the people who provide them with the health care they need, that abortion remain legal, safe and available. As the friends of the amici curiae, we have also helped to write this brief by writing about the impact upon our lives of the experiences of our loved ones and friends who had legal or illegal abortions.[3]

---

3. The letters cited or quoted in this brief written by friends of the amici curiae ("FL-") are reproduced in full in Appendix C.

Together we urge this Court to affirm the decision of the court of appeals below, Reproductive Health Services v. Webster, 851 F.2d 1071 (8th Cir. 1988), striking sections of the Missouri statute, which significantly restrict access to and the availability of abortion, and violate women's fundamental liberty and privacy rights. Moreover, we urge this Court to preserve for future generations the principles set forth in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), and reaffirmed in subsequent cases.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

For compelling physical, economic, social and moral reasons, women have sought and will seek to have abortions. Roe v. Wade stopped state interference in women's abortion decisions, thus ending the terrible health crisis created by the criminalization of abortion, and finally affording women their first opportunity for true liberty. This Court wisely recognized that only a woman, in consultation with her physician, not a distant state legislature, can determine whether or not she should bear a child. To reverse or significantly modify Roe v. Wade, as appellants and their supporting amici curiae urge, would subject women again to profoundly intrusive and grossly punitive state action, contrary to the principle of individual rights embodied in the Constitution. As excerpts from the letters from amici will show, Roe v. Wade wisely placed the primary decision-making for abortion in the hands of women, the people best situated to make this decision.

ARGUMENT

Inevitably a woman's decision whether to bear a child or to have an abortion is a resolution of sharply competing demands. When a woman is confronted with that decision, she not only considers her responsibilities for the well-being of the life she may bring forth but also examines her own life, health and essential well-being and the well-being of her spouse or significant other, her parents, her child[ren], and others close to her, all of whom "unlike the unborn child [have] begun to imagine a future,"[4] and whose lives will be drastically altered by the added commitment and responsibility that

---

4. Ely, The Wages of Crying Wolf: A Comment on Roe v. Wade, 82 Yale L.J. 920, 927 (1973). Ely acknowledged "that the mother, unlike the unborn child, has begun to imagine a future for herself strikes me as morally quite significant." Id. at 927. But Ely's analysis failed to grasp that "prohibitions on abortion encumber what many now reasonably regard as a highly conscientious choice by women regarding their bodies, their sexuality and gender, and the nature and place of pregnancy, birth and childrearing in their personal and ethical lives. The abortion choice is thus one of the choices essential to the just moral independence of women." D. Richards, Toleration and the Constitution 268, 231-81 (1986).

inevitably would result from her childbearing. Finally, she must weigh her obligations to the larger community and to her spiritual values. Each woman faced with this decision will weigh various considerations differently in new and unique circumstances.

Many women who believe that bearing a child would cause them to fail in deeply felt obligations to their own or other already existing lives decide against childbearing and consider themselves morally bound, indeed compelled, to act upon that decision. Whatever her decision, it is one that only the woman herself, aided by the advice of her physician, can make, given her unique position of knowledge and responsibility.

This Court in Roe v. Wade wisely responded to the reality of women's lives by recognizing that decision to fall within the constitutionally protected zone of privacy:

> "This right of privacy...is broad enough to encompass a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy." 410 U.S. at 153.

With this simple acknowledgment, the Court addressed a woman's reality throughout the years of her childbearing potential and ensured a woman's right to liberty in the full sense that the right to "liberty" is understood under our Constitution.[5] It

---

[5] Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 399 (1923).

Subsequently this Court observed that protecting women's abortion decisions is critical to women's equality and that the woman's decisions falls properly within:

> [a] certain private sphere of individual liberty...kept largely beyond the reach of government... [which] extends to women as well as to men. Few decisions are more personal and intimate, more properly private, or more basic to individual dignity and autonomy than a woman's decision -- with the guidance of her physician and within the limits specified in Roe -- whether to end her pregnancy. A woman's right to make that choice freely is fundamental. Any other result, in our view, would took a step toward correcting the extreme imbalance that was locked into our system of law and government by the systematic subordination and exclusion of women[6] and it recognized that the abortion decision was exactly the kind of decision-making that should be protected by the Bill of Rights:

> The very purpose of a Bill of Rights was to withdraw certain subjects from the vicissitudes of political controversy, to place them beyond the reach of majorities and officials and to establish them as legal principles to be applied by the courts. One's right to life, liberty, and property, to free speech, a free press, freedom of worship and assembly, and other fundamental > protect inadequately a central part of the sphere of liberty that our law guarantees equally to all.

---

Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747, 772 (1986).

[6]. The exclusion of women from our legislatures has not been cured. See, e.g., National Women's Political Caucus, National Directory of Women Elected Officials 97 (1987) (15% women in Missouri state legislature).

> rights may not be submitted to vote; they depend on the outcome of no elections.

West Virginia State Board of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 638 (1942).

Appellants argue to the contrary that the decision whether or not to bear a child is best made by state legislators,[7] and implicitly stereotype women's decisions to have abortions as immoral, a matter of convenience or selfish. The reasons for which women have decided to have abortions soundly rebut Appellants' argument and it is appropriate for this Court to consider the issues as they really affect women's lives. As one amicus has written:

> So much of the dialogue, argument and confrontation regarding this issue...have [sic] seemed to take place in a vacuum...as a contrast to "real life, real people...." FL-240

---

7. See Brief for Appellants; Brief for Amicus Curiae United States Supporting Appellants.

The integrity of each woman's decision will be respected and protected only by this Court's consideration of the reality of women's lives and its strong reaffirmance of Roe.[8]

---

8. The intrusiveness and brutal indignity with which individuals touted as passively disobedient, see Brief for the Southern Center for Law and Ethics as Amicus Curiae in Support of Appellants, attack women's choice argues that women need the strongest possible protection of their privacy and liberty in connection with their determination whether or not to bear a child. See National Abortion Federation, Incidents of Violence & Disruption Against Abortion Providers (1977-88) (Number of Reported Incidents: 32 bombings, 42 arson attacks, 37 attempted bombings and arson attacks, 222 invasions, 220 incidents of vandalism, 46 assaults and battery; 65 death threats, 2 kidnappings, 20 burglaries, 162 incidents of hate mail and calls, 216 bomb threats, 675 pickets, blockades of 138 clinics).

See also, e.g., NOW v. Scheidler, et al., No. 86 C7888 First Amended Complaint (N.D. Ill., filed Jan. 30, 1989) (a pattern of extortion and conspiracy (including theft of 4000 fetal remains) in violation of racketeering and antitrust laws by Joe Scheidler, Randall Terry and others); NOW NYS et al. v. Terry et al., 697 F. Supp. 1324 (S.D.N.Y. 1988), appeals consolidated as No. 88-7873 (2d Cir. 1988); L-42, 47,

I. As the Experiences of Women Show, Roe v. Wade is a Wise and Just Decision and its Relevance Has Not Altered or Changed

Prior to Roe v. Wade, this country was in the midst of a medical, social and legal crisis caused by the illegality of abortion. Despite the fact that abortion was illegal or highly restricted in its availability throughout the United States before Roe v. Wade, women did have abortions, for compelling reasons. See generally, E. Messer & K. May, Back Rooms: Voices from the Illegal Abortion Era (1988). The numbers of illegally induced abortions in the United States in the 1960's ranged up to estimates of 1.5 million a year.[9] Women risked their lives and health in order to meet their inevitable need for abortion. These complex problems were hidden because the longstanding legal prohibitions against abortion, as well as the inherently private nature of the decision, silenced women and their friends.

---

306; RL-22.

[9] R. Schwarz, Septic Abortion 7 (1968); L. Lader, Abortion 2 (1966); Cates, Legal Abortion: The Public Health Record, 215 Science 1586 (1982).

A. Criminalization and Excessive Regulation of Abortion Endangered the Lives and Health of Women and Hurt Their Loved Ones

The conditions under which illegal abortions were performed were bad. It was estimated that "as many as 5,000 American women die[d] each year as a direct result of criminal abortion. The figure of 5,000 may be a minimum estimate, inasmuch as such deaths are mislabeled or unreported." R. Schwarz, supra n.9, at 7. See FL-17, 27, 33, 41, 50, 127, 166, 170, 172, 179. As these letter excerpts reveal, friends of amici curiae have not forgotten the women who died as a result of illegal abortions:

In 1965 I had to care for a 19 year old girl as she lay dying of infection following an illegal abortion. The fact that she denied having an abortion up to the time of her death and the tearful disclosure by her mother after her death underscored the fear these two people were experiencing.... FL-179 (nurse)

***

It was over! I want to shout. My closest childhood and young adult friend, whose abortion on her dining room table...with no sterilization and the crudest of instruments...is already dead. Why do I have to fight for her life again? FL-170

***

I have vivid memories of caring for a women who had used a caustic substance on herself.... She went into renal failure.... She did not survive! FL-127 (Nurse)

***

I lost my mother at the age of 7 years because at that time it was illegal to obtain an abortion even for medical reasons.... FL-41

Women who did survive illegal abortion were likely to experience health complications.[10] As these women recall, the illegal abortions were often extremely dangerous and painful:

---

10. H. Morgentaler, Abortion and Contraception 110-11 (1982).

In December of 1969 I became pregnant and chose to terminate the pregnancy.... The abortion was performed on the bed with my legs resting on two chairs. I experienced an extreme amount of pain and was told that if I didn't shut-up he [the doctor] would leave and not complete the abortion. After he was finished I layed in bed for 18 hours unable to get up or eat. When I finally found the strength to get out of bed, I staggered into the bathroom, sat down on the toilet and passed out, only to wake up hours later and find out I had been laying against a steam hot water pipe and received second degree burns on my shoulder; scars I have to this day. Somehow I made the trip back home. Twenty four hours later I was in such extreme pain that I called a doctor. I was admitted to the hospital immediately and diagnosed with peritonitis, punctured uterus and colon. My doctor told the person who brought me in that he did not expect me to live. I spent 16 days in the hospital and had to have major surgery to have the damage done to me repaired.... L-296

***

I was the first person in a family of 13 children to graduate from high school. I was just past my 20th birthday.... I was pregnant.... I was told that I shouldn't be afraid. "Don't worry. There is a guy in ... Ohio who is safe. All the mob guys take their girlfriends there...."

We arrived at dusk and pulled into an alley behind a very old house.... I remember only that the man had said,

"You will probably have some pain, but you'll be okay."

I waited, afraid of what was going to happen, and then the pain began. Hour after hour of the most intense pain I have ever experienced. Then the bleeding began, a hemorrhage so bad the memory of it still frightens me. The hours in the bedroom of my apartment, my roommate begging me to call a doctor, go to the hospital, call my mother, do something are still with me. But...I was afraid to do anything, because I was convinced that...I would go to jail....

Finally, the pain stopped and eventually the bleeding stopped, too. I returned to work, and within a few weeks realized I was still not well. My body was filled with infection. Still frightened about doing something illegal, I went to a doctor and told him that I was sick but did not tell him why.... He warned me that if I had any more heavy bleeding, that I must go to the hospital immediately because I was very anemic from losing so much blood.

Immediately after that visit, I did begin to hemorrhage again, and woke up in.... General Hospital with blood transfusions and IV, and the doctor bending over my bed with tears in his eyes, saying "Why didn't you tell me you had an abortion?" I looked back and answered very truthfully, "Because I thought you would put me in jail." Eventually I healed, went back to work, went on with my life, but kept the memory of my abortion buried in a dark and secret place.

That's my story. Even after all these years, tears spring to my eyes when I think of how frightened I was, how young and desperate and how vulnerable.

I have spent a great deal of my life and my energy dedicated to keeping abortion safe and legal for women.L-267

A large number of illegal abortions were self-induced or performed by unskilled and untrained personnel working under dangerous septic conditions, unaccountable to professional guidelines and safeguards and unreached by ordinary government licensing procedures or other safeguards.[11] Medical procedures, record-keeping and referral techniques were guided by concerns about detection, not best medical judgment.[12]

---

11. See generally, Tietze & Lewit, Epidemiology of Induced Abortion in, Abortion and Sterilization: Medical and Social Aspects 41, 54-56 (J. Hodgson, ed. 1981).

12. See Cates et al., Legalized Abortion: Effect on National Trends of Maternal and Abortion-Related Mortality (1940-1976), 132 Am. J. Ob. & Gyn. 211, 213 (1978) (mortality from induced abortions decreased after abortion legalized and safer legal procedures substituted for

The women received treatment which was often delayed under conditions of severe physical and emotional stress. The process was degrading. Follow up care was entirely lacking or inadequate. These dangerous and humiliating conditions existed precisely because abortions were illegal; they are graphically described by some amici:[13] more dangerous illegal procedures).

---

13. The amici curiae describe a wide range of experiences, many illustrating the horrible conditions existing when abortion was illegal or excessively regulated. L-1, 6, 9, 11, 12, 13, 15, 17, 20, 22, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 35, 40, 45, 46, 49, 52, 53, 54, 63, 65, 66, 68, 69, 70, 73, 74, 75, 79, 87, 89, 94, 96, 100, 101, 107, 111, 113, 116, 118, 125, 127, 128, 129, 130, 137, 140, 145, 150, 153, 154, 156, 161, 162, 164, 167, 169, 171, 181, 184, 186, 189, 190, 193, 200, 205, 206, 208, 211, 215, 217, 219, 222, 223, 225, 226, 228, 229, 232, 233, 236, 240, 241, 243, 247, 248, 257, 259, 260, 262, 263, 264, 267, 269, 274, 279, 280, 282, 287, 288, 291, 293, 294, 296, 298, 301, 303, 304, 305, 310, 312, 314, 315, 316, 320, 321, 324, 326, 327, 334, 335, 337, 338, 339, 340, 352, 354, 355, 358, 359, 360, 363, 365, 366, 367,

I am a 60 year old woman deeply troubled by the possibility that women's constitutional right to determine their own reproductive rights is being threatened and may be taken away....

When I was in my twenties I had an illegal abortion. There were no other options that I saw at that time. Because of the illegality, it was extremely difficult to find someone who would discuss how to find someone to help me. People were afraid. As a consequence, when I finally found a source I had gone beyond the time of a safe procedure. I lied to the "doctor" because I knew he wouldn't do it if I told him how far along I was.... He insisted I come by myself which I did. Is there any way I can describe my fear. He was unclean, he joked a lot, his hands were rough, his breath was bad. He forcefully approached me to have sex with him because "what harm would there be under the circumstance?" That, of course, explained his reason for insisting that I come alone. So, on top of the fear for my physical safety in that situation, the agony of decision about what I was doing, the need to keep this secret away from everyone I knew and face it alone, there was the disgust, repulsion and deep fear that if 368, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 378, 382, 384, 385, 389, 393, 395, 396, 405, 406, 412, 413, 414, 417, 423, 430, 436, 442, 443; RL-4, 12, 19, 21, 37, 43, 45, 59, 60, 62, 65, 67, 70, 72, 75, 77, 79, 84, 85.

---

> I didn't do what he wanted he would send me away....
>
> I never want another woman to have to experience what I went through. My plea is that simple. L-130

See L-32 in Appendix B.

Finally, of course, many women who did not have access to legal abortions suffered the health risks and deeply scarring experience of forced childbearing.

> At the age of 19, through an accident and naivete, I got pregnant.... Having neither the money nor the nerve to face a back-alley abortion, I chose to have the baby....
>
> With some financial help from my parents, we had just bought a little one-room house in another town when we found I was pregnant again. The birth of twins, welfare supplementing my husband's meager income, a one-room house and shaky beginnings exploded a bad marriage....
>
> With help from Welfare and my parents.... I got a job in my field, went off AFDC, and have been a contributing member of society ever since.
>
> But this is not the happy ending to some fairy tale.... I have three children whose beginnings were the result of a slip-up, youthful carelessness and naivete, and a government that claimed control over my body....

> [T]he kids have not done well. Each of them has had run-ins with the law, one is on probation until her eighteenth birthday, all are substance-abusers, it appears none will graduate from high school, and there's a good chance they'll all be chronically unemployed for years to come.
>
> My twin daughters have had four abortions between them. For each, the first was at the age of fourteen....
>
> I love my children dearly, but I think they got a bad break, starting their lives in such difficult circumstances. L-318

B. Before Roe v. Wade, Women Were Punished for Having Abortions, Which Silenced All Women on This Critical Topic

Those amici curiae who recall the days when abortion was illegal, also recall the silence surrounding the topic. If a woman admitted having or needing an abortion, it was only to her most trusted friend or family member. To have an abortion or to aid someone in having an abortion was to risk arrest and prosecution or involvement in legal proceedings.

In late 1955, I was pregnant again. .... I wanted an abortion. But the political atmosphere of the fifties was different from the thirties [when I had had two earlier abortions]. There were crackdowns on suspected "abortion rings." Doctors and hospitals were being surveilled....

[After obtaining an illegal abortion performed by a doctor I became extremely sick and my husband took me to the emergency room at our health maintenance organization].

I was placed on a gurney to await a doctor. I knew that for a physician to diagnose and treat effectively, I must give him all pertinent information. I told him I had had an abortion, and as he could see, it hadn't worked too well. That admission was my mistake. I simply should have said I had miscarried. Now, suddenly, nurses and doctor left the room. They could not admit me, yet. I was very weak and hot and scared. About 45 minutes later two men in street clothes came in. They were deputies from the District Attorney's office, and proceeded to question me: who did it, where, when. I refused to answer, and they told me I had committed a criminal offense and could be "the second woman to go to... in California history" for this offense, unless I cooperated.... The deputies continued to alternately threaten and cajol [sic]. It wasn't hard for me to be silent; I was very sick. I was admitted to the hospital.... My lawyer came every day to confer, for the D.A. was pursuing my case and I was to be charged with a statutory offense....

For the next two months, men from the D.A.'s office came to the door, phoned, tapped our phone, and pressured both me and my attorney to "give in".... Finally my attorney... retained one of the best criminal attorneys in [the city] (a man I could never have afforded) in a "friendship" arrangement, who persuaded me that I must accept the D.A.'s proposition to be a State's witness. When I took the stand I could plead "the Fifth". I felt miserable about protecting myself with the Fifth Amendment. But my attorney said, "they're out to break what they think is a big abortion ring, and they think it's your man, and they aren't going to let go". So, I went to make a deposition.

The questions I was asked and the innuendos that were made were offensive, racist and sexual: "was the fee low in return for sex?"; "did he fondle you?"; remarks suggesting that my husband was not responsible for the pregnancy; and, of course, who, what, when and where. I simply "could not remember" any names or addresses.... Eventually I was subpoenaed as a witness in, [the criminal case against the doctor who performed the abortion] I was not on trial. I was only a witness. But I was nervous, and shaken when I had to face the "defendant" and the catheter.... The doctor from [the hospital] (also called as a witness) met me in the hall before the trial. He said he was "terribly sorry" that I had to go through all this. He had been a brand new staff member when I was brought into Admissions, and he simply was not sure of hospital policy. If only he had not asked... Policy apparently, was not to ask! L-294

***

This story is not unique. Other women were dragged through the public and private drama of prosecution for abortion. See L-568 (story set forth in Appendix B).[14]

3. Since Roe v. Wade, Abortion Has Become an Extremely Safe Procedure and Women Experience It Without Significant Trauma

As soon as abortion became legal, the procedure became extremely safe and has become increasingly so.[15] Treatment

---

14. See also, N.Y. Times, Dec. 4, 1971, at 37, cols. 1-2 (Shirley Wheeler convicted of manslaughter following her abortion in Florida); N.Y. Times, May 8, 1962, at 5, col. 1-3 (Prosecution of Hunter College woman and Bronx N.Y. doctor for abortion); Crissman v. State of Texas, 245 S.W. 438 (Tex. Crim. App. 1922).

15. See J. Legge, Abortion Policy (1985); Atrash et al., Legal Abortion Mortality and General Anesthesia, 158 Am. J. Obst. & Gyn. 420 (1988); Rosenberg & Rosenthal, Reproductive Mortality in the United States: Recent Trends and Methodologic Considerations, 77 Am. J. Pub. Health 833, 834 (1987) (reproduction-related mortality rates for 1982 were as follows: abortion - 0.4 deaths per 100,000 conditions became humane and subject to proper follow up care.

The experience is no longer traumatic;[16] the response of most women to the procedures; contraceptives - 1.3 per 100,000 users; full-term pregnancies - 10.0 deaths per 100,000 full-term pregnancies); Cates & Rochat, Illegal Abortions in the United States: 1972-1974, 8 Fam. Plan. Persp. 86, 92 (1976) (illegal abortion death rate is approximately eight times greater than for legal abortions).

---

16. Many of the amici curiae included in their letters descriptions of how "safe", "clean", "caring" and otherwise supportive the medical treatment was that they received after Roe v. Wade. L-8, 24, 25, 42, 46, 53, 58, 61, 88, 89, 90, 95, 103, 106, 121, 122, 133, 155, 158, 160, 164, 170, 176, 185, 205, 207, 210, 214, 218, 229, 238, 246, 248, 250, 252, 269, 272, 278, 290, 295, 306, 328, 332, 333, 334, 353, 376, 402, 427, 429, 432, 440; RL-6, 10, 22, 34, 45, 54, 55, 73, 78, 86, 89, 93. Several of these women contrasted these good experiences with bad experiences they or friends of theirs had with respect to the medical treatment and the conditions under which it was received before Roe. L-53, 65, 68, 89, 113, 164, 248, 269.

experience is relief.[17] The crisis posed by criminalization of abortion for women's physical and mental health has ended. Moreover, this country no longer punishes or threatens to punish a woman who acts according to her conscience to end her pregnancy.

II. For a Woman, the Decision Whether to Bear a Child or to Have an Abortion is a Profound Judgment Reflecting Not Only Responsibility for Herself and to a Potential Life but Also to Loved Ones, to Community and to Spiritual Values; According to Our System of Limited Government, that Decision Must be Left to Her

> I have heard it said that abortion is just a convenience, especially for middle-class women. I assure you, pregnancy is no mere inconvenience. A

---

17. E.g., L-17, 44, 61, 82, 101, 116, 121, 163, 175, 178, 183, 189, 206, 208, 216, 302, 311, 340, 369, 379, 423, 456, 459, 516, 558, 565, 567; RL-22, 32, 49, 53, 65, 69, 84, 107. See Brief of Amicus Curiae American Psychological Association in Support of Appellees (discussing studies demonstrating positive mental health effects of abortion and discrediting studies to contrary cited by some amici curiae supporting Appellants).

> pregnancy consumes a woman's body, energies and resources for nine months, many times with complications, sometimes at risk to the woman's life. After pregnancy, there is a child, life's most sacred responsibility, for eighteen years, for life. I am not well-to-do. I cannot offer my children the world on a silver platter, but I feel that I and every woman must have the right to offer her child the best chance for life that she can. Every woman must have the right to enter into this life-absorbing responsibility when she decides that she can. L-140

***

> Since my abortion I've listened with interest to the controversy and I've even written to and talked with some of the "pro-lifers" to see if there was something I hadn't been told.... I've found that most of them leave out women's circumstances in their arguments.... As good as many of their intentions may be, their vision tends to be narrowly focused so that they forget to consider the true probable outcome of what they propose. Many forget to account for circumstances such as the life of an unwanted child, the equally "immoral" behavior of the men who made the women pregnant, and the unfortunate financial realities of parenthood in America. L-121

In deciding whether to bear a child or have an abortion, a woman thoughtfully considers the realities of motherhood, her obligations to herself and her family, and the social and economic injustices which she (and her offspring) must face. Her assessment is highly contextual and personal. Futhermore, it is moral--deriving from her diverse duties and her ability to fulfill them, which only she can evaluate.[18]

Women's decision-making on such difficult matters has, however, rarely been appreciated or respected. Indeed it has been denigrated. This was particularly so when abortion was criminal. But it is also denigrated by laws such as those in Missouri which interfere with women's decision-making. As one researcher, studying moral decision-making by women with respect to abortion has said:

---

[18] See C. Gilligan, In a Different Voice: Psychological Theory and Women's Development 65-105 (1982).

> The moral imperative that emerges repeatedly in interviews with women is an injunction to care, a responsibility to discern and alleviate the "real and recognizable trouble" of this world....
>
> Only when substance is given to skeletal lives of hypothetical people is it possible to consider the social injustice that their moral problems may reflect and to imagine the individual suffering their occurrence may signify or their resolution engender.

C. Gilligan, supra note 18, at 100.

These are considerations not within the competence of a government to judge in the abstract, or to regulate fairly.

A. Whether to Bear a Child or Have an Abortion is a Highly Contextualized Uniquely Personal Decision That Is Not Within the Competence of a Distant Government Entity to Make or Fairly Control

Appellants and amicus curiae United States argue that distant state legislatures should be permitted to impose their abstract judgments concerning abortion on women. This position ignores the critical fact that a woman's decision whether and when to bear a child is a uniquely personal private decision requiring a highly specific analysis by the woman of her own situation.

Women who have made public their reasons for choosing abortion describe widely varying circumstances that compel their decision. Despite the differing circumstances one truth emerges: only the woman can best decide whether she is able to care for a new, completely dependent, life while continuing to respond adequately to already existing obligations and responsibilities. This is a profound moral determination; only the woman involved can make it.

Women express a variety of concerns in assessing their responsibilities including competing demands within the family,[19] lack

---

19. E.g., L-1, 3, 6, 9, 10, 12, 15, 18, 24, 29, 30, 33, 36, 40, 42, 44, 45, 46, 54, 59, 64, 65, 66, 68, 69, 72, 74, 78, 80, 84, 87, 88, 89, 93, 94, 96, 98, 99, 101, 116, 125, 126, 129, 132, 133, 138, 140, 142, 144, 152, 156, 160, 168, 172, 173, of adequate financial resources,[20] and

175, 178, 180, 181, 182, 183, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 198, 199, 201, 205, 213, 214, 215, 219, 221, 224, 226, 227, 228, 240, 242, 243, 247, 249, 252, 260, 263, 271, 277, 284, 287, 290, 291, 297, 303, 311, 313, 314, 317, 318, 321, 322, 325, 332, 334, 335, 342, 343, 346, 348, 352, 356, 358, 360, 362, 363, 368, 370, 373, 375, 380, 382, 384, 386, 388, 397, 404, 405, 409, 412, 416, 418, 422, 428, 434, 436, 437, 443, 447, 448, 449, 450, 452, 455, 460, 463, 466, 467, 471, 476, 483, 484, 489, 493, 501, 507, 508, 518, 521, 525, 526, 530, 531, 540, 549, 554, 556, 558, 562, 564, 565, 567; RL-2, 3, 4, 12, 27, 28, 29, 34, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 47, 55, 57, 62, 65, 66, 68, 73, 74, 78, 85, 86, 102, 103, 106, 111, 117, 121, 127.

20. E.g., L-2, 10, 12, 17, 18, 21, 27, 31, 33, 36, 39, 40, 43, 46, 59, 60, 61, 67, 68, 69, 71, 72, 82, 84, 85, 98, 99, 108, 109, 112, 113, 116, 117, 118, 123, 124, 125, 129, 134, 135, 138, 140, 141, 142, 146, 152, 154, 160, 162, 164, 170, 171, 173, 174, 179, 182, 187, 189, 190, 191, 196, 212, 220, 240, 242, 243, 250, 259, 260, 261, 281, 284, 286, 288, 302, 308, 322, 324, 325, 331, 332, 335, 336, 339, 342, 343, 346, 353, 360, 368, 369, 370, 373, 374, 375 401, 405, 412, 415, 421, 422, 430, 432, 439, 440, 443, 450, 454, 455, 457, 459, 460, 462, 466, 472, 475, 478, 480, 483, 486, 496, 497, 499, 508, 511, 512, 522, 526, 535, 541, 542, 545, 549, 555, 558, 560, 562, 566; RL-1, 3, 12, 14, 15, 23, 29, 31, 32, 34, 40, 41, 42, 46, 47, 48, 51, 54, 58, 61, 64, 74, 75, 81, 82, 83, existing health problems incompatible with pregnancy and childbirth.[21] Usually more than one factor is important.[22]

Women weigh these concerns, as well as the highly demanding responsibilities that accompany motherhood. Most of the women who have abortions choose at some time to become mothers, but they choose to do so at times when they are financially, physically and emotionally prepared properly to care for a child. Their assessment of when the 106, 107, 111, 114, 115, 118, 119, 129, 131, 132.

---

21. E.g., L-15, 22, 50, 54, 63, 66, 90, 92, 93, 113, 117, 120, 138, 149, 150, 152, 153, 154, 174, 183, 186, 199, 203, 206, 208, 216, 218, 234, 245, 252, 259, 277, 281, 320, 333, 345, 357, 370, 380, 382, 386, 397, 400, 401, 404, 409, 421, 429, 441, 446, 458, 462, 472, 474, 476, 479, 486, 493, 497, 530, 541, 554, 561, 567; RL-14, 16, 23, 26, 32, 78, 84, 103, 121, 126, 127, 129, 130.

22. Torres & Forrest, Why do Women Have Abortions?, 20 Fam. Plan. Persp. 169 (1988) (survey discussing reasons women elect to have abortions).

time is and is not right is both caring and realistic.[23]

1. Only the Woman Can Determine How Best to Meet the Often Sharply Competing Demands Within Her Family

Mothering, although a source of deep joy when freely chosen, is also demanding, exhausting and stressful, beyond any other commitment.[24] Even women with spouses

---

23. Over and over women who have had abortions say that anyone in favor of "life" must start first by addressing and changing the arduous conditions under which most women and their children live. See generally Law, Women, Work, Welfare, and the Preservation of Patriarchy, 131 U. Penn. L. Rev. 1249, 1249 (1983) ("federal labor and welfare policy 'resolve' the conflict between the traditional assumption that women cannot and should not work outside the home and the reality that they do, in ways that are systematically injurious to women and families") present in the home perform the vast majority of arduous homemaking duties[25] including child care.

24 See L. Genevie & E. Margolies, The Motherhood Report: How Women Feel About Being Mothers (1987) (Reporting results of comprehensive survey of 1,100 mothers randomly selected from 350,000 households nation-wide; reporting on experiences with childbirths, infancy, toddlerhood, and children with illness, disability or behavioral problems).

For those women who are unprepared or unequipped through lack of financial or emotional support, education or skills to provide for support, immaturity, overextension by already existing family and work obligations, or due to health or

---

25. One recent study indicated that on average, employed wives spend twenty-six hours per week on housework while their husbands spend just thirty-six minutes. Cruver, Husbands and Housework: It's still an Uneven Load, USA Today, Aug. 20, 1986, at 5D. See also Burros, Women: Out of the House But Not Out of the Kitchen, N.Y. Times, Feb. 24, 1988, at A1, col. 1 (86% of married women employed full time reported doing most or all household cooking, compared to 93% of married women who stay home); The Division of Labor, 6 Employee Rel. Weekly (BNA) 166 (Feb. 8, 1988) (university study found that men spent 1.6 minutes per day on housecleaning in 1986). Husbands do not significantly increase their participation in household tasks when their wives work outside the home. See, e.g., Hofferth & Moore, Women's Employment and Marriage, in The Subtle Revolution: Women At Work (R. Smith ed. 1979).

family crises, the experience of motherhood or added motherhood can be devastating.

> When I became pregnant for the second time three years ago my son was eight months old and my husband and I had not made a decision about a second child. Our first child was unplanned and I had had great difficulty adjusting to the changes being a parent brought into my life. I was not behaving irresponsibly either time I became pregnant - I was 31, and 32, respectively, I was married and I was practicing a reliable form of birth control that failed.
>
> With this second pregnancy I was forced to confront my true feelings about parenting and I knew introducing another child into a marriage that had been shaken by the unexpected arrival of a first baby could not withstand a second child. I went through a week of serious soul-searching, involving long discussions with my husband and a therapist. It was a difficult painful week but when I made my decision I knew it was the right one for all of us.L-34

Moreover, unexpected childbearing can exacerbate a severe family crisis:

> Two weeks after I discovered I was pregnant, my husband, who had suffered for years with an un-diagnosed illness, was found to have a malignant tumor. After two very expensive visits to psychiatrists I was given permission to have a leagalized [sic] abortion at a local hospital. This was in 1960.

For the next 3 1/2 years...I was the only one who could interpret my husband's garbled speech. He died at the end of that time.

To have an abortion was the wisest decision I have ever made. I could not have been as helpful to my husband or my two children during the horrible time of this dreadful illness.... L-149. See also FL-242 (Counselor).

2. Only the Woman Can Determine Whether She is Financially, Educationally, and Emotionally Ready and Able to Assume Responsibility for a Child

For any woman contemplating having a child, her preparedness to support herself and her children is an important consideration. Many women reasonably fear that childbearing will halt education needed to achieve meaningful work and adequate pay or interrupt work,[26] thus creating a family financial crisis.[27] As one amicus explains:

---

26. See S. Kamerman, A. Kahn & P. Kingston, Maternity Policies and Working Women (1983).

> I have personally had an abortion.... I was twenty-five years old at the time, divorced with two small children, ages five and seven, and a senior in college.... I was putting myself through college with the help of my family, raising my children as a single parent with very little emotional or financial support from my extremely immature ex-husband; I was making grades good enough to consistently keep me on

---

27. Even without children, women's economic circumstances are different than those of men with comparable skill and experience. See Bluebook, Women in the Work Force: Pay Equity: Hearing on S. 98-1050 before the Joint Economic Committee, 98th Cong. 2nd Sess. 9-14 (1984) (submission for the record by Dr. H. Hartmann, of report by National Academy of Sciences, Women, Work and Wages: Equal Pay for Jobs of Equal Value (1981)). If she works, she will have to have higher educational attainment to obtain comparable pay and advancement. See U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, 1 Comparable Worth: Issues for the 80's, 200 (1984) citing U.S. Bureau of the Census, Dep't of Commerce, Money Income of Families and Persons in the United States: 1979-1980; Current Population Reports P-60, No. 129, table 53 (The mean annual earning of a woman with a 4 year college degree is less than a male with only four years of high school).

the dean's honor roll and contemplating going to graduate school.

When I became pregnant I was terrified at the prospect of bringing another child into the world, knowing that I was already strained to the limit, both financially and emotionally with the two children I had. I felt certain that bearing this child would be a disaster for me, my educational plans, my children and possibly for the relationship with the father. After an incredible amount of soul-searching discussions with the father and with doctors and counselors... I decided to have an abortion. L-247

Many women find themselves divorced or single mothers with little income and without child support.[28]

---

28. For example in March of 1985 in the U.S., there were more than 10.5 million families principally supported by women who were divorced, separated, widowed or never married. These families accounted for almost 17% of all U.S. families. Women's Bureau, U.S. Dep't. of Labor, Facts on Working Women No. 86-2 (1986). Of the 8.8 million women living with children under 21 years of age whose fathers were not living in the household in 1986, only 5.4 million, or 61%, had a child support agreement or court award for child support. Of the 4.4 million of them due to receive child support in 1985 only 48% received the full payment due. About 26% received only partial payment, and 26% received none of

I am a divorced professional woman, who is raising three children alone. I barely make it from paycheck to paycheck. My children are very healthy, happy and loved....

I have yet to receive any assistance of any kind in raising my children.

Most times, I feel like I am at the end of the ropes, juggling a career (I am forced to work 2 jobs to support my children, but one of them is a career), finances which are barely met, child-raising alone....

I chose abortion. I chose to limit myself to dealing with the too much responsibility I have now. All women should have the right to chose how much responsibility they feel they are able to handle. Especially since she is the only one she knows she can count on. L-2

***

[A]t the time of the divorce, when I was in my late 30's, the children were 1 and 3. We were thrown suddenly into poverty as my ex-husband refused child the support due. The average amount of child support received by all women due payments in 1985, was $2,220. Bureau of Census, U.S. Dep't of Commerce, Child Support and Alimony: 1985 Current Popluation Reports, Series P-23, No. 152 1-3, 11 (1987). This averaged $109 per month per child, not even enough to support a child at the federal poverty level. Williams, Deficiencies in Child Support: Consequences for Children and Implications for Courts, 12 St. Ct. J. 4, 7 (1988); See generally L. Weitzman, The Divorce Revolution (1985).

---

> support. I had no job skills.... At my first job I earned $100 a month less than the child care cost. The job required me to work 70 hours a week (ass't. manager of a McDonald's). (My husband had disapproved of my working outside the home even though for most of the time we were married we had no children and he was away 14 hours every day.) Our life was a nightmare of fear and struggle after the divorce. L-160

Some women choose an abortion at a time in their lives when their obligations exceed their means and they must depend on welfare or on financial assistance from family or friends:[29]

---

[29] Although most people who go on public assistance do so for a relatively short time, too-early childbearing can consign a woman and her children to long-term poverty with significantly reduced chances of escaping. U.S. Comm. on Civil Rights, A Growing Crisis: Disadvantaged Women and Their Children 5-14 (May 1983).

Monthly welfare payments vary from state to state but no state affords large support. As of January 1989,for a family of three headed by a mother who has no other income, Alabama provided $118 per month, Mississippi $120, California $633, and New York $539. N.Y. Times, Mar. 15, 1989 at A16, col.4 (Citing Family Support Administration of U.S. Dept. of Health and Human Services as source).

> In April of 1988, I obtained a legal abortion. I was twenty years old and faced with an unplanned pregnancy. I already have two sons that came along in my young life. Like most single parents, I live on Public Aid. I also live in one of the poorest regions of Illinois. I was very relieved that there was a safe and legal option to resolve my problem. I believe all women should have reproductive rights for their own bodies. L-212
>
> ***
>
> My reason for getting the first illegal abortion had to do with the fact that in addition to living below the poverty level ($250 a month) with my three little children (eldest child: four and a half), I was no longer married. After a difficult divorce, my ex-husband had never respected the agreement that said he was required by law to pay alimony and child support. I was twenty five, we were living in Montreal, and I had no money to pay a lawyer, so I turned to my father for help. He told me that neither he nor my mother would help me, because they were ashamed of me. L-125

3. Only the Woman Can Determine Whether the Conditions Within Her Life or Family are Healthy Enough to Risk Having a New Child

Some women facing unplanned pregnancies are already dealing with troubled families, abusive spouses and extreme emotional distress.[30] Some of these women decide that they should not bring a child (or another child) into such an environment:

---

> In 1984 I became pregnant by accident. I was married to a man who had become a physically abusive alcoholic. We had one child, age 3, at the time. I didn't see any way out of the relationship for myself.... My husband was not then working.... I was the sole support for my family at this time and had virtually no help from my husband in any area of responsibility. I was emotionally distraught much of the time because I felt I was not providing the material or emotional environment that my child deserved, and because of the constant pressures of physical and emotional abuse.... I knew I could not add the work of caring for another child to my burden, it would have broken me..... With no joy in my heart but with the knowledge that I was certainly making the right choice I had an abortion. L-173

---

30. See R. Dobash & R. Dobash, Violence Against Wives (1979); R. Langley & R. Levy, Wife Beating: The Silent Crisis 1977; L. Walker, The Battered Woman (1979). See also Hilberman, Overview: The "Wife Beater's Wife" Reconsidered, in The Gender Gap in Psychotherapy 213 (P. Rieker and E. Carmen eds. 1984) (documenting psychological impact of spousal abuse ("stress response syndrome") upon victim and transgenerational patterns for perpetrators and victims).

4. Only the Woman Can Determine Whether She Is Healthy Enough to Sustain a Pregnancy and Able to Obtain Adequate Prenatal Care

Many women have abortions because they suffer from health problems that can be exacerbated or made life-threatening by pregnancy.[31]

> Shortly after my husband and I were married, I suffered a nearly fatal bout with a rare and devastating disease, Guillain-Barret syndrome. During a slow recovery, we conceived our first child. Almost immediately I was back in the hospital with a recurrence of the most serious symptoms. As my condition rapidly deteriorated, the physicians attending me decided that an abortion would be necessary to save my life. L-245

---

31. Although few in number, post-viability abortions occur in situations of acute, particularized need often involving the onset or worsening of certain diseases. See generally S.L. Romney, et al. Gynecology & Obstetrics: The Health Care of Women, 697-796 (2nd ed. 1981) (discussing diseases complicating pregnancy).

Obtaining adequate prenatal care is a major problem for many childbearing women.[32] Some women with limited or no access to prenatal care choose abortion because they decide that the risk to themselves and to the potential life they carry is too great.[33] Additionally, many

---

32. Tragically some jurisdictions have attempted criminal action against pregnant women in relation to prenatal care. E.g., People of California v. Stewart, No. M508197, slip op. (Cal. Mun. Ct. San Diego Cty., filed Feb. 26, 1987). See Note, Pregnancy Police: The Health Policy and Legal Implications of Punishing Pregnant Women for Harm to Their Fetuses, 16 NYU Rev. L. & Soc. Ch. 277 (1987-88).

33. In the U.S., access to health care services depends upon possessing health insurance or disposable income. Edelman, Maternal and Child Health Care: A Deepening Crisis, 1985 N.Y.S. J. of Med. 128, citing Kleinman et al., Use of Ambulatory Medical Care by the Poor: Another Look at Equity, 19 Med. Care 1011 (1981). Access is more limited for women of color. Id. (citing National Center for Health Statistics 1980 data). In 1985, prenatal care and uncomplicated delivery cost $3000-5000. Seventeen percent of American women aged 15-44 had no health care coverage and 36% whose annual family women have received medical treatment necessary for their own health that may have endangered a fetus.

> In February 1985, I was treated for an exacerbation of Multiple Sclerosis with a very high dosage of Prednesone for three (3) weeks. Unfortunately, during that period, I unknowingly became pregnant, even though my husband and I were practicing a very reliable method of contraception. Inasmuch as corticosteroids are known to cause severe birth defects, especially during the first 6-8 weeks of pregnancy, I knew I would have to abort the embryo. RL-26

Some women are struggling with alcohol or drug abuse that they are unable to overcome at the time of pregnancy.[34]

> In February, 1982, I had an abortion.... I was 38 years old, married with two children. We were and are still a incomes were less than $10,000 had no coverage. Gold & Kenney, Paying for Maternity Care, 17 Fam. Plan. Persp. 103-04 (1985).

---

34 A woman who is alcohol or drug addicted and pregnant is entitled to have her liberty and privacy fully respected. See ACOG Committee Opinion No. 55, "Patient Choice: Maternal-Fetal Conflict" (Oct. 1987). See also note 32 supra.

typical suburban family - as far as the outside world can see. But life was not ordinary for us in 1982. I was (I am) chemically addicted to the drug alcohol. Beginning in October, 1981 I made my first feeble attempts at recovery from alcoholism.... I wandered in and out of AA meetings....

In the midst of this rollercoaster ride of addiction - in February, 1982, I realized I could be pregnant.... I was frantic, frightened, drained physically, emotionally, spiritually from my alcoholism. I could not manage my own life. The prospect of a baby was overwhelming!.... I chose to have an abortion....

I continued efforts toward recovery, and with the help of support of AA, I have not had a drink since April 13, 1982. L-216. See also L-152 (drug abuse).

5. Only the Woman Can Weigh Her Ability to Provide for a Child Whose Health May Be Seriously Impaired

Many women have faced the revelation that the fetus may be born with serious disabilities.[35] Here again, the woman must decide, ideally with the best available and 35 See, e.g., L-3, 80, 138, 163, 185, 208, 214, 217, 231, 253, 271, 313, 320, 351, 381, 403, 410, 420, 426, 429, 471, 474, 556, 561, 564; RL-26, 51, 84, 86, 110, 123, 132.

---

least biased information and support, whether she can meet existing responsibilities and provide for the expected new responsibility.[36] In addition, some women decide that they cannot give birth to a child who they know would live a lifetime of tragic pain.

> I would never, never, never, in a million years, deliberately and knowingly bring another Tay-Sachs child into the world. The knowledge that I have the ability to spare another child the degradation that my cherished daughter is going through means everything to me. It would be a crime to put another child through the humiliation and pain that this cruel disease inflicts.
>
> At the same time, the hope of someday having a healthy child, and the knowledge that it can happen if we will only have the strength to keep trying, is one of the few things that is helping to keep me sane through the anguish of watching my child slowly die. If abortion were to be made illegal, I would have to give up that hope, as I would never take the risk of conceiving

---

36. See generally Asch, Reproductive Technology and Disability in Reproductive Laws for the 1990's 59 (N. Taub & S. Cohen eds. 1988).

and having to bear another child with Tay-Sachs. L-351[37]

6. Only the Woman Can Determine Whether Moral or Spiritual Values Compel Her to Terminate Her Pregnancy

Many women believe that their religious or moral values impel them not to bring an unwanted child into difficult cirumstances in a hostile world.[38] Others choose a different mode of dedication and service rather than motherhood.

> [M]y pregnancy resulted from a failure of my birth control method,

---

37. Tay-Sachs is a genetic disease occurring in infants and children. Children afflicted with Tay-Sachs disease, or one of the similar allied diseases, suffer slow degeneration, severe mental and physical impairment, resulting in their deaths in infancy or very early childhood.

38 E.g., L-27, 31, 35, 36, 38, 39, 40, 48, 51, 55, 56, 58, 71, 76, 78, 82, 83, 89, 91, 96, 98, 99, 101, 108, 114, 119, 121, 123, 124, 125, 131, 141, 142, 148, 151, 154, 157, 159, 162, 166, 1170, 172, 183, 189, 198, 206, 228, 270, 288, 308, 313, 354, 400, 424, 444, 454, 455, 460, 489, 497, 522, 529, 537, 542; RL-14, 28, 51, 61, 64, 67, 86, 87, 88, 97, 102, 104, 120, 131.

> which is supposedly more than 95% accurate.... I believe that taking the time out to have a child would have changed my life for the worse, whether I would have had the child put up for adoption or not.... I am thought to have a promising career ahead of me as a biomedical researcher. For those who wonder about possible Einsteins that could have been born, what about the female Einsteins that could have developed had their lives not been disrupted by an unplanned pregnancy. RL-53

7. Only the Woman Can Determine Whether She Should Bear a Child for Adoption When She is Unable to Assume Responsibility for Her or His Care

Adoption has been advanced by some as the cureall for abortion.[39] The pain of giving a child up for adoption can be overwhelming:

> In 1977 I had a safe, legal abortion, felt only a great relief at that time, and have never regretted that decision.
>
> In fact, I was particularly aware of how important that choice was. Because fifteen years earlier, in 1962, when I was a college student, I could not get a safe, legal abortion. I endured

---

39. See L.A. Times, Oct. 20, 1988 at __, col. 1 (quoting Pres. Bush as opposing abortion and favoring adoption).

therefore a cruel, forced pregnancy and a forced surrender of my first child, a daughter, to adoption. I have felt only regret and will for the rest of my life... The pain of the loss of my only daughter is indescribable....

She disappeared into the unknown and I was never to know whether she was alive or dead. L-5

***

At 17 years old I became pregnant. I made my choice alone out of confusion and shame. I chose to give my baby up for adoption.... I can only tell you that I could never go through it again and live....

[W]hen I faced the same situation earlier this year, I did not chose adoption. There was alot of soul-searching and memories from the adoption this time. I considered having the baby, but the reality of my financial situation made it impossible.... I don't think the court really understands some of these cruel truths. L-286

***

Adoption was never an alternative for me. Personally, I feel absolutely emotionally incapable of carrying to term and then giving up the child. L-259

***

This time, neither my husband nor I could face another baby.... I do not regret my choice. I am sorry I could not bear that child.... But the cost of having it would have been too high for me, for my husband, and perhaps for our older son. And nice middle-class ladies definitely do not put babies up for adoption. RL-27

***

As an adopted child I know what choice is about. I still feel that abortion should be legal. FL-227

As the comments from amici curiae show, the responsibility of bearing a child or having an abortion is a woman's.

B. The Reality for a Pregnant Woman is That Potential Life is a Part of Her Body

The reality for a pregnant woman is that potential life is a part of her from the moment of conception until birth. This is the salient fact. Arguments as to whether life begins at conception, viability[40] or

---

40. Contrary to arguments by some, the stage at which the fetus is potentially able to live outside the mothers womb with artifical aid has not changed in any significant way since Roe v. Wade. See Brief of Appellees; Brief of Amici Curiae Neurobiologists and Neonatologists in Support of Appellees.

It is estimated that less than 0.01 (one one hundredth of one percent) of all abortions are performed after viability. Henshaw et al., A Portrait of American Women Who Obtain Abortions, 17 Fam. Plan. Persp. 90, 91 (1985). One study suggests that even the 0.01 percent figure may be birth, and labels used to describe potential life--a "fetus," an "unborn child" or a "baby" -- are, by contrast, abstract conceptualizations.[41] A woman is guided by the sure knowledge that the developing life is part of her body,[42] her profound physical burden until the day of birth. After birth the child remains a tremendous responsibility thereafter for too high. Spitz et al., Third--Trimester Induced Abortion in Georgia, 1979 and 1980, 73 Amer. J. of Public Health 594 (1983) (estimating 0.004 percent after examining the data).

---

See RL-78 (pregnant recently widowed woman in the military stationed in third world country received erroneous negative pregnancy test result in 15th week and had to return to U.S. for abortion in 22nd week).

41. See also FL-242 (Counselor: division of opinion on when life begins); FL-245 (Doctor: same).

42. See Regan, Rewriting Roe v. Wade, 77 Mich. L. Rev. 1569, 1579-80 (1979), for an excellent summary of the physical burdens of pregnancy.

the woman -- a responsibility greater than any other known to human beings.

> When I was nineteen I became pregnant with my first child. I never thought of doing anything other than having the baby....
>
> 1 1/2 years ago I became pregnant again. Initially we were glad as we recognized the sacredness of life. But in time and through discussion I realized I was not ready to be the mother of two. I also felt my 13 month old son deserved my full attention and demanded it. At this point we fully understood the realities and stresses of parenting. The financial responsibilities create very high levels of stress and even our love for each other and our son didn't make it any better. After a heart wrenching decision we chose abortion. Not out of convenience or hate but out of love for the unborn child we knew we were unprepared to take proper care of. L-187

See also, e.g., L-181.

Any legislative determination that potential life begins before it can be sustained outside the womb will be abused.[43] Only the pregnant woman can

---

43. Section 1.205.1, Mo. Stat. Ann. (Vernon Supp. 1989), has already been used to a woman's detriment in the State of judge her ability to sustain the responsibility of childbearing. Even if in rare instances a woman feels she erred in her judgment, no one else could have judged better because no one else occupied her unique position of knowledge and responsibility.

C. For a Woman, To Choose an Abortion is Not Separate or Distinct from Any Other Conduct Protected By the Right of Privacy

Preventing conception is not completely within a woman's control for a variety of physical, economic and social reasons. Moreover, for a woman, contraception as a procedure is not sharply distinguishable

---

Missouri as the basis for overriding a pregnant woman's elected treatment options and ordering an forced cesarean. See Deaconess Hospital v. Ilester McRoberts and Kevin McRoberts, No. 874-00172 Div. No.2 (Mo. Cir. Ct., St. Louis Cty., May 21, 1987). See Kolder et al., Court-Ordered Obstetrical Interventions, 316 New Eng. J. Med. 1192, 1194 (1987) (criticizing court intervention).

from abortion as a procedure.[44] For this reason, a woman's right of privacy would be abrogated if women lost the right to choose an abortion.

A woman in an intimate relationship with a man in this culture normally will be expected by that man (and often by others as well) to engage in sexual intercourse with him[45] even though it is she, not he, who will bear the primary risks, costs and

---

44. For example, not all contraceptives prevent ovulation or fertilization. Some prevent or interfere with implantation. See 43 Fed. Reg. 4231 (1981) (discussion of "mini-pill"); Burnhill, Intrauterine Contraception in Fertility Control 271, 280 (Carson et al. eds. 1985) (IUD function); Johnson, Contraception: The Morning After Pill, 16 Fam. Plan. Persp. 2661 (1984) (DES); Morris & von Wagner, Interception: The Use of Postovulatory Estrogens to Prevent Implantation, 115 Am. J. Obst. & Gyn. 101 (1973) (same).

45. See C. MacKinnon, Privacy v. Equality in Feminism Unmodified 93, 96-97 (1987).

burdens.[46] Some women never intended to become pregnant, but as a result of misinformation or lack of maturity, education, resources or access to contaceptives, either could not, or did not, take precautions.[47] Others had used

---

46. Cf. Michael M. v. Superior Court, 450 U.S. 464 (1981) (statutory rape law applied only to males upheld, in part, upon the reasoning that female sexual conduct deterred by prospect of pregnancy).

47 Henshaw & Silverman, The Characteristics and Prior Contraceptive Use of U.S. Abortion Patients, 20 Fam. Plan. Persp. 158, 166 (1985) (in sample of reported abortion cases, non-use of contraceptive greatest for those who were young, never-married, poor, minority or less educated). Many of the amici curiae were minors when they experienced the unwanted pregnancy they describe. L-1, 27, 36, 53, 69, 85, 88, 98, 107, 111, 121, 128, 131, 132, 154, 155, 159, 162, 169, 178, 190, 202, 211, 222, 233, 250, 254, 262, 273, 274, 286, 287, 292, 302, 303, 305, 316, 317, 331, 339, 340, 348, 356, 357, 363, 365, 378, 379, 389, 395, 413, 416, 423, 428, 437, 448, 454, 456, 461, 469, 487, 497, 498, 499, 500, 504, 506, 510, 516, 520, 527, 538, 542, 550; RL-13, 19, 48, 54, 56, 60, 63, 74, 79, 94, 125, 128, 133.

contraceptives but because of difficulties with contraceptive methods, were changing or abandoning methods when they became pregnant.[48]

Many women never intended to be pregnant, took appropriate steps to prevent pregnancy,[49] and those steps failed[50]

---

48 Henshaw & Silverman, supra note 47, at 165 (91% of women seeking abortions in 1987 had used contraception at some time; 18% prior users were pregnant within one month of stopping; 47% within three months).

49. In an effort to avoid unwanted pregnancy, some women opt for sterilization. See L-270 in Appendix B. This strategy is not available to all women because many desire to delay childbearing, not forestall it altogether, Henshaw & Silverman, supra note 47, at pp.164-65.

In 1982, 27% of all women over age 15 were sterile, 25.7% of whom were surgically sterile, 17% for contraceptive purposes. U.S. Dep't. Commerce, Statistical Abstracts of the United States 1987 (Table No. 99 citing 1982 U.S. National Center for Health Statistics). Almost 37% of the remaining population used non-surgical contraception, 9.2% were seeking pregnancy or were post partum pregnant, and 26.9% were not using contraception (and of those approximately 72% were sexually inactive). Id.

because all forms of artificial birth control are defective. Many of the amici curiae, had on the occasion of their unwanted pregnancy, used contraceptives that failed.[51]

---

50. Henshaw & Silverman, supra n. 47, at 166-67 (over half of the women who had abortions in 1987 were using contraceptive during month of in which they became pregnant).

51 Including, e.g., an I.U.D., e.g., L-1, 9, 19, 77, 78, 90, 113, 136, 138, 174, 198, 241, 246, 249, 252, 257, 270, 290, 359, 369; a contraceptive pill, e.g., L-164, 174, 204, 376; a diaphragm, e.g., L-48, 53, 87, 150, 156, 226, 229, 254, 270, 306; a sponge, e.g., L-67; a condom and foam, e.g., L-115, 144, 222; or the cervical cap, e.g., L-142. See L-7, 23, 25, 31, 40 (vasctomy), 43, 49 (contraceptive failed 3 times), 52, 55 (seven times), 59, 68, 69, 72, 74, 86, 101, 102 (age 50), 105, 108, 132, 133 (three times), 137, 170, 172 (sterilization), 177, 179, 182, 183, 192, 210, 218, 227, 239, 294, 315, 356, 364, 375, 401, 404, 426, 438, 451, 453, 454, 455, 456, 466, 467, 470, 479, 480, 482, 483, 486, 491, 496, 507, 508, 512, 513, 514, 522, 528, 529, 534, 535, 537, 540, 541, 544, 545, 549, 552, 557, 558, 560, 562, 564, 567; RL-1, 7, 8, 10, 14, 15, 22, 23, 25, 26, 27, 32, 34, 36, 39, 41, 45, 46, 48, 50, 51, 53, 57, 64, 68, 69, 70, 71, 79, 81, 82, 83, 85, 87, 88, 92, 95, 97, 99, Finally some women become pregnant because of forced sex. Given the likelihood of conception in the absence of contraception, these tragic circumstance do result in unwanted pregnancies. Amici curiae describe unwanted pregnancies resulting from rape by a stranger, friend ("date rape") or husband ("marital rape").[52] See L-28, 44, 75 (former nun raped by her priest-confessor), 113, 131[53] 243, 244, 251, 301, 302, 352, 383, 416, 487, 524, 526, 535. RL-58, 60, 92, 94, 133. FL-5, 30, 53, 67, 122, 242, 264.

---

101, 102, 103, 107, 112, 113, 118, 120, 123, 126, 129, 131, 133.

52. The FBI has estimated that in the United States in 1987, one forcible rape occurred every 6 minutes (91,000 occurrences reported). FBI, Uniform Crime Reports for the United States 6, 13-15 (1987). Rape is a crime frequently unreported and difficult to report because it is stigmatizing. Additionally, marital rape is unreported because it is not illegal in most states. See, e.g., D. Finklehor & K. Yllo, Licence to Rape: Sexual Abuse of Wives (1985) (Estimating 10-14% of all married women experience marital rape; majority of states have not abolished marital rape exemption). See generally S. Estrich, Real Rape (1987).

> In 1977, I became active in the antiabortion movement....
>
> In 1980, I found myself pregnant as a result of a forced sexual encounter...I realized that my life was also a "human life," and that I knew I simply could not bear a child from such an ugly experience!
>
> I went to a clinic in my city (one which I had even picketed at one time), and I had the abortion there....
>
> Since my abortion (quite some time later), I became a born-again Christian.... I find my faith in Christ strengthens my pro-choice commitment. Jesus Christ tells me as a Christian to "judge not, that ye be not judged" (Mt. 7:1).... L-28

Some friends of amici describe the abortion experiences of young women who were the

---

53. One amicus describes a brutal rape and the demeaning circumstances that she suffered to end the resulting pregnancy. See L-131 in Appendix B.

victims of incest. See FL-5, 53, 61, 122.[54]

It is grossly intrusive, demeaning, unreasonable, unfair and unduly burdensome to condition the right of any woman pregnant due to any form of forced sex to have her reasons for wanting an abortion scrutinized or to be required to "report" the forced sex as a precondition to ending her unwanted pregnancy.

---

54. By 1985, there were 113,000 reports of child sexual abuse annually, the vast majority of them involving parents and other family members. Kleiman, "The Last Taboo: Case on L.I. Pierces the Silence on Incest," N.Y. Times, Sept. 28, 1987, at A1, col. 1. Unreported cases far outnumber those that are reported. See generally D. Whitcomb, E. Shapiro and L. Stellwagen, When the Victim Is a Child: Issues for Judges and Prosecutors 4-5, 84 (1985); D. Russell, Sexual Exploitation: Rape, Child Sexual Abuse and Workplace Harassment 180-94 (1984) (16% of randomly selected women had been victims of incestuous abuse, 64% of whom experienced forced vaginal penetration.)

For all women, the option of abortion, without government interference,[55] is vital; without that option, other guarantees of freedom in our Constitution are meaningless.

CONCLUSION

Women's privacy and liberty interests constitutionally protected by Roe v. Wade would be substantially infringed upon by the provisions of the Missouri statute at issue. Reproductive Health Service v. Webster, 851 F.2d 1071. As outlined at

---

55. But see Brief of the United States, at 22-23 n.16, suggesting that it is reasonable to make a women submit to "the... question... whether a woman has been afforded a meaningful opportunity to avoid an unwanted pregnancy, taking all of the options available to her, including abstinence and contraception." Id. at p.22. Obviously, this approach invites both grossly punitive statutory provisions that will undoubtedly spring from stereotypes, not the reality of women's reproductive lives, and intrusive systems of mini trials upon the "reason" that each woman is experiencing unwanted pregnancy.

length in the Brief for Appellees, section 1.205.1 (1) (life begins at conception) provides the basis for coercive treatment of pregnant women. See note 43 supra. Sections 188.029 (fetal viability tests for fetuses of twenty weeks or more gestational age) 188.205 and 188.215 (prohibitions on use of public funds and facilities) and 188.210 (prohibitions on work of public employees) will lead to delay, lack of information, misinformation and lack of health services, all of which increase health risks for women. These provisions increase the cost and diminsh the availability of services and thus present substantial impediments to those most in need of services.

The option of abortion, as the letters and statements of amici curiae make clear, is fundamental to women's lives, liberty and their pursuit of happiness. Amici curiae and their friends urge this Court to reaffirm its original holdings in Roe v. Wade and subsequent decisions[56] upholding women's reproductive choice, and to affirm the decision of the court of appeals below.

56. Thornburgh v. ACOG, 476 U.S. 747 (1986); City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416 (1983).

Respectfully submitted,

March 30, 1989

Sarah E. Burns
Counsel of Record
Helen Neuborne
Alison Wetherfield
NOW Legal Defense and Education Fund
99 Hudson Street
12th Floor
New York, NY 10013
212-925-6635
and
1333 H Street, NW
11th Floor
Washington, D.C. 20005
202-682-0940

Dawn Johnsen
National Abortion Rights Action League
1101 14th Street, NW
Washington, DC 20005
202-371-0779

* Counsel for amici curiae acknowledge attorney Lynn Paltrow for her leadership in ensuring that the voices of women concerning abortion reach this Court, see Brief of Amici Curiae National Abortion Rights Action League et al. in Thornburgh v. ACOG, U.S. Sup. Ct. Nos. 84-495 and 84-1379, and for her insights shared in the preparation of this brief.

 Amici curiae also thank New York Attorney Carole Cleaver for her dedicated assistance in preparing this brief.

APPENDIX

APPENDIX A

Here follow the names of the 2887 amici curiae, women who have had abortions (including 849 Jane Roes) and their 627 friends. This is a random list; the position of the names bears no relation to the sequential order of the lodged letters.

NAMES OF AMICI CURIAE

Ann Davis Melbye, Elizabeth M. Nikoloric, Christine Molnar, Sharon A. Wimpy, Eugenie Seidenberg Delaney, Alice Z. Lawrence, Susan Laurence, Mary L. Donnelly, Mary Bengtson-Almquist, Marilyn Magnuson, Diane E. Gow, Kathie Rogers, Kathy Lenington, Elaine Stansfield, Betsy Morrison, Melanie A. Cloghessy, Caren Cronk Thomas, Julie Lehnis, Sara-Jane M. Cohen, Dana K. Ellis, Andrea Boroff Eagan, E. Jean Oton, JoAnn Castillo, Rebecca Stone, Paula McKenzie, Jada Wright, Amy J. Amoon, Virginia Tornes, Terrye Witte, Sherri L. Anderson, Judith M. Allen, Lisa M. Kushner, Phyllis C. Edwards, Randy Rutkin, Kay J. Stenberg, Beth F. Cohen, Vickie Algarin-Randle, Kathy K. Astor, Nancy Goldhill, Deborah L. Bacon, Michele Wilson, Belinda Etezad, Claudia Cleaver, Dr. Sarah N. Papier, Andrea M. Smith, Nancy Newton, Beatrice A. Beeson, Faye K. Daly, Mollie Moore-Sullivan, Vicki Sotak, Marg Chandler, P. M. Roper, Leslie A. Allen, Lucille Purdy, Susan Dudley, Pauline A. Roberts, Lori V. Battistoni, Gail C. Feldman, Ph.D., Pamela Chilton, Natalie G. Delvaille, Roberta Piell, Adrianne C. Bodensteiner, Marla R. Netzer, Elizabeth White, Wilma T. Young, Julie Ann Allender, Beth J. Wickler, Ann F. Crowe, Renee N. Chelian, Mary Gillmor-Kahn, Susan L. Goldring, Ursula Le Guin, Susan A. Taylor, Susan Woodin, Linda S. Winslow, Pat Moshimer, Janet G. Clark, Nicole Ballardini, Mary D. Rendall, Mabel L. Eisner, Dorothy Haymes, Kathryn Lowery, Sharon Reed-Miller, Bernice W. Smith, Barbara Griffith, Margaret L. Hofmann, Edith Butler, Nansea A. Levy, Susan D. Hill, Angie King, Jessie Hillinger, Mignon F. Souto, Diane B. McCarthy, Ilse Asplund, Cari Vallo, Michal Reed, Ann E. Holmes, Margo Adrienne Master, Felicia C. Wicker, Gwen Williams, Robin L. Magee, Kate Lehn, Laurie Naranjo, Jane E. DeNeefe, Lee Gardner Dewey, Doris Espy, Ileen Self, Virginia R. Baim, Laura Israel, Jody Sova, L. Jean Rowe, Olive Karen Stamm, Esq., Sara K. Krusenstjerna, Eleanor Arkowitz, Anne D. Ehrlich, M.D., Elizabeth B. Conant, Nicolette Noyes, Wynne E. Smith, Lyra Halprin, Rosalind Stark, Christel S. Carlson, Nicolette R. Elko, Eleanor Breese, Ellen ~~Cohen,~~ Ethel E. Bishop, Arlene Halfon, Linda Henry, Janet M. Osborn, Teresa M. Goetz, Margaret Nell Webb, Marilyn Schaeffer, Annie Osburn, Elizabeth M. Proctor, Frances T. Shalent, Ann Davis Melbye, Barbara T. Chang, Barbara Kraft, Sharon Weisman, Mrs. Blanche Twyman, Heather L. Grimshaw, Betty Ackermann, Dorothy C. Gunter, Beverly Richert, Linda Shapiro, Suzanne Huston, Marjorie B. Zucker, Ph.D., Paula B. Weingarten, RN, Barbara Katz, Judith A. Schroeder, Leslie Kim Smith, Jane Husman, Meredith Cahn, Sharon Mullane, Kathleen R. Urch, Kerie Hitt, Leslie M. Clark, Sara Horowitz, Tineke Ritmeester, Ph.D., Lisa Hoffman, Mary E. Jennings, Luba Fineson, Lore Feldman, Bertha K. Bowerman, Jean Lynam, Anita Beamon, Mona M. Clark, Felicia Value, Ann M. Mallouk, Rhonda Rossman, Judy Cosdon, Maxine S. Seller, Andrea L. Ross, Carolyn Buhl, Sara B. Deringer, Gail Judd, Janet Gotkin, Carla S. Gibbs, Carol Ann Peterson, Mary Alice Wanamaker, Frances V. Martin, Judith Roth, Mary Jean Haddin, Jean S. Gross, Lorri Bauder, Sheerah R. Roache, Susan R. Necheles, Katie Cushman, Fanny Jay, Syd E. Rosen, Annette Rotter, Maurine M. Ruddy, Sandra Davis, Joanne Goldwater, Suzanne Freeman, Cheryl L. Payne, Vita Henderson, Lillian G. Gordon, Barbara LeBey, Joan Meyers, Malani Sternstein, Mary Whalen, Connie Mitchell, Darla Dawn Turpen, Anne F. Taylor, Penny Fujiko Willgerodt, Sue Roselle, Sadja Greenwood, M.D., Donna Nasoff, Lisa Marie Strzelecki, Cynthia C. Ramseyer, Ruth D. Jacobson, Rebecca J. Bernhard, Florence E. Moore, Chrisanne Gordon, Sheila Wood, Linda Brown, Peggy Pridemore, Joanne Katz, Jeri K. Ernst, Stephanie Tournas, Shannon Wegele, Laura L. Hitchcock, Karen Deaver, Ethorne LaBarr, Jasmine Ellen Wolf, Nancy C. Bowen, Susan A. Griffel, Carol L. Campbell, Maria Patrick Oakley, Julie L. Moore, Pamela Dennis Thomas, Coleen Murphy, Tammy Jo Abbott, Millicent Kaufman, Marilyn Davis, Jan L. Palchikoff, Emily Hancock, Pauline Gardiner, Amy Goldsmith, Melissa Madden, Iris Hale, Alice Alexander, Justine Schiffer, Sharon Richer, Lisa Johnson Waugh, Christine Soto, Willa Williams, Onna Spohn, Deborah R. Slepian, Terry A. Jones, Pamela Hoey, Karen Raylene Mellos, Elizabeth Arthur, Elizabeth Seton Stone, Robyn Kramer, Cara Lou Wifler, Susan Morton, Wanda Martin, Mareen Hoerle , Linda Weiss, Ellin London, Ann Riley Owens, Lisa Fontes, Virginia L. Senders, Lori J.

Ingram, Lin Lawrance Chase, Mary O. Wright, R.N., Lucy C. Metting, Silvana & Marie Pretel, Jane L. Timmermans, Vera Lucile Mundy, Leslie Byers, Ruth Anderson, Stacey Rose-Blass, Fay Anderson, Ed.D., Renee Rose Shield, Andrea Thrasher, Bonita Siler, Judith Grossman, Hilda Steckel, Laurie C. Urias, Beverly Johnsen, Sarah T. Mack, Phyllis C. Hall, Nancy H. Coffin, Mary L. Litman, Linda Kolker, Lisa DuPont, K. Johnston, Tiffin Shewmake, Linda L. McCulloch, Linda L. McCulloch, Carole Riggin, Ms. Angela H. Mohr, Thelma B. Moody, Marsha Dale, Lori L. Wichhart, Helen J. Keever, Roberta Branagan, Catalina Hall, Geraldine Misner, Janice Vondrasek, Anna Gullette, Celia S. Miklos, Lenore Walton, Gayle Schucker, Susan B. Jones, Janice Harris, Jane Jinks, Patricia Clay Grooms, Nancy K. Weled, Gail Ashburn, Jennie Stevens Marsh, Gina Burrell, Donna M. Clark, Betty B. Moser, Margaret N. Poxon, Julie Burke, Barbara M. Young, Jenefer Ellingston, Barbara A. White, Marky Deese, Claudia Cleaver, Kathleen Feinblum, Louise Eweus, Susan Brown, Pauline Lynch, Catherine F. Goldman, Lisa M. Hummel, Mary E. Hudson, Holly Fernandez, Myra Brown Gorelick, Emilie N. Junge, Judith Seigel, Christine Tyner, Ruth Ellen Lindenberg, Susanna S. Cuyler, Lil Friedlander, Lori A. Black, Judith Bell, Jacqueline Perry, Victoria Dedek, Susan Satterfield Burtoff, Sara C. Hill, Bobbe Banks Salkowitz, Linda Harroun, M.S.W., Claudia F. Coffee, Jane Ising, Deborah Lewis, Barbara Finesmith, Frances G. Block, Pamela Johnson, Phoebe Frosch, Mary Reynolds-Parra, Robin Cash, Alyson Smith-Bradford, Jessica Schiffman, Kimberly L. Mitchell, Susan J. Phillips, Susan Grimes, Patricia L. Cunningham,

Patricia Miller, Susan E. Curan, Suzanne Wallis, Amy Blum, Edna Mayer, Manya B. Warn, Lynnda Cramer, Jane S. Speyer, Marla Felcher, Pearl F. Shipman, Florence Waber, Susanne Carlson, Dianne E. Nelson, Deborah Higdon, Constance Schlesinger, Elizabeth A. Good, Angela Cali, Marilyn Dreampeace, Nancy J. Rosson, Nansie Van Der Hout, Janice Hayri, Elissa Raiten, Carolyn Judd, Sara Meric, Susan Boyes, Joan Hertzberg, Leslie Hartley Gise, MD, Mrs. Joel M. Segal, Barbara Winslow, Natalie A. Uzoff, Jennifer Welker, Theresa Ferguson, Cindy Heath-Simon, Janet VanDeusen, Joanna Ward, Sonia I. Schneider, Angela Anthony, Virginia T. Sheen, Jill Medvedow, Lynne Schroeder, Rose E. Pinkas, Mary Osborn Black, Sylvia Roussi Kennedy MD, Ilene J. Dale, Ruth M. Glick, Ph.D., Rena Smilowitz, Gabrielle O'Brien, Tamar E. Abrams, Yvonne Singer, Elaine Burton, Marge Mulhall, Ann A. Cruse, Judith A. Gray, Roberta B. Hutner, Jill C. Roese, Frederika Ann Robinson, Monica L. Parish, Joan Garrity, Christine E. Johnson, Annette L. Ravinsky, Carol Moore, Jane Lindsay Miller, Virginia Childs, Susan A. Smith, Adrienne Kavelle, Jean McFarland, Patricia Lazar, Arlene Ferguson, Marlene S. Eshelman, Ms. Jerri Ann Moore, Marian Galbraith, Jamie Fischman, Melissa J. Mendell, Elizabeth C. Berigan, Barbara Engel, Laura Moody, Nancy Bretz, Virginia C. Eskridge, Lisa Whaley, Ruth A. Campbell, Jeanne Lewison, Arlene P. Cayer, Geraldine Tarbutton, Alice Marie Holland, Elizabeth G. Whaley, Judith Shure, Margaret L. Sullivan, Anne Moriarty, P. Kaiman Rayner, Beverly Barrett, Elisa Goldberg, Nancy J. Watson, Tina M. Balsamo, Shannon Wood, Susan L. Rose, Laura B. Woltz, Georgia Christgau, Jackie Pardon, Carolyne Epstein, Marcia Todhunter DeRosa, Suzanne Connolly, Isabelle Taylor, Louise Hodin, Valerie Hedquist, Leah C. Mayhew, Joyce Madsen, Cathleen Ruth Deppe, Leslie Hodges, Christine Kraemer, C. Vernell Hubbs, Elizabeth P. Zissa, Lucia Cies, Mindy Sue Cohen, Christine Anderson, Leslie D. Clark, Betsy G. de Leiris, Pamela Dunlap-Patterson, Susann G. Mark, Frances C. Whittelsey, (Mrs.) Mildred Kadell, Jean Rosenthal, Patrice G. Kleinberg, Nadine Grady, Carol Ferguson-Sneed, Peggy A. Norman, Linda L. Wells, Gail Harrison, Lisa Quackenbush, Connie Cafagno, Jerry Robb, Ragnhild Fredriksen, Martha E. Munzer, Becky Ellis, Denise A. Thal, Nancy E. Grossman, R. M. Hardister, Margaret C. E. Tingley, Etta J. Posnick, Patricia Milner, Herta Drucker, Gay Katilius, Claudia B. Logan, Regina June Marcus, Mary Elizabeth Cashel, Gail Reiner Davis, Sue E. Bertram, Deborah Dvorak Hunter, Jill A. Smith, Beulah P. Minkoff, Barbara Brandt, Sylvia Stengle, Susan Kelly Scholl, Arlynn R. Grimm, Susan H. Pincus, Traci N. Snow, Lyle L. Warner, Jennifer Putman, Linda J. Myers, Magda Krance, Margo B. Loring, Harriette Ramos, Susan Green, Mary M. A. Evans, Anne Bracewell, Deborah S. Ruhe, Mrs. Frances Meehan, Kay Abraham, Zola Dincin Schneider, Rene L. Bushan, Roslyn A. Schwartz, Harriette S. Glasner, Elizabeth C. Parker, Tam Fletcher, Iris M. Kaplan, Mary-Scott Welch, Meloney J. Sallie, Julia Ericksen, Pamela R. Kirsch, Judith J. Levine, Gloria Friedman, PH.D., Ms. Helen B. Stern, Louise Moed, Edith Bliss Stubbs, Gail Cowie, Deborah Hedwall, Lilly Rivlin, Betty Schacht, Carole Seligman, JoAnn Wheeler-Burbank, Gloria R. Allred, Roz Kupferman, Ann C. Robinson, Esq., Janet L.

Mattern, Virginia M. Hudson, Judie J. Hartley, RNC, Claire Kahane, Anne Jennison, Jean S. Fraser, Meredith Ann Madri, Gael K. Gallant, Jacqueline Beard, Vicki Roberts Hall, Eava Lufkin, Deirdre Finney Boylan, Jill McMillen, Elaine Melson Madsen, Jackie Clark, Adrienne M. Smeltzer, Crystal A. Harmes, Leona Farless, Julie Borcherding, Tonya J. Fowler, Teresa Carroll, Jennifer Oddleifson, Amy Smith, Elizabeth C. Beard, Ann Townsend, Gina Secrest, Dorothy Cobbs Shaw, Janet L. Pregel, Cathy Dean, Monica Sandoval, Gloria E. Albetta, Joyce Bogan, Mary F. Whalen, Caitlin O'Heaney, Kathy Huddleston, Helen L. Grieco, Jane Kappus, Julie Raffety, Karen Marshall, Judy L. Meuth, JoAnn Conant, Samantha Frost, Gail E. Ellis, Kay M. Rippelmeyer, Peggy Powell Dobbins, Marjorie Howard, Marjorie Howard, Ann Petry, Margaret M. Conway, Bertie J. Weddell, Susan J. Schramm, Marge Piercy, Lisa A. Flood, Leslie Gallagher, Julie Wuthnow, Carla Watkins, Diane Workman Derzis, Nancy Lord, MD, Sarah Gilmore, Carol Edge, Suzanne R. Garnier, Leonore Tiefer, Hannah T. Gibbs, Cheri Casolari, Cindy Cobb, Karin Stallard, Janet Stevens, Carol J. Friedman, Glennito Myers, Annette S. Lessmann, Kristi Young, Carolyn Nemeth, Sandra L. Frye, Nancy Ippolito, Deborah Wachtel, Laura Strauss, Karlene John, Abby Snay, Sally Brennan, Susan Slovak, Sara E. Rose, Darla Green, Alice Carroll, Mary Ellen Griffith, Martha Betcher, Nancy Baker, Ann Malester, Frances Ziegler, Holliday B. Wagner, Kathryn Sweeney, Susan W. Griffin, Erika Woodyard, Wendy Maury, Kelly Nelson, Joanna Levine, Diane Ehrensaft, Ruth Krauss, M.D., Sally O. Hawn, Veronica Elliott, Shirley Sadjadi, Norma Stringer, Judith Ann Burk, Nancy

Roth, Janet Colm, Carrie Burgess, Madeline Helbraun, Bonnie L. Cumings, Nancy N. Artus, Anne Merrill, Jean D. Grambs, Marcie Sillman, Rosalyn Murray, Lisa Moore, Vicki VanLandingham, Lorraine Fuller, Rose Marie Prins, Becky Mayo, Katya Kirsch, Penelope Tingle, Barry Osborne, Patricia D. Lockhart, Sherry Foster, Julie Jay, Connie Torres, Laurie Cunningham, Linda J. Nordquist, Kathryn M. McKeown, F.S. Hazel, Carolyn Roundey, Vicky Cullen, Juliet Kadlecek, Christine Curran, Jane A. Ripley, Linda J. Merrifield, Pamela Torazzo Azar, Janette Case, Sarah N. Papier, Ph.D., Beverly McClendon, Janice Habbley, Winifred Sewell, D.Sc., Cynthia McCloskey, Rosemary Curran, Margaret Zanger, Elizabeth Johnson, Lisa C. C. Edman, Lori Wilcox Ott, Rhonda Robinson, Elese Humphries, Brenda S. Bishop, Marcia P. Hallock, Susan L. Vogt, Marie E. Berglund, Linda S. Fernandez, Laura Richard, Sharon Pope, Sue Selick, Samantha E. Ostertag, Jill A. Atkins, Judith Rosenstern, Sandra Williams, Michelle Roth Ansdotter, Sioban Harlow, Ph.D., Kim Klausner, Roberta Cass Dileo, Alissa Guyer, Donna Snyder, Diane Peterson, Sylvia Evans, Michelle R. Mercier, Pegge Hopper, Bambi Lynn Yost, Lois Rosett, Louise Goodman, Marsha A. Shopsis, Anna M. Theobald, Kim Baldwin, Sylvia Tesh, Ann Marlowe, Michelle M. Lamoreaux, Lou Robinson, Ana Coghlan, Dianne Tripp, Sherry Atkinson, Tammy Ledbetter, C. A. Cooke, Kristi Schell, Ri Gleason, Alice R. Bentley, Donna Hughes-Hasle, Margaret Baumgartner, Evan Young, Pat Purcell, Lillie M. Shirley, Debbie Tessandore, Annetta K. Gregory, Kathy Shea, Laura Russell, Susan B. Kullman , Sandi Goldstein, Elaine S. Hofberg, Regina

Kessler, Claudia Summer, Veronica Slajer, Joyce - Goodman, Pat Hartwell, Alison M. Conner, Cindy Ehrman, Margaret Alois Gifford, Eileen Donnelly, Ginger A. Peugh, Leslie Cain, Ann Leonard, Pa Pao Ihouampide, Melissa Bernstrom, Kathleen M. Haynes, Vicki A. Zeitner, Oda Friedheim, Maria Rodriguez, Sheri Rene Hill, Leslie R. Wolfe, Nikki Mason, Nancy Stearns, Joanne Mattson DeVoe, Rubin Mahan, Joyce C. McIntyre, Maribeth Oakes, Lee Ullmann Fenner, Michelle Patzke, Beverly Bajema, Ann Williams, P. Duxbury, Gail Sokoloff, Martha Lankton, Joyce George, Lisa Connell, Lynn Lichner, Sally Lichner, Ginger Moss, Sally Penso, Corinne Russ, Kathy Feinsinger, Kathryn Andree, Carol Snell, Keely L. Collins, Gail A. Martin, Amanda Bennett, Elaine M. Landon, Martha Bodtke, Dr. C. E. Carr, Andrea M. Theisson, Sari J. Bennett, Elizabeth K. Heisinger, Kathleen M. Wormwood, Brenda Williams, Sharon Borgia, Cheryl L. Price, Bonnie R. Andrews, Judith Kurtz, Yvonne L. Monroe, M.D., Dimity Nyhus, Beatrice Spear, Ed.D., Diana Scheffler, Lida Bates, Fern H. Munro, Kay H. Lusky, Tara Cleckler, Diane Bernardo, Vicki Corby, Karen Kirbis, Karla Smith, Stephanie Collins, Yolanda Hernandez, Linda Overhauser, Margot McCormick, Sherry Hilscher, Darlene Cobbey, Debbie Collier, Patricia K. Poyner, Suzanne Jarrett, Becky Cogsdill, Tillie Atkins, Bonnie LaFleur, Joann Murdy, Kit Guest, Mary R. Weldon, Katherine Ann Brown, Angela Gross, Kathy Hoops, Kimberly Carlson, Gayle Garrigues, Mary Carr Melkonian, M.H. Bacha, Malia Winn, Kathy Kerns, Alison Anne Barnsley, Maureen A. Gallagher, Merle D. Ciomei, Regina Kuca, Thelma C. Bosowski, Cherie Davis, Julie LeGallee, Kathy Barnett, Erin

Gilland Roby, Tiffany Decker, Anne Germaine, Hedy Hager, Patricia E. Moriyasu, Cornelia Thomas, Patricia Caldwell, Vicki Simon, Deborah A. Culp, Jana Cardoni, Michele Bonnot, Kathleen M. Pickett, Nancy Killian, Alison Scott, Lottie Nicholson, Patricia A. Knuth, Vanessa Else, Lorine Marvin, Lisa Mouton, Bobbye S. Maley, Diana L. Weggler, Amanda C. Bear, Christy Menton, Marjorie Cage, Laura Hussey, Danie McReynolds, Cathy Wingrove, Elaina Aggeler, Gail Palchikoff, Rachel H. Graziano, Lisa Bradley, Karen Carlisle, Michelle L. Beggs, Karen Ehrlich, Rita L. Marubayashi, Cindy Pickering, Paula S. Millet, Lynn L. Bouthillier, Lori Springer, Kathy Sullens, Joy Godsey, Darla Stettler, Sheryl V. Thacker, Kitty Smith, Lara M. Kutsche, L. Hutchins, Heidi Cronkhite, Tara Davis, Sarah Wenk, Emily Graham, Audrey Winograde, Deborah Agre, Alyson Reed, Jennifer Ryman, B. Allison Gordin, Diane L. Brown, Donna M. Dupree, Lori R. Moss, Barbara J. Heaney, Roberta Weiner, Julie Hengel, Marjorie N. Rosenthal, Grace C. Brock, Melissa D. Miller, Denise Crowe, Heather L. Mitchell, Mercedes Gutierrez, Katharine Anne Ludwick, Aurora N. Wallace, April Spelman, Amy Nolan Turner, Vera A. Herbst, Clementina Colliver, Anita Levin, Eve Wittenberg, Leslie S. Heimov, Jean Guzman, Marianne Alweis, Karen F. Johnson, Essie Lee Wahington, Lasuntha Wahington, Lee Finney, Kate Dauber, Tamra Johmston, Janna L. Floyd, Alice D. Arrington, Ellen P. Kane, Mary Ellen Miller, Paula Vannatta, Laurie Keel, Mary Ann Borchert, Donna M. Brown, Nancy Hult, Claire F. Beck, Ellen L. Sosin, Susan L. Avakian, Jodi Witmer, Rebecca Galvin, M. J. Langelan, Melodie Bahan,

Jacquelyn Kaestner, Claire Read, Rebecca Mary Coufal,— Esq., Jacqueline Chan Valencic, Gayle Smooklet, Diane Bibeau, Linda Eucalyptus, H. H. Billett, M.D., Mary Greenfield, Ruth A. Davis, Esther B. Russo, Jacqueline Gray, Lisa Foster, Renate A. Coombs, Margaret W. Jewett, Jill N. Rolfe, Jana Crisp, Lillian F. Hamrick, Sara T. Davies, Sherri E. Davis, Jayne W. Barnard, Nancy E. Biberman, Jo Ann Palmer, Patricia Kowalski, Christy M. Newman, Carole Paul, Jan Velasquez, Claudia Withers, L. S. Alfredson, Linda Handel, Martha Shaw, Jennifer Boswell, Ellen Neufeld, Janet P. Harrison, Sarah Hunt, Michelle Fargerson, Caterina Barone, Paulette Mills, Annie Rodriguez, Eileen Sherman, Pamela J. Abercrombie, Claretta F. Prescott, Kathleen Bartolomeo, Suzanne F. Dice-Goldberg, Robin Philipbar, Tricia Barnes, Denise Ross, Andi Kaufman-Lennon, Linda Adame, Anne Branscum, Claudia Pocock, Joanne M. Rella, Tara Crandall, Linda J. Curtis, Sherry Gold Oberstein , Esther A. Vela, Sharon Rosen, Barbara Wolvovitz, Elizabeth Campbell, Lisa Bailey, Cathy Reilly, Kaethe Radomski, Yvonne Allen, Judith Rosenthal, Elizabeth Weingartner, Jean Battle, Pat McLarty, Mrs. Edith C. Wolff, Ph.D., Barbara Brozik, Denise R. Catanzarite, Deborah L. Probst, Mary Elizabeth Branaman, Carol Anderson, Shirley M. Walker, Karla Steele, Mary Beth Smith, Susan Clark Goodgame, Janice Lipartito, Yvonne Allen, Norma Mize, Marion Wiley, Debbie C. Brant, Jacqueline McCoy, Robin Messing, Ellen D. Lee , Leigh Anne Strawn, Janet Williams, S. P. Pines, Deann A. Pimes, Claire Dannenbaum, Jeannette Phillips, Susan Q. Cobb, Patricia L. Fulop, Margaret E. Lawrence, Deneice Maddox, Del Martin, Anne Ellman, Stacy Culbertson,

Beverly Isenson, Connie Blaine, Pamela Avery, Jane Wisnieski, Aurora Ioanid, Katherine E. Thompson, Lynn Yanis, Martha Wolf, Betsy M. Aller, Susan Seavers, Debra Leah Thomason, JoAnne C. Butler, Leila Redmond, Teresa Koelling, Jennifer Kelly Harris, Janet Gottlieb, Elizabeth Reeves, Patricia Austin, Eugenia Vickers, Valerie Wittstein, Kathy Vaughan, Janet E. Freedman, M.D., Katherine O'Hanlan, M.D., Phyllis Landis, Debra P. Anderson, Lana DeLeon, Kimberly Ferguson, Stella Routson, Stella Routson, Claudia W. Campbell, Yvonne Tyler, Constance Williams, Mila Honn, Cheryl Peterson, Debra Ballew, Cheyl Watson, Toni Proskey, Elizabeth Dunn, Katherine K. Kinkead, Renee Hensley, Kathy Merta, Eleanor Myers, Kay Holmes, Deloria Z. Garcken, Carol A. Sterling, M.A., Nancy Arbuckle, Caralee Allsworth, Beth L. Raps, Beth A. Pfohl, Susan Brossy Crosier, Karen R. West, Patricia Mott, Mary L. Jack, Judith L. Kasten, Virginia Arnold, Gloria Steinem, Anne S. Connor, Elizabeth Janeway, Joan B. Dunlop, Ms. Risha L. Stebbins, Joan McGuire, Cheryl Kinney, Karen Fleming-Brooks, Louisa N. Saladino, Rhita S. Lippitz, Patricia Crown, Patricia Hite, Heidi Rowland, Jenny Norindr, Ms. Diane Horowitz, Amy C. Moore, Kimber Jones, Ms. Alice Thomas, Peggy Queen, Ann Jones, Elin Abbott Crawford, Kimberley A. Kerns, JoAnna Pelzek, Lynn B. Cooper, Cathy Nance, Lori F. Morris, Darla Atwood, Carolina Yahne, Ph.D., Marilyn Okuyiga, Anna-Rose Tykulsker, Elizabeth Penaranda, Victoria Hellman, Mary Britting, Shelley Levinson, Janet Frost, Barbara Alessio, Judith Duhl, Angela Melina Raab, Vikki L. Johnson, Louise A. Hoxworth, Kristin Hurt, Brenda J. Curtiss, Toby Egeth, Jennifer Rossmere,

Denise Parietti, Anita DeFelice, Beverly Firestone, Ms. Randel Mott Cobb, Michele Momparler, Maureen Healy, Arline Wyner Prigoff, Rhonda Miller, Roseann Cannon-Wallace, Thea Abu El-Haj, Debra Hershcopf Kennedy, Sharon Lieberman, Alice Bird, Nina C. Berlowe, Jana Varrati, Naomi Ritter, Rita Johnson, Donna J. Carroll, Marilyn Fitterman, Mary R. Hardin, Camille Greeley, Cheryl Rubin, Karen Young, Brenda Smith, Geneva King, Eleanor L. Basel, Carol Browne, Marla Painter, Janis Compton-Carr, Kim Tipton, Patricia Maravel, Carol Strickman, Bryna Diamond, Vicki Thompson, Wanda Rosenlund, Ronna K. Fuller, Maryanna Kennedy Milton, Kat Brennan, Elise L. Stahlman, Sylvia L. Kohrn, Laura Kaminker, Lois Schoenbrun, Barbara Van Dyke, Sue Segura, Solange R. Echeverria, Deborah S. Belwood, Yvonne Roodberg, Meredith Ruland, Mary R. Pena, Teresa M. Schiller, Linda Keith, Connie Frankowiak, Kay Kirkman, Judith Kaplan, Judith S. Koven, Kim M. Pineda, Betsy Carpenter, Jean Ford, Kathleen Marks, Carrie L. Williams, Karri E. Christiansen, Lynn Kelly, Janet F. Zuzack, Janet Axelrod, Nancy P. Roberts, Elisa Atkin, Terry Merritt Reed, Leah S. Bratton, Karen Williams, Tammy White, Kerrie Smith, Tami I. Lawry, Deirdre Wilson, Sandra O'Briant, M. M. Murphy, Ellen Cooperperson, Eliska Chanlett, Samantha Hill, Lucy Renee Anthony, Cherri Jacobs Pruitt, Leonora Wiener, Nan Wiener, Brenda S. Walter, Jane Strauss, Josie Hasle, Robin L. Flood, Trena Brown, Linda Sue Berns, Beth Tapprich, Terry Martin, Marsha Costa, Carol Southard, Elizabeth Clayton, Suzanne Sangree, Sandra L. Olsen, Wendy E. Wifler, Mary Ches Applewhite, Kimberly A. Dauw, Mrs. Roslyn L. Katz,

Sharon Riddle, Jo Malin, Jennifer Lang, Shannon McBain, Patrica A. Price, Lynell Lea Porter, Gina Maire Sinsigalli, Edna Heatherington, Ariane Justus, Ruth Soffer, Wendy Jo Sutherland, Jane Bukertow, Adrienne R. Taylor, Carol A. Vontobel, Jaren J. Ducker, Sharon Tracy, Christy Clark, Patricia Barron, Jane Edmondson, Catherine Pate, Lori Gregory, Denise Defa, Sandra W. Bagley, Hilary Markoe, Renee Heyum, Virginia L. Senders, Phyllis Schoenwald, Grace Bukowski, Pamela Kaufelt, Kathryn Winogura, Leonore Unger, Jill Horowitz, Lori Segall, Elizabeth P. Hubbell, Elaine A. Barlow, Dayna O'Neill, Traci Gibson, Janice Zalen Stiers, Sonja D. Boyd, Mona Bernstein, Larian Angelo, Bettina R. Proctor, Lynn Letterman, Chelsea Miller, Carol Mimless, Heather Steckel, Elizabeth C. Spalding, Teresa G. Morton, April Taylor, Terri Walsh, Joyce S. Gerber, Leah L. Jones, Elizabeth A. Gray, Elaine S. Morse, Mary K. Sholar, Laura J. Rift, Stacey Wendland, Winnie J. Porter, Lisabeth M. Schiller, Sylvia L. Reynolds, Helen Cohen, Traci Lunceford, Gigi Middlebrook, Deborah Walsh, Ann E. Levine, Judi Addis, Nancy Falk, Kathy Ingracia, Debbie Burnett, Ruth A. Majesky, Victoria Duerr, Pattie Adler, Nicollet A. Markovetz, Laura Brezinsky, Gwendolyn E. Kim, Anita Wolfson, Kay Johnson, Virginia N. Durrin, Isabel Ann Freund, Lori Lynn Turner, Ronnie Cantor, Tammy F. Anderson, Jennifer E. Daly, Julie Burns, Joyce Strum, Sara R. Tompson, Judith A. Roberts, Deborah P. Warner, Monica Markiewicz, Judith I. Horrell, Mariquita Reynoso, Sarah Pleydell, Celeste A. Rogers, Leslie Riggins, Susan M. Jarvis, Margaret A. McNally, Darby Leonard, Bunny Kolodner, Mary Carter, Evelyn

Gunning, Deana L. Sherman, Lona Foote, Grace G. Hardenbrook, Janis Gibson, Patricia S. Simons, Barbara Rittel, Bonnie Gardner, Angela Gunn, Margaret Bryant, Barbara Martinez, Amy Jo Levi, Debbie Klauber, Debra L. Aldridge, Charlotte Smith, Claudia Davidson, Prof. Sylvia A. Law, Christel Urmenyhazi, Pier A. Gage, Nancy Weiss, Maureen Conley, Bonnie Becker, Lenore Colz, Suzanne Carmona, Maryska Suda, Victoria Major, Ms. Willoughby B. Freeman, Susan Wortham, Muffin Spencer-Devlin, Darlene Kuhr, Marie Gibson, Margaret D. Hayden, Pamela D. Smith, Kristin A. Daly, Anne Colby, R.N., Hedy M. Ratner, Beth Schlau, Shelley Murphy, Barbara D. Taylor, Barbara Ann Boltz, Christine Lee, Debra Cockrell, Kathleen M. Smith, Nichol Lovera, Morgan Landi, Esther Markus, Mary Bertino, Kathi Cleaver, Jan Gray, Katie Kane, Jonna C. Cali, Patricia Bronstein, Cynthia Robinson, Cindy Robinson, Carol Platt Cagan, Esq., Marissa Diego, Linda Eibel, Kimberley D. Keyl, Laura Zimmerman, Sylvia B. Nachman, Donna Marie Parrilli, Sandy Pettipas, Kristen Pendleton, Amy Blair, Dr. Anita Levy, Maria Dolores Farnos Garcia, Carol Mayes, Terri Goldberg, Erla S. Youmans, Trixie Harville, Carol Lynn Mithers, Laura Katan, Sherry Knapp, Dorothy C. Scott, Cynthia Duff, Dorothy O. Somner, Debby Kelly, Rose Salz, Linda Bosniak, Sarah Grambs, Nachama Wilken, Constance Del Vigna, R.N., Joyce D. Byrd, Sandra Loundy, Cassandra Decker, Lois MacLean, Queenelle Minet, Dianne Presnell, Julie E. Christian, Donna Schiller, Helen E. Neal, Roselle Sherman Levy, Stephanie Ortega, Hollis Zelinsky, Catherine Scallan, Erika Beck, Daphne Gardiner, Michelle F. Gross, Donna L. Magden, Marla Glenn, Abbe Stahl

Steinglass, Carmen A. Rivera, Lee Angress, Judy R. Hodgson, Laura C. Mandell, Pam Shumway, Nancy A. Speck, Sandra Levitt, Marjorie Thompson, Dayna F. Deck, Jeana Bock, Carol E. Proctor, Riggs Bailey Roberts, M.D., Emily Schweber, Andrea Medeiros, Jennifer Ball, Leigh Campbell-Hale, Catherine Rodriguez, Jessie Bunn, Christine S. Fukui, Angela Shaw, Rachel Thompson, Dorothy C. Maclean, Rochelle Cohen, Jean Diamond, Pauline Whitlock, Angela Graham, Tracey Baker, Nancy M. Rose, Cori Maciejiewski, Alison Gonzalez, Margo Berch Matzdorf, Anna M. Schuller, Judith A. Faulkner, Teri Walters, Mildred S. Myers, Jane Kremsreiter, Glenda J. Straube, Barbara Ann Rice, Mary Hale Seymour, Deborah G. Beitler, Lida Husik, Rachel Weissmann, Sheryl Truax, Deborah McCardell, Donnia Haynes, Anne C. Dooley, Paula Tice, Lauren L. Kehr, Cathy Hall, Phyllis M. Rothschild, Susan Nerson, Karen M. Bendross, Debbie Bafford, Sherrell Collins, Karen Erde, M.D., F. Elizabeth Challis, Ph.D., Diane A. Kelly, Florice Hoffman, Heather Ames Bascom, Barbara S. Webster, Roxanne Hamilton, Bette-Jean Jones, Linda Hughes, Molly Day, Carol Dunn, Deborah Lewis, Karen Shields, Rebecca Warner, Judith K. Pollock, Aviva Futorian, Moira M. Megargee, Michelle A. Maese, Karin Schmerler, Lori Rothman, Helen Knode, Laura Hahn, Victoria Andersen, Randi Morgan, Joan West, Mary Anna Singer, Polly Brinkley, Arwyn E. Elden, Susan Brock, Valerie Berman, Margaret D. Conover, Gloria Stein, Tiffany Stevens, Marilyn Eisenberg, Barbara Houston, Suzanne Davenport, Janice E. Hayes, Christie Morse, Tina L. Frankin, Carol Leavenworth, Karol Evans, Mindy V. Harris-Silk, Merry Demarest, Patricia Ann

Parish, Gayle Breslow, Suzette DuCharme, Pamela Gaarde Lipari, Mary L. Stone, Judy Roumpf, Margaret Brown, Mary M. Miller, Wendy Solomon, Laurette S. Garner, Delores D. Hathaway, Eilene Manning, Laura Willmann, Jean Hunt, Nancy R. Manley, Holly Laney, Patricia L. Doyle, Jeanne M. Rasmussen, Rita Hayward, Paula Haller, Robbin Henderson, Kathleen M. Schardt, Melissa L. McWhinney, Ms. Joyce L. Eisold, Kate Kennedy, Penny Hollingsead, Helen Hammond, Sonja M. Gjerde, Merry L. Nasser, Robin Schneider, Peggy Friedlander, Doris Goldberg, Nancy J. Daynard, Teresa C. Beem, Phyllis K. Kushiner Cucchiella, Paula Ageuire, Elsie Schwartz, Esther R. Herst, Susan L. Sauerwin, Kathi D. Hamm, Susan Fearon, Cathy Nevy, Janice E. Casey, Edith Zuckerman Key, Kathryn McKnight, Martha Ann Terry, Cathy Eckford, Lenora Davis, Joan Rosenthal, Lisa Howard, Lisa Howard, Connie Rose, Professor Marie Ashe, Kristen M. Fife, Denise Park, Maria L. Turner, Kathy Martin, Carol Mason, Nancy Sarah, Julie Bellaart, Stacy Finke, Yael Shuman, Johnnie Chase, Mary Admire, Kelly Neubauer, Sandy Wiltzius, Mary Ann E. Claxton, Ann Rosenthal, Janetta Yanez, Margaret Bowman, Esq., Francine Szymanoski, Teshia Dunn, Judith Winslow Walcott, Alta Withers, Naomi Jacobs, Mildred Sanchez, Carol A. Bryant, Karen L. Shepard, Gail M. DeFonzo, Linda Layne, Gabrielle Semel, Carol A. Schrager, Teresa Cotton, Pamela W. English, Rollie Greene, Janet Todd Bliss, Susan Conklin, Maria Blanco, Brenda Huber, Vickie Knight, Deanne Korte, Kathy Cruttenden, Beau-Janette B. Feldman, Carolyn G. Koehler, Cathleen M. Gentry, Lynn Wall, Barbara Beyers, R.N., M.A., Doreena Wong, Sarah Shannon, Lynn Hoff, C.C. Young, Celeste L. Steffancci, Emily Kraus, Dakota Butterfield, Jane Van Keuren, Gretchen Hall, Deborah R. Hensler, Valerie Evans, Terese E. Duggan, Maria T. DeFelice, Betty Klausner, Barbra J. McCandless, Jean Schermer, Alexis Gabrielle Edwards, Megan Burbick, Lori Schroyer, Eleanor Bravo, Marie E. Berglund, Judy Sue Wolfson, Belinda Elwell, Deborah de Santos, Wendy Wheeler-Coltrane, Audrey L. Nelson, Lori Carter, Barbara F. Tice, Bonnie Santosusso, Mrs. Marian Straehley, Marlene Wicherski, Page H. Wilson, Marianne Wilson, Tina Tatgenhorst, Carol J. Hammond, Maureen Burke, Anita Blair, Tonia Beauchman, Sigrid Ede Knuti, Margaret Dorfman Chandler, Wanita Bowley, Jill Stockinger, Katharine Rowe, Nancy J. Groszek, Anita McFarland, Margaret A. Lutz, Karen Kuhlman, Linda Watson, Marilyn Hutchinson, Cindy J. Esparza, Terri A. Dowd, LuAnne King, Laurie Emrich, Gael Murphy, Margaret Cahill, Chere R. Palenske, Carrie Kamperman, Elizabeth M. Calhoun, Sherry Glover, B.C. Cornish, Anne Bassett, Colleen Clarke, Ph.D., Terri J. Wolf, Amber Hollibaugh, Eileen E. Brumbaugh, Katherine A. Wolfe, Susan G. Stewart, Jane Hershey, Michelle Gandy, Thora M. Guinn, Jeanne Londe, Joan Spiegel, Summer Wadsworth, Joan E. Stokes, Brandi Martin, Susan Gleghorn, Ruth Watson, Laura J. Strychalski, Cheryl A. Hudson, Mary Lou Montauk, Carol Beitel, Lois E. Wilcken, Sarah E. McKinley, Sheri Utain, Angela Calcaterra, Katherine G. Webb, Maisha Strozier, Leah C. Pruitt, Barbara Loeb, Kristin K. Urry, Amy Mills, Virginia A. Goble, Ann Crane, Elizabeth Perry, Lorraine Yglesias, Jennifer Shortridge, Julie Gale, Elizabeth Moody, Robin Hurt Skaletsky, Jamie Endriss, Ann Schneider,

Roxanne Shepherd, Leonora S. Gorfinkel, Carol A. Everett, Deborah M. Roach, Barbara Warkus, Penny Bird, Marsha F. Enright, Ruth Ann Campbell, Allison M. August, Annette Van Howe, Angelita Garcia, Priscilla Oppenheimer, Joanne Savoie, Kimberly Sparks, Darlene A. Brown, Abby Stella Eason, Lucy A. Thulin, Lynn Baumeister, Nancy Thomas, Cathleen Gutekanst, Sharron Kimsey, Donna Janosik, Ruth Henrich, Debbra Nelson, Kara Milbank, Brooke Lauter, Celina Hicks, Karen Wilson, Donna June Goodroe, Diana Ferrol, Rebecca Roberts, Shireen Miles, Tina Chappell, Denise L. Moore, Eileen Morley, Penne Martindale, S. J. Childs, Tina Alvarado, Laura B. Woltz, Tracey Garrett, Pamela Benvenue, Barbara Rosen-Share, Tracey Chamberlain, Linda Sprague, Josette Reznick, Anna T. Brewer, Mary Fitzgerald, Sandra Cox, Caroline Hopkins, Marion S. Damick, Charlene Nelson, Melissa Moore, Brigette Zimmer, Helen Minth, Jo Ellen Pasman, Cynthia A. Pearson, Patricia Cannon, DeAyn Jackson Curtis, Janet Breyer, Andrea Meghrouni, Wendy Gates, Tabitha Durland, Jaci Fentriss Muzamel, Rayna Armour, C. Kent, Cynthia Bell, Anne Moroh, Kristin S. Williams, Mare Brixie, Melinda Robin, Patricia A. Cope, Sarah B. Johnson, Franceen Park, Ellen E. Mitchell, Cathy Jo Hutto, Gail Bickford, Adrien K. Wing, Heather Ross-Ault, Judith P. Sherman, Mary Ann Burg, Jill Williams Ross-Beres, Christine Harper, Elizabeth Henehy, Julia Carter, Rita Schaefer, Mary B. Welch, Charlotte E. La Rue, Ruth Harris, Sharon Ramirez, Debbie Abney, Karen Bray, Susan Campbell Wood, Jodene M. Young, Kathryn Petersen, Anne Guthrie, Bernice Horn, Carolyn Johns, Mary Ellen Strote, Elizabeth A. Moses, Rebecca Ann Raja, Terri

E. Lewis, Andra J. Crippen, Leslie Hughes, Priscilla Randall Middleton, Loralee Newman, Vera L. Dafoe, Molly King-Gilpin, Linda Anderson, Jackie Franklin, Lynn Barg, Janet Nudelman, Linda J. Maisner, Allyson Cook, Marci Banes, Marlene B. Naide, Peggy Davis, Camille Tischler, Barbara Durkee, Janet Chapman Mason, Michaela Condit, Patricia L. Stearns, Faye Nuell Mayo, Martine Yingling, Margaret C. Stewart, Randi West, Jennifer H. Lee, Nancy Rehwaldt, Yvonne Schomber, Tracy Patterson, Andrea Pacic, Kim Shipman, Andrea J. McNeil, Laura Burroughs, Madeline Weaver, Julie Summersquash, Ms. Christine Ammer, Darcy A. Baker, Judith Perlstein, Lori L. Warren, Cathleen Campbell, Fran Kaplan, P.K. Adelmann, Donna Costa, Lorraine Doyle, Laurie Callaway, Kristin A. Wooten, Marjorie M. Howard, Edie Rice-Sauer, Courtney Flavin, Norma L. Jones, Maryjo Schmerber, N. Elizabeth Moore, Patricia E. McCuaghtry, Joyce A. Schoenheimer, Stephanie Byrd Fair, Aimee Merrill, R.N., Mrs. Ruth A. Harvey, Sandra Lee O'Neal, Tammy Shackelford, Janine M. Guerrini, Denise Hertz-McGrath, Jenny Wasburg, Diana Workman, Kathy Moore, Berdina Green, Gabrielle Gorton Gallegos, Daniela Salvioni, Jill Belasco, Alix Kates Shulman, Rachelann Esposito, Kristina Blackwell, Helen Rosenberg, Lynne M. McCollough, Paula Chin, April Laveen, Margo Smith, Stephanie Feyne, Ann M. Powers, Laura Gregar, Ronnee David, Julia Just, Barbara Hoskinson, Kathleen Vance, Jami L. Howe, Ann Denkler, Isabelle Katz Pinzler, Kate B. Rousmaniere, Susan Courtney, J. S. Miller, Vicki Jacobs, Helen S. Harrison, Kim Murphy, Elizabeth Ridley, Wendy Dillon, Tobylee Holmgren, Carol A. Salamone,

Belinda Harris Turner, Lynda H. Schneekloth, Beth Meyer, Christine Crandall, Sandra Sinck, Erin T. McCoy, Sara K. Shinbach, Marcia L. Sauter, Carmen Rumbaut, Susan Jane Brumbaugh, Mindi J. Hovin, Christina Guzman, Traci Petersen, Sono Taki, Piper Phillips Caswell, Debbie Neufeldt, Nina Sturgeon, Dana Gaurkel, Lindsay Roberts, Catherine A. Haraldsson, Judie F. Albano, Rebecca Pardo, Nancy Kushubar, Nancy Adams, Amy Dickerson, Betty Lazarus, Mary Munoz, Barbara A. Becker, Margo Cuisinier, Ann Glasser, Lynn Bruser, Lynn Bruser, Shona Nicola Balfour, Jeanne Poland, Sandra A. Nunes, Donna Woodley, Nancy Gaines, Jennifer L. Robinson, Janice K. Becker, Karen Cook, Marsha S. Clark, Nancy Claussen, Anne L. Atchison, Robin E. Brooks, Barbara Evans Fleischauer, Lorraine Marie Crouch, Betsy Vonk, Aloha Windsor, Sarah Scher, Deborah Hopping, Donna Solomon, Ann W. Rose, Monica Ericksen, Jessica Agre, Lynn Thomason, Nickie Bischoff, Carol E. Hayes, Denise L. Holness, Tracey Hill, Dr. Carol R. Schniebaum, Mary Jane Wilkie, Mrs. Ruth Proskauer Smith, Phyllis Friedman, Betty Ann Miller, Laura Pinsky, Alexandra Leban, Ruth Harrison, Debra Cooper, Jacqueline Huey, Ellen W. Schrecker, Antoinette Schruefer, Mary Ann Kroeck, Peg Ruggiero, Lisa Bosshart, JoAnn C. Beasley, Jeanne Goodin, Brooke Petersen, Brooke Petersen, Cherri Bennett, Marilyn Hughes, Kimberly T. Winslow, Adele Clarke, Lynn McCarthy, Elizabeth P. Chase, Annette Marie McAlvey, Ann A. Walker, Robin Lynn Shumer, Vivian Rudofsky, Cathy Panasuk, Susanna Florance, Leah Jonas Peavy, Angela M. McDowell, Dr. J. Carpenter DeClerque, Linda Webb, Cecilia Munez, Billie Hara, Henny Zenglein, Tammy

Bane, Susan McDaneld, Mary L. Dudziak, Patricia Paddison, M.D., Cynthia Katz, Mary Howe, Monique Gamble, Lorraine W. Young, Elizabeth Haines, Donna R. Lenhoff, Leila Williams

849 Jane Roes

NAMES OF FRIENDS OF AMICI CURIAE

Karin G. Horwatt, Robert L. Main, M. J. Micheson-Thiery, F. Taylor Peck III, Penni Eldredge-Martin, Cynthia L. Cease, Steven Zweig, Mary S. Huhn, Helen T. Davidson, Kathlene Mount, Dana Gallagher, Betty Knight, Judy B. Dodds, James D. Weddell, Sunya Kent, Margaret Daniel, Sandra Snow, Sara Feldman, M. Gray-Schlink, Kenneth R. Wright, Annette Jurgelski, Susan Stoughtenger, Kathy Gavin, Jeffrey W. Peterson, Susan Morton, Torge Lorentzen, Terry L. Hunter, Melanie R. Bond, Marcie Brensilver, Johnell McLean, Francine Franklin, Kimberly Cowie Hague, Joan E. Burke, Joan G. Babbott, M.D., Ora B. Hughes, M. Teresa de la Vega, Phyllis Bailey, Elizabeth Lansing, Parker F. Harris, M.D.,P.A., Carolyn V. Brown, M.D., Patricia L. Sledge, DVM, Patricia A. Henry, Sonja K. Binkhorst, M.D., Bonita M. Riggens, Rieta Walker, Barbara Whipple, Helen Schotanus, Karen Friedman, M.D., Catherine Powell, Dr. Todd D. Little, Georgia Yuan, Donna M. Wilber, Seth Hendor, Wynell King, Elizabeth A. O'Brien, Lisa Harris, Mirka J. Negroni, Barbara F. Hartley, Shari Altman, Clare Marie Ackroyd, Frances R. Fish, Chas. B. Brack, James G. Friedl, Mary Lunn, Glenna F. Kops, Thelma V. Baca, Bruce Whitelam, Anita Sobin, Adaleah Jeri Camara, Virginia Sparks Volker, Robin M. Coseo, Cynthia King, Catherine L. Nevlin, Christine Strong Ott, L. Ann Herzog, Mrs. Ruth I. Knee, Bernice Hamele, Christine Vercellino, Ralph E. James, Susan J. McConocha, Randall L. McConocha, Sheila J. Kaplan, Ph.D., Deborah C. Lindsay, Linda M. Fancher, Lynn Jacobsson, Phyllis Rossiter Forbes, Judith Silverman, Anne Baker, Delores Graham, Ruth K. Nash, Dawn Clarke Palchikoff, Anne W. Steytler, A.C.S.W., Rosemary K. Coffey, Helen J. Pointer, Maida S. Tryon, Rita Schneider, Laura B. Tracy, Robin E. Parks, Dale Heinzelmann, Hope Morrison, Henry S. Kahn, M.D., Edna Mae Reynolds II, Rosemary C. Langford, Lori A. Welch-Rubin, Fayette K. Stroud, M.D., Carl Stroud, M.D., Molly McGurk, Joan Costello, Christopher Hebert, Barbara Westhafer, Patsy A. Downum, Mary Wynne, Holmes McGuigan, Mrs. Karen Bunch, H. Hassoun, Ric A. Souto, Marion M. Oman, Patricia Feldhaus, Laura Moye, Leslea A. McCord, Rhonda Chaikin, Henry F. Todd, Aline Bernstein, Emerson Bruds, Christy Menton, Norene Kuznezon, Patricia Zeigen-Grover, Patricia Zeigen Grovek, Joanna S. Calne, Charlotte B. Foster, Ellen Shair, Carolyn Becker, Iva M. McAlpin, Heidi E. Moon, Donald Hurford, Arthur J. Comeau, Lauri Benton, Catherine S. Wooledge, Camille Cox, Shellie Klein, Paulette Goodman, Barbara Greer, Virginia S. Caton, Tariq Mahmood, Marsha Epstein, M.D., Susan I. Cohen, M.D., Jean Reiley, Rosemary Sinclair, Ms. Brazella D. Robinson, Jane K. Roberts, Mrs. Esther Zuckerman, Betty Lou Ward, Willard Chilcott, Marilyn Fisher, Joyce Strauss, Littleton Waller Tazewell, Fritz R. Ward, Eve Malakhof, Phyllis Weiner, Mrs. L. Friedman, Vera Glaser,

Betsy Arnold-Leahy, C.N.M., Susan Lasko, Francis G. McGuire, Elizabeth Weisbard, Clara Harari, Sheila F. Higgins, Carolyn R. Whiting, Julie Komarow, M.D., Nancy Balaban, Roger A. Lang, M.D., Alan Cunningham, Chella Courington-Livingston, Alison Cox Jones, Melissa Segal, Kristin Atwell, Dawn Latham, Edna E. Moate, Tracee Craig, Mary P. Dillon, Jaime Lluch, Kendalle D. Carns, Esther A. Gekoski, Carol S. Holmes, Patricia Spielberg, Y.-Antoinette Echols II, Cindy Judd Hill, Ann R. Russell, Simon Glickman, Karen Hummer, Wendi Huntzicker, Dorothy M. Rich, Doris F. Parker, Brenda Mayo, Cynthia L. Turel, Vera Goodman, Denyse Brown, Mary Doerr, Ruth Dreyfuss, Diane Margolin, Ellen Bilofsky, Carl Betz, Mrs. Helen Papalia, Marlene Y. Ebert, Kathryne J. Shaw, Ann S. Cowie, Martin E. Gardner, Jr., Ann Doerfler, Doreen Lorand, Nora H. Jason, Sue M. Bartczak, Irene D. Stevenson, Barbara Lee Chase, Helen M. Moore, Cynthia O. MacKay, M.D., Rena Zurofsky, Rebecca Long, Roger A. Harless, Carol Gonzales, Norma Ladd, Sidney Kulek, Jennie L. Goldstein, Jessica Evans, Stanford J. Glanzberg, Amy J. Kepple, Patrice Radwan, Nancy Wilson, Helen L. Hollowell, Becky Gesteland, Arlene K. Jaffe, Anne Wesley, Carolyn S. Allen, David Tai, Marjorie Troutner, Maria J. Thorpes, Mrs. Gertrude H. Benson, R.N., Tinie Notis, Christine H. TenBarge, Rhoda E. Harris, Herman S. Alpert, M.D., P.C., Anne C. Carter, M.D., Anja S. Kondo, Roxanne Bloom, Anna Buchholz, Marilyn Savin, Frances Sanchez, Sandy Rowland, Virginia L. Bailey, Floy French-Landau, Julia Grella, Kelly A. McCarthy, Barbara Stackhouse, Lisa Goldberg , Harriette L. Baggett, Ellen Hofler, Mary Ann Reames

Moore, Ursula H. Poland, Myra J. Neylon, Aatis Lillstrom, Susan Ward, Dennis Nadler M.D., Peggy E. Pressman, Ann S. Wolff, Carl Khalil, Pamela Mandeloff, Lee Howard, Linda T. Diamond, Suzanne Reiter, R.N.C., Anita Billado, Stephen Marshall, George E. Leedom, Jeanette Huettner, Mrs. Ginny Shollenberger, Sally C. Wallace, Leslie A. Houston, Donald O. Collins, Jr., Joyce Shevrin, Elizabeth van Court-Wels, Karen K. Brady, Jean Dunham, Teri Stewart, Sharon G. Levin, Gwenyth Jackaway, Joanne Z. Harrison, Barbara Cole-Kiernan, Michele Papale, Bonita Franklin, M.D., Miranda Edison, Steffanie Garrett, Elizabeth A. Moon, Sharon Goodhart, Sally A. Farr, DeAnna Loretto, Julie Macdonald, Rachel Grant, Deitra Lundberg, Marilyn W. Silin, M. Catherine Maternowska, Gale Kempf, David W. Kempf, Katherine Olix, Joan Rahm, Mrs. Simon Grossman, Mrs. Jane L. LeRoy, Judi Justus, Elizabeth L. Dodge, Gail Michaelis-Ow, Elaine Berge, Lauren Heim, Sandra W. Greiff, Ann Adams, Judy T. Harford, Mark A. Smith, Anne Castleton, Jacqueline D. Wurzelbacher, Mrs. Lidia R. Walters, Sheila Brass Chadwick, Amy K. Naegele, Diane Maddex, Katherine Cross, Robin Slim, Ethel R. Johns, Elisabeth R. Bettman, Yogendia A. Shah, M.D., Elizabeth P. Holdsworth, Vivian Sokitch, M.D., Ellen L. Hamilton, Priscilla M. Leith, Serey Andree, Cathy Bacquet, Yvonne Odegard, Susan J. DuBois, Cynthia Funckes, M.D., Steven Wensel, Carmel Weifert, Carol Post, Gail Gramarossa, Alice R. Erb, Margaret Zackowitz, Linda Leete, Larry Dickens, Deborah Perloe, Jonathon Marley, Helene England, Mark Glass, Paula King, Gladys Witt Strain, Michael Epstein, Susan R. Monson, Carolyn S. Schultz, Marie E.

Clarke, Rose Marie Shivy, Marc Silver, Sharon M. Hall, Gail Davis, Dilla G. Tingley, Victoria Jones, Mabel C. Donnelly, Steve Andreas, Bill Tomczak, Mara Braverman, Christina Dempsey, Roberta Taylor, Laurie Berkman, Karen M. Eisgruber, Deanna L. Schmidt, B. Darren Burns, Karen J. Isbell, Christine Clark, M.D., Arlene Kerber, Carolyn R. Pardue, Hannah Sidofsky, Marcia Holly, Linda Del Casino-Hanna, Dorothy M. Sohl, Hilda J. Thomas, Mary Jo Cardinal, Bonnie F. Rodemich, Janet H. Murray, John Levy, Judith R. Diehl, Leslie B. Mitchell, Frank A. Circosta, Karyn M. Schmidt, John W. Field, Robert S. Stevens, Christopher Lande, David J. Iguall, Melanie F. Michaelson, Heidi L. Wilson, Tonia E. Jones, Brian K. Telfari, Christine E. Rua, Felicia Lynn Silber, Eric M. Turner, Margaret C. Binzer, Toby Ticktin Back, Nancy Rae Reinisch, Kelly Harrington, Genevieve Grein, Margaret Anne Parker, Elizabeth K. Canfield, Mary B. Kolman, Susan M. Boettger, Shirley B. Bolstad, Carolyn D. Runowicz, M.D., Kim Palchikoff, David S. Lawrence, Margaret Mikyung Lee, Jennifer Zereski, Marie E. Roberts, Col. Anthony J. G. Timmermans, Jr. (USAF-Ret), Nicole Hodges, Patricia Shuff, Cindy Biggs, Constance Bennett, Gloria Feldt, Susan P. Clarke, Kate Webster, Elizabeth M. Martin, Louise S. Hiatt, Tyler Jarvis, Mary E. Smith,M.D., Ms.Fay Martin, Judith Madsen-Carney, Frank Carney, Sharon L. Kuebbing, Martha Klems, Judi A. Lamble, Kelly Dennis, Diane M. Blair, Julia Abrahams, Mrs. S.W. Miller, Jeffrey R. Butler, Lynn Hermann, Katherine C. Snook, Linda Sutton, MA, Sharon Shortridge, Donnella Slayton, Genna Southworth, Sharon Shepherd, Anna Blain, Esthr M. Singer, Ph.D., Nancy Jerin, Joan Wargo, Audree McElligott, Suzanne Claire, Fannette Sawyer, Robert Meischner, Suzanne M. Brewer, Laura McDougle, Coleen M. Jarvis, Andrea H. Kasarsky, Tom Dolgenos, Daniel H. Bloom, Deborah S. Vick, Jo Ann Pippin, Isabel Rosenberg, Dennis A. Caine, Joan K. Hertzberg, E. Edward Sachez, Theresa Hull, Elizabeth W. Muller, John Ferguson, Barbara J. Mapp, Jill Ferguson, Jinny Gender, John E. Hipskind, M.D., Dr.Betsy N. Callahan, Dorothy Gartner, Caroline Lund Sheppard, Maureen Karp, Monica Brady, N. Marie Youmans, Vincenza Petrilli, Beverly M. Haas, Diane Gnepp, Jane H. Hope, Mary S. Gould, Andrew B. Cohen, Joy Matsuura, Asta Farrand, M. C. Ziegler, Carmen A. Perez, Robin Weirauch, Paulette D. Ache, Kathryn Henderson, Lorraine Lathrop, Mildred Woytisek, Virginia R. Barmen, Michelle Wiznitzer, Stephen C. Fleeger, Winifred B. Shewmake, Bernadine Ryswick, George O. Kolombatovich, Florence Garland, Janet C. Cooper, Dr. Anne B. Johnson, Linda S. Dye, Peggy Priegel, Richard M. Dennis, Patty Taylor, Carol M. Savkovich, Marti M. Mann, Dr. Meredith R. Margolis, Cindy A. S. Grainger, Jean Peterman, Hector Zevallos, M.D. , Diane Hoellerman, Leona M. Thomas, Charlotte A. Ballew, Felicia F. Ferlin, Nancy Kachel, Margaret A. Brown, Deborah L. Ouellette, Dolores A. Weglarz, Jane E. Williams, Hadley Sharples, Lois Jean Turner, Judith C. Frey, Mrs. Gretchen H. Miller, Lisa M. Small, Michelle Healy, Mary Lerner, Catherine King, Donna Sue Warden, Michael Wong, Martha Hopkins, Heather P. Read, Nancy Martin, Lenore D. Moody, Harold N. Moody , Alice Miller, Monica L. Hieber, Carole M. Smith, Phyllis Sharlin, Suzanne Welker, April Halprin Wayland, Carol F.

Kessler, Naomi Bleifeld, Elizabeth Werthan, Deborah D. Demars, Juliet Johnson, Deborah A. Tomblyn, Panseata Bryan, Robert Ralph Reed, John W. Robinson, III, Joan A. Garbagni, Luish Hernandez, Kristin M. Brokl, Sally van Schaick, Virginia S. MacLeod, Ellen A. Rojo, David L. Chittenden, M.D., Barbara Reinert, Marilyn Epstein, Joseph Dimeo, T'Brin E. Back, Amy Thatcher Clarke, Ellen Wedum, John Fendig, Christina Taylor, Carrie Seligmann, Nancy Belmont Dayhoff, Leslie A. Neel, Kathy J. Malone, David Scobey, Elizabeth Thomas, Florence Schlesinger, Ruth Ruggeri, Mary Ann Elliott, J. T. Ebert, Lauren Mosso, LeClair Bissell, M.D., Doris Mills, Cheryl M. Cardran, Norma Hymes, Colleen Sheehan, Kathleen Klein Cooper, Albert Gray, Sharon Ganellen, Karyn Schwartz, Maja Wiesinger, Douglas A. Stout, Lynda C. Dale, Patricia Askham, Judith Stimson, Douglas Angus, Carol W. Friends, Kathy Maguire Waltz, Danielle Fontaine Byers, Lucinda W. Short, Margaret I. Walton, Richel B. Lupkin, Jean McLaughlin Tanney, Cynthia Mathews, Lauren J. Pittenger, Clara H. Serene, James E. Durham, Renee F. Durham, Richard Clark, Sandra C. Sheldon, Linda M. Roby, Ms. Leah Sayles, Peter Blanc, Kathy Berkman, M.D., Virginia M. Houk, Pamela Lukowski, Alice Franklin, Leigh Ann Hodges, Dan D. Barker, Ruth H. Meyer, Brian Ebert, Mindy Berman, Susan R. Ward, Alec I. Deull, Meredith H. Gaines, Margaret H. Main, Helen P. Nassar, Darby Bloodgood, Frances Hoffman, Ph.D., Sylvia R. Margolies, Liesbeth Gerritsen, Jacquelyn L. Williams, James R. Hackney, Jr., Margot F. Horwitz, Marilyn C. Trainer, Colleen D. Gray, Doug Brown

APPENDIX B

TABLE OF CONTENTS

LETTER-2 . . . . . B4

LETTER-5 . . . . . B5

LETTER-12 . . . . . B6

LETTER-28 . . . . . B8

LETTER-32 . . . . . B10

LETTER-34 . . . . . B11

LETTER-53 . . . . . B12

LETTER-63 . . . . . B14

LETTER-80 . . . . . B15

LETTER-121 . . . . . B16

LETTER-123 . . . . . B23

LETTER-125 . . . . . B24

LETTER-130 . . . . . B33

LETTER-140 . . . . . B34

LETTER-149 . . . . . B36

LETTER-152 . . . . . B37

LETTER-157 . . . . . B38

LETTER-160 . . . . . B39

LETTER-173 . . . . . B42
LETTER-181 . . . . . B43
LETTER-187 . . . . . B47
LETTER-209 . . . . . B49
LETTER-212 . . . . . B50
LETTER-216 . . . . . B50
LETTER-245 . . . . . B53
LETTER-247 . . . . . B54
LETTER-259 . . . . . B58
LETTER-261 . . . . . B61
LETTER-267 . . . . . B63
LETTER-270 . . . . . B66
LETTER-278 . . . . . B68
LETTER-286 . . . . . B69
LETTER-294 . . . . . B71
LETTER-296 . . . . . B78
LETTER-318 . . . . . B79
LETTER-351 . . . . . B83
LETTER-369 . . . . . B86
LETTER-568 . . . . . B87
ROE LETTER-26 . . . . . B88

ROE LETTER-27 . . . . . B89
ROE LETTER-53 . . . . . B91
. . . . . B93
ROE LETTER-78 . . . . . B93
. . . . . B94

Letters of the Amici Curiae
Women Who Have Had Abortions

The texts set forth herein[1] in numerical order are the complete transcriptions of letters quoted in part in the brief of Amici Curiae women who had had abortions. Letters of amici curiae cited but not quoted in the brief are lodged with the Court.

I.
Letters of Named Amici Curiae

LETTER-2

I am a divorced professional woman who is raising three children alone. I barely make it from paycheck to paycheck. My children are very healthy, happy, and loved.

At one point in time, I found myself pregnant by a close friend. He said he would support whatever decision I decided to make. I have not only heard that before, but was also married to the man who said it. I have yet to receive any assistance of any kind in raising my children.

Most times, I feel like I am at the end of the ropes, juggling a career (I am forced to work 2 jobs to support my children, but one of them is a career), finances which are barely met, child raising alone and a reasonable facimile of a social life. I was unable to handle another responsibility at this point in my life.

---

1. The texts are reproduced with the punctuation, spelling grammar, etc., in the original letter.

I chose abortion. I chose to limit myself to dealing with the too much responsibility I have now. All women should have the right to chose how much responsibility they feel they are able to handle. Especially since she is the only one she knows can she can count on.

***

LETTER-5

In 1977 I had a safe, legal abortion, felt only a great relief at that time, and have never regretted that decision.

In fact, I was particularly aware of how important that choice was. Because fifteen years earlier, in 1962, when I was a college student, I could not get a safe, legal abortion. I endured therefore a cruel, forced pregnancy and a forced surrender of my first child, a daughter, to adoption. I have felt only regret and will for the rest of my life. I can describe having an abortion. The pain of the loss of my only daughter is indescribable.

There is no comparison between the loss of a fetus to an abortion and the loss of my real baby girl to adoption. She disappeared into the unknown and I was never to know whether she was alive or dead.

No woman should live in a society where she can be forced to get pregnant, or be forced to complete a pregnancy and surrender her child to anyone else, or be forced to have an abortion or be forced to raise a child, or be forced (or forced by coercion) to do anything with her reproductive self she does not choose to do. Each woman should be free to make a personal, private decision about how she will use her reproductive self.

***

LETTER-12

This is in response to the letter asking for the experiences of women with abortion, legal or illegal.

In 1941, I was already married. I was teaching school; my husband had been fired without explanation or recommendation from his job and could not find another job. I found myself pregnant; my diaphragm had failed - to this day, I don't know why or how. A pregnant woman was unthinkable in a teaching position. So the prospect was no income, no job for either of us, and no money in the bank, no feasible doubling up with parents or friends. There was only one solution and it was illegal. There was no one I could tell or appeal to. I was frantic and had to go on smiling as if nothing were wrong. One friend knew someone who knew someone who had had an abortion and eventually I got a telephone number, only to learn that the doctor was away on extended vacation. When, in desperation, I asked my doctor if he knew of an abortionist, he refused even to talk without the presence of my husband. After I had brought my husband to see him, he decided he couldn't talk without the consent of my father whom he had known for many years. Only then did he give me a name of a man he had heard was reliable, but if he butchered me it would be legal for my doctor to try to put me together again. Nice. My father wouldn't consider the matter without telling my mother who, we all knew, would become hysterical. Which she did. I would never have told her for that very reason. It was awful.

So amid the anguished cries of my mother, with a painfully large amount of cash in my pocketbook, I went to the office of a strange man at a strange address and prayed for the best. I had been a law-abiding citizen and this deception and illegality was almost as painful to me as the procedure itself. I was fortunate that the man did a good clean job under an anaesthetic. I rested an hour and then sneaked out the back door, and took a taxi home. Friends dropped in that afternoon and even to them I made no mention of what I had just been through.

And how did I feel? Relief, relief, RELIEF. Emerging from several weeks' nightmare, I could hardly believe I was home free. Did I ever regret the abortion? Never for a moment.

The tone of this letter 48 years later may give some indication of the emotions I did feel. Outrage! I was 26 years old and self-supporting. I was married (If I had been unmarried I would probably have committed suicide. Women did in those days.) A wife was expected to have intercourse , wasn't she? I was using the available contraceptive correctly. And I was acting in the most responsible way I knew. The decision about my body that should have been mine alone had to be OK'd by husband, doctor, father. How humiliated, how trapped can one be?

Two years later, under happier circumstances I had a much-wanted boy and then a much wanted girl. For God's sake don't let abortion become illegal again.

***

LETTER-28

I signed the attached form permitting you to use my name for court suits that you are filing regarding abortion. I am also giving you permission to use my name in court.

You asked if I would tell my story in regard to abortion - here it is.

In 1977, I became active in the anti-abortion movement. By 1978 I had been elected [to a national office of a national anti-abortion group]....

In 1980, I found myself pregnant as a result of a forced sexual encounter. All my "pro-life" beliefs flew out the window when I realized that my life was also a "human life", and that I knew I simply could not bear a child from such an ugly experience!

I went to a clinic in my city (one which I had even picketed at one time) and I had the abortion there. Strangely I had no misgivings afterward, and no guilt (I had assumed I'd become suicidal.) I was surprised by how easy it was, both physically and emotionally.

Now, 9 years later, I am solidly pro-choice. Whereas before I was "pro-life" because of a set of beliefs (how fragile those beliefs were!), I am pro-choice now because of a very personal experience. I have found that beliefs formed through experience are almost always the best!

Since my abortion (quite some time later), I became a born-again Christian. Strangely (to most people, anyway), I find my faith in Christ strengthens my pro-choice commitment. Jesus Christ tells me as a Christian to "judge not, that ye be not judged"(Mt. 7:1). I think that all who pass judgement on women who have abortions should take His words to heart. I feel strongly that God put me into the situation where I was faced with an unbearable pregnancy, in order to teach me that I must never judge another person until I have been in their situation. I learned my lesson very well.

When I was "pro-life", I had no knowledge of what illegal abortions were like before 1973 - if I had known, I doubt I would have been a "right-to-lifer". But I didn't know, and now, I have been reading quite a bit about what women had to endure before Roe v. Wade. I pray to God that we will never have to return to those evil days! I was only 15 when abortion was legalized, so naturally I don't remember what it was like then. But now that I do know, and now that I know what my own experience has taught me, for me there is no turning back.

I am not worried for myself; I an married now (and I have been for 6 years). If abortion is outlawed again, my husband and I are well-off enough financially that I could afford to fly across the country to get an abortion if I should need one again. My concern now is not for myself; it is for all the women who cannot afford to travel to another state (or another country) if abortion is outlawed in their own state. And of course, if they are desperate enough, they will take an old coathanger and perform a "do-it-yourself". And they will die.

Knowing what I do now, I will fight to defend safe and legal abortion with all the strength I have. That is the Christian thing to do, as far as I am concerned.

***

LETTER-32

I had an illegal abortion in 1959. This may be a rather rambling story, but abortions in 1959 were rambling stories. The way one found an abortionist in those days was to call friends and acquaintances and see if they knew anyone.

After a number or phone calls, I reached a male friend who said his girlfriend was pregnant and also wanted an abortion, so if I found anyone I should let him know. Eventually I found someone, who was presumably a doctor and who came to your house to perform the abortion. I called my friend's girlfriend, Mary, and we arranged to have the doctor perform both abortions the same day -- hers first at her home and then mine.

The male doctor and his male companion arrived at the house around 7:00 P.M. They told me to boil some water (!) and clear off the dining room table. I spoke with both of them for a few minutes. The doctor smelled of liquor and was slurring his words. I asked his companion if he were drunk and he said "No, we just had a couple of drinks before dinner." I asked them to leave and not return.

The next day I called Mary to see how her operation went. She said OK, except that she noticed the doctor had grease under his fingernails. When she asked him why a doctor wold have grease under his fingernails, he said, "I'm not a doctor-- I'm a mechanic." She went ahead with it anyway. Incidentally, she was a former Miss .... and the doctor/mechanic called her regularly for a date. She had to threaten him with the police to get rid of him.

I later asked my friend who had recommended this doctor if he knew the doctor was actually a an auto mechanic. He said yes, he did, but he did good work and had learned his trade from "an old colored lady in North Carolina".

I eventually did find a doctor to perform the abortion.
He had an office on ... Avenue. The whole thing was slimy and sleazy and is still very vivid in my mind.

The bottom line is that women will always have abortions. If it becomes illegal again, they will go back to the alleys, the coat hangers and the auto mechanics for them. I hope to God that Roe v. Wade is never overturned.

***

LETTER-34

When I became pregnant for the second time three years ago my son was eight months old and my husband and I had not made a decision about a second child. Our first child was unplanned and I had had great difficulty adjusting to the changes being a parent brought into my life. I was not behaving irresponsibly either time I became pregnant - I was 31, and 32, respectively, I was married and I was practicing a reliable form of birth control that failed.

With this second pregnancy I was forced to confront my true feelings about parenting and I knew introducing another child into a marriage that had been shaken by the unexpected arrival of a first baby could not withstand a second child. I went through a week of serious soul-searching, involving long discussions with my husband and a therapist. It was a difficult painful week but when I made my decision I knew it was the right one for all of us.

I recently heard that right to life advocates are trying to implement a study on post-abortion depression. The day I had my abortion was one of great relief and thanks that I had the freedom to make a choice, that my destiny, the quality of my life and that of my family was something I could control.

This is the one political issue for which I will go to the streets to express where I stand.

***

LETTER-53

Although I have had an abortion, and consider the freedom I enjoyed to choose that option a blessing, I would like to relate the experience I had with a friend, before Roe v. Wade gave all of us that freedom and the right to protect our bodies and lives.

This experience happened when "Helen" and I were in high school in Virginia. It was about 1969.

Helen was in love with "Tom," and she became pregnant. She was 17. The only thing they could think of to do was to try and find a doctor who would help them illegally. Helen's parents were very strict, and didn't approve of Tom and how serious their relationship was. Helen and Tom didn't have the thousands of dollars it would have taken to go to New York and have a D & C in a hospital. That was about the only legal way we knew of at that time.

Through word of mouth, Tom heard of a doctor in Washington, D.C. who would provide injections that he said would cause a miscarriage. Three shots, a week apart, were required. Each shot cost about $50. They decided to try it. I gave them all the money I had to help.

The "doctor" said the shots were sheep placenta. God only knows what they were. They made Helen very sick, but she stayed pregnant.

Tom heard about another "doctor" who would perform an abortion. We went to his office, somewhere in a bad part of D.C., late at night. His "office" was a bedroom in his house. God knows what kind of equipment he had there, or how clean the place was, or what kind of training he had. I'll never forget sitting in his living room, listening to Helen scream. When it was over, he insisted that we leave immediately, without giving Helen more than 15 minutes to rest and recover. She was white as a ghost, and in great pain.

The doctor gave her no post-procedure instructions, no mention of a follow-up appointment, nothing. If I remember correctly, it cost about $500, which Tom borrowed from his parents on some pretext or another.

A few days later, Helen was still bleeding, and she felt awful. She finally went to her family doctor, and he discovered the abortionist had punctured her uterus.

Helen recovered, married Tom, and later learned that they could never have children because of the damage done by that butcher.

While this experience was horrible and tragic, I'm sure it wasn't all that extraordinary. It was just so damn unnecessary, and should never be allowed to happen to anyone ever again.

My own experience was far more ordinary, and I'll always be thankful for that.

I had the good fortune to have an accidental, unwanted pregnancy when I was an adult, and abortions were legal.

Somehow my diaphragm failed me, and I became pregnant while I was in college.

I was able to go to an immaculate clinic, with a caring and skilled staff. I was provided with counseling - both before and after - and with information, a phone number to call 24-hrs-a-day in case of complications, a follow-up examination, and a wonderful nurse to hold my hand. And the cost was something I could afford.

Thank you for all you are doing to make sure the horror stories don't become commonplace again.

P.S. I'd rather my name not be used, because it could hurt me in my profession. but I authorize you to use it anyway, because the threat is so serious that freedom of choice might be diminished. I feel a responsibility, as a result, to stand up and be counted.

***

LETTER-63

I hope you will send my letter on to the Justices of the Supreme Court of the U.S.A.

My experience with the abortion I had in 1952 was a positive experience. The worst aspect of the abortion was having to leave the U.S, my 4 sons, and spend a great deal of money which we could ill afford in order to go to Panama where the operation could be done safely and legally. One way or another I was bound and determined to have that abortion. My reason for being so adamant about it was that my brother was born with a cleft lip and my third son was born with one too plus a cleft palate. I nearly went out of my mind waiting for the birth of the 4th child. There is no way I would have been sane by the end of a fifth pregnancy. I would have been of no use to my children or my husband in that condition. It was an easy decision to make.

You should also know that wonderful as my 4 sons are, I have had no regrets and never wondered about what that fetus was or would have been as I'm sure I would have done if given up for adoption. Having the abortion was like having an unwanted wart dispatched.

I only wish there had been Roe vs. Wade back in my day of decision, but I rejoice that others can now make their own choice. Please don't take that inalienable right away from women of our country.

***

LETTER-80

This letter is being written in support of PRO-CHOICE.

At the age of 34 I had to face that choice. After seven years of marriage, my husband and I were told our first born would have a degenerate I.Q. chromosomal syndrome, being born with an I.Q. of 40 or less and continuing to degenerate. (I had had an amniocentesis.)

We knew we could never afford the necessary life-long care, not could we bare the thought of a child of ours living in an over-crowded, loveless institution or home. Many friends in our community called in condolence, even one telling us of her divorce due to an institutionalized child; and how she wished she had had a CHOICE "in those dark ages" prior to legalized abortion rights.

Having been an elementary teacher for twelve years, I knew the struggle children with at least average I.Q. must go through to succeed. I could never bring a child with less into the world.

My husband and I went through the procedure hand in hand, shedding tears together, but our life goes on now with a very healthy baby boy who is now six years old and will not be a burden to tax payers or society.

It is very easy for the in-experienced to philosophize on any given subject, so please listen to those of us who have experienced this very personal CHOICE, and let it continue to be a woman's choice.

***

LETTER-121

I am angered that a minority of very vocal fanatics are now making me feel that it is necessary for me to put on the public record one of the most private, difficult, important, and far-reaching decisions in my life. However, I feel that I have no choice in this matter because women's lives, the quality of those lives, and women's legal personhood are at stake.

First I'd like to tell you a little bit about who I am because I am not just a statistic and because I might not fit your stereotype of a woman who would have an abortion. Most importantly, I'm alive thanks to safe, legal abortion. Furthermore, I don't think I could ask for a happier life, although some would say I should be in constant grief due to my abortion.

I'm a college student, often on the Dean's List, studying to become a German teacher. At least, those are my plans right now, but I have so much going for me and so many options that I'm not sure if that's what I'll do. I enjoy my education immensely and I plan to continue it beyond a bachelor's degree.

Besides being a student, I'm also a journalist. I've edited my high school newspaper, written for my college paper, and for a year I was a paid freelance writer for the ... of ... county. I'm also an active volunteer. I've spent many hours working with children, especially gifted students who need extra encouragement and attention, through YWCA/YMCA programs since my first year in college and I currently lead one of those programs.

I have a boyfriend whom I love very much and intend to marry after we both graduate. He is studying to be a history teacher. We recently celebrated our 5-year "anniversary". Some of the things I enjoy are running, traveling, weightlifting, photography, and cooking. Other interests I pursue are animal rights (I'm a vegetarian), music, and the Pro-Choice movement.

I have a wonderful and fun family. We've had our problems in the past but we generally get along well. My mother is a nurse in a ..., my father is a computer scientist, my younger brothers are students, and my older sister is married with two young children and a house painting business.

I personally don't think a twenty year-old could ask for a better life than mine. I like to believe that the pursuit of happiness is an important and unique principle upon which my country was founded and I wish more Americans were able to enjoy the fruits of this philosophy as much as I have so I do what I can to help.

When I was fifteen I had an abortion. I had been somewhat ignorant about the workings of birth control. I wasn't totally ignorant, but most of my information came from peers. So when my father took away my birth control pills (an unfortunate, misguided reaction to a rebellious teenager by a frustrated father), I wasn't very alarmed and I didn't cease having sex with my boyfriend. I planned to get more pills as soon as I could (which wasn't easy, not being able to drive), but in the meantime I thought it would be easy to predict my days of fertility. That's what I'd picked up from friends. And besides, when you're fifteen years old you don't really believe you could become pregnant any more than you believe you could die tomorrow.

For a couple of weeks I suffered from morning sickness and I was tired all the time. I was so nauseous that sometimes I couldn't attend school. My mother guessed what was wrong some time during those weeks and confirmed her guess by snooping through my purse and finding the receipt for my pregnancy test. Needless to say, we didn't have the perfect mother-daughter relationship.

When I found I was pregnant, I was in disbelief. I told my boyfriend right away. He was fourteen years old. We were very scared and we discussed what we should do. Neither one of us believed that the fetus was a human life yet and we were sure we weren't ready to be parents (just as sure as we had been when we bought my birth control pills). One of my biggest worries was what his parents' reaction would be. I believed we wouldn't be able to see each other again if they found out. I also worried about my parents' and grandparents' reactions and the reactions of people at school. I felt, with good reason, that my family had enough problems without my adding this to them. And, as little as I liked school at that time, I was worried about the future of my education. So our decision was that I should have an abortion. I had considered some other options, namely suicide or running away and giving the baby up for adoption. I actually made a list of pros and cons of suicide. But there was no way I would've been able to pull off either of those two options and I'm glad I didn't try to. My boyfriend and I decided we wouldn't tell our parents about it and we would get money from selling things we owned.

As it turned out, my mother discovered our secret. She was angry but mostly concerned, and I think she felt somewhat guilty. She asked me what I wanted to do and didn't really try to sway me one way or the other. She told my father I was pregnant and he wouldn't talk to me for a long time, which was something he had never done before. I felt very guilty, like I'd let everyone down.

My mother took me to get the abortion and paid the $250.00. My boyfriend wasn't allowed to come along although I wanted him there. My mother was very non-judgmental. Just once I remember she told me "You don't have to do this if you don't want to," but I assured her that I really did.

At the clinic I met women of various circumstances. Some were teenagers but most seemed to be older than me. One woman was married with one son. She told me she was pregnant because her birth control had failed, but she and her husband had planned to have only one child. They couldn't afford to give a second child a quality life. She had already been planning to have a tubal ligation when she became pregnant. Several other women were there because they had tried the new "sponge" method of birth control which was being vigorously advertised on T.V. at the time. Obviously it was not reliable.

I received a great deal of counseling at the clinic. I was told about the procedure and its risks and about effective birth control. Furthermore, people there made sure more than once that I had thought my decision through. They were very thorough about this. No mention was made of a "baby" growing inside me, as is apparently done at certain fake abortion clinics. Instead words were used which would not insult my belief system. However, I knew about the controversy surrounding the topic and the argument that abortion is murder. This argument had never been convincing to me or my boyfriend or my parents because it is based on certain religions rather than science and I had not been brought up with any of these particular religions.

For me, the abortion was mercifully almost painless and the two-week recovery period was without any serious problems. I had only been about eight or nine weeks pregnant at the time. Afterwards, I was distraught and doubtful at times, but not nearly as much as I had been before my abortion, and mostly I just felt relieved. I felt freed from the trap I'd been in, glad to be alive, and ready to make a new start.

Since my abortion I've listened with interest to the controversy and I've even written to and talked with some of the "pro-lifers" to see if there was something I hadn't been told. But without exception I've found their opinions to be based on their religions rather than verifiable scientific facts. Furthermore I've found that most of them leave out women's circumstances in their arguments and some seem to have an unspoken desire to use forced pregnancy and labor (or unsafe illegal abortions as the alternative) as a punishment for what they consider to be the immoral behavior of women. As good as many of their intentions may be, their vision tends to be narrowly focused so that they forget to consider the true probable outcome of what they propose. Many forget to account for circumstances such as the life of an unwanted child, the equally "immoral" behavior of the men who made the women pregnant, and the unfortunate financial realities of parenthood in America. Many of these people try to reduce the issue to a simple one, but I know from experience that it is not.

About a year ago I thought I might be pregnant again. I told my boyfriend and he took me to get a pregnancy test. I'm on the pill but I know that no form of birth control is 100% effective. We discussed the possibility and decided that we would probably have a baby and give it up for adoption if I was pregnant. That option makes more sense at this time in our lives than it did when we were younger for several reasons. First we have stronger support systems to see it through now than we would have had then, in terms of the strength of our own relationship, close friendships with others, and healthier, more supportive families than we had had. We see adoption as a way to give happiness to a childless couple, but unlike before it wouldn't be a disruption of our lives and families at a crucial time. Also, it would pose less of a threat statistically to my health and life to go through pregnancy and labor at 19 or 20 than at 15, physically as well as psychologically. Finally, if we decided for some reason that we could not bear to give the baby up for adoption, we would be in a considerable better position to provide a life for her or him without jeopardizing our futures, our relationship, or the well-being of the child. It turned out that I was not pregnant again, which was a relief to us.

But I know that this may happen some day. A woman can't stay on the pill indefinitely because it poses risks to her health which aren't entirely understood even now. I know I'll have to switch birth control methods some time in the next few years and unless scientists come up with something revolutionary my new method will probably be something less reliable than the pill.

If I do face another unwanted pregnancy, married or not, I will need to be free to decide what to do about it without the interference of my government or religious fanatics, based on all of the circumstances surrounding me, my pregnancy, my health, and my family at that time. I cannot foresee now what those might be, but I can't imagine who would possibly be more qualified than me, aside from God, to assess all of those circumstances surrounding my situation and to make a decision about my body and my future. Thank you.

***

LETTER-123

My name is .... I am 26 years old. I am married and have two children. I had an abortion when I was 19 years old. It was before I had my two children now. I was not married. The reason I had the abortion was,

1. I was not working. I didn't have a car are any kind of insurance. I felt that I could not afford to have a child. If I would have had the child, I would have had to go to a charity hospital. (Are had it in the street) I could not have gone to work. I would have had to draw food stamps, welfare, wic, and low income houseing. Which you the taxpayer would have had to pay. I didn't feel that you the tax payer should pay for my mistake.

2. I didn't want to marry the father just to help pay for having the child when he nor I wanted it.

3. I believe I was to young to care for a child when I couldn't care for myself.

4. I don't believe my family should have to pay for my mistake.

I also considered adoption, but after having two children I do not think I could have given my child away after brith. Having a child is a very emotional and physical experience. I believe that you are anyone else should no't have the right to force me are anyone to have a child. That person may not be emotionally ready to have a child. Are you going to be there to help take care of this child for the rest of its life?

I personally feel that a fetus is not a life until it is born from the mother. I do not believe it is considered a life at the time of conception. Because it can not live with out the mother. This is suppose to be a free country, What happen to freedom of choice?

I would like for you to stop and think how much money it would cost you the tax payer, for all the hospital bills, food stamps, welfare for unwed mothers, wic progam, and many more progams, to care for these unwanted children which most people can not afford.

I would have had the abortion even if it was illegal. It would have been just a litte more difficult.

Please do not change the law.

***

LETTER-125

I am the 58 year old mother of five adult offspring, and the ex-wife of two men, one of whom fathered three, and the other of whom fathered two, of my children. All of my five babies were delivered by Caesarian section. I am also the grandmother of seven grandchildren.

Back in the 1950's, when abortion was still a word that you whispered behind your hand; and when having an abortion could land you in jail for years, I had two illegal abortions. They were horribly painful, both physically and mentally.
As a result of the first abortion, (1955) I suffered a crippling infection on the Caesarian scar located on the inside of my uterus; this was the result of an excessively zealous overscraping on the part of the person who performed the abortion. I would not stand up straight nor walk easily for a year after this experience. Also, my early attempts to find an abortionist who didn't want to have intercourse with me as part of the procedure, led to my being severely traumaatized. In addition, there were deep psychic scars which I incurred as a result of being indirectly encouraged to feel that I deserved to suffer for killing a three month old fetus.

In the second abortion, I nearly died while still lying on the table, just after the procedure had been completed, due to an injection of penicillin to which I am lethally allergic. The abortionist didn't have the medical expertise to have anticipated such a possibility, and he had not consulted me.

I chose to have both illegal abortions (the procedure was Dilation and Currettage) without any anesthesia, because of my fear of complications which might possibly kill me. As it was, if I hadn't been awake to croak out the word "adrenalin" after that lethal shot of penicillin, I would have died immediately.

My reason for getting the first illegal abortion had to do with the fact that in addition to living below the poverty level ($250 a month) with my three little children (eldest child: four and a half), I was no longer married. After a difficult divorce, my ex-husband had never respected the agreement that said he was required by law to pay alimony and child support. I was twenty five, we were living in Montreal, and I had no money to pay a lawyer, so I turned to my father for help. He told me that neither he nor my mother would help me, because they were ashamed of me.

When I discovered that I was pregnant, I went to my doctor, who was one of the top obstetrical surgeons at the ... hospital; he had delivered my third living child. He made it clear to me that under the circumstances, (including his awareness of earlier physical abuse that my husband had inflicted on me and on our children), he felt that an abortion was indicated, but that he could not possibly perform it, or even discuss the matter with me any further until the abortion was completed by "somebody else". He gave me a number to call, and told me that he would be able to take care of me "right after it has been started".

There followed a very bad time. When I walked into the office of the man whose number my own doctor had given me, the first thing I saw, piled up on all the shelves and on the floor in the corner as well, were hundreds of bottles filled with clear fluid in which were floating fetuses and embryos. This man told me that he was a pathologist. He immediately asked me to pay him the cost of the abortion: $250. I did so. He then told me to remove my underpanties, and he stood watching me and laughing.

After an extremely painful pelvic examination, in which he tried to play with my clitoris, I sat up and jumped off the table in shocked protest. He then showed me his engorged penis, while he insisted that we could have intercourse together until I aborted. Or if that didn't suit me, I could put his penis in my mouth while pumping a plastic dildo in and out of his rectum. If I chose the latter alternative, he told me he would be willing to refund the $250 cost of the abortion. After a physical struggle, I broke free, ran out of the door and down the steps. I was so distressed that it wasn't until I was on the bus that I realized I was minus both my underpanties and my $250.

Although this seemed awful to me, an even more awful part of it was that when I called my own doctor back (the one who had given me the number of the "pathologist"), he refused to listen to me. I said I wanted to tell him what had happened, because I was sure he didn't realize....The doctor became extremely angry, and shouted at me that by my telephoning him I was endangering his professional career. In a scathing voice he said "I've done all I can do for you at this time. There are LEGITIMATE babies waiting to be born. Is that clear to you?"

I said yes, in a small voice, and hung up the phone. There were legitimate babies waiting to be born, so that meant there was no time for illegitimate fetuses to be disposed of. My feeling of guilt was surpassed only by my sense of outraged helplessness. In all of this, there were still three little mouths to feed, hundreds of diapers to change and launder, and many family and household details to be arranged, just as if nothing else was happening.

The next evening, a friend brought me fifty quinine tablets to swallow. They were supposed to cause immediate abortion. After two days of vomiting and intense stomach pain, my basic situation remained the same: I was still pregnant.

The following week, I went to my boss who ran a pharmacy. I told him what I needed. He told me he knew of an abortionist, but it would cost me $500. He loaned me $250 and my boyfriend borrowed the other $250. My boss said to me, "Now, remember: these guys are all alike. They want your NOOKIE! Keep your eye on what you want: an abortion. Stay calm!"

I then went to the office of a man who would arrange the abortion. He locked us into his office together and suggested to me in a whisper that if I did not want to pay money for my abortion, he knew of a number of "young, handsome, professional men" who would be willing to perform various sexual acts (with me) in front of "a small, high-class audience" and "a famous photographer". He swore that this would make me abort the fetus within a day, and it would cost me nothing.

Wordlessly, I handed him the envelope with $250 in it. I then told him that I wanted a "simple" abortion. He laughed and told me I was crazy. Then he said I was to meet a man on a certain corner at seven that evening. The man's name was "Mister Smith", and he would drive me in his car to a place out of town where he would perform the abortion. I would pay Mister Smith the other $250. He would drive me home after the abortion.

"Mister Smith" performed the abortion without anesthesia on a kitchen table in a cabin somewhere in the Laurentians. His wife assisted him. The operation itself was excruciatingly painful. To help me control my screaming, Mister Smith's wife gave me a wet towel to bite down on. I stared at a painting by Rembrandt, which adorned a calendar on the wall. Mister Smith insisted on showing me the aborted fetus. There was such a large amount of blood that I fainted. He drove me home, and I spent the night curled around my precious children, praying to God to keep them safe from harm, because I had proved that I certainly could not.

The following day I went to my o.b. at [the hospital]. He gave me permission to have an appointment with him now that the abortion had been "done". After he examined me, he told me that although the fetus had been successfully aborted, the Caesarian scar on the inner side of my uterus had been cut, and scraped raw. It had already become badly infected.
After he treated me for the infection, I felt obliged to tell my obstetrician what had happened. He said he would not listen to me, that he didn't want to know about it. He told me: "It's over now, Don't think about it again. Ignorance is bliss."

He also told me that it was his conviction that if a woman becomes pregnant with "an unwanted child" whom she tries to abort, she deserves to have a bad time. "As we say in Quebec, ABORTION IS ILLEGAL FOR A VERY GOOD REASON!"

I have had plenty of time to think over what he said to me then, and I disagree profoundly with his appraisal of the situation. I have concluded that abortion ought to be legal for a number of very GOOD reasons. In my own case, by the time I managed to get an illegal abortion, it wasn't just the lining of my uterus that had been cut and scraped and scarred; it was my soul. And in the long run, it was the members of my living family who suffered the consequences of my guilt and shame and exhaustion, for I became a mother whose terror and depression often overcame her ability to be loving and happy, or even her desire to be living. No matter how I tried to think differently, my having had an illegal abortion meant that I had not only suffered, but I had endangered the life of my children's mother (the life my living children depended upon): MY life and THEIR life, but I had also committed murder in the eye of The Law. After the abortion, I was unable to walk for several months. For many years longer than that, I was unable to govern my brood with confidence, or to live my life with pleasure or gratitude.

*(Of course, Montreal is in the Province of Quebec, which is extremely Catholic. Even the poorest of the poor among French Canadian families are encouraged to have as many babies as they can, presumably to build the strength of The Church by helping to increase its membership. In Quebec, abortion is still as dire a sin as suicide. Many women who are the mothers of large, obedient Catholic families, have lost most of their teeth and hair by the time they are thirty, and in a small town in Quebec, for example, one is considered to be unfaithful if one hasn't proffered at least 6 or 8 new little Church members to the Catholic family. When i lived in Montreal, there were signs that said, "Birth control is against God's Law!")

My second abortion took place in the USA. in 1962. By then, I had been married to my second husband for several years. We lived in Washington, D.C. I had already given birth to my fourth Caesarian-born child, and I became accidentally pregnant a few months after I had stopped nursing him. This pregnancy was the result of unsuccessful contraception. When my husband gave me time, I always used a diaphragm with spermicide jelly. (My husband refused to use anything, believing that it spoiled his pleasure, and that it was solely the woman's business to protect herself from "getting herself pregnant".) We both felt that it was far too soon for me to have another baby. My health was fragile at that time, and the obstetrician told me that my uterus might rupture if I tried to have another baby so soon after the last. But even with this admonition, it was illegal for my doctor to abort my pregnancy. Lacking any sensible legal alternative, I chose to have an illegal abortion. I was given the name of an abortionist in Manhattan. The abortion was performed by ... whose office and fingernails and assistant were all filthy dirty. After the abortion, which was a very painful and slow process, I nearly died from a "surprise" injection of penicillin to which I am lethally allergic. I hemorrhaged, my throat began to close, and as I swelled up, my blood vessels popped like fireworks. I managed to call out for adrenalin, which they eventually administered. My recovery from this experience was slow and difficult, and lonely.

I began to dread and to loathe sexual intercourse. This new attitude of mine caused my husband to begin to look elsewhere for his pleasure. I felt victimized: I was "Damned if I did, and Damned if I didn't."

I also had a legal abortion, in 1965. This was when I was again pregnant: far too soon to safely deliver again after my fifth child was born. (Note: My uterus did in fact rupture when I was later pregnant with my sixth child, which I lost. Both my uterus and ovaries were removed at that time. The doctors had no difficult choices in performing that operation.)

In order to obtain the legal abortion, I was required to be certified by two psychiatrists as mentally and emotionally unstable and "suicidal". (The certification process was humiliating; one of the psychiatrists told me I was suicidal and needed "prolonged help", which he gave me over the next seventeen years for two hours every day, six days a week, always with the threat that I might kill myself if I didn't depend on him and his treatment...at last I managed to realize that at over $200 a day, I was paving his terrace, sending his children, and probably paying for his wife's new mink coat!) It was not a stabilizing realization.

The legal abortion was performed by my obstetrician at the ... Hospital. I went into the hospital the night before; my doctor's attitude was practical and matter-of-fact. The procedure itself was done with sensitivity to my emotional as well as physical condition, which allowed me to recover quickly and without added stress. Sodium pentathol was administered during the D and C, and afterwards, I was given an antibiotic for infection and codeine for pain. When I went home, 24 hours later, I was in good condition considering the fact that I had just undergone an abortion. And even though I was sad, I most definitely did not feel like a murderer!

I felt sympathetic support from the doctor and from the nurses. There is always a sadness that goes along with any kind of procedure that takes away the possibility of a new life. But what makes the difference is attitude.

In choosing to have abortions, I was choosing to remain strong and healthy for my family.

But by putting my life at risk in order to avoid taking on more that I could cope with, I ended up feeling like a murderer. At least with a legal abortion, I felt that I could be protected from the kind of abuse or harm I had experienced with the illegal ones.

Recently, I read an article which said that over 40,000 babies die of starvation every day, in the Third World. Can it be a morally superior choice to bring so many new, hopeless little lives into the world to suffer from hunger and die of starvation without ever knowing life's happiness? If saving so many lives from misery and futility were to be considered a function of abortion, then it could be seen as a compassionate choice rather than a crime against life.

***

LETTER-130

I am a 60 year old woman deeply troubled by the possibility that women's constitutional right to determine their own reproductive rights is being threatened and may be taken away. It is almost hard to believe that there is even a possibility that this could happen after so many of us fought to achieve this fundamental right. I know, of course, that the threat is very real and I urge you to abandon this path of thinking.

When I was in my twenties I had an illegal abortion. There were no other options that I saw at that time. Because of the illegality, it was extremely difficult to find someone who would discuss how to find someone to help me. People were afraid. As a consequence, when I finally found a source I had gone beyond the time of a safe procedure. I lied to the "doctor" because I knew he wouldn't do it if I told him how far along I was. We all hear the stories about "what it was like." They are true. He insisted I come by myself which I did. Is there any way I can describe my fear? He was unclean, he joked a lot, his hands were rough, his breath was bad. He forcefully approached me to have sex with him because "what harm would there be under the circumstance?" That, of course, explained his reason for insisting that I come alone. So on top of the fear for my physical safety in that situation, the agony of decision about what I was doing, the need to keep this secret from everyone I knew and face it alone, there was the disgust, repulsion and deep fear that if I didn't do what he wanted he would send me away.

It is not my intention to describe the physical procedure, the discomfort, the sounds that I will always remember. That isn't the point. It was something that I did and I am not sorry. Sad, yes. Sad that it had to be, sad that it had to be such a traumatic experience that will always be a part of me, sad that there was so much agony and turmoil trying to find help.

I never want another woman to have to experience what I went through. My plea is that simple.

***

LETTER-140

I am writing today to share my experience with abortion in the hope that it might, in some small way, help the Supreme Court understand why it is so important that abortion remain safe, legal and affordable.

In 1964, I was a nineteen-year old wife and mother of an infant daughter. My daughter, born five weeks premature, had been diagnosed soon after birth with a congenital heart defect. She would need open-heart surgery as soon as she was strong enough.

When our little girl was a year old, I became pregnant as a result of a contraceptive failure. I tried very hard during this time to image caring for a second child. We considered our finances, our emotional resources and support system. We sadly had to admit that our marriage was already under incredible strain. It seemed impossible to have another child without doing irreparable harm to our existing family.

Abortion was not legal. After several weeks of searching, I found someone who would perform the procedure, but his fee was more than we could afford. Beginning to feel desperate, I tried several times to abort myself. Before I could do myself any more harm, the doctor, unlicensed in the U.S., agreed to reduce the fee to whatever we could afford after hearing our situation. I was fortunate. I watched a neighbor rushed to the hospital after she tried to abort herself.

Since that time, my daughter has had two successful heart operations, graduated from college and is a healthy productive woman. She also has a sister born in 1977.

I have heard it said that abortion is just a convenience, especially for middle-class women. I assure you, pregnancy is no mere inconvenience. A pregnancy consumes a woman's body, energies and resources for nine months, many times with complications, sometimes at risk to the woman's life. After pregnancy, there is a child, life's most sacred responsibility, for eighteen years, for life. I am not well-to-do. I cannot offer my children the world on a silver platter, but I feel that I and every woman must have the right to offer her child the best chance for life that she can. Every woman must have the right to enter into this life-absorbing responsibility when she decides that she can.

I strongly support thorough sex education for young people, contraceptive research to develop safe, inexpensive birth control, and safe legal, affordable abortion. I hope the Court will as well.

LETTER-149

Two weeks after I discovered I was pregnant, my husband, who had suffered for years with an un-diagnosed illness, was found to have a malignant brain tumor. After two very expensive visits to psychiatrists I was given permission to have a leagalized abortion at a local hospital. This was in 1960.

For the next 3-1/2 years I spent most of my days at ... I was the only one who could interpret my husband's garbled speech. He died at the end of that time.

To have the abortion was the wisest decision I have ever made. I could not have been as helpful to my husband or my two children during the horrible time of this dreadful illness, had I also been©R responsible for a baby.

I have never regretted my decision. I had no physical or mental ill effects. I have never had any feelings of guilt. It was a decision of survival as far as I could determine.

It is all too easy for anti-abortionists to judge as long as the unwanted pregnancy is not theirs. When or if the problem becomes theirs personally, they will quickly be on the pro-choice side!

***

LETTER-152

In the summer of 1982 I had a legal abortion. I was twenty-seven years old and living with the man I later married. I was using birth control, a diaphragm, but nonetheless, I became pregnant. My mate and I discussed the options, and he basically told me that whatever decision I made, he would support.

I chose abortion because both my mate and I were abusing drugs at that time, a fact I am not proud of, but one that must be considered in the decision to bear and raise a child. Our financial situation was disasterous, we were in debt from hospital bills from surgery my mate had had on a bleeding ulcer and from a recent IRS audit. We were both working, but it was barely enough to take care of the bills and our drug habits.

Our health was poor, as was our emotional state. The thought of bringing a child into an environment of fighting and turmoil associated with drug abuse was inhumane to me. I didn't believe adoption to be a viable option, as I didn't think that I could give birth to a healthy baby.

Choosing abortion was a tough decision, one I hope I never have to make again, but I am thankful that the option was open to me. My husband and I are drug-free now, financially solvent, and plan to have a child in the near future.

People who don't have options often do desperate, dangerous things. I implore you not to take the right to abortion away from American women. We alone are responsible for making choices concerning our bodies' reproductive systems.

***

LETTER-157

My name is .... I left home when I was 17. I found myself pregnant when I was 18. I was the mother of one at 19. At 20, the mother of two. Given my Catholic upbringing, it was completely out of the realm of possibility to choose anything other than having a child and if the father was willing, to marry. I married a boy no more ready to be a father and husband than I was ready to be a wife and mother. Neither of us attended college and had barely any idea of how to support ourselves. The marriage lasted on and off for eight years. During most of those years we went hungry and were under the incredible pressure of basic survival. We had children as children and had to figure out fast how to grow up. It's not as simple as sink or swim, and the emotional and psychological damage that is wrought cannot ever be undone. I experienced two nervous breakdowns during those years, with scars I live with to this day. I had made the decision to have children when I was totally unprepared economically, physically, emotionally, morally, spiritually, and psychologically. And why? Simply because I had been programmed to believe it was the "right thing to do". The critical thinking never entered into it, I did what I was supposed to do. It changed the course of my life forever.

I had always been opposed to abortion vehemently, never thinking it through myself, just condemning those who believed in it. It was easy to feel a rather smug, self-satisfied righteousness to be on "God's side" and dismiss the voiced concerns of women who found themselves faced with painful options. During one of the several separations I had with my former husband, I found myself pregnant. I could not just blindly assign my fate once again to someone else's beliefs. I was forced to confront my beliefs and make my own decision. After grueling soul searching, I chose abortion. Had that option not been available to me I know, given the state of my emotions from all I had been through, I would not be here today writing this letter.

The world is full of neglected, abused children. We see and hear about them every day. What is the sense of adding to their numbers by limiting a woman's options over he own body? If this legislation is overturned, would any of us be able to face any of the resulting unwanted children, poor, neglected or abused and say well, at least you're alive? The "gift of life" can mean shockingly little when your life is never free from poverty and abuse.

Please, let us as a society make our choices wisely.

***

LETTER-160

Yesterday, I called Mass Choice because I am more and more frightened that the choice to end an unplanned pregnancy, which was of critical importance to me and my two children on two separate occasions (when the birth control I was using failed to protect me), may become unavailable to other women.

I also chose, during the course of a sixteen year marriage, to have two children (mentioned above) by artificial insemination as my husband was unable to father children. The children are now 12 and 14.... They are healthy, attractive, straight A adolescents with the normal problems of adolescence.

However, at the time of the divorce, when I was in my late 30's, the children were 1 and 3. We were thrown suddenly into poverty as my ex-husband refused child support. I had no job skills and had never dated. At my first job I earned $100.00 a month less that the child care cost. The job, required me to work 70 hours a week (ass't. manager of a McDonald's). (My husband had disapproved of my working outside the home even though for most of the time we were married we had no children and he was away 14 hours every day.) Our life was a nightmare of fear and struggle after the divorce.

Twice during those years immediately following the divorce, during the course of a relationship we hoped would lead to marriage, I became pregnant. I recognized the signs immediately. I was terrified. Thankfully, a friend told me about [an abortion clinic]. (It saved my life and my children's lives. An illegal abortion would have had to be my choice were not abortion legal and available through the Center at a reasonable cost. They provided counseling on birth control as well. (It wasn't until after the second abortion two years later that I had an I.U.D. implanted. It has proved effective and safe for me in the 9 years since).

The Center was a port in a terrible storm. To have been forced to carry the pregnancy to term and then give the baby up for adoption, as Bush has suggested, would have destroyed my children's and my life. I'm from a well-educated, upper middle class background, for me personally welfare is not an option. All my children would learn from that is "how to be on welfare" instead of "how to work your way out of a difficult situation."

It's been eleven years since the divorce. I'm forty-eight. I haven't even dated for a couple of years. My focus is on the children and completing my Ph.D. in Applied Behavioral Systems Theory. The children and I live in a house I was able to buy last summer. We're happy. We made it. But just barely. In those first years our situation was so fragile. I have, now, enormous empathy for other women who suddenly find themselves fighting to keep their family together in a sudden poverty they themselves did not cause. Not having the free choice for a necessary abortion at such a time would, in many cases, be a virtual death sentence for the family. The strength of feeling I have in this is born of my own struggle.

I was thankful to the medical profession for giving me two children I would not otherwise have had. To me they are miracle children.

And I am thankful to the medical profession for providing a safe, immediately available abortion, twice in my life.

I chose to have two children.
I chose not to have two children.
I was luck to be able to choose.
I fervently hope you will not take away the choice from other women.

***

LETTER-173

Please use this letter in any way it can be helpful in filing friend of the court briefs or in any other way it can be useful to the cause of continuing freedom of reproductive choice for all women in the United States. I am willing to have my name associated with any use of it.

In 1984 I became pregnant by accident. I was married to a man who had become a physically abusive alcoholic. We had one child, age 3, at the time. I didn't see any way out of the relationship for myself at that time. My husband was not then working. He had left his step-father's company and I believed (correctly) that his chances of working steadily were dim because of his behavioral problems. I was the sole support for my family at this time and had virtually no help from my husband in any area of responsibility. I was emotionally distraught much of the time because I felt I was not providing the material or emotional environment that my child deserved, and because of the constant pressures of physical and emotional abuse. The thought of bringing another child into that environment was more than I could bear. I knew I could not add the work of caring for another child to my burden, it would have broken me. Although I had enjoyed my first child as a baby and had been more delighted than burdened with night feedings and constant care, I did not want to think about what kind of a person I would become with the added demands on me. I was also afraid of physical harm to myself and the developing fetus, and fear that I could become a "welfare mother" unable to support my family. With no joy in my heart but with the knowledge that I was certainly making the right choice I had an abortion.

Two years later I found the strength to divorce my husband and am now living a much better life with my one son in all regards. We are self-sufficient and stable. I am even able to plan for his education. I don't know what would have happened in our lives had I not been able to obtain a legal, and therefore affordable, abortion. If the right to safe, legal abortion is denied it is not denied to those who can afford to go out of the country or to pay an exorbitant fee for a "D & C" to a doctor willing to act illegally. It is only denied to those who are least able to bear additional financial and emotional burdens. They must seek unsafe, degrading abortions or risk losing their self-sufficiency and direction in life which also robs their living children of the opportunity to grow up and benefit from the other rights and opportunities available to americans which allow most of us to lead useful, productive, satisfying lives.

***

LETTER-181

As you are all well aware, it is the interpretation of the law, not the law itself, that bestows its bite or its blessing. Abortion is the same. For each woman who has had an abortion, there is a different interpretation of the experience, ranging from relief to sorrow, and sometimes a woman's feelings include the entire spectrum at once.

This is why, to me, abortion means ambivalence.

I have had two abortions. The first brought me a sense of relief after I became pregnant near the end of a relationship, and knew there was no future with that man. There was nothing about my situation at the time that seemed healthy for a child to be born into. It was not an easy decision, but I was grateful for the fact that my own struggle was exactly that - my own struggle - and that I did not also have to endure the persecution of taking an action that was illegal. However, I must say, if it were illegal at the time, I would have made the same choice.

The second time I had an abortion I had been married eight months. My husband and I had decided before we were married that we wanted children, but my unplanned pregnancy seemed like a prison sentence to him. He wanted me to have an abortion. I did not want an abortion, but I decided to have one because I felt that having a child at that time would have driven a wedge between us. I was in deep emotional and spiritual pain over this decision because I loved my husband dearly and I loved the child inside me. However, it was my decision at the time to choose to nurture our relationship until the "right" time to have children.

I realize now there is no "right" time. I was divorced last year after waiting eight years for the right time to come. Sometimes I feel the depth of regret about my abortion, wondering about that child, loving that child. Sometimes, however, I feel that I must have known, intuitively, that it was better not to have children with this man. The years with my husband revealed he had a violent streak that was unpredictable and frightening. When we decided to divorce he said he realized he was afraid of having children because he didn't want to inflict his turmoil on them.

To me, abortion means ambivalence. Life means ambivalence. Life does not fit into neat and permanent packages. The choice to have an abortion should and will always remain one of the most difficult decisions a woman could make. But because it is fraught with conflict does not mean it should be taken out of her own personal realm of choice.

I have made decisions which only I am responsible for making. The wisdom or foolishness of past decisions becomes clearer with age. I have not permanently judged either of my decisions as wise or foolish. Some days one feeling prevails, some days another. What persists is that I made the choices and I am responsible for those choices, and responsible for my feelings about those choices. Making a choice and living with it is the weight of life that we all must learn to bear. Learning to bear this weight, and to learn from our mistakes, is the passage into adulthood which is fundamental to a healthy society. Otherwise, citizens are mindless, without accountability.

A friend of mine who is a loving father and a Fundamentalist Christian feels that abortion is murder. I agree with him. Where we differ is that I admit that sometimes the taking of life is necessary. Not right. But sometimes necessary.

I believe a fetus is human and has a spiritual identity. And I believe that the weight of life that we must learn to bear as adults sometimes includes the taking of life. It is the conscience or lack of conscience with which the taking of life is committed that has consequences for our society. The arguments about euthanasia, our guilt over Viet Nam, - these are extensions of our ambivalence about the taking of life. And we should never take it away easily. But still we know that sometimes the taking of life is necessary. In euthanasia, it is sometimes necessary to preserve the dignity and the quality of the life that has been lived; in abortion, it is sometimes necessary to prevent the birth of a life that would be lived without quality, because the mother knows that she does not have the spiritual, emotional or material resources to provide to that child at that time. To dictate that in such an instance she should give birth and give the child up for adoption is to sentence the mother to another cruelty. She should be able to decide for herself if she can bear or should bear the weight of that very private burden.

Instead of legislating to restrict people from the weight of personal decisions, shouldn't we rather encourage a society where people understand the complexity of life, and bear the responsibility for their choices? Perhaps we want to legislate against abortion because we are afraid of bearing the weight of our decisions. Perhaps it is because we are afraid of death.

I pray that you all, in your hearts, choose to listen to the stories of women of conscience, like me, who believe that life is sacred AND that the difficult decision to have an abortion or to give birth must rest with individual women.

***

LETTER-187

I happily write this letter in support of every person's right to choose when they will have their children.

I have faced several such decisions in my life.

When I was nineteen I became pregnant with my first child. I never thought of doing anything other than having the baby. The baby's father, now my husband, first thought of abortion but that quickly gave way to acceptance and joy at the arrival of our son.

In the past 2 1/2 years since his birth, we have understood what it is to struggle. Neither of us have college degrees and we both feel very strongly about not using the welfare system. We have had to do the best we can for ourselves and our son. What we have had is love.

1 1/2 years ago I became pregnant again. Initially we were glad as we recognized the sacredness of life. But, in time and through discussion I realized I was not ready to be a mother of two. I also felt my 13 month old son deserved my full attention and demanded it. At this point we fully understood the realities and stresses of parenting. The financial responsibilities create very high levels of stress and even our love for each other and our son didn't make it any better. After a heart wrenching decision we chose abortion.

Not out of convenience or hate but out of love for the unborn child we knew we were unprepared to take proper care of.

I did not enjoy my abortion. I don't see how anyone could. I do not plan to have another. It was one of the most physically painful experiences of my life but I feel deep in my heart I made the right choice for the baby and for myself and my family.

I think we as women and/or mothers do have the right and the insight to know what is best for our unborn babies and for ourselves. Let's remember how we all speak of "women's intuition."

At my abortion experience there were others who chose the same place and day to release their babies. Almost all were obviously under 18 and most were with their mothers. I am glad to know our young women have a safe choice. They have the choice to wait until they feel they are ready to be good mothers and able to provide the kind of security necessary for a child to grow up healthy. They have a choice to live out their dreams, even though they've made a mistake. Would we really send them back to the enslavement of unwanted pregnancy, financial hardship and shattered dreams? Don't we want more for their children than lives on welfare, in poverty. Don't we want all of our children to have every opportunity for education instead of forced enslavement to a welfare system that cannot support human life? I think anyone who thinks that with a little effort these women can remove the ball and chain of poverty isn't living in the real world.

I was lucky enough to have the love and support of my man standing by me, but how many teenagers have that? I realize teenage pregnancies are only a portion of the abortions that happen these days, but teenage abortions are what is relevant to my experience.

I recently became pregnant again and I am now choosing to have our second child. The stresses are all still there but I feel like the last 4 years of my life have matured me enough to handle them.

I have no college degree. I have no way, on my own, of making enough money for my children and I to survive. I understand these realities the realities the young women of this country face at the thought of illegalizing abortion.

If we want our country to have on coming generations of children that are bright, healthy and capable we must allow women and men the right to choose when they will become parents and not force them unnecessarily into lives of poverty and shattered dreams. We owe our children that much at least.

I would like to thank all of you there at NARAL for all you are doing to speak out for the women and unborn children of this country.

Keep up the good work!

***

LETTER-209

I had an illegal abortion in 1966. My parents went with me. We were lucky. The person who performed the procedure was competent and considerate. My father was a 4-year WWII vet. stationed in North Africa. He told me a few years ago he was never more afraid in his life than when we went to New Jersey for that illegal abortion.

I was 19, attending a city college, and unprepared to marry, to be a mother, to continue with the pregnancy. The fear, isolation and horror my whole family experienced should not be repeated for my children or their friends. The decision about what to do in a crisis pregnancy belongs to the woman involved and her conscience. It does not take a sperm + ova to create new life - it takes a sperm, ova and a woman's uterus. If that woman does not want to support that growth for whatever reason, she is the one who should decide what to do about it.

I now work as a sexuality educator and birth control advocate. If people want to prevent abortions, let them get serious about contraception, about b.c. options, research etc. The facism involved in the anti choice movement enrages me. I will testify, appear in public, use my name, do whatever to keep up the struggle for women's right to choose.

***

LETTER-212

My name is .... In April of 1988, I obtained a legal abortion. I was twenty years old + faced with an unplanned pregnancy. I already have two sons that came along in my young life. Like most single parents, I live on Public Aid. I also live in one of the poorest regions of Illinois. I was very relieved that there was a safe + legal option to resolve my problem. I believe all women should have reproductive rights for their own bodies.

****

LETTER-216

One morning late last fall, I listened in disbelief to the news that the Attorney General had asked the Supreme Court to review a case that might overturn Roe vs Wade. I cried - cried at the thought of so many women suffering so much if this threat really came to pass. The tears were quickly followed by anger and fear. The anger and fear have not diminished.

I feel qualified to comment on this possible reversal and free to be outraged. In February, 1982, I had an abortion. It is a decision I have never regretted. I thanked God then and still for my right to have had a choice seven years ago.

In 1982, I was 38 years old, married with two children. We were and are still a typical suburban family - as far as the outside world can see. But life was not ordinary for us in 1982. I was (I am) chemically addicted to the drug alcohol. Beginning in October, 1981 I made my first feeble attempts at recovery from alcoholism. Having finally accepted the fact that I needed help with a problem that was making life a living hell, I wandered in and out of AA meetings, listening but not hearing, trying but failing - time after time. The months passed. I became more and more fearful that I wasn't capable of recovery - I was going to die from a disease - the progression of which only I could halt. But I couldn't stop drinking for any substantial length of time. For some reason, I kept attending AA meetings-they provided the only hope.

In the midst of this rollercoaster ride of addiction - in February, 1982, I realized I could be pregnant. I called a doctor who quickly verified the pregnancy with a blood test. I was frantic, frightened, drained physically, emotionally, spiritually from my alcoholism. I could not manage my own life. The prospect of a baby was overwhelming! There are those, no doubt who might think, "she's pregnant...now she'll see it's time to pull herself together!" And they would know nothing of the forces of addiction! I chose to have an abortion. Now much is known about Fetal Alcohol Syndrome. In 1982, this was not a topic of discussion. My doctor, who knew I had a drinking problem did not mention it. He assured himself that an abortion was what my husband and I wanted, and it was performed. It had been 6 days since I called him. I was 4 weeks pregnant. The fact that legal abortion was available meant it could be performed early - which meant more safely and certainly with less emotional trauma involved.

I believe my decision was the right one at the time - for me - for my family.

I continued efforts toward recovery, and with the help and support of AA, I have not had a drink since April 13, 1982.

It makes me furious that women in similar situations might soon not have the choice that was given me. Any woman who wants to terminate a pregnancy must have good reasons - for her. Who is to judge anyone else's emotional or physical capabilities for bearing and caring for another life. No one but the woman herself.

I am resentful that our right of choice has become a political football- politicians conveniently switching their stand on the issue according to the loudest voices. First for it, then against it. I wonder - how do they really feel? There are so many tragic circumstances when abortion is so obviously in order - how can they be against it and have any sense of humanity?

I am resentful, too, that many of the groups so opposed to abortion also oppose efforts to educate the public, especially the young, about birth control. And, will I someday be told that I can no longer use an IUD because it doesn't necessarily prevent conception - only the egg's implantation in the uterus? How far could the government take this issue?

I thank all those who are fighting once again for our right of choice. I hope the Supreme Court hears our voices. We won't be silent - ever.

***

LETTER-245

Shortly after my husband and I were married, I suffered a nearly fatal bout with a rare and devastating disease, Guillain-Barret syndrome. During a slow recovery, we conceived our first child. Almost immediately I was back in the hospital with a recurrence of the most serious symptoms. As my condition rapidly deteriorated, the physicians attending me decided that an abortion would be necessary to save my life. After consultations with highly respected specialists in the fields of neurology, obstetrics, and internal medicine, the decision was made to do the abortion in the first class hospital where I was a patient. Immediately my condition improved so that I could convalesce over a period of many months.

Later, my husband and I were blessed with four planned children. They are all grown and all are active in their respective professions: medicine, medical research, ecology, and English teaching at the college level.

Without the abortion, which I never regretted, my husband and I would not be celebrating forty years of happy marriage, and the country would have lost four outstanding professional men and women, our children.

THE CHOICE OF REPRODUCTION MUST BELONG TO THE WOMAN, AND NOT TO THE POLITICIANS. ONLY THE WOMAN AND HER DOCTOR CAN MAKE THE BEST DECISION.

***

LETTER-247

I am writing in response to your letters of January 19 and February 16, 1989 calling for individuals to write of their own experiences with abortion for possible inclusion in a friend-of-the-Court brief in the case of Webster v. Reproductive Health Services. I can think of no more worthwhile way to spend my time than to provide you with such a letter. I only hope that it will reach you in time to be considered for inclusion. I would be honored to participate in this historic case of such great importance to women, and indeed, to all people in this country.

I have personally had an abortion. It was pre-Roe v. Wade in 1970 at the ... Medical Center. The law in ... at the time stated that the only allowable circumstances in which a woman might have a legal abortion were in cases of rape or incest, or when carrying the pregnancy to term would be dangerous to the life or health of the mother.

I was twenty-five years old at the time, divorced with two small children, ages five and seven, and a senior in college. I had for two years been living with a man with whom I was in love, but were uncertain as to future plans in terms of marriage. I had at that point made significant progress in turning my life around after an inappropriate and disasterous teenage marriage. As mentioned above, I was putting myself through college with the help of my family, raising my children as a single parent with very little emotional or financial support from my extremely immature ex-husband; I was making grades good enough to consistently keep me on the dean's honor roll and contemplating going to graduate school.

When I became pregnant I was terrified at the prospect of bringing another child into the world, knowing that I was already strained to the limit, both financially and emotionally with the two children I had. I felt certain that bearing this child would be a disaster for me, my educational plans, my children and possibly for the relationship with the father. After an incredible amount of soul-searching, discussions with the father and with doctors and counselors at the ... Medical Center, I decided to have an abortion. I was lucky in that the medical personnel at the Med Center were incredibly enlightened in that they chose to interpret the existing ... statute as including the "mental health" and emotional well-being of the mother. Part of the law required that the woman be seen by two physicians who would sign an affidavit allowing the woman to have the abortion. The Med Center had set up a procedure wherein the two required physicians were picked from a group of sympathetic psychiatrists, whose job it became to determine that the women in question were "healthy" enough to withstand the stress of the abortion, rather than having to prove that they were too unhealthy to bear a child. I was most impressed with the reasonableness, genuine concern and enlightenment that prevailed.

I should say that I was resolute enough in my decision that I would have proceeded with the abortion, even if I had not been so fortunate to find myself in the hands of such caring people. I might have followed in the footsteps of my sister-in-law who some years earlier had gone to Juarez, Mexico for an abortion, wherein she suffered a brutal and unsanitary abortion, from which it took her many months to recover physically, and from which I don't think she ever recovered emotionally.

I also want to say that I got good follow-up care after the procedure, a D & C; again, both physically and emotionally. (The doctors who had signed for me to have the abortion warned me that I might experience post-abortion depression, and in fact, I did.) I heeded their advice and sought support from a mental health professional. I mention this to emphasize that there is nothing about abortion which is taken lightly by the women who choose to have them. The decision to have an abortion is at best the least of several bad scenarios; the procedure itself, although safe and fairly simple (now) is still unpleasant, and it is inevitable that there will be post-abortion discomfort. After all, the woman has suffered a loss and grieves for that loss, no matter how sensible the decision. The charge made so frequently by anti-choice folks that women who choose abortion do so carelessly and often for the sake of convenience are out of touch with reality and operate at a level where they see things only in terms of black and white and their own stilted version of morality, with no understanding that most human behavior takes place in the "grey areas."

I have never been sorry I made the decision that I did; I know it was the right one for me at the time. My life, and the lives of my children, would have been significantly different and more difficult had I been forced to bear that child. I am glad that I had the courage to go through with what needed to be done, and I am very glad that my circumstances were such that I was supported in my decision and given excellent health care.

I should also mention that I did go on to graduate school, that I married the father, raised my children to adulthood, and have been a productive and politically-active member of society. (I did, in fact, lobby for the National Organization of Women in the ... Legislature in 1986 and was dismayed to find that it was necessary to spend the better part of my time in that position fighting the anti-choice forces.)

I know, because of my personal experiences, that this right of ours, to choose whether or not to carry a child to term, is so basic and fundamental, that it is among the most crucial issues of our time, and that the decision of the Supreme Court in Webster v. Reproductive Health Services will have an immense impact on our society. After all, if we as women, are denied the right to control our own bodies by the government under which we live, have we any rights at all?

Thank you for the opportunity to be a small part of this historic event. I, along with millions of other enlightened Americans, a growing majority, as you know, await the results of this case with the greatest anticipation. Keep us the good fight; my thoughts and prayers are with you!

***

LETTER-259

I've had two first-trimester abortions, in 1979 and 1980. I was barely 20 and 21 years of age, respectively.

I became pregnant the first time two months after being diagnosed as thyroid deficient. Some symptoms of hypothyroidism are menstrual irregularity and sterility. I had practiced no birth control for years before this, and didn't believe that thyroid supplements would REALLY make me fertile; after two "clockwork" menstrual cycles, I conceived. I didn't believe I was pregnant, I thought it was stress. I was nauseous, sure, but ALL DAY LONG and not enough to vomit. Plus, the local clinic gave me a negative test. The second one came back positive.

Here are the circumstances surrounding my first pregnancy: I was a dishwasher in a little health food cafe, making less than minimum wage as a part-time worker; so was the father. Between us we took home maybe $90 a week. If we hadn't received free meals from the restaurant, we would have gone hungry. We had been living together about a month. I had a car: it was broken. I was 20, he was 24.

I was utterly unprepared, emotionally or financially, for the responsibility of raising a child. No question: I would have HAD to go on welfare. There would have been no way I could have continued working. I over-reacted punitively when my DOG misbehaved; I was afraid I would abuse a child. Childrearing is a lifetime commitment; I wasn't secure enough in my relationship with the father to count on his support through that. I wouldn't marry him out of necessity, though he claimed to be willing to marry if that was what I wanted. His stand was he found the idea of fatherhood attractive, but he would ultimately respect and support my decision, because he felt the decision was mine to make.

Adoption was never an alternative for me. Personally, I feel absolutely emotionally incapable of carrying to term and then giving up the child. If I was going to go through all that, I may as well just keep it. Also, I would have to live with the thought that s/he might show up on my doorstep 20 years later. I've known women who have given children up for adoption and it is a hell that haunts them forever.

So the abortion was scheduled. We pawned the father's guitar and borrowed some money from my mother. She flew out from L.A. to offer moral support. She was very supportive throughout the procedure and afterward.

The clinic was a good one. I was pre-counseled and told what to expect during the procedure, and emotional after-effects (i.e., "post-partum blues"). I remember I cried a little during the abortion--big, fat, quiet tears rolling back into my ear--because I felt that I had failed the father (talk about social conditioning!).

Primarily, though, I felt RELIEVED. I was glad when it was over, and I was glad I didn't get stuck in the welfare system. I might have been stuck in a lousy marriage with kids that I didn't want. No one wins in that situation.

I beat myself up pretty bad over getting pregnant. I should have been on birth control. I felt that having this sort of "accident" was the worst form of irresponsibility. Plus, there were other people effected; the father, our families.

Having an abortion was, to me, a responsible way of handling what I felt to be an irresponsible mistake. All the alternatives had been rolled around and considered for a long time. Granted, a lot of it was before the fact: "What would I do if I got pregnant?" Pregnancy to me was something I feared, but felt would not happened to me.

The second abortion occurred a year later, shortly after the relationship mentioned above dissolve. I'd quit taking the thyroid supplements, and figured I'd been off them long enough to be sterile again, and went off birth control pills. I became involved in a brief and futile relationship with an old boyfriend, and wound up pregnant. By the time I found out, he was gone. I was an emotional wreck over the failure of the previous relationship, barely able to take care of myself.

I was sad the first time; this time, I was angry. I was angry with myself about being so stupid as to make this mistake a second time, and have to go through it again. "Fool me once, shame on you--fool me twice, shame on me." I was pretty much alone for this one; my mother was again supportive. Fortunately, this time I had insurance, so I scheduled a tubal ligation along with the abortion. This might sound a bit extreme...but even now, eight years later, I feel I made the right decision, all the way around.

One thing I want to make clear: It seems that some anti-choice people think in the general terms that women who have abortions view them as some form of laissez-faire, after-the-fact birth control. Nothing could be farther from the truth, and anyone who thinks abortion is an easy decision is sadly mistaken. It is a difficult decision, and often a secret one.

Having the LEGAL CHOICE to make that decision is VITAL, however; I know I would have pursued illegal abortions if I'd had to. The information was readily available, and absolutely frightening; potentially poisonous herbal remedies (for example, large quantities of pennyroyal); people who would perform kitchen-table abortions with a turkey baster and a piece of rubber hosing; such extreme treatments as douching with household cleansers or lye-based drain opener. This appalling information is not pulled from books or newspapers; people I've known have volunteered these alternatives.

I am grateful to have been able to legally make the choice to have an abortion. I ultimately control my own body, one way or another, legally or illegally.

We must never go back to the days of back-alley, coat hanger abortions. Women should not have to pay the ultimate price of giving up their lives because of unwanted pregnancies.

****

LETTER-261

I had an abortion in England during my Junior Year Abroad. I was alone, scared, and very unhappy that I could not carry the pregnancy to term. I wanted to. I love children - I know I could be a responsible parent. I couldn't carry the pregnancy to term because I had no one - no one - to help me. No money, my education was not complete, my boyfriend was sleeping with someone else... I was so miserable. I knew I was pregnant, even though I had two negative pregnancy tests. The third was positive. I knew I wanted to have an abortion. I consider having an abortion an important decision - we are, after all, talking about a potential life. But deciding to carry the pregnancy to term is a much bigger decision - we are, after all, talking about a child, a person with needs, an undisputedly living human being.

In order to have an abortion, I had to get two doctors say that my mental health was in jeopardy. I was humiliated. They asked me where my boyfriend was. It is impossible to get pregnant without a "boyfriend." The place I had the abortion was sterile, ugly. I was put under general anaesthesia, which made me very sick. I was all alone, and I kept thinking - I wish I was home, at my local Planned Parenthood.

I didn't feel "proud" of my decision- my pride came later. At the time I was mad that I didn't live in a world that loves children - if there was free medical care, affordable childcare, acceptance of non-traditional families - I would have wanted that pregnancy. My mother was "anti-abortion" (now she is pro-choice) so I had some guilt about that - disappointing her.

It hurt physically - what a joke, the idea that women have abortions for "convenience." We have abortions because we have unintended pregnancies, because our society has not created effective birth control. I was using a diaphragm when I got pregnant.

I share this story in hopes it will help other women. I said I wasn't proud at the time. Now I am. I made a responsible, loving decision. It would have selfish to give birth then. I would never have given it away.

I loved being pregnant. I wasn't sick, but I felt different. The fetus, my fetus; however, was not a living human being. My pregnancy was mine, my abortion was mine, and my body was and is mine. Thank you for sharing my story with the Supreme Court.

***

LETTER-267

One day in the early 70s, I picked up a copy of MS Magazine. In that issue was a list of women's names who had had illegal abortions. With tears streaming down my face, I read each one those names over and over and realized that I was not alone in the world. In memory of those women who published their names so many years ago, I am telling my own story of what it was like when an unplanned, unwanted pregnancy put women outside the law.

I was the first person in a family of 13 children to graduate from high school. I was just past my 20th birthday, I had a good job, I thought I was in love, I was young and pretty. Suddenly, I felt as though all the good parts of my life was coming apart at the seams, because I was pregnant.

Stunned, confused and frightened, I told the man I was involved with of my situation. There was never any question of marriage, but I heard the word that I had only heard whispered about - abortion. I became even more frightened, for my experience with abortion was only horror stories of women who died on kitchen tables with knitting needles and coat hangers as surgical instruments.

However, when I voiced these fears, I was told that I shouldn't be afraid. "Don't worry. There is a guy in ..., Ohio who is safe. All the mob guys take their girlfriends there." Somehow that made sense to me, after all abortion was a crime, so why shouldn't criminals know the best place to go?

And so, I found myself in a big automobile heading towards an unknown fate in .... I sat between these two men who talked of sports and gambling, one was the man I thought myself in love with, the other was a convicted murderer, the one who knew the man in ....

We arrived at dusk and pulled into an alley behind a very old house in a dark part of town. I left the car and walked alone into a small room with a table. I remember a black man with frizzy white hair, I remember seeing an old calendar with 1937 on it, and I remember nothing else. It is gone from my conscious memory, buried deep in my subconscious where I can't get to it. Somehow the trip back to Pittsburgh was made, and I remember only that the man had said, "You will probably have some pain, but you'll be okay."

I waited, afraid of what was going to happen, and then most the pain began. Hour after hour of the most intense pain I have ever experienced. Then the bleeding began, a hemorrhage so bad the memory of it still frightens me. The hours in the bedroom of my apartment, my roommate begging me to call a doctor, go to the hospital, call my mother, do something are still with me. But, I did nothing, I was afraid to do anything, because I was convinced that if I told what I had done, I would go to jail. I was outside the law, and there was no help for me.

Finally, the pain stopped and eventually the bleeding stopped, too. I returned to work, and within a few weeks realized I was still not well. My body was filled with infection. Still frightened about doing something illegal, I went to a doctor and told him that I was sick but did not tell him why. To my shame, he tested me for venereal disease. When those tests came back negative the doctor arranged for me to got to the hospital for a D & C the following week. He warned me that if I had any more heavy bleeding, that I must go to the hospital immediately because I was very anemic from losing so much blood.

Immediately after that visit, I did begin to hemorrhage again, and woke up in ... Hospital with blood transfusions and IV, and the doctor bending over my bed with tears in his eyes, saying "Why didn't you tell me you had an abortion?" I looked back and answered very truthfully, "Because I thought you would put me in jail." Eventually I healed, went back to work, went on with my life, but kept the memory of my abortion buried in a dark an secret place.

That's my story. Even after all these years, tears spring to my eyes when I think of how frightened I was, how young and desperate and how vulnerable.

I have spent a great deal of my life and my energy dedicated to keeping abortion safe and legal for women. My own memory of the way it was in the dark days of back alleys, criminals, and illegal abortions have convinced me that to take away a woman's right to choose is putting women right back in that very same alley in ..., Ohio where I came very close to losing my life.

***

LETTER-270

I am writing to express my concern that a women's right to choose her own life is being threatened.

I am a 32 year old woman who has made the conscious choice to not have children. The primary reason behind my choice is the knowledge that there are too many people in this world - and that this fact is at the root of all the ills now facing humankind. I could not, with conscience, bring into this world another hungry mouth that would further strain the limited resources of this planet.

At the age of 28 I had my tubes tied. It took me 6 years from the time I first made that decision to the time of its realization. The reason it took so long is because I could not find a doctor who could accept that because I was single, and so young I could know my own mind.

During that time I had several unwanted pregnancies. Not because of promiscuity, or carelessness - but because of the lack of the effectiveness of the birth control methods available to me. I refused to tamper with my body by using the pill - it is still unknown what all the long term risks are. I became pregnant while using an IUD - (that puts me in a high statistic group.) I also became pregnant, twice, while using the diaphragm method. I know that I never should have been fitted for one in the first place - my body shape and size makes it impossible for my cervix to be adequetly covered and hence I cannot be effectively protected with one. Because of my convictions I could not and would not allow these pregnancies to come to term. They were terminated through legal abortion. I do not regret my choices.

I have always been proud to be a citizen of a country that safeguards an individuals right to make personal choices in their life. I have friends who live in Mexico, and the physical suffering and humiliation they were subjected to in carrying out their convictions is appaling. In countries where abortion is illegal, the abortions are not stopped, but a womans health is threatened, both physically and emotionally. If we allow this to happen in our country there will be butcher shops. A woman should not be forced by law to be subjected to such ill treatment.

I do not believe in using abortion as a method of birth control. But I can attest to the reality that a woman can become pregnant while doing everything in her means to prevent it. If abortion had been illegal, I would have gone the illegal route, and I would have been forced to.

I chose a permanent birth control. Not all women are willing to make that sacrifice. No woman should be forced to be a mother. Motherhood should be a choice, consciously taken when the woman is ready and willing to take on the immense responsibility of raising a child - at the time when she can give her child love and emotional support. The government should not be given the right to make that choice for her.

***

LETTER-278

I became pregnant when I was 19 years old. I was troubled and concerned, but not confused and manipulated, as anti-choice activists would like to describe me. I knew what I wanted to do. I chose an abortion.

I write now not because my experience was particularly grim--it wasn't, and that's the point. I was able to get a safe, legal abortion, unlike my maternal great-grandmother who aborted herself with a knitting needle. I got care, I got counselling, and I got advice from clinic staff. My great-grandmother got none of these. Perhaps the worst part of her experience--and the most trenchant lesson--is the silence surrounding it. My mother whispered the story to me late one night, still afraid (?) that the words would haunt.

This is the message I most wish to convey: We cannot be silent. I am sympathetic with those who encourage conscientious choice, whether the choice is for or against an abortion. I am intolerant of those who would keep abortion--and they would be keeping abortion--a silent matter while many of them scream for capital punishment.

There is an ironic twist (at least one) in all of this. I became pregnant while I was a student at DePauw University--Vice President J. Danforth Quayle's alma mater and my own. It is ironic that I write now to contest the policies of a man who--according to DePauw tradition--is supposed to share a certain moral sense with me. I see now, as I began to see then, when I was 19 and pregnant, what the conditions of that moral sense are for J. Danforth Quayle and so many others like him.

I contest those conditions proudly.

***

LETTER-286

I am writing this letter because of my beliefs and experiences with the reproductive issue. If a woman's choice for or against abortion is to be decided in a court of law, then they need to understand what makes a woman face these choices.

My name is Anna, and I am 24 years old. I have a high school education and two years of college, uncompleted. I come from a divorced family and I have had five stepfathers. However, it was my mother who always worked and supported by sister and me.

At 17 years old, I became pregnant. I made my choice alone out of confusion and shame. I chose to give my baby up for adoption. I went through an adoption agency in Atlanta, who sent a representative to South Carolina where I lived at the time. She took me back to Atlanta, where I was completely isolated from everyone I knew. To sum up those long months, or to make anyone understand the loneliness, the exaggerations they told me, as well as the things they never told me would be impossible without living through it. I can only tell you that I could never go through it again and live.

What kept me going was the belief in what I was doing was right. But sometimes it's not enough when you worry whether or not your child is healthy and happy. It doesn't stop that hollow feeling in your womb, or the feeling of being used and discarded like an incubator.

I hope that I'm not being misunderstood, I am not bitter. It was the right choice at the time. However, when I faced the same situation earlier this year, I did not chose adoption.

There was alot of soul-searching and memories from the adoption this time. I considered having the baby, but the reality of my financial situation made it impossible. The nightmares of my own childhood haunted me. I could never put my child through that. So, when the technician at the hospital told me the fetus had a very irregular heartbeat, I knew my choice. A woman in my situation can't afford hospital care, how could I support a child with special medical needs? It is also impossible to have someone adopt a baby that is not healthy. I don't think the court really understands some of these cruel truths.

In summary, I would like to say this: If Roe vs. Wade is going to be overturned, then there is going to have to be more Federal aid to pregnant women, a watchdog committee on adoption agencies, and even more medicaid or socialized birth facilities. However, I don't believe that those who would overturn Roe vs. Wade have made any considerations to this effect. If they did, I feel they would be more concerned for the children who live now without homes, food or in need of medical care. This "holy crusade" is a farce without attending to those children first.

Please feel free to use any part of this letter in your prepared brief. I have no objections. Thank you for reading my letter, and standing up for my rights.

***

LETTER-294

I am 70 years old, married for 49 years, mother of four, grandmother of eight; and I have had three abortions, all before Roe v. Wade.

I was reared by my single mother, a feminist and Margaret Sanger advocate, who informed me about birth control so early in my life that I cannot remember just when it was. I used a diaphragm from the age of seventeen until menopause. My husband and I planned each of our four children with great deliberation. I was disappointed when I had a miscarriage, and the space between two sons became three years instead of two as planned. All this is by way of explaining that I never considered abortion as a desireable method of birth control. But...on three occasions I gambled and lost by neglecting to use my accustomed contraceptive.

In 1937 I was in college and in love with a ... student, an affair approved by our respective parents (in fact, his physician father had fitted me with a diaphragm) but marriage was never contemplated. So, when I became pregnant, abortion was the only consideration. My mother, a social worker, knew of a retired woman physician who performed abortions in her home. My "boyfriend" and I went there together one afternoon. The "procedure" took place in an upstairs "surgery", quickly and with little pain. The doctor told me I would abort in about a week. Her procedure did not include a curettement. I paid $15.00 to this doctor who did abortions on principle, not for money. I walked out of her house with my friend, much relieved. We would go on with our student lives. I aborted the fetus in a week, with little warning, in a gas-station restroom. I recall THIS as the most disturbing and humiliating part of the experience.

In 1940 I married my present husband, a second marriage for each of us. We returned from a trip to Mexico, and I was pregnant. Once again I had neglected to use birth control. I went to the same woman physician who had performed my abortion three years earlier, and went through the same procedure for the same price. I remember feeling embarrassed for my negligence. I knew she was a firm believer in birth control, and felt intelligent young women need not repeat their mistakes. However, this time I did not abort in a week. I began to feel sick, developed a fever, and one night found myself crawling on my hands and knees to the bathroom, only half aware. My husband was frantic. We had come to live in the small town where he was reared, where his father was a minister and president of the Board of Education, and where he now taught school. He knew of no physician who would admit me to a hospital. But my sister-in-law had "heard" of a doctor who had performed abortions, and had lost but regained his licence. I don't remember how we found him, but he was able to admit me to the community hospital. He performed a proper curettement. I was in the hospital two days. There was no question of illegality because this physician was not the one responsible for the "abortive" abortion. He could clean up someone else's mess, and save my life, but he could not legally do a proper abortion in the first place. I do not recall the doctor or hospital fees, but for a teacher making less than $1,400 a year, I know it was a burden. All this pain, humiliation, expense and family distress would have been unnecessary if abortion had been legal. In a small town anonymity is rare, and gossip is recreation. And "breaking the law" is no recommendation for a teacher and minister's son. However, my husband and I were not to face such stress again until four children and 16 years later.

In 1942 we had a daughter, the first of four planned children. Her brother was born in 1944. My husband was drafted six months before the end of WWII. That, plus its aftermath, changed our lives and family plans. I went to work as a teacher. My husband went to graduate school and earned a doctorate in psychology. I returned to fulltime "homemaker", and we had another son in 1950. We planned to have our fourth and last child in 1952, but I started to miscarry, and had a D&C on doctor's advice; a simple uncomplicated procedure (as an abortion can be). Our third son was born in 1953. We now had the children we wanted, loved, and could afford to care for emotionally, psychologically, and financially.

In late 1955, I was pregnant again. Although my husband was quite willing to have another child, I was not. I had decided on the size of my family; I knew what I could cope with without stress, I was almost 37 years old, and I was happily involved with my teenagers and the younger children. I felt our income was adequate to provide a good present and future for all of us. And I, like many others, (perhaps a little late!) was beginning to be concerned about the environment and world population. I wanted an abortion. But the political atmosphere of the fifties was different from the thirties. There were crackdowns on suspected "abortion rings". Doctors and hospitals were being surveilled. Physicians were loathe to refer even if they were your friends and knew someone who performed a "clean" abortion. Eventually, through an extended "grapevine"...a friend who had a friend who knew a friend who had a friend...I was given a telephone number. Already I felt uneasy, frightened, about to break the law; worried for my children, my husband, myself.

I phoned the number I had been given. It was a doctor's office. I said a friend had referred me, and I would like an appointment. I was given an address on the south side of ... the Negro (we didn't say "black" in those days) ghetto where I had once been a teacher. I was told to come in the evening, and alone. It was an ordinary doctor's office, full of patients, men and women, black and white. The receptionist asked me to fill out a history. I was shown to an examination room. A nurse took my blood pressure and temperature, and Dr. ... came in. He was friendly and jolly, and told me he was chief of staff at a southside hospital. His fee was $75, and I could "pay as you go", for his procedure would not be over in one visit. He gave me an injection (which he named, but I've forgotten) of something that made me feel very warm from head to toe ... a sort of "flush", and then inserted a catheter into the uterus, telling me that in time I would abort. He gave me a prescription to be filled at the neighborhood pharmacy near his office. I was to return at the same time in a week. I went home to be comforted by my concerned family.

It was very uncomfortable wearing the catheter day and night, but not painful. I returned the next week and the next and the next, alone and at night. No abortion. But on each visit Dr. ... examined me, changed the catheter, talked, sang songs from operettas, laughed, and assured me that I would eventually abort. Nothing to worry about. It had to work. By this time I was spending most of my time in bed, with the catheter draining and me rather weak. From time to time I would pass clots of blood. One morning I thought I had finally expelled the fetus, but I wasn't sure, because some of the clots had been pretty large. That night I had a temperature of 104 degrees. My worried husband tried to reach Dr. ... without success, and decided it was time to take me to the emergency room at [the hospital] where we were members.

I was placed on a gurney to await a doctor. I knew that for a physician to diagnose and treat effectively, I must give him all pertinent information. I told him I had had an abortion, and as he could see, it hadn't worked too well. That admission was my mistake. I simply should have said I had miscarried. Now, suddenly, nurses and doctor left the room. They could not admit me, yet. I was very weak and hot and scared. About 45 minutes later two men in street clothes came in. They were deputies from the District Attorney's office, and proceeded to question me: who did it, where, when. I refused to answer, and they told me I had committed a criminal offense and could be "the second woman to go to Tehachapi in California history" for this offense unless I cooperated. My husband became furious and went off to call our lawyer. The deputies continued to alternately threaten and cajol. It wasn't hard for me to be silent; I was very sick. When our attorney arrived he told me I need not say anything, and told THEM to leave. I was admitted to the hospital.

Very little was left in my uterus, but I was treated and put on IV anti-biotics for four days (during which time I had four different roommates who had come in for D&C's). My lawyer came every day to confer, for the D.A. was pursuing my case and I was to be charged with a statutory offense. I said I would never give the doctor's name because, while his method of abortion had been dangerous for me, he had helped many other women, rich and poor. And, I would be glad to test the law which I had broken. I was feeling very brave!

For the next two months, men from the D.A.'s office came to the door, phoned, tapped our phone, and pressured both me and my attorney to "give in". I had made one phone call to Dr. ... when I came home from the hospital to tell him what had happened. He was unperturbed. I was not to worry. Finally, my attorney felt he could not properly advise me, as he was primarily a civil liberties lawyer, and I was now a criminal case. He retained one of the best criminal attorney's in [the city] (a man I could never have afforded) in a "friendship" arrangement, who persuaded me that I must accept the D.A.'s proposition to be a State's witness. When I took the stand I could plead "the Fifth". I felt miserable about protecting myself with the Fifth Amendment. But my attorney said,

"they're out to break what they think is a big abortion ring, and they think it's your man, and they aren't going to let go". So, I went to make a deposition.

The questions I was asked and the innuendos that were made were offensive, racist and sexual: "was the fee low in return for sex?"; "did he fondle you?"; remarks suggesting that my husband was not responsible for the pregnancy; and, of course, who, what, when and where. I simply "could not remember" any names or addresses. I knew by then that they had them anyhow. Eventually I was subpoenaed as a witness in [the case against Dr. ...]. My attorney said the trial was before a woman judge and in closed chambers. This relieved me, and I'm sure Dr. .... There would be no reporters. My husband would be protected from publicity which could possibly harm him professionally as a clinical psychologist and professor. My children would not be embarrassed or stigmatized. I was still uneasy about the whole court procedure and "taking the Fifth", but my attorney said it was very simple; just state my name and address and then refuse to answer further questions on the grounds it would tend to incriminate me. My attorney would not be in the courtroom. I did not need representation. I was not on trial. I was only a witness. But I was nervous, and shaken when I had to face the "defendant" and the catheter, and refused to identify either. I was dismissed. The doctor from [the hospital] (also called as a witness) met me in the hall before the trial. he said he was "terribly sorry" that I had to go through all this. He had been a brand new staff member when I was brought into Admissions, and he simply was not sure of hospital policy. If only he had not asked... Policy apparently, was not to ask!

Well, I did not become the "...second woman in California history to go to Tehachapi" as threatened. Dr. ... was not convicted (his defense was that he performed no "surgery", and only treated me for on ongoing uterine problem, as his records would clearly show!). Only ..., a black newspaper, reported the case and my name. Our home felt secure again. My husband kept his job and "good name". Some years later my daughter chose to have an abortion which was done well and without trauma, but it still was clandestine, illegal, and expensive. And then came Roe v. Wade. How we cheered, knowing that her daughter and all the daughters ever after would never have to suffer danger nor indignity when choosing to terminate a pregnancy.

***

LETTER-296

This true story is written to those who have the power to deny women the right to a safe, legal abortion.

In December of 1969 I became pregnant and chose to terminate the pregnancy. At that point in time there existed an underground referral service at the University I attended. I was referred to Detroit, Mich. to a doctor who performed abortions. I was told he did them all of the time and I had nothing to worry about. The abortion was performed in a hotel room with no anesthetic. The doctor entered my room and demanded $400 before he started.

The abortion was performed on the bed with my legs resting on two chairs. I experienced an extreme amount of pain and was told that if I didn't shut-up he would leave and not complete the abortion. After he was finished I layed in bed for 18 hours unable to get up or eat. When I finally found the strength to get out of bed, I staggered into the bathroom, sat down on the toilet and passed out, only to wake up hours later and find out I had been laying against a steam hot water pipe and received second degree burns on my shoulder; scares I have to this day. Somehow I made the trip back home. Twenty four hours later I was in such extreme pain that I called a doctor. I was admitted to the hospital immediately and diagnosed with peritonitis, punctured uterus, colon. My doctor told the person who brought me in that he did not expect me to live. I spent 16 days in the hospital and had to have major surgery to have the damage done to me repaired.

I identified the doctor; through police pictures, that performed the abortion. He was apprehended in Detroit with $18,000 but was let go two days later.

There is no doubt in my mind that if Roe v. Wade is overturned that what happened to me twenty years ago will be a common experience. Women will continue to seek abortions. Leave the current law in tact so that women are not put through what I had to go through. I deserved more then and all women deserve more now.

***

LETTER-318

I want to add my personal story to the attached letter. I am one who is strongly affected by peoples' life stories, and I'm hoping my story affects you.

I was raised in a nice, upper-middle-class home by God-, family- and country-loving parents who didn't drink, smoke, swear or beat their children. At the age of 19, through an accident and naivete, I got pregnant. Since this was 1967 and I had no access to a safe low-cost abortion, I was faced with a choice. Having neither the money nor the nerve to face a back-alley abortion, I chose to have the baby. Also, to protect my parents, I married the father, also 19, whom I had known only a few weeks.

Since my young husband had no skills and was afraid to get a job because he was violating probation (had stopped reporting when I met him), I took a job as a waitress to support us. After a few months I was laid off for being "too pregnant". Welfare paid for the birth of my son.

The day I arrived home from the hospital with the baby, the police arrived and arrested my husband for probation violation, and he went to jail. I don't remember how we made it through those times, but I do recall long hours spent in public health clinics and welfare offices with a crying baby.

Eventually we found work, and grandparents babysat. I wanted to have another child so my son wouldn't grow up lonely. My husband and I were both working, and renting a two-bedroom house near the grandparents, so it seemed possible.

With some financial help from my parents, we had just bought a little one-room house in another town when we found I was pregnant again. The birth of twins, welfare supplementing my husband's meager income, a one-room house and shaky beginnings exploded a bad marriage.

When we separated, my husband took my son and left me the year-old twin girls, a lot of debts and bills, and the discovery that I was pregnant again. The pregnancy was identical to the one I'd experienced with the twins, and was unlike my single-birth pregnancy. That evidence, plus the fact that twins are VERY prevalent in my family, led me to face the choice of being a single welfare mother of probably five children, or - because it was 1973 and Roe v. Wade had just been decided - having a safe, legal abortion in my gynecologist's office. For the sake of my children, I chose the latter.

With help from Welfare and my parents, I returned to college, where I earned a Masters of Social Work degree. I got a job in my field, went off AFDC, and have been a contributing member of society ever since.

But this is not the happy ending to some fairy tale, Mr. Thornburgh. I have three children whose beginnings were the result of a slip-up, youthful carelessness and naivete, and a government that claimed control over my body. I was forced to choose between crippling poverty and death or maiming. Choosing the former, I subjected the son I was not prepared for and his subsequent siblings to the almost inevitable broken-home and absent-parent syndrome.

Although their father and I have done our best to raise them while trying to put our own lives together, the kids have not done well. Each of them has had run-ins with the law, one is on probation until her eighteenth birthday, all are substanceabusers, it appears none will graduate from high school, and there's a good chance they'll all be chronically unemployed for years to come.

My twin daughters have had four abortions between them. For each, the first was at the age of fourteen. (They did not know at the time that I'd had an abortion, so don't jump to the conclusion that I'd somehow encouraged this by "modelling" it.) I am not proud that they got pregnant, nor are they - far from it! But what a relief that they were not forced to repeat, perhaps for generations, the cycle of poverty that marred their beginnings. If my daughters and my son can avoid having children until they are financially and emotionally prepared to do so, doesn't ALL of society benefit?

I got out of poverty with the help of social assistance, my parents and a ton of initiative. But I can tell you unequivocally, I never could have done so if I had been forced by law to bear another set of twins - or even one more child. I couldn't have gone to college or gotten a job without college that could have supported more children. My family's fate would have been years of Welfare, and our society would have been burdened with more unwanted children. I love my children dearly, but I think they got a bad break, starting their lives in such difficult circumstances.

Do I want you to support equal rights for ALL people, as we're guaranteed in the Constitution? You bet your life - and everyone else's! ENCOURAGE THE SUPREME COURT TO UPHOLD ROE V. WADE!

Thank you for listening. I hope you are feeling, too.

***

LETTER-351

I have a very specific personal reason for wanting abortion to remain legal--without access to safe and legal abortion, my husband and I cannot have a family.

My husband and I are both carriers for a rare and deadly genetic disease called Tay-Sachs. Eighty-five percent of Tay-Sachs carriers are of Eastern European Jewish origin, but 15% are of other backgrounds. Both parents have to be carriers for a child to be born with the condition. There is absolutely no cure for Tay-Sachs; it is 100% fatal. The age range for a child born with Tay-Sachs is 2-1/2 to 5 years.

Unfortunately, we have found out all this through bitter first-hand personal experience. I gave birth to a child who was diagnosed with Tay-Sachs at 11 months. My obstetrician had advised my husband to be tested to find out if he was a carrier when I was six weeks pregnant (prior to that, neither of us knew anything about Tay-Sachs). The doctor told me that the carrier test would be unreliable on a pregnant woman (not true, as we later found out), and that, anyway, if my husband was not a carrier, we had nothing to worry about. This was absolutely true, assuming the test had been done correctly. Unfortunately, the laboratory that handled my husband's carrier test made a simple mathematical error when analyzing the test results. Because of this mathematical error, we were told that Dave was not a carrier, when indeed he really was. And although I am a carrier, too, we did not know this because I had not been tested.

Tay-Sachs is a progressive neurological disease. The child with Tay-Sachs stops normal physical development at about six months, and then very gradually begins losing all skills gained up until that point. In the case of our daughter (Abigail), she was never able to sit up, although she did everything normally up until that point. By the age of 18 months (7 months after she had been diagnosed), Abigail was blind, had devastating seizures (which have to be controlled with medication), lost the ability to swallow (she now has to be fed through a tube), and lost all motor skills (smiling and laughing, holding her head up, rolling over--all things she had previously been able to do). She is now 2-1/2 years old (she will be 3 in June). We had to hospitalize her permanently last March (a year ago); prior to that we had nurses at home to care for her while we worked, but even this level of care became insufficient at a certain point. Although Abigail receives superb care at the facility where she lives now (she is in a hospice unit in a larger hospital--the hospice is for terminally ill children only), she is in a vegetative state. She is completely paralyzed, does not respond to or recognize anyone, and is in almost constant discomfort because of the chronic congestion that is caused by her inability to swallow or cough. Suctioning and various positioning techniques relieve her discomfort somewhat, and she is given antibiotics and other medications when she is given antibiotics and other medications when she gets respiratory infections such as pneumonia and bronchitis, but such treatment is only partially successful.

Eventually her ability to fight off these infections will weaken to the point where she will die, probably by the age of 4 or 5, but possibly earlier.

Although my husband and I are both carriers for Tay-Sachs, we can still have a normal family. With Tay-Sachs, one out of four pregnancies are affected when both parents are carriers. In other words, every time I get pregnant, we have a 75% chance of having a normal, healthy child--but I do have to have a prenatal test. Done between 9 and 12 weeks of pregnancy, the test--known as a CVS--is highly accurate, and allows me to have an abortion much earlier than if I were tested by amniocentesis, which cannot be done until about 16 weeks of pregnancy.

It took a while for my husband and I to feel that we were emotionally ready to have another child, but a year and a half ago we made the decision to start trying again. Since that time, I have had several early miscarriages and two "healthy" pregnancies--"healthy" in the sense that I did not miscarry. However, in both cases the prenatal test indicated that I was carrying a Tay-Sachs-affected fetus. In both cases I elected to terminate the pregnancies. This decision was not painless (abortion never is), but it was an easy decision to make. I would never, never, never, in a million years, deliberately and knowingly bring another Tay-Sachs child into the world. The knowledge that I have the ability to spare another child the degradation that my cherished daughter is going through means everything to me. It would be a crime to put another child through the humiliation and pain that this cruel disease inflicts.

At the same time, the hope of someday having a healthy child, and the knowledge that it can happen if we will only have the strength to keep trying, is one of the few things that is helping to keep me sane through the anguish of watching my child slowly die. If abortion were to be made illegal, I would have to give up that hope, as I would never take the risk of conceiving and having to bear another child with Tay-Sachs. Legal abortion for me and my husband is a pro-family issue--without it I could not have a family. It is as simple as that.

***

LETTER-369

Like most women in this country, I am concerned about the possibility that the Supreme Court will substantially limit Roe v. Wade. Also like many women in this country, I had an abortion in my youth--one that was legal and safe. I am committed to making sure that my daughters have the same opportunity if necessary.

When I was 19 I became pregnant. I was not irresponsible; I had an I.U.D. But no method of contraception is perfect and I was one of the three out of a hundred that didn't make it. At the time I was an honors student in college working my way through school at a 32 hour a week job. Had I not had the abortion, had I decided to keep the baby, I would have had to quit school. I would probably still be working as a sales clerk somewhere, eeking out a living just below the poverty line. Instead I had the opportunity to go to law school and become a successful, contributing tax-payer. I am able to ensure that my children will be able to grow into successful adults rather than part of the seemingly unending cycle of poverty.

I now have two children, the youngest is only four weeks old. There is not a day that goes by that I am not clear about the miracle that life is. I would not have another abortion if I became pregnant again. My life is different. My potential is different. The life I could provide to my child is different. But I do not have a moment of regret about the choice I made in 1970.

Enclosed is $100 to keep up the good work. When I can, I will send more. If there is anything else I can do, please let me know.

***

LETTER-568

I was a nineteen-year-old college student in New York when I got pregnant in 1962. I and my boyfriend pooled our money and borrowed from friends until we had the $460 necessary to pay for an illegal abortion from a doctor to whom a friend had referred us. We went to the doctor's office and I had the abortion, without anesthesia, while my boyfriend waited and worried that I might die.

When the operation was over, we took the elevator to the ground floor and found the street lined with police cars. The officers surrounded us and arrested me, my boyfriend, and the physician for the illegal abortion. They took me, alone to another doctor and subjected me to a physical examination to verify that an abortion had been performed. Then they took me to jail where I spent the night alone in a cell. The police provided a box of sanitary napkins because I was still bleeding from the surgery.

The next morning the district attorney in the Bronx filed charges against me, my boyfriend, and the doctor. The judge released me and my boyfriend in the recognizance of our parents whom the police informed of the proceedings. The New York Post printed a story about the arrest on page five of the morning paper on May 8, 1962. My brother was a newsboy, and he stole all the papers out of one of the buildings on his route in an effort to protect my privacy. The charges were eventually dismissed.

I have now been married for almost twenty-five years to the man who was my boyfriend at the time. We waited to have children until we could provide them the opportunities they deserved. Our two daughters are now in college themselves. One volunteers in her spare time as a counselor at Planned Parenthood. I have agreed to allow my story to be told because I am committed to preserving my rights and my daughters' rights to privacy and liberty.

II.
Letters of unnamed Amici Curiae: the "Jane Roes"

ROE LETTER-26

In light of recent reports that the U.S. Supreme Court is considering overturning 'Roe v. Wade' which legalized abortion, I feel an absolute necessity to voice my opinion as well as my own personal experience.

In February 1985, I was treated for an exacerbation of Multiple Sclerosis with a very high dosage of Prednisone for three (3) weeks. Unfortunately, during that period, I unknowingly became pregnant, even though my husband and I were practicing a very reliable method of contraception. Inasmuch as corticosteroids are known to cause severe birth defects, especially during the first 6-8 weeks of pregnancy, I knew I would have to abort the embryo. I would not put myself, nor my husband, through the trauma of raising a child with a severe birth defect.

In addition, the stress associated with giving birth and then raising a deformed child could also have had a detrimental impact on my illness.

Thus, I located a Physician who performed the "VIP" (Voluntary Interruption of Pregnancy) under general anesthesia in a hospital setting on an outpatient basis.

To this day, I am thankful that the procedure was available in a hospital setting. If it had been illegal, (or even restricted to women whose lives were in danger), I would have been forced to go abroad, or worse consider the horrible alternative of possible mutilation or death!

An abortion should not be anyone's decision but the woman's - it's her body; her health; her life, at stake.

It's a RIGHT that should be available to any woman for whatever reason. It's availability does not mandate its use, rather, it's a CHOICE! A choice that should always be available!

***

ROE LETTER-27

I am writing as a co-signer to the amicus curiae brief that NARAL will file on the cases pending in the Supreme Court that will affect the legality and availability of abortions in the United States. Although I am not ashamed of having had an abortion, please do not use my name on your brief.

My first accidental pregnancy occurred in 1981 when I was 25: My husband and I have always been dedicated users of birth control, and the pregnancy was a bitter and painful shock to me. We had been married for two and a half years, and although the marriage was not happy, we decided to have the child. I was terribly depressed for much of the pregnancy, and to this day I wonder if I ever would have had children if the choice had not been pressured. But by the time our first son was born we were both happy to welcome him into our lives. Still, the adjustment to motherhood has been the hardest thing I have ever done (I'm still adjusting); it has also given me great happiness. When our older son was just a year old, I missed a period. Apparently, I managed to expel a size C Lippes Loop without being aware of it. I still can't figure out how that could happen! This time, neither my husband nor I could face another baby. We knew that thousands of people of had babies that close -- or closer -- together, but yet another unplanned child would be too much for us. At that time I felt that, as much as I loved my son, I knew what the physical and psychological cost of another child would be, and I did not think I could do it again so soon. It was so hard for me to be a good mother, and I wanted so much to be a good one, but I had already spent a year struggling not to feel overwhelmed with one baby -- I knew I could not cope with two. My husband concurred and accompanied me to an abortion which took place, ironically, on the tenth anniversary of Roe v. Wade.

Nice, middle-class comfortably married ladies are not supposed to have abortions, and although I feel apprehensive of social censure (that's why I don't want you to use my name), I do not regret my choice. I am sorry I could not bear that child, because I see how beautifully my two boys are turning out, and I know that child too would have been a lovely child. But the cost of having it would have been too high for me, for my husband, and perhaps for our older son. And nice middle-class ladies definitely do not put babies up for adoption.

I am now 33 years old and, despite unerringly consistent use of birth control, have had three accidental pregnancies. I have used every birth control device known to man or woman. I cannot take the pill because it makes me incapacitatingly depressed; I cannot use a diaphragm because of anatomical peculiarities; I have expelled two different IUD's. I will probably be fertile another fifteen to twenty years. I hope the condoms and the sponges keep working. Every month I count the days. I do not know if I will have another child, if we can afford another child economically or psychically. The cost is high on both counts, but I'm not ready to be sterilized. If I need another abortion in the future, I just hope, for the sake of all my family, it will be a safe, legal one.

***

ROE LETTER-53

I am taking the time to write this letter because I believe that there are a some generalizations made about women who have had abortions, and their reasons for having chosen abortion. Although I can only speak for myself, there are probably many women just like me.

One misconception held by anti-abortionists is that an unplanned pregnancy is somehow the woman's fault. Granted, had I (and my partner) practiced abstinence, the pregnancy would never have occurred. However, my pregnancy resulted from a failure of my birth control method, which is supposedly more than 95% accurate. I resent the attitude of those who believe that a woman should be punished for a supposed "fault", especially, when the "fault" does not exist.

I believe that taking the time out to have a child would have changed my life for the worse, whether I would have had the child put up for adoption or not. I was a junior in college, with hopes of attending graduate school to obtain my doctorate, in a field that does not allow falling behind, even for a few months. I am now a graduate student, working for my doctorate in biophysics. At the risk of sounding extremely immodest, I know that among my professors I am thought to have a promising career ahead of me as a biomedical researcher. For those who wonder about possible Einsteins that could have been born, what about the female Einsteins that could have developed had their lives not been disrupted by an unplanned pregnancy?

I still believe that my choice was the right one; I have never for a moment regretted it. Even if I had never had an abortion, I would still be pro-choice today. I support a woman's right to reproductive choice, and oppose anyone who would attempt to force his/her beliefs on others. Thank you for your time.

***

ROE LETTER-78

I had an abortion today. I am a young widow in the military and have a 3 year old son. My son's daddy died suddenly the day before his 3rd birthday. We are still trying to cope with the loss - both emotionally and financially.

I've been stationed in a 3rd world country full of poverty, dirt, ignorance, tyranny, and hostility towards Americans. I had to rely on military doctors who apparently were highly incompetent. They told me I wasn't pregnant when I was really 15 weeks along! The only military personnel who was helpful was the Chaplain. He helped me keep my sanity in the month of December.

I had had no symptoms of pregnancy till December, the month I asked for a pregnancy test and exam. Even though I was assured, "You just have an infection," I recognized the signs of pregnancy that finally emerged full blown by January. I learned that only dirty, life-threatening illegal abortions exist in that country. And so I struggled through the red tape to get out of that country and come back home where I could exercise some control over my life, safely and sanely.

It took me till February before I got home to my parents. By this time I was 22 weeks! I was determined to end that pregnancy because financially and mentally and physically I knew I could not survive if I carried to term. While giving birth to my 3 year old I had multiple complications, and the doctors then told me it would be physically risky for me to try again. My son already had lost his Daddy. I surely didn't want him to lose me, too. And even if I did survive, I felt I owed what resources I had left to the child already living and needing me so badly.

Fortunately (it was high time I started having some luck), my parents found the only clinic in a 4 state area that performed abortions up to 24 weeks. They went with me.

It is the 2nd day of a two-day procedure. I received the best of care from both the counseling and medical staffs, and all went well. I am feeling fine physically and relieved and grateful emotionally.

Now I can begin again, and rebuild a life for me and my son. I thank God that I was born in the good old U.S. of A. where people have personal rights and freedoms. May we never lose our liberty and fall backward into the mentality and condition of a 3rd world country!

***

APPENDIX C
TABLE OF CONTENTS

FRIENDS LETTER-5 . . . . . C3

FRIENDS LETTER-17 . . . . . C4

FRIENDS LETTER-27 . . . . . C5

FRIENDS LETTER-30 . . . . . C6

FRIENDS LETTER-33 . . . . . C6

FRIENDS LETTER-41 . . . . . C15

FRIENDS LETTER-50 . . . . . C16

FRIENDS LETTER-53 . . . . . C17

FRIENDS LETTER-61 . . . . . C20

FRIENDS LETTER-67 . . . . . C20

FRIENDS LETTER-122 . . . . . C22

FRIENDS LETTER-127 . . . . . C23

FRIENDS LETTER-166 . . . . . C24

FRIENDS LETTER-170 . . . . . C25

FRIENDS LETTER-172 . . . . . C29

FRIENDS LETTER-179 . . . . . C30

FRIENDS LETTER-227 . . . . . C31

FRIENDS LETTER-240 . . . . . C32

FRIENDS LETTER-242 . . . . . C33

FRIENDS LETTER-245 . . . . . C34

FRIENDS LETTER-249 . . . . . C34

FRIENDS LETTER-260 . . . . . C35

FRIENDS LETTER-264 . . . . . C36

Letters from Friends of the Amici Curiae
Quoted or Cited in Text

FRIENDS LETTER-5

It was a beautiful day in September 1974, when I made the decision to begin working in an abortion clinic. I was a young woman who had known the fear of pregnancy without the availability of legal abortion. I knew about illegals. My aunt had several illegal abortions and my grandfather's stories as a police officer, had been passed through a generation. He told of attempted suicides, the use of coat hangers, and deaths related to hemorrhage. I knew about "the pill", Planned Parenthood, and abortion clinics in New York. I though I knew "it all" but soon began to realize I knew little.

I knew the fear of pregnancy as a consenting adult. What I didn't know was incest at the age of 11 or rape at the age 16 by an older boyfriend and the resulting pregnancies. I did not know that men tell women they had a vasectomy, so they need not use a condom. I did not know that tubal ligations fail and women become pregnant. I did not know that parents beat their children that become pregnant. I did not know that desperate women would resort to unconventional methods to rid themselves of a pregnancy, when safe, legal abortion was available.

I did not know that a minority of religious zealots would try to push their beliefs on desperate women. I did not know that their ultimate goal is to convert the world to their belief of "reborn again christianity". I did not know that these same people would not only tell me what to do in my bedroom, but tell me what I can and can not read. I did not know that I would work in an environment of harassment and fear, where windows have been riveted with bullets and phones have carried bomb threats. I did not know that I would be followed in my car or my personal privacy invaded by home picketers.

The past 14 years have been an "eye opening" experience. I know that a registered nurse who works in an abortion clinic is dedicated to the right of women to receive free access to safe, legal abortion no matter what the cost. I know that Roe v. Wade must remain as written or my grandfather's stories will no longer be a part of history. They will reappear on daily basis, and desperate women will die. I know that it could be a cold, dark day in the summer of 1989 when the Supreme Court decides to begin chipping away at Roe v. Wade, but I am hopeful and know that summer is full of sunshine and warmth, and the Justices will safeguard this 16 year old right of women to choose a safe and legal abortion.

***

FRIENDS LETTER-17

The importance of choice and the right to a legal safe termination of pregnancy is an extremely strong issue for me. Perhaps because of three people I have know who have had to deal with this issue.

My sister-in-law as a teenage became pregnant before abortion was legal. She had a "back alley" abortion. As a result of this she was not able to have children when she was a married woman with an education and very much wanted children. We have always felt that if the procedure had been done in a hospital or clinic under clean + safe conditions, by a doctor this tragedy wouldn't have happened. (1950's)

My second experience was with my cousin + his wife. They had two children + were thrilled when she became pregnant. At the time there was a measles epidemic. The two older boys brought measles home from school to her. He doctor felt the fetus had been damaged and the pregnancy should be terminated. She agonized over this. In the 60's you had to have a 2nd opinion and a psychiatrist had to write a letter on her behalf stating that she was emotionally unable to deal with a deformed child. Why on top of everything should a woman be forced to go through this?

The most traumatic case was a girl I new in school in the 50's. She was very quiet and shy. I understood she came from a very religious background. She became pregnant and went to Tijuana. She never made it home. She had a massive hemorage and died between the border + San Diego. She was seventeen.

Never again!!

***

FRIENDS LETTER-27

My aunt died having a "back room" illegal abortion." Abortion is one of the most fundamental of rights; the right to pursue happiness, the right over one's own body. The folks who want to overturn Roe vs. Wade desire to keep women bare foot and pregnant, and out of the business world. Men are terrified of this and the ignorant women who support this view (because of their own terror of having to justify their lives.

FRIENDS LETTER-30

Though I have not had an abortion, I have taught young women who, because of sexual immaturity and/or date rape, found themselves pregnant and in need of an abortion. Because of the Roe v. Wade decision, they at least had the freedom to choose thier options.

***

FRIENDS LETTER-33

I am writing to share some of my experiences with respect to both legal and illegal abortions over the past 25 years. It is my wish to urge the Supreme Court, in its consideration of the Webster case, and others which may follow, not to limit women's access to competent and legal abortions. Please feel free to excerpt any material which you feel may be useful in that regard.

I write from the perspective of a woman young enough to be still of child-bearing age but old enough to remember vividly the last era of illegal abortions. I also bring to these issues my training as a geneticist and physician, all of which reinforces my strong opinion that, whatever abuses may be associated with readily available abortions, the alternatives harbor much greater evils, both for the individual woman and for society in general.

I was in college in the mid-1960's in western Oregon. Among my friends and close acquaintances there were four women, that I knew of, who had abortions. Let me tell you about them.

Joetta was a large, effusive, good-hearted woman, full of laughter and optimism. She was a virgin until she met

Dan in her junior year. They married shortly after graduation. But before they did, they conceived a child, whether through carelessness or contraceptive failure I do not know. After much agonizing Joetta sought an abortion. She was a bright and ambitious woman, and although she sorely wanted children, she also wanted to finish her education, and to allow Dan to finish his. Whatever arguments can be made for adoption, the fact of the matter is that an ill-timed pregnancy, carried to term, frequently derails a woman's (and, less frequently a man's) chances for education, career and achievement. This was true then - it is still true today. Joetta went to Seattle for her abortion. It was done in a doctor's office, after hours (and after the money was counted), without anaesthesia, quickly and gruffly. She drove back home the same night. She had significant pain and bleeding for many weeks, although no immediate life-threatening complications. She was graduated, married, and went on to graduate school. Some years later, in a college bulletin, I saw a notice of her death, at age 26. Inquiries of mutual friends revealed that she and Dan had tried for some years, without success to conceive. Ultimately they did, and she died of a ruptured ectopic pregnancy. A late result of her previous abortion? Scarring of the fallopian tubes due to poor surgical technique? Who knows. Does it matter? Not to Joetta. Not to Dan. But to women grappling today with hard reproductive and personal choices - yes, it matters very much.

Nancy Jo was a very different kind of woman.. She was a tiny, fragile-looking, spectacularly beautiful girl with an affect of innocence and gullibility which was only partly an act. Men and women alike felt a protectiveness towards her - she seemed so in need of cuddling and looking after. One was always somehow surprised when a chance remark revealed her sharp mind and almost causally obtained academic grounding.

She was also what many would call a slut. By late adolescence her lovers were too numerous to count. And everyone knew it. What most people didn't know was that her first sexual experiences were acquired at the hands of her alcoholic and brutal father while her equally drunken mother slept off her booze. She was a victim of childhood sexual abuse before it became fashionable to acknowledge this social tragedy, before there were hotlines. A rural Wyoming girl, raised on a poverty stricken chicken farm, a single daughter among four brothers, she learned early that compliance with men's wishes won her certain freedoms - and a warped, impoverished kind of affection, valuable only to one who has never known real caring. In spite of this familial cesspool in which she was raised, she achieved academically and won a scholarship to college, working part time to pay living expenses. But her good mind was sabotaged by her emotional neediness. Nancy Jo was astounded when she became pregnant, although no one else was. I am ashamed to recall it, but I laughed when she told me. She saw herself as a little girl - how could she be pregnant? She was, however, grown-up enough to know that she was not a fit mother and cognizant enough of social reality to see abortion as her only salvation. For women faced with unwanted pregnancies, in situations of real or perceived isolation, there really are no choices.

She took an overnight train, alone, to a small town in Montana where she had made contact with a supposedly sympathetic elderly doctor. She wore a white dress - a defiant badge of girlish innocence in the August heat. Two days later she staggered, ashen, back to our apartment. (I was the one "taking care" of Nancy Jo that summer- someone always was.) Her white dress was smudged with grime from the dirty train and a large red stain covered the back of the skirt, directing one's eye to the rivulets of blood running down her legs. Why the cabdriver who picked her up at the train station hadn't taken her directly to a hospital I will never know.

In Montana, following instructions, she had checked into a fleabag hotel near the train depot. A "nurse", summoned by the desk clerk, had escorted her, via a circuitous route, to the doctor. He had scraped her out unceremoniously and had sent her back to the hotel with instructions not to call if she had problems. At our local emergency room she was packed and cauterized and transfused. Two days later, unable to control her bleeding, her doctor performed a hysterectomy. She was 20 years old. It seemed at the time, and in retrospect as well, that the physical and emotional scars of that dreadful, seedy and painful episode represent an additional nightmare that that already sorely burdened young woman didn't need.

I tell Lynne's story with a knot in my stomach and sweaty palms. It's been 24 years; I remember it like it was yesterday.

She was my best friend and I was with her for her "procedure". Lynne got pregnant using a diaphragm. Not irresponsible adolescent passion. Perhaps improper use. But probably just bad luck. It happens. The "doctor" came to my second floor walk-up apartment on a Sunday morning. (We were serious students; we didn't want to miss any classes.) He was probably in his mid 60's, unkempt, a sneer under his straggly mustache. "Money, ladies", he said, "then we work". Lynne handed over $200. He turned to lock the front door behind him. He eyed us critically, with a definite leer. He put out his hand and fondled my breasts, quickly, jabbingly. I was too dumbfounded to withdraw. He looked at Lynne, long and lean, considerably less well endowed that my "zaftig" figure, and said "You should grow some tits, sweetheart, like your friend here." Then he reached around and squeezed her behind. "But you're just fine back here - good and firm." Nodding at me, "She's too broad for my taste". Any vestige of sophistication, any veneer of independent womanhood, any sense of intellectual accomplishment we might have ever had vanished in front of that sleazy, leering old man. Why didn't we kick his butt out on the spot? Sheer terror, I suppose. Both of him and of this terrible, threatening unwanted pregnancy and all it implied.

He suddenly changed his focus, became all business. He surveyed the apartment, and came finally to the kitchen with its large window facing an open field. He withdrew a linen-wrapped package from a brown paper bag. It was sealed with autoclave tape - the kind, I had learned in biology class, that developed black lines when exposed to certain temperatures and pressures. I remember thinking, naively, that at least the instruments were sterile.

Lynne had her abortion on my kitchen table, with her legs strapped to the high backs of two wooden chairs, and a dishrag stuffed in her mouth to muffle the screams. I sat in the living room and sobbed while it was going on. Afterward he chucked me on the chin and left. Lynne lay on the living room couch and said only "Thank God the body doesn't remember pain". But the mind does. I'm a physician now, and I've witnessed my share of pain and suffering, but seldom have I felt so helpless, so at the mercy of a hostile biology, as on that day.

Diane's story is very different. She found the courage to tell her parents when she became pregnant. And her parents found the emotional and financial resources to help her. She flew to Japan, with her mother, and obtained a safe, legal abortion in a modern clinic. She was observed for 24 hours for complications, received counseling on birth control, and returned to the U.S. chastened and subdued but not brutalized and afraid for her life and for future fertility.

Somewhat closer to home is my stepdaughter's saga. Her natural father had abandoned her and her mother at an early age. At the age of 15 she lost her mother to breast cancer. Her stepfather (now my husband) tried hard after his wife's death to provide her with a secure and loving home. But some combination of adolescent rebeliousness and, undoubtedly, an enormous sense of abandonment and vulnerability, led her to a variety of self-destructive behaviors. A former honors student, she was failing in school and pregnant before her 16th birthday. She had a safe, legal abortion, got some psychiatric counseling and was graduated from high school two years later - not with honors, but with a diploma in hand. She is nineteen now, and we have had some rough times. But she is growing up, letting go of the hostility towards the world, showing signs of a growing maturity and functional independence. I think she will be OK. Should this child, already scarred by harsh circumstance beyond her control, have been forced to complete that pregnancy, perhaps drop out of high school, or at best continue school in an atmosphere of snickers and ridicule from her peers? How much psychological burden can be assumed with any hope of a functional recovery? Do we sacrifice our adolescents (foolish and irresponsible as they may often be) in the name of a morality focused on the unborn? Sometimes the living must take precedence, in needs and rights, over the yet-to-become.

Which of these scenarios would we prefer to see replayed? Unwanted pregnancies will continue to occur, and women, attempting to compete in academic, business and social settings which are still governed by rules adapted to the male's freedom from reproductive responsibilities, will continue to refuse to have their lives controlled by their biology and will opt for abortions in many circumstances. The fact of the matter is that over the last ten years contraceptive options have been reduced, rather that expanded. With the virtual abandonment of IUD's because of many complications and the new suggestion in the medical literature that birth control pills may in fact place women (especially younger women) at an increased risk for breast cancer, even those women who are methodical and rigorous in their use of birth control may find themselves forced to choose a less reliable method, and thus place themselves at risk for an unwanted pregnancy, rather than compromise their health. And even those who conceive through blatant unconscionable carelessness should not be butchered by back-room abortionists nor should they be forced to face a premature parenthood which would likely be handled in an equally irresponsible manner. Society has shown no great willingness to address (with pockektbook in hand) the need for childcare and meaningful levels of supplemental income for children being raised in impoverished environments. The number of such children will increase dramatically if abortion becomes unavailable to all those unwilling to risk their lives with an illegal procedure and unable to afford travel to a country where legal abortion exists. My personal feeling is that regardless of the level of societal responsibility a woman should have the right to control her reproductive life, if necessary through abortion. But until such time as our society is willing to accept complete financial responsibility for children born to unwilling parents, as well as to ensure (if such a thing is ever possible) that a pregnant woman suffer no discrimination in the employment marketplace, it is sheer foolishness as well as blatant sex discrimination to force a woman to carry to term an unwanted pregnancy.

While the accidental conception probably accounts for the greatest number of abortions, there is another category of pregnancy which demands your serious consideration in any discussion of limiting a woman's access to legal abortion. That is the pregnancy involving a fetus which has been determined by prenatal examination to be severely abnormal. I speak now as a physician and geneticist, involved for a number of years in counseling and consoling would-be parents whose potential conceptions are at risk for a variety of genetic and developmental defects. I speak also as a 43 year old mother, anxious to have another child, yet painfully aware of my significant age-related risk for conceiving a child with a chromosomal abnormality. In many cases these are parents (myself included) who would not dare to risk a pregnancy were prenatal diagnosis and the option of aborting a seriously compromised fetus available. Many accuse such families of demanding "perfect" children and abhor the notion of selectively aborting abnormal conceptions. I think this attitude represents a tremendous naivity concerning the gravity of many of these defects and the emotional and financial havoc that the birth of such a child can bring to a family. Should a family at risk, for instance, for Tay-Sachs disease, be forced to watch the agonizing, lingering and inevitable degeneration and death of a toddler rather that terminating the doomed pregnancy? Should a woman be forced to carry to term a fetus, such as an anencephalic or a trisomy-18, which faces sure and early death? And while some families may feel capable of dealing with the many problems of a severely retarded child, such as one with Down Syndrome, others will see such a birth as a tragedy which would destroy the fabric of their lives. Is society ready to accept the burden of caring for these children. (And I do not mean in institutional settings, the thought of which brings shudders to those for whom quality of life is an issue on equal par with life itself.) Of course not - not in any meaningful fashion. You cannot convince me that adoption of such children is a feasible alternative. The number of disabled children currently in institutional or foster care awaiting, interminably, adoption by loving families, speaks forcefully against this as a realistic possibility.

These are highly personal issues, requiring in each case careful and agonizing decision-making. But the decisions must remain private ones, not legally mandated, because the consequences of these decisions are, ultimately, borne by the woman in question and, if she is lucky, her family. The issue of when life begins, and the rights of an unthinking embryo, become academic exercises when measured against the right of the individual woman to define her reproductive role and the enormous pain which is incurred when that right is denied.

FRIENDS LETTER-41

I am writing this letter in reference to the following cases: Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, Turnock v. Ragsdale, Ohio v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health or Hodgson v. Minnesota.

The freedom of choice is something that the American women have worked long and hard for. If legal abortion is canceled than we will have progressed back twenty years or more when a women had to seek illegal means of abortion, thus causing deaths when it was not necessary.

I can speak on a personal basis about the above as I lost my mother at the age of 7 years because at that time it was illegal to obtain an abortion even for medical reasons. Our family doctor had to send her to someone else because he was legally unable to perform the required abortion.

By making it legal to have an abortion has eliminated many number of unnecessary deaths.

I and my family stand with the majority of U.S. citizens that support legal abortion.

***

FRIENDS LETTER-50

As a fourth year medical student in the sixties, I took a 1 month elective in Obstetrics at Cornell in NYC. In those four weeks, I took care of 2 patients, 2 victims of illegal and unclean abortions, who subsequently died of sepsis. One was a beautiful, intelligent and mature auburned hair teenager whom I shall never forget.

It was with relief that one of my best friends could, years later, have an aseptic (and legal) abortion so that she could later get married and have a stable home for a wanted (and affordable) child of her own. Because of the legalization of abortions she and her wanted child are alive and thriving.

***

FRIENDS LETTER-53

I am writing to support the amicus briefs being filed in support of women's untrammeled right to abortion.

During 1983, I was president of a chapter of the National Organization for Women in ..., Illinois. The three hospitals in ... do not permit abortions under any circumstances, one for religious reasons and two for fear of what anti-choice terrorists can do. The least of the consequences include disruption of ambulance traffic and stress on patients who can hear the bullhorns.

What it boils down to, then and now, is that you cannot get an abortion in .... The closest clinic is in Granite City, Illinois, about 100 miles away. Because my number was listed as the chapter contact in the phone book, I frequently got urgent calls from desperate women, women who were so frantic to terminate their pregnancies that they would threaten self-mutilation through self-abortion if a way could not be found to get them south to Granite City.

In the Ragsdale case in Rockford, Illinois, the same phenomenon occurred. The clinic there is the only one for 100 miles in any direction. When it was threatened, the local NOW chapter started getting phone calls from women in despair.

When I was in high school, abortion was not legal in Illinois. I remember hearing a pregnant 15-year-old offer to sleep with an entire carful of young men in hopes that this vigorous activity would cause her to lose the baby. I remember one young man of my acquaintance repeatedly punching his 16-year old girlfriend in the stomach in hopes of initiating a miscarriage. I know of another case in the late fifties in which a woman tried to self-abort by douching with an industrial solvent. Her son, born alive, is in his 30's now with the reasoning ability of a six-year-old. No one knows who will take care of him when his mother dies.

In my own circle of close friends, one woman was raped by an uncle at 9; another by a friend of her brother's at 11; another by a complete stranger at 14. None of these rapes was reported. The women did not speak of them at all until years, even decades, later. How will similarly situated women be treated under state abortion laws that will require prompt reporting of assaults before permitting abortions? One good friend was raped by her father; do you think he would have let her go to the police?

It may be time for the privacy argument to fall, and it is definitely time to release the court from making medical decisions. However, the Constitution gives strong grounds for the right of the woman alone to determine her reproductive status in its guarantees of equal protection and its prohibition of slavery.

The strongest argument to support a woman's untrammeled right to abort hinges on the personhood of the mother, and bypasses both the sentimental and the medical debates over the personhood or citizenship of the fetus. No law in the country can compel one citizen to risk his life for another. Even military law cannot compel fatal altruism on the part of one individual for the direct and immediate benefit of another, even a comrade in arms. No state can compel a bystander to intervene in a crime in progress, no matter how heinous the provocation nor how slight the physical risk to the intervenor. Likewise, no state can compel a father to donate so much as a single pint of blood to his baby.

However, anti-choice advocates do not hesitate to put such a compulsion on mothers. Although childbirth is demonstrably riskier than abortion at any range of maternal age, most anti-choice statutes require a clear and immediate threat to maternal life before permitting abortion. A mother cannot withhold her blood nor any other bodily necessity the fetus may require. If the offspring in questions were a six-year-old child rather than a six week old or even six-month fetus, she could legally, (if not morally), deny access to her organs for transplant and her blood of transfusion. It is only during pregnancy that anti-abortion legislation, in the absence of Supreme Court protection, can strip a woman of her bodily integrity and her legal independence. Under no circumstances can a man be so disenfranchised.

Finally, there are constitutional prohibitions of slave labor; yet to compel a woman to bear an unwanted pregnancy to term is forced labor in both senses of the phrase, leaving a woman a slave of the state, the father, or the fetus (depending on whom the party of interest is determined to be).

Please protect the right of American women to self-determination and safe, legal, and anti-septic abortions.

***

FRIENDS LETTER-61

First of all I'd like to express my thanks to the Supreme Court Judges for making abortions safe and legal. On a personal level I'm currently involved to keep it that way.

I am an only child and was raised by the women in my family. Every woman in my family has been abused by the men in their lives. It was hand-me-down effect from alcohol abuse that led my step father to sexually abuse myself, he forced himself on me for 9 years.

My two aunts have each had one abortion, during the time of legal and safe abortions. I escorted one aunt to the clinic, I was reminded that while my step-father took his pleasures with me, just how fortunate I was to not become pregnant!

There is no doubt in my mind I would have wanted the Freedom of Choice!

***

FRIENDS LETTER-67

When I was married in the early 1950's, I wanted to have four children and, fortunately, in time each of four babies were welcomed into our family. My family doctor advised me not to have anymore children for health reasons and I had already decided I would not consider a fifth. I asked him, however, what I would do if I should become pregnant again. He replied, "You'll have the baby." His statement made a profound impression on me, penetrating to the very core of my innermost self. His attitude of mandatory motherhood no-matter-what contradicted everything I knew to be respectful, compassionate and fair to a fellow human being. His pronouncement motivated me to become an abortion rights activist and for the past twenty years I have done whatever I could to help keep abortion safe, legal and within the reach of any woman who feels she must make that choice.

I respect the view of those people who would not choose abortion for themselves. It's the political antiabortionists I quarrel with. By the way, I have known so-called Right-to-Lifers to change their minds when abortion got down to them personally and to insist that their daughters have abortions for no other reason than that they didn't like their daughter's sex partner. It is as unconscionable to force a woman into an abortion as it is to deny her the right that is hers--to choose if and when to have a baby. I cannot respect, therefore, the view of those people who oppose abortion for all women. Over the course of some ten years I offered help to about thirty women ranging in age from fifteen to thirty. Each woman had her own special reason for having an abortion. I never gave advice--I'm not a counselor. I gave them what they asked for--information that ought to be free to anyone and financial help. The fifteen year-old feared to go to her parents--religious fanatics. An eighteen year-old, an exchange student raped in Spain, could not face her parents. Most were college students facing an unwanted pregnancy alone. Whatever their individual reasons for choosing abortion, all were exceedingly grateful for the opportunity to make a choice that made the difference in their lives. There is no doubt in my mind that the right to live belongs first to the already born (female and male) who know what is best for them and who strive to make the best of their existence in a world that cries out for sane judgments.

***

FRIENDS LETTER-122

I am writing to briefly describe my experiences with young women seeking an abortion. As a result of these experiences, I feel strongly that it is critical for all women to have the right to choose an abortion, regardless of their individual circumstances.

In 1983-84, I was a graduate student in public health at ... University. In order to earn money, I worked as a counselor at a large abortion clinic. I was responsible for counseling women over the phone and scheduling their appointments. In addition, I frequently worked as the admitting counselor, preparing patients for the abortion and answering any final questions they may have had.

Many of the patients at the clinic were very young women, some who had never ventured beyond their neighborhoods. When they arrived at the clinic, most were anxious and some fearful. Yet despite their anxieties, all were sure of their decision to abort. For many, it was an agonizing choice, not one made lightly or without serious consideration. As I talked to these patients, some told stories of rape, incest, birth control failure or ignorance about reproductive health. For all of them the availability of abortion allowed them to maintain their physical, emotional and social health. It was an option that allowed young women to continue their educations and pursue their dreams. It allowed rape victims to begin the healing process. It allowed mothers to sustain their families. It allowed women to maintain control over their bodies, their lives and their futures. For many of the patients I saw, if abortion was not available, their lives would be irrevocably different and decidedly damaged.

Because of this experience, I firmly support a woman's right to choose abortion and I pledge to do all I can sustain that right.

FRIENDS LETTER-127

I have been a nurse for almost thirty years. In those thirty years I have taken care of women who have had both legal and illegal abortions.

When I first began my nursing career abortions were illegal. This did not stop desparate women from attempting to abort themselves. I have vivid memories of caring for a woman who had used a caustic substance on herself. She developed a severe infection and was admitted to the hospital. She went into renal failure and had to be dialized. She did not survive!

I shudder at the thought that our Supreme Court would force us back to those horrors.

I have also spent time counselling women with problem pregnancies. These women did not want to be pregnant. They did not make the decision lightly to terminate their pregnancy. For many of them a pregnancy would have forced them to drop out of college and seek jobs. Many would end up on welfare to raise their babies.

People who suggest that these women should deliver their babies and give them up for adoption have learned nothing from history. The majority of women I have worked with who continued their pregnancies did not give up their babies. They kept their babies and raised them as single, poor moms who abuse their children.

It is also an insult to women to force them to be "brood mares" for childless couples. The courts should not have the right to tell women how their bodies will be used.

Please show that you understand the lessons from history and do not allow abortions to become illegal again. Women will continue to have abortion so please lets keep them safe and legal.

***

FRIENDS LETTER-166

I am a 55 year old mother of two children who were both wanted and planned. I was fortunate enough, having married at 18 to have had proper counseling on family planning.

I know that personally, I would have a very hard time deciding to have an abortion, because of my strong belief in life.

However, the quality of life of unwanted and battered children is questionable.

Also, I have known a young woman years ago who died at age 26 of complications from self abortion. I have been aware that thousands of women each year, for as long as I can remember, have gone to extreme lengths, endangering their lives to get out of unwanted pregnancies.

I support healthy families, planned parenthood, but about all freedom of choice. This is a fundamental right for every woman.

***

FRIENDS LETTER-170

The Complacent Radical

"Didn't we do this 20 years ago?" Anne asked as we searched for the number of the house where the meeting was scheduled. "Didn't we win this battle?"

Indeed we had. In the late 60s we marched and spoke out to legalize abortion, revealed those sad, frightening, sometimes horrible secrets of our and our friends' illegal abortions. We had been arrested and freed on our own recognizance, made speeches and defended ourselves to an IRS that harassed us with tax audits in three of every five years, though we rarely earned more than $7500 in any given year. Once before we had met in small apartments to plan strategy and review the painful personal reasons for our political activism.

But here we were again, with all the deja vu sparked by Salvation Army couches overlain with Indian-print fabrics and proclaiming posters decorating the walls.

When it comes time to reveal why we are at this particular meeting, we embarrassedly say we have been through this before. Embarrassed because our victory has not held; embarrassed because we have spent many of the intervening years building our professional lives; embarrassed because we couldn't keep Lowell Weicker in the Senate or Danforth Quayle out of the White House.

How often will we have to do this? we think. Why must we do it? Haven't our victories permitted us to live secure bourgeois existences, to leave the streets for comfortable offices and labor-saving-deviced homes? I had not expected to be putting on Emma Goldman's mantle again. In fact, I had been so far from believing I would be organizing and speechifying again that I had even named my feline Emma Goldcat. A memorial to my heroine and to the days when I saw myself as a modern Emma, raising consciousness and organizing. I expected it to be a memory only: I did not expect to be doing it all again in middle age.

We sit next to these 20-year-olds feeling a mixture of pride and sorrow. Proud and sorry to look so appropriate for our professional personas--physician Anne, advertising executive Marcia. Proud that we have opened doors that were closed to our mothers, sorry that, having passed through those doors we have so little time to challenge new barriers. Proud to have been leaders in a progressive struggle; sorry to have been pushed back to a past that gave men rights over our bodies and our lives that should always be ours. Proud to have been instrumental in a historical change; sorry to be confronting forces we though we had vanquished.

We've not come full circle, of course; history is a spiral that doesn't repeat exactly. This time the struggle is to protect a freedom long since won. But it's as though they wanted to rescind our right to vote or remove the freedom to marry whom we choose or divorce when we must.

It was over! I want to shout. My closest childhood and young adult friend, whose abortion on her dining room table by an immigrant woman with no sterilization and the crudest of instruments, whose experience was paramount in activating me on this issue, is already dead. Why do I have to fight for her life again? I have thanked God and our women warriors that my own daughter, when she had to have an abortion, could go to a physician, be given anesthetics and pain killers, could survive it with minimal trauma, remembering Sue, who had an abortion by a sadist doctor who refused her all analgesia insisting that she feel every thrust of the knife. She deserved the pain, he thought, moralizing even as he took her $500 -- in small bills. But we are being threatened again. My own perimenopausal, sterilized body is not in jeopardy, but they are trying to force our daughters to return to butchers; they want total reproductive control, insisting that we carry unwanted fetuses to term and raise unwanted babies without public money or child care centers. If they have their way, we will have to do without contraception because after all every ovum is a potential baby.

So here we are again, coerced from complacency, aging warriors whose weapons are our emotions and our history. I want to write this as a funny piece, because there is considerable humor in our being old radicals meeting with a new generation of movers and doers. The vision of us--well-coiffed and manicured, wrapped in cashmere and silk, carrying calendars that read "meeting with marketing V-P" and "grand rounds presentation" instead of "grand jury demo" and "strategy meeting," coming here in an Alfa Romeo instead of a battered old Volvo-- has more than a touch of humor.

I'm going to have a 50th birthday in a couple of years. I should be concerned with funding my Keogh and keeping my cholesterol below 190, not with raising money for Planned Parenthood because the "Moral Majority" wants them to stop educating girls and women about contraception which might guard against unwanted pregnancies and sexually transmitted diseases. I should be protecting my elegant fingernails, not scratching off wallpaper in tenements that we have fought to turn over to homeless AIDS patients and their infected babies. I want to kvetch about my stiffening knees, not sit at malls asking stranger to sign petitions saying they want to keep the right to choose their life directions by themselves, without government intervention.

I am an aging radical and I want to age gracefully, not on the front lines of more battles against fascist control. I want to enjoy my limited affluence, not spend my evenings planning how to protect us from the reactionaries who are moving to abolish freedom of choice in all aspects of our private lives; who want to take over our wombs and bodily fluids (they want access even to our urine, to make sure we smoke only legal toxins and nothing natural); who want to reduce our art to objects of consumption (how else can we view their permitting Ted Turner to tamper with copyrighted films?); who want to own language (how else can we understand the Newspeak of the 1980's?). And they are succeeding. So, here I am in my cashmere sweater, driving my Alfa Romeo to one more demonstration, sitting in one more strategy meeting, planning one more speech in favor of liberty and justice for all.

[The writer] presides over an agency in ... that produces medical education and promotional programs. She used to think "liberals" weren't progressive enough; now she sees them as another endangered species.

***

FRIENDS LETTER-172

I offer the following experiences as my personal reasons why I am in favor of Pro-Choice:

When I was six years old, I was forced to endure a 40 mile trip to what was referred to as "Feather Annie's." I stayed in the car with my father and two brothers while my 41 year old mother went inside the private residence. My father's serious attitude instilled fear and insecurity in my older brother and I. When my mother returned to the car she was crying. She repeated the words "I'm afraid I'll die- I'm afraid someone will find out I came here and I'll get her (referring to the woman who performed the abortion) in trouble with the law. I'm glad it's over, but I'm afraid - if I die, what will happen to the children?" It was an awful experience for a child who was too young to understand. All the way home she cried and repeated over and over her fear of dying. I do not remember of her expressing any regret, she expressed her relief that it was over. Her fears became contagious and needless to say it was traumatic for me and my older brother (one brother was less than 2 years old). Many years later when my brother and I recalled that day, we agreed that the only crime committed was by a society that forced a woman to have to submit herself to fear and agony of that magnitude. Our mother survived and imbued in us forever was our sympathy for her on that day. After all, she had already born six children, she was in poor health, and my father was unemployed in that year of 1936.

My mother told me that it was a terrible tragedy that the little 2 year old neighbor girl's mother died suddenly. When I became old enough to understand I found out that it was no secret, in the small town we lived in, that the young mother had died from a self induced abortion. As a very young child I was terribly disturbed over the fact that this dear cute little girl had no mother for the reason that her mother had died because she didn't want to have another baby. I felt sad that such a thing could happen, it was hard for me to accept that "Jane's" pretty young mother had to die. I saw sadness in Jane's face and unhappiness was apparent in her father's behavior. I cannot justify a law that allowed such unfortunate circumstances to happen.

In the 1950's my sister lost a good friend who had an illegal abortion. The 28 year old woman who died had five small children. Her unplanned and unwanted pregnancy was more than she was able to handle and her untimely death was the result of not having the choice of a safe and legal abortion. A law with the potential effect of depriving a loving husband and five small children of the presence of a young wife and mother is a disgrace in a compassionate society.

I am happy to share my testimony.

***

FRIENDS LETTER-179

I am writing to let you know that my first experience with abortion was a very grave one that left an indelible mark on me and my commitment to the need for legal abortions performed by medically knowledgeable staff.

— In 1965 I had to care for a 19 year old girl as she lay dying of infection following an illegal abortion. The fact that she denied having had an abortion up to the time of her death and the tearful disclosure by her mother after her death underscored the fear these two people were experiencing because this was an illegal act.

Hospitals such as the one I was doing my nurses training in at the time, saw the results of desperate women who knew there were risks, but who endured them because they felt they had no alternative.

Making abortion illegal again will not make abortion go away it will only make it unsafe again. Do you want to make women suffer the indignity and danger of back-alley abortions or self induced abortions? Who knows how desparate a woman faced with an unplanned, unwanted pregnancy will be-can any one else profess to know what she must do?

***

FRIENDS LETTER-227

Every women should have the right to control her own body. As long as there are unwanted pregnancies there are going to be abortions. They should be safe and legal. If abortion is made illegal, women are going to die from botched abortions. Our society can't afford to pay that price. As an adopted child I know what choice is about. I still feel that abortion should be legal.

***

FRIENDS LETTER-240

So much of the dialogue, argument, and confrontation regarding this issue, at least in the ten years during which I have been aware of it, have seemed to take place in a vacuum of sorts. I don't use vacuum in a pejorative sense but rather as a contrast to "real life, real people." Discussion about ethics, values of life, murder, survival, hope, love, religion, poverty, adoption, birth control, motherhood, and duty can be instructive and insightful, but those who engage in it from the perspective of "anti-abortion" ignore the greatest issue of all: a woman's physical, mental and spiritual integrity. Across all the variety of contexts in which choices about abortion must be made, from urban poverty to exclusive medical clinics, from rapes to comas, and against the range of factors from age to income which come into play, there is only one constant -- a woman's right to control her destiny. Because of chromosomal variation, a woman can get pregnant. As important and miraculous as this possibility may be, however, it cannot diminish a woman's right to assess the values and needs attendant to her existence. In this, a woman is entitled to no less, no more than a man. Her entitlement must include the right to make and live with choices about her body and what it may or may not do.

Life is not carried out as a controlled experiment, it's variables dictated in a predictable void, and a woman's integrity should not be treated as if it were.

***

FRIENDS LETTER-242

Despite being male, I believe that my experiences as a counselor give me a personal perspective from which to speak on the issue of abortion. Based on my conversations with women over many years, I believe that the most devastating effect of rape is not the act itself, but the aftermath of nightmares, anger and self-recrimination which follow. These emotions can last for years, and subjecting a rape victim to the additional mental agony and physical discomfort of an unwanted pregnancy strikes me as cruel and demonstrates an extraordinary insensitivity on the part of those who would outlaw abortion.

Other women have told me countless stories of a child born out of wedlock, the father suddenly disappearing, and a life, fraught with financial difficulties, which become a continuous struggle with mental and emotional exhaustion, leading in some cases to drugs, alcoholism and child abuse. Social services are already so overburdened that the meager benefits available to these women are delivered too slowly to prevent hardship. Do we multiply the sufferings of unwilling parents and unwanted children - at great social costs- to placate noisy zealots?

Finally, anyone with eyes to read and a capable mind should know that there is division of medical and moral opinion on the moment when life begins. When reasonable people differ on the solutions to difficult problems, toleration and compassion for opposing views seem healthier than false certainties derived from simplistic moralists. I do not advocate abortion. I ask only that the court honor the separation of church and state on which this country was founded and be humane and realistic enough to allow poor citizens the choice which will always be available to the rich.

***

FRIENDS LETTER-245

The Supreme Court of the United States will soon be considering cases in which they will be asked to rule on facts not in evidence. I refer specifically to the question of when the products of conception become "human."

Those who oppose a woman's right to reproductive freedom would have you believe there is only one answer to that question. As a physician of almost twenty years experience, I submit that their response lies in faith, not Science. It is abundantly clear that there is NO agreement in Theology or Science about when the products of conception become a human individual. To even suggest there is, is wholly inaccurate. For the court to overturn Roe v. Wade on this issue would be to legally endorse one religious viewpoint with the force of law. As an American, I would find the imposition of someone else's articles of faith intolerable.

***

FRIENDS LETTER-249

My mother, who has since passed away, was born and raised in a small country town in Hungary in 1909.

When she was around 16 years old, her best friend had an abortion. It took 3 months for her to watch her friends slow death, due to an infection which could not be treated because #1 there was no antibiotics at the time, and #2 abortion was not an acceptable practice.

My mother had an extremely difficult time accepting her friend's death. Even when I was a young woman, she would tell me how beautiful and good her friend was. Even though my mother never joined the ranks of the "Feminist Movement," and in fact, was quite a homebody raising 3 children, she always supported the right of every woman to choose what was best for them to do with "their" bodies, even though, and especially because, of her friend.

Abortion has been around for a long, long time, and will continue. I cannot even imagine the deaths that will occur at the hands of those people who will illegally perform unsafe surgical techniques, nor can I imagine those women who will be unable to bear children, because of botched abortions.

Our young people will not stop having sexual relations. Would anyone want an unsafe surgical procedure to happen to their daughter? Mother? Wife?

***

FRIENDS LETTER-260

I cannot claim a personal experience with a woman who has had an abortion. However, a number or women have told me privately that they have had abortions. Some of these would be acknowledged as therapeutic; others would not.

Partly because of the stories of these women (now that I've begun writing I remember the neighbor woman who had to wait until an ectopic pregnancy ruptured before the doctor could help her. This was in the 1950's. Another woman told me of the brain function damage she felt that she had received as the result of a similar situation.) I believe that there is the need for safe, legal abortions and that they should be readily available.

Furthermore, I have always been thankful that I have lived during a time when birth control could/can be discussed, when information and birth control products became and are openly available.

In my family there are stories of deaths due to childbirth, ruined health, fear and wrecked family relationships that could have been prevented had birth control devices been generally available in those days.

I think that every woman (and man, too) should revere the work of Margaret Sanger.

FRIENDS LETTER-264

I am writing this letter to demonstrate my strong support of the continuation of reproductive freedom, the right to choose, for all women. Although I have not personally had an abortion, I have had experience with two friends who made this difficult decision and have considered the right to choose this avenue a vital one to myself as a women, to all women, children and to families as a whole.

In the cases of my friends, one was a young girl who in today's terms was 'date raped' but at the time of her pregnancy was of course considered at fault. Thankfully, her family was supportive of her and, although abortion was not a legal option at that time, were able to take her someplace where it was. This was not an act of irresponsibility but rather one of compassion for this girl as an individual and a responsible decision regarding the future of a child in this kind of situation. Our communities and society as a whole do not assist with child rearing in any financial, practical or emotional way. A decision about having a child is responsible only if considerations of the future are a part of that decision.

In the case of my other friend, a decision was made between husband and wife to postpone having children. Although she used birth control at all times, she did get pregnant. Her husband was not willing to consider a change in their decision. In order to give her marriage every chance it had and to have children in an intact two parent family, she made the very difficult decision to have an abortion. Once again, rather than being an irresponsible frivolous decisions, it was one that took a great deal of courage and concern for her future children.

For myself, reproductive freedom has meant a respect for women and has given a right that should naturally be ours. With any right comes the hope that each individual will use it wisely. However, there is a wide continuum of 'wisely' and there is also no power so supreme that it or they know what wise use of a right is for any individual. Although I have not had to make the decision to have an abortion, I was prepared to if I had gotten pregnant after my husband and I had decided against having more children. It would not have been an easy decision, but most life decisions are not easy. It would, however, have been the best decision for myself and my entire family. I should have the right to that decision since I have the sole responsibility for any child born to me.

Under reproductive freedom, no one is determining the path of another. It is the freedom to choose, to have the varied options available that is the key. No one can guarantee anyone else's actions and choices but neither does anyone take responsibility for the consequences for someone else's choices. We each make our own choices and live with the consequences of them.

I hope this issue is considered with the greatest of seriousness. We are speaking to the heart of the freedoms that this country stands for and the hope that the women and children of this country are given the respect that they, as well as every other individual, deserve.

***

AMICUS CURIAE

BRIEF

No. 88-605

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
MAR 30 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,
Appellants,

v.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,
Appellees.

On Appeal from the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit

BRIEF OF THE AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, AMERICAN ACADEMY OF CHILD AND ADOLESCENT PSYCHIATRY, AMERICAN ACADEMY OF PEDIATRICS, AMERICAN COLLEGE OF OBSTETRICIANS AND GYNECOLOGISTS, AMERICAN FERTILITY SOCIETY, AMERICAN MEDICAL WOMEN'S ASSOCIATION, AMERICAN PSYCHIATRIC ASSOCIATION AND AMERICAN SOCIETY OF HUMAN GENETICS AS AMICI CURIAE IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEES

Of Counsel:

KIRK B. JOHNSON
EDWARD B. HIRSHFELD
DAVID ORENTLICHER
AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION
535 N. Dearborn Street
Chicago, Illinois 60610
(312) 645-4600

STEPHAN E. LAWTON
REED SMITH SHAW & MCCLAY
1200 18th Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20036
(202) 331-8566

ANN E. ALLEN
AMERICAN COLLEGE OF OBSTETRICIANS AND GYNECOLOGISTS
409 12th Street, S.W.
Washington, D.C. 20024
(202) 638-5577

[Of Counsel Continued on Inside Cover]

JACK R. BIERIG
DAVID F. GRAHAM
LYNN D. FLEISHER
SIDLEY & AUSTIN
One First National Plaza
Chicago, Illinois 60603
(312) 853-7000

CARTER G. PHILLIPS *
ELIZABETH H. ESTY
JULI E. FARRIS
SIDLEY & AUSTIN
1722 Eye Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20006
(202) 429-4000

* Counsel of Record

WILSON - EPES PRINTING CO., INC. - 789-0096 - WASHINGTON, D.C. 20001

LAURIE R. ROCKETT
HOLLYER, JONES, BRADY, SMITH,
TROXELL, BARRETT & CHIRA
(COUNSEL TO THE AMERICAN MEDICAL WOMEN'S ASSOCIATION, INC.)
342 Madison Avenue
New York, New York 10173
(212) 818-1110

JOEL I. KLEIN
ONEK, KLEIN & FARR
2550 M Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20037
(202) 775-0184

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

Amici curiae will address the following questions:

1. Whether the Court should reaffirm that the "liberty" and privacy rights embodied in the Due Process Clauses of the Constitution fundamentally protect, inter alia, individual medical treatment decisions.

2. Whether Sections 188.029 and 188.205 of the Missouri statute unconstitutionally infringe the fundamental right of patients to make medical treatment decisions in consultation with their physicians.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Page
QUESTIONS PRESENTED	i
TABLE OF AUTHORITIES	v
INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE	1
MEDICAL BACKGROUND	3
I. General Background on Abortion	3
II. Fetal Viability	5
III. The Health Effects of Childbirth and Abortion	8
IV. Individual Physical and Psychiatric Effects of Pregnancy and Abortion	13
A. Individual Physical Effects from Pregnancy	13
B. Individual Physical Effects from Abortion	18
C. Individual Psychiatric Effects from Pregnancy and Abortion	20
SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT	23
ARGUMENT	25
I. INDIVIDUALS HAVE A FUNDAMENTAL RIGHT TO MAKE DECISIONS ABOUT THEIR MEDICAL CARE, AND STATE LAWS WHICH INTERFERE WITH THAT RIGHT CAN BE JUSTIFIED ONLY IF THEY ARE NARROWLY TAILORED TO FURTHER A COMPELLING STATE INTEREST	25
A. The Individual's Fundamental Privacy And Liberty Right To Be Free Of Governmental Interference Extends To Medical Treatment Decisions	26
B. This Court's Recognition That Every Individual Has A Fundamental Right To Make Decisions About His Or Her Medical Treatment Is Supported By The History And Traditions Of This Nation	30

TABLE OF CONTENTS—Continued

	Page
C. This Court's Recognition That Every Individual Has A Fundamental Right To Make Decisions About His Or Her Medical Treatment Is Supported By This Court's Approach To The Protection Of Health Under Specific Constitutional Provisions	33
D. State Interference With A Fundamental Right Triggers Searching Judicial Examination Pursuant To The Compelling State Interest Test	35
II. SECTIONS 188.029 AND 188.205 OF THE MISSOURI STATUTE UNCONSTITUTIONALLY INFRINGE THE FUNDAMENTAL RIGHT OF PATIENTS TO MAKE MEDICAL DECISIONS IN CONSULTATION WITH THEIR PHYSICIANS	38
A. Section 188.029 Of The Missouri Statute Is An Unconstitutional Interference With The Right Of Patients To Make Important Medical Decisions In Consultation With Their Physicians	39
B. Section 188.205 Of The Missouri Statute Impermissibly Burdens The Constitutional Right Of Patients To Make Informed Medical Decisions In Consultation With Their Physicians	44
CONCLUSION	50

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

Cases:	Page
Board of Regents v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564 (1972)	27
Canterbury v. Spence, 464 F.2d 772 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1064 (1972)	32
Carey v. Population Serv. Int'l, 431 U.S. 678 (1977)	26, 28, 37
City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983)	passim
Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379 (1979)	passim
Coyle v. Smith, 221 U.S. 559 (1911)	27
Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179 (1973)	39
Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972)	27
Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97 (1976)	34
Fitzgerald v. Porter, 523 F.2d 716 (7th Cir. 1975)	28
Garcia v. San Antonio Metro. Transit Auth., 469 U.S. 528 (1985)	27
Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)	27, 27, 28
Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980)	29, 35, 38, 48
Huzjak v. United States, 118 F.R.D. 61 (N.D. Ohio 1987)	32
Ingraham v. Wright, 430 U.S. 651 (1977)	32
Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11 (1905)	37
Lee v. Winston, 717 F.2d 888 (4th Cir. 1983)	33
Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967)	27
Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977)	48
Memorial Hosp. v. Maricopa County, 415 U.S. 250 (1974)	34
Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923)	23, 27, 30
Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974)	35
Moore v. City of East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494 (1977)	23, 30
Natanson v. Kline, 186 Kan. 393, 350 P.2d 1093, clarified, 187 Kan. 186, 354 P.2d 670 (1960)	32
Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928)	27
Perry v. Sindermann, 408 U.S. 593 (1972)	49
Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925)	27
Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft, 462 U.S. 476 (1983)	36

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES—Continued

Page

Planned Parenthood v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976) ..... passim
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973) ..... passim
Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (1969) 27, 35
Skinner v. Oklahoma ex rel. Williamson, 316 U.S. 535 (1942) 27
Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986) 28, 37, 47
Union Pacific Ry. v. Botsford, 141 U.S. 250 (1891) .. 24, 30
Whalen v. Roe, 429 U.S. 589 (1977) 27
Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. 753 (1985) 24, 33
Youngberg v. Romeo, 457 U.S. 307 (1982) 32

Constitutional Provisions and Statutes:

U.S. Const. amend. IV 24, 33
U.S. Const. amend. VIII 24, 33
U.S. Const. amend. XIV ..... passim
Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.029 (1986) ..... passim
Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.205 (1986) ..... passim

Other Authorities:

Abortion, Medicine & the Law (J. Butler & D. Walbert 3d ed. 1986) 17, 18, 20
Adler, Emotional Responses of Women Following Therapeutic Abortion, 45 Am. J. Orthopsych. 446 (1975) 22
Adolescent Abortion: Psychological and Legal Issues (G. Melton ed. 1986) 22
American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, Methods of Midtrimester Abortion (Technical Bulletin 109, Oct. 1987) 12
American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, Standards for Obstetric-Gynecologic Services (6th ed. 1985) 46
American Medical Association, Current Opinions of the Council on Ethical and Judicial Affairs, ¶ 8.07 45

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES—Continued

Page

Amon, Sibai, Anderson & Mabie, Obstetric Variables Predicting Survival of the Immature Newborn (≤1,000 gm): A Five-Year Experience at a Single Perinatal Center, 156 Am. J. Obstet. Gynec. 1380 (1987) 6
Ashton, The Psychosocial Outcome of Induced Abortion, 87 Br. J. Obstet. Gynec. 1115 (1980) .. 22
Binkin, Trends in Induced Legal Abortion Morbidity and Mortality, 13 Clin. Obstet. Gynec. 83 (1986) 9, 11, 12
W. Blackstone, Commentaries 1:134 (1765) 31
Blumberg & Golbus, Psychological Sequelae of Elective Abortion, 123 West. J. Med. 188 (1975) .. 21, 22
Bracken, Freeman & Hellenbrand, Hospitalization for Medical-Legal and Other Abortions in the United States 1970-1977, 72 Am. J. Pub. Health 30 (1982) 13
Brewer, Incidence of Post-abortion Psychosis: A Prospective Study, [1977] 1 Br. Med. J. 476 21
J. Brocklehurst, Textbook of Geriatric Medicine and Gerontology (3d ed. 1985) 7
Buehler, Schulz, Grimes & Hogue, The Risk of Serious Complications from Induced Abortion: Do Personal Characteristics Make a Difference?, 153 Am. J. Obstet. Gynec. 14 (1985) 19
G. Burrow & T. Ferris, Medical Complications During Pregnancy (3d ed. 1988) 15
Cates, Legal Abortion: The Public Health Record, 215 Sci. 1586 (1982) 10
Cates & Rochat, Illegal Abortions in the United States: 1972-74, 8 Fam. Plann. Persp. 86 (1976) 12
Cates, Smith, Rochat & Grimes, Mortality from Abortion and Childbirth—Are the Statistics Biased?, 248 J.A.M.A. 192 (1982) 10

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES—Continued

Page

Chervenak, Berkowitz, Thornton, Kreiss, Youcha, Ehrenkranz, Hobbins & Berkowitz, A Comparison of Sonographic Estimation of Fetal Weight and Obstetrically Determined Gestational Age in the Prediction of Neonatal Outcome for the Very Low-Birth Weight Fetus, 152 Am. J. Obstet. Gynec. 47 (1985) 42

Comprehensive Textbook of Psychiatry/IV (H. Kaplan & B. Sadock 4th ed. 1985) 21, 22

R. Creasy & R. Resnik, Maternal-Fetal Medicine (2d ed. 1989) 14, 15, 16, 17

Cruikshank, Amniocentesis for Determination of Fetal Maturity, 25 Clin. Obstet. Gynec. 773 (1982) 42

D. Danforth & J. Scott, Obstetrics & Gynecology (5th ed. 1986) ..... passim

David, Rasmussen & Holst, Postpartum and Postabortion Psychotic Reactions, 13 Fam. Plann. Persp. 88 (1981) 20, 21

S. Elias & G. Annas, Reproductive Genetics and the Law (1987) 42

Ewing & Rouse, Therapeutic Abortion and Prior Psychiatric History, 130 Am. Psych. 37 (1973) .. 22

Forrest, Unintended Pregnancy Among American Women, 19 Fam. Plann. Persp. 76 (1987) 5

Frank, Kay, Scott, Hannaford & Haran, Pregnancy Following Induced Abortion: Maternal Morbidity, Congenital Abnormalities and Neonatal Death, 97 Br. J. Obstet. Gynec. 836 (1987) 20

Gerdes, Abbasi, Bhutani & Bowen, Improved Survival and Short-Term Outcome of Inborn "Micropremies," 25 Clin. Pediat. 391 (1986) 6

Golde & Platt, The Use of Ultrasound in the Diagnosis of Fetal Lung Maturity, 27 Clin. Obstet. Gynec. 391 (1984) 42

Greenberger, Asthma in Pregnancy, 12 Clin. Perinat. 571 (1985) 18

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES—Continued

Page

Grimes & Schulz, Morbidity and Mortality from Second-Trimester Abortions, 30 J. Reprod. Med. 505 (1985) 11

Grimes, Schulz & Cates, Prevention of Uterine Perforation During Curettage Abortion, 251 J.A.M.A. 2108 (1984) 19

Hack & Fanaroff, Changes in the Delivery Room Care of the Extremely Small Infant (<750g), 314 New Eng. J. Med. 660 (1986) 6

Hack & Fanaroff, How Small Is Too Small? Considerations in Evaluating the Outcome of the Tiny Infant, 15 Clin. Perinat. 773 (1988) 8

F. Harper & F. James, The Law of Torts, § 17.1 (2d ed. 1986) 32

Henshaw, Characteristics of U.S. Women Having Abortions, 1982-1983, 19 Fam. Plann. Persp. 5 (1987) 5

Henshaw & Silverman, The Characteristics and Prior Contraceptive Use of U.S. Abortion Patients, 20 Fam. Plann. Persp. 158 (1988) 5

Henshaw, Forrest and Van Vort, Abortion Services in the United States 1984 and 1985, 19 Fam. Plann. Persp. 63 (1987) 4

W. Hern, Abortion Practice (1984) 9

J. Hodgson, Abortion and Sterilization: Medical and Social Aspects (1981) 10, 19

Hood, Anesthesia for Cesarean Section: Minimizing Risk and Complications, 15 Obstet. Gynec. Clin. N.A. 639 (1988) 16

Hopkins, Marcus & Campbell, Postpartum Depression: A Critical Review, 95 Psychol. Bull. 498 (1984) 22

Johnson, Cox & McKim, Outcome of Infants of Very Low Birth Weight: A Geographically Based Study, 136 Can. Med. Ass'n J. 1157 (1987) 6

Lazarus & Stern, Psychiatric Aspects of Pregnancy Termination, 13 Clin. Obstet. Gynec. 125 (1986) 21, 22

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES—Continued

Page

LeBolt, Grimes & Cates, Mortality from Abortion and Childbirth: Are the Populations Comparable?, 248 J.A.M.A. 188 (1982) 9, 10

Linn, Schoenbaum, Monson, Rosner, Stubblefield & Ryan, The Relationship Between Induced Abortion and Outcome of Subsequent Pregnancies, 146 Am. J. Obstet. Gynec. 136 (1983) 20

Lloyd & Laurence, Sequelae and Support After Termination of Pregnancy for Fetal Malformation, 290 Br. Med. J. 907 (1985) 22

Miller, Maternal and Neonatal Morbidity and Mortality in Cesarean Section, 15 Obstet. Gynec. Clin. N.A. 629 (1988) 16

Minkoff, Care of Pregnant Women Infected with Human Immunodeficiency Virus, 258 J.A.M.A. 2714 (1987) 46

Mulder, Amniotic Fluid Embolism: An Overview and Case Report, 152 Am. J. Obstet. Gynec. 430 (1985) 20

National Center for Health Statistics, 37 Monthly Vital Health Statistics Report 15 (Supp. No. 3, July 12, 1988) 4

The New York State Task Force on Life and the Law, Fetal Extrauterine Survivability (1988) .. 6, 7, 8

Nwaesei, Young, Byrne, et al., Preterm Birth at 23 to 26 Weeks' Gestation: Is Active Obstetric Management Justified?, 157 Am. J. Obstet. Gynec. 890 (1987) 6

Noronha, Neurological Disorders During Pregnancy and the Puerperium, 12 Clin. Perinat. 695 (1985) 18

C. Pauerstein, Clinical Obstetrics (1987) ..... passim

Placek & Taffel, Recent Patterns in Cesarean Delivery in the United States, 15 Obstet. Gynec. Clin. N.A. 607 (1988) 10

Poland & Russell, The Limits of Viability: Ethical Considerations, 11 Sem. Perinat. 257 (1987) 5, 6

E. Quilligan & F. Zuspan, Douglas-Stromme Operative Obstetrics (4th ed. 1982) 11

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES—Continued

Page

Rayburn & LaFerla, Mid-Gestational Abortion for Medical or Genetic Indications, 13 Clin. Perinat. 71 (1986) 19

Richards, Lachman, Putsoe & Moodley, The Incidence of Major Abdominal Surgery After Septic Abortion—An Indicator of Complications Due to Illegal Abortion, 68 S. African Med. J. 799 (1985) 13

Robinson & Stewart, Postpartum Psychiatric Disorders, 134 Can. Med. Ass'n J. 31 (1986) 21

Rochat, Koonin, Atrash & Jewett, Maternal Mortality in the United States: Report from the Maternal Mortality Collaborative, 72 Obstet. Gynec. 91 (1988) 9, 10

Rogers, Complications at Cesarean Section, 15 Obstet. Gynec. Clin. N.A. 673 (1988) 16

Rovinsky & Guttmacher's Medical, Surgical, & Gynecologic Complications of Pregnancy (S. Cherry, R. Berkowitz & N. Kase 3d ed. 1985) .. 8, 12, 18

Sabbagha, Tamura & Socol, The Use of Ultrasound in Obstetrics, 25 Clin. Obstet. Gynec. 735 (1982) 43

T. Sadler, Langman's Medical Embryology (5th ed. 1985) 7

S. Schwartz, G. Shires, F. Spencer & E. Storer, Principles of Surgery (4th ed. 1984) 8

Sell, Outcome of Very Very Low Birth Weight Infants, 13 Clin. Perinat. 451 (1986) 6

Smith, Frey & Johnson, Assessing Gestational Age, 33 Am. Fam. Physician 215 (1986) 43

Stork, Extracorporeal Membrane Oxygenation in the Newborn and Beyond, 15 Clin. Perinat. 815 (1988) 8

Stubblefield, Surgical Techniques of Uterine Evacuation in First- and Second-Trimester Abortions, 13 Clin. Obstet. Gynec. 53 (1986) 11, 12, 19

Stubblefield, Monson, Schoenbaum, Wolfson, Cookson & Ryan, Fertility after Induced Abortion: A Prospective Follow-Up Study, 63 Obstet. Gynec. 186 (1984) 20

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES—Continued

	Page
U.S. Dep't of Health and Human Services, 2A Vital Statistics of the United States 1981	9
Verloove-Vanhorick, Verwey, Brand, Gravenhorst, Kierse & Ruys, Neonatal Mortality Risk in Relation to Gestational Age and Birthweight, [1986] 1 Lancet 55	42
J. West, Respiratory Physiology—the Essentials (3d ed. 1985)	7
Whittle, Lung Maturation, 11 Clin. Obstet. Gynec. 353 (1984)	7
8 J. Wigmore, Evidence § 2380a (McNaughton ed. 1961)	32
Williams Obstetrics (L. Hellman & J. Pritchard 14th ed. 1971)	7
Williams Obstetrics (J. Pritchard, P. MacDonald & N. Gant 17th ed. 1985)	passim
Williams & Bitran, Cancer & Pregnancy, 12 Clin. Perinat. 609 (1985)	17, 18
Yu, The Extremely Low Birthweight Infant: Ethical Issues in Treatment, 23 Aust. Paediat. J. 97 (1987)	5, 6
Zuckerman & Beardslee, Maternal Depression: A Concern for Pediatricians, 79 Pediat. 110 (1987)	21, 22

INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE

Amici curiae are eight major organizations of health care professionals. Amici share an abiding dedication to promoting the public welfare through the maintenance of the highest professional standards and the provision of quality health care. Amici's interest is not in debating the philosophical, ethical, moral or religious issues surrounding abortion. Indeed, their members hold widely divergent views on the various issues raised in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973). Amici recognize that reasonable people differ about how to balance the woman's privacy right against the state's interest in maternal and fetal health, and in particular about whether the state has a compelling interest in fetal health before viability. Given the diversity of views of amici's members, this brief neither endorses nor opposes the Court's holding in Roe that the state's compelling interest begins at viability. However, our members all agree that every individual has a fundamental right to make an individual medical treatment decision free of state interference unless the state has a compelling justification for the restrictions it imposes.

Amicus American Medical Association ("AMA") is a private, voluntary, nonprofit organization of physicians. The AMA was founded in 1846 to promote the science and art of medicine and the improvement of public health. Today, its membership exceeds 280,000 physicians and medical students.

Amicus American Academy of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry ("AACAP") is a national professional organization of over 4,200 child and adolescent psychiatrists, who engage in research, prevention, diagnosis and treatment of developmental and psychiatric disorders in children, adolescents and families.

Amicus American Academy of Pediatrics ("AAP") is a nonprofit association of approximately 30,000 physicians certified in the specialized care of infants, children and adolescents. The AAP's principal purpose is to ensure the attainment by all children of their full potential for physical, emotion and social health.

Amicus American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists ("ACOG") is a private, voluntary, nonprofit organization of physicians who specialize in obstetric and gynecologic care. ACOG is the leading group of professionals providing health care to women; its 28,000 members represent approximately ninety percent of all obstetricians and gynecologists practicing in the United States.

Amicus American Fertility Society ("AFS") is a voluntary, nonprofit organization of 11,000 physicians and scientists—the vast majority of whom are obstetrician-gynecologists—dedicated to advancing knowledge about and treating the disorders of the reproductive system.

Amicus American Medical Women's Association, Inc. ("AMWA") is a nonprofit organization of 12,000 women physicians and medical students, one of whose primary missions is to promote quality health care for women. AMWA strongly opposes laws which adversely affect the health of women, or impose constraints on the right of the pregnant patient, in consultation with her physician, to make a personal and medically informed decision whether or not to continue a pregnancy.

Amicus American Psychiatric Association ("APA") is the nation's largest professional association specializing in psychiatry, with a membership exceeding 30,000 physicians. APA's purposes include promoting the welfare of patients who require psychiatric services.

Amicus American Society of Human Genetics ("ASHG") is a scientific association whose members include more than 3,800 physicians, scientists, genetic counselors and allied health specialists who are involved in research and the delivery of genetic services to families with, or at risk for, a broad array of genetic disorders.

The provisions in the Missouri statute, which require physicians to undertake specific medical examinations and tests concerning the development of the fetus and which prohibit a physician from counseling a woman concerning abortion as a treatment option, interfere with the woman's right to seek and obtain medical care and prevent her physician and other health care providers from exercising their best medical judgment in providing quality medical care. The outcome of this case will directly affect the professional services amici's members provide and the health of the patients whom they serve. Accordingly, amici wish to present their views concerning the important issues raised in this appeal.[1]

MEDICAL BACKGROUND

Amici firmly believe that any attempt by the Court to evaluate the individual's legal rights in the abortion context should be undertaken only after the Court has a relatively full appreciation of the medical facts surrounding pregnancy and the abortion procedure. Accordingly, amici, who have unique expertise in this area, offer in this section of the brief an extended discussion of the medical background of pregnancy and abortion to provide a context within which to present our analysis of the fundamental legal issues presented in this case.

This discussion of the medical background, which includes the relative health effects of abortion and childbirth, is not provided to suggest that this Court's ultimate constitutional analysis can or should turn solely on the relative health risks, but instead to demonstrate clearly that both abortion and childbirth are significant medical procedures which carry what are sometimes significant health risks.

I. General Background on Abortion

Although commonly understood to encompass all terminations of pregnancy, abortion is technically defined as the termination of a pregnancy in any way before the fetus has reached the stage of viability. Williams Ob-

---

[1] Pursuant to Rule 36 of the Rules of this Court, the parties have consented to the filing of this brief. The parties' letters of consent have been filed with the Clerk of the Court.

stetrics 467 (J. Pritchard, P. MacDonald & N. Gant 17th ed. 1985); D. Danforth & J. Scott, Obstetrics & Gynecology 231 (5th ed. 1986). Viability refers to the point at which the fetus would have a reasonable potential for survival if it were removed from the pregnant woman's uterus. Williams Obstetrics at 467. See infra at 5-8.[2]

An abortion may be spontaneous (unintentional) or induced (intentional). Since this Court's decision in Roe v. Wade, the number of lawful, induced abortions has doubled from roughly 750,000 to nearly 1.6 million a year. Henshaw, Forrest & Van Vort, Abortion Services in the United States 1984 and 1985, 19 Fam. Plann. Persp. 63, 64 (1987). Almost all of the increase occurred by 1980. Id.; Obstetrics & Gynecology at 256. By way of comparison, the annual number of live births has increased from about 3.1 million to 3.8 million since 1973. National Center for Health Statistics, 37 Monthly Vital Health Statistics Report 15 (Supp. No. 3, July 12, 1988). Abortion services are concentrated in metropolitan areas; 79% of women in rural America live in counties which have no abortion services, and, in 1985, only two percent of abortions were performed in rural communities. Henshaw, Forrest & Van Vort at 64-65.

Induced abortions are primarily performed on young women, unmarried women, white women, and women who are having their first abortion. Henshaw & Silverman, The Characteristics and Prior Contraceptive Use of U.S. Abortion Patients, 20 Fam. Plann. Persp. 158, 159 (1988). Among women age 15-44, more than 21% have had an abortion; if current abortion rates continue, 46% of all American women will have had an abortion by the time they are 45. Forrest, Unintended Pregnancy Among American Women, 19 Fam. Plann. Persp. 76, 76-77 (1987).

[2] If the termination of a pregnancy occurs after the fetus has become viable but before the 38th week of gestation, then the termination is referred to as the preterm delivery of a premature infant. Williams Obstetrics at 467. (Gestational age is measured from the first day of a pregnant woman's last menstrual period, rather than from the more uncertain date of fertilization, which is approximately two weeks later, or of implantation of the fertilized egg in the woman's uterus, which is nearly three weeks later. Id. at 139.) If the premature infant of a preterm delivery shows no signs of life at birth, it is classified as stillbirth. Obstetrics & Gynecology at 289. Thus, while third-trimester terminations of a pregnancy are commonly characterized as abortions, they technically are not. Nevertheless, for convenience, we will characterize all terminations of pregnancy as abortions.

Ninety percent of abortions are performed during the first trimester of pregnancy. Henshaw, Characteristics of U.S. Women Having Abortions, 1982-1983, 19 Fam. Plann. Persp. 5, 6 (1987). Only 1% of abortions are performed after 20 weeks of gestation, and approximately 100 abortions a year, or 0.01% of all abortions, occur during the third trimester of pregnancy. Id. at 6.

II. Fetal Viability

This Court has observed that "[v]iability is usually placed at about seven months (28 weeks) but may occur earlier, even at 24 weeks." Roe, 410 U.S. at 160. Since then, improvements in health care have resulted in greater survival of infants born at a gestational age of 24-28 weeks, which corresponds to a birthweight of approximately 500-1,000 grams, although survival is not common with birthweights between 500 and 600 grams. The earliest point at which a fetus can survive is 23-24 weeks.

The improvements in prognosis for infants weighing between 500 and 1,000 grams have been striking. (These infants are commonly characterized as extremely low birthweight infants or ELBW infants. Yu, The Extremely Low Birthweight Infant: Ethical Issues in Treatment, 23 Aust. Paediat. J. 97, 97 (1987).) In the 1950's approximately 2% of ELBW infants survived delivery, and almost all were seriously handicapped. Poland & Russell, The Limits of Viability: Ethical Considerations, 11 Sem. Perinat. 257, 257 (1987). By 1960, ELBW infant survival had increased to about 10% and, by 1970, to about 20%. Poland at 257. Recent studies on the ELBW infant indicate that as many as 40-50% will survive. Yu at 98; Amon, Sibai, Anderson & Mabie, Obstetric Variables Predicting Survival of the Immature Newborn (≤1,000 gm): A Five-Year Experience at a Single Perinatal Center, 156 Am. J. Obstet. Gynec. 1380, 1382 (1987).[3]

As fetal weight rises from 500 to 1,000 grams (or gestational age increases from 24 to 28 weeks), survival gradually improves from about 10% to as much as 80%. At 26 weeks, or 750 grams, approximately half the infants survive. The New York State Task Force on Life and the Law, Fetal Extrauterine Survivability 9-10 (1988); Nwaesei, Young, Byrne, et al., Preterm Birth at 23 to 26 Weeks Gestation: Is Active Obstetric Management Justified?, 157 Am. J. Obstet. Gynec. 890, 893 (1987); Yu at 98. In short, if viability is defined as the point at which 50% of fetuses will survive, then it has moved from 28 weeks to 26 weeks since 1973. If viability is defined as the point at which a fetus has any prospect of extrauterine survival, then it has moved from 24 weeks to 23-24 weeks.

The ELBW infants who survive today are also suffering fewer handicaps than those born 15 years ago. While a majority of these infants were seriously handicapped at one time, Poland at 257, approximately 70% of surviving ELBW infants now go on to be free from major handicaps like blindness, deafness, cerebral palsy and mental retardation. Id. Approximately two-thirds of the survivors have significant educational problems. Sell, Outcome of Very Very Low Birth Weight Infants, 13 Clin. Perinat. 451, 457-58 (1986).

---

[3] See also Johnson, Cox & McKim, Outcome of Infants of Very Low Birth Weight: A Geographically Based Study, 136 Can. Med. Ass'n J. 1157, 1159 (1987); Gerdes, Abbasi, Bhutani & Bowen, Improved Survival and Short-Term Outcome of Inborn "Micropremies," 25 Clin. Pediat. 391, 392 (1986); Hack & Fanaroff, Changes in the Delivery Room Care of the Extremely Small Infant (<750g), 314 New Eng. J. Med. 660, 663 (1986).

While even more of the 500-1,000 gram (24-28 week) infants are expected to survive in the near future, there is an "anatomic threshold" for fetal survival of about 23-24 weeks of gestation (500 grams). This is because the fetal lung does not mature sufficiently to permit normal or even mechanically-assisted respiration (i.e., breathing assisted by a ventilator) before week 23-24 of gestation. New York State Task Force, at 7.

In order for enough oxygen to be able to enter the bloodstream, there must be an extensive network of interfaces between the air spaces in the lung and the blood vessels of the lung. Effective oxygenation also requires that there be a very thin barrier of tissue separating the red blood cells from the air spaces. J. West, Respiratory Physiology—the Essentials 1-2, 21-22 (3d ed. 1985).

Until weeks 23-24 of gestation, however, the network of air spaces and blood vessels is not extensive enough nor is the tissue barrier thin enough for effective oxygenation of the blood. New York State Task Force at 6-7; T. Sadler, Langman's Medical Embryology 218-29 (5th ed. 1985); Whittle, Lung Maturation, 11 Clin. Obstet. Gynec. 353, 354 (1984).[4] Thus, while substantial strides have occurred in saving infants born between 24 and 28 weeks, the earliest point at which an infant can survive has changed little. Compare Williams Obstetrics, at 748-49, with Williams Obstetrics 493 (L. Hellman & J. Pritchard 14th ed. 1971).[5]

---

[4] The anatomic threshold for development of the network of interfacing blood vessels and air spaces explains why ventilators or injection of pulmonary surfactant have not lowered the threshold of viability below 23-24 weeks. These measures can only help a sufficiently developed lung work to its full potential.

[5] There is an analogous biologic limit at the end of life. While the maximum lifespan has not changed during the course of recorded history and remains at about 100 years, an increasingly higher percentage of people survive to the maximum lifespan. J. Brocklehurst, Textbook of Geriatric Medicine and Gerontology 4 (3d ed. 1985).

The anatomic threshold in lung development could be overcome in theory by "extracorporeal membrane oxygenation" (ECMO), which involves diversion of the bloodstream into a machine that takes the place of the lung. The machine removes the blood, oxygeneates it and then returns it to the body for circulation. ECMO is commonly used in heart surgery to bypass the heart and lung while the surgeons are operating on the heart. S. Schwartz, G. Shires, F. Spencer & E. Storer, Principles of Surgery 811-14 (4th ed. 1984).

There are significant limits, however, to the use of ECMO. Its use results in bleeding tendencies, damage to the blood cells and deterioration of lung and kidney function. Id. at 813-14. Because of the risk with premature infants of bleeding into the brain, it is contraindicated in infants whose gestational age is less than 35 weeks or whose birthweight is less than 2,000 grams. Stork, Extracorporeal Membrane Oxygenation in the Newborn and Beyond, 15 Clin. Perinat. 815, 821 (1988). Improvements in ECMO may someday permit its use in premature infants. However, such improvements are not expected in the foreseeable future. New York State Task Force at 8; see generally, Hack & Fanaroff, How Small is Too Small? Considerations in Evaluating the Outcome of the Tiny Infant, 15 Clin. Perinat. 773, 782 (1988).[6]

III. The Health Effects of Childbirth and Abortion

Many women experience medical complications during childbirth (i.e., a term pregnancy, labor and delivery), and, in rare instances, death results.[7] Abortion also can

[6] It has taken over 50 years from the time laboratory investigation of extracorporeal circulation began to reach the current limits. Principles of Surgery at 811.

[7] There are certain health benefits to childbearing. For example, women who do not bear children are at greater risk of breast cancer, uterine cancer, colon cancer and ovarian cancer. Rovinsky & Guttmacher's Medical, Surgical, and Gynecologic Complications of Pregnancy 502-04 (S. Cherry, R. Berkowitz & N. Kase 3d ed. 1985).

have adverse health effects, including death, but the severity and frequency of harm is significantly less than in childbirth.

In 1973, this Court observed that maternal mortality from abortion was lower than maternal mortality from childbirth until the second trimester of pregnancy. Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. at 149, 163. Since that time, advances in medical knowledge and surgical technque have made both childbirth and abortion safer. In addition, abortion has remained safer than childbirth.[8] LeBolt, Grimes & Cates, Mortality from Abortion and Childbirth: Are the Populations Comparable?, 248 J.A.M.A. 188, 190 (1982). By 1981, for example, the risk of a woman dying from an abortion had dropped to 0.5 per 100,000 procedures from 4.1 per 100,000 in 1972. Id. at 191; Binkin, Trends in Induced Legal Abortion Morbidity and Mortality, 13 Clin. Obstet. Gynec. 83, 85 (1986).[9] The risk of death from childbirth declined less sharply, to 8.5 per 100,000 live births in 1981 from 18.8 per 100,000 in 1972. U.S. Dep't of Health and Human Services, 2A Vital Statistics of the United States 1981 64.[10]

The reported mortality figures may understate the relative safety of abortion compared to childbirth. According to a number of studies, mortality statistics published by the federal government underestimate the number of maternal deaths from childbirth by as much as 37%-50%. Cates, Smith, Rochat & Grimes, Mortality from Abortion and Childbirth: Are the Statistics Biased?, 248 J.A.M.A. 192, 194 (1982); Rochat, Koonin, Atrash & Jewett, Maternal Mortality in the United States: Report from the Maternal Mortality Collaborative, 72 Obstet. Gynec. 91, 92 (1988).[11] The data on abortion mortality, on the other hand, are highly accurate. This is because efforts to detect maternal mortality from abortion have been very thorough. Cates, Smith Rochat & Grimes at 193-94.

[8] Induced abortion is one of the most commonly performed and safest surgical procedures in the United States, with half the risk of death involved in a tonsillectomy and one one-hundredth the risk of death involved with an appendectomy. W. Hern, Abortion Practice 23-24 (1984).

[9] The most common causes of death from abortion are uncontrolled bleeding (hemorrhage), complications of anesthesia, infection and pulmonary embolism. Binkin at 90.

[10] The most common causes of maternal death from childbirth are pulmonary embolism, pregnancy-induced hypertension, ectopic pregnancy, uncontrolled bleeding (hemorrhage) and cerebrovascular accidents (stroke). Rochat, Koonin, Atrash & Jewett, Maternal Mortality in the United States: Report from the Maternal Mortality Collaborative, 72 Obstet. Gynec. 91, 93 (1988).

The risk of other medical complications is also higher in childbirth than in abortion. While 63% of women suffer some adverse health effect during pregnancy, Placek & Taffel, Recent Patterns in Cesarean Delivery in the United States, 15 Obstet. Gynec. Clin. N.A. 607, 612, 615 (1988), approximately 12% of abortions result in some medical complication. J. Hodgson, Abortion and Sterilization: Medical and Social Aspects 159 (1981). Moreover, the risk of major surgery is higher in childbirth. While nearly 25% of women deliver by cesarean section, Placek & Taffel at 607, fewer than one percent of abortions result in the need for intra-abdominal operations. Cates, Legal Abortion: The Public Health Record, 215 Sci. 1586, 1587 (1982).

The difference in maternal mortality and morbidity between abortion and childbirth is significantly affected by the gestational age of the fetus. When the fetus is eight or fewer weeks old, abortion is more than 20 times safer than childbirth. LeBolt at 191. The difference in maternal complications narrows thereafter with abortion remaining safer until at least 16 weeks of gestation.[12] LeBolt at 191.

---

[11] The underreporting stems chiefly from the fact that official statistics are based solely on information from death certificates, which frequently provide inadequate information regarding the cause of death. Cates, Smith, Rochat & Grimes at 193.

[12] By 1981, the maternal mortality rate for abortions between 16 and 20 weeks dropped to 7.8 deaths per 100,000 abortions. Binkin at 87. Also in 1981, the official maternal mortality rate in childbirth was 8.5 per 100,000 live births. Obstetrics & Gynecology at 288.

Abortions have become increasingly safer for three reasons. First, like any other surgical procedure, abortions have fewer complications as physicians gain experience performing them. Binkin at 90 (1986); Grimes & Schulz, Morbidity and Mortality from Second-Trimester Abortions, 30 J. Reprod. Med. 505, 506 (1985). Second, a higher percentage of abortions are performed on women whose characteristics place them at a relatively low risk of complications. For example, the risks are lowest when abortions are performed before week eight of gestation, and the fraction of abortions occurring in that time period has increased from about one-third to one-half. Binkin at 88. Finally, the risks to maternal health from abortion have decreased because of a shift to safer techniques for performing abortions. Id.

There have been two important advances in technique. First, during the first trimester, suction curettage (vacuum aspiration), the safest method of abortion, has replaced mechanical curettage as the dilation and evacuation method of choice;[13] almost all first trimester abortions are performed by suction. Stubblefield, Surgical Techniques of Uterine Evacuation in First- and Second-Trimester Abortions, 13 Clin. Obstet. Gynec. 53, 53 (1986); E. Quilligan & F. Zuspan, Douglas-Stromme Operative Obstetrics 182 (4th ed. 1982). Use of vacuum aspiration results in an abortion that requires less time, results in less damage to the uterus and causes minimal blood loss. Id.

The second important improvement in technique has been the greater use of dilation and evacuation to perform second trimester abortions. Previously, physicians believed that dilation and evacuation could be performed only through the 12th week of gestation. Stubblefield at 63; Rovinsky & Guttmacher at 688-89. In addition, alternative techniques were not considered safe enough for widespread use before the 16th week of gestation. As a consequence, a woman who decided to have an abortion during weeks 13-15 had to wait until week 16, when an abortion was more dangerous. Binkin at 88.

---

[13] Dilation and evacuation methods involve two steps: (a) widening of the cervix until it is large enough to permit insertion of instruments into the uterus for removal of the fetal tissue (dilation) and (b) removal of the fetal tissue (evacuation).

It is now clear that dilation and evacuation can be used safely through week 20 of gestation, and, since 1980, has been the most commonly used method for mid-trimester abortions, accounting for two-thirds of such abortions. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, Methods of Midtrimester Abortion 1 (Technical Bulletin 109, Oct. 1987). Dilation and evacuation is safer than other mid-trimester abortion techniques until week 16 when it becomes as risky as some of the alternatives, but is still preferred for weeks 16-20 because it is simpler, cheaper and less traumatic for patients. Stubblefield at 66; Rovinsky & Guttmacher at 690.

Improvements in the safety of abortion have also occurred because lawful abortions are much safer than unlawful ones. Between 1940 and 1972, more than 75% of abortion deaths were the consequence of unlawful abortions and, in 1972, women having unlawful abortions were eight times more likely to die than women having lawful abortions. Cates & Rochat, Illegal Abortions in the United States: 1972-74, 8 Fam. Plann. Persp. 86, 91-92 (1976). After Roe, abortion deaths dropped sharply. Between 1972 and 1974, for example, the total number of abortion deaths declined from 88 to 48, and deaths from unlawful abortions declined from 39 to 5. Cates & Rochat at 87. In other words, 85% of the decrease in abortion deaths between 1972 and 1974 reflected reductions in mortality from unlawful abortions. Id.[14]

[14] In nearly 70% of the deaths from unlawful abortions in 1972-74, the woman belonged to a minority racial group. Cates & Rochat at 91.

Non-fatal complications of abortion also have declined following legalization. For example, hospital admissions for septic abortion in California dropped by 68-75% following liberalization of the state's abortion laws in 1967. Bracken, Freeman & Hellenbrand, Hospitalization for Medical-Legal and Other Abortions in the United States 1970-1977, 72 Am. J. Pub. Health 30, 30 (1982). Moreover, in countries in which abortion is still illegal, the likelihood of major complications is much higher than in the United States. In South Africa, for example, the incidence of complications requiring hysterectomy is 50-100 times greater. Richards, Lachman, Pitsoe & Moodley, The Incidence of Major Abdominal Surgery After Septic Abortion—An Indicator of Complications Due to Illegal Abortion, 68 S. African Med. J. 799, 800 (1985).

In sum, what the Court found in 1973 is even more true today: the medical risks to a woman of childbirth are greater than the risks of abortion. In the next section, we discuss some of the individual risks of childbirth and abortion.

IV. Individual Physical and Psychiatric Effects of Pregnancy and Abortion

A. Individual Physical Effects from Pregnancy

Pregnant women may experience a wide range of adverse health effects. As many as 90% of pregnant women develop gastrointestinal symptoms, including nausea and vomiting. Obstetrics & Gynecology at 334-35. Other common problems include fatigue, varicose veins, hemorrhoids, headache and backache. Williams Obstetrics at 260-63.

Many pregnant women confront potentially more serious health problems. Hypertension,[15] for example, complicates about 8%-10% of pregnancies. C. Pauerstein, Clinical Obstetrics 645 (1987). In the majority of cases, [15] Pregnancy may induce hypertension as well as aggravate pre-existing hypertension.

the hypertension can be controlled, and no permanent consequences result. Clinical Obstetrics at 645, 655-56; R. Creasy & R. Resnik, Maternal-Fetal Medicine 801 (2d ed. 1989). However, hypertensive pregnant women are at higher risk for cerebrovascular accidents (strokes), abruptio placentae (premature separation of the placenta from the uterus), and disseminated intravascular coagulation (a severe bleeding disorder). Clinical Obstetrics at 656.

About 0.1% of deliveries are complicated by eclampsia, a severe form of pregnancy-induced hypertension. Williams Obstetrics at 539. Eclampsia is characterized by headaches, visual disturbances, abdominal pain and seizures, id. at 544, and it has a maternal mortality rate that ranges from less than 1% to 17%, Clinical Obstetrics at 647, depending upon the adequacy of prenatal care and the access to health care facilities. Because of the seriousness of eclampsia, the standard approach for pregnant women with any degree of hypertension is to induce labor as soon as the fetus is mature and the woman's cervix is favorable for induction. Obstetrics & Gynecology at 458; Williams Obstetrics at 542.

The pregnant woman also bears a risk of hemorrhage during pregnancy, labor and delivery, and the puerperium (the immediate post-delivery period).[16] During the third-trimester, for example, bleeding occurs in 2%-3% of pregnancies, most commonly from the placenta. Obstetrics & Gynecology at 433. Third-trimester bleeding is of particular concern because of its potentially fatal outcome for both the mother and fetus. Id. Indeed, the standard response to any third-trimester bleeding is immediate hospitalization to determine the cause of the bleeding so that appropriate treatment can be instituted.[17]

[16] The most common period during which serious blood loss in obstetrics occurs is after delivery, and the main causes are uterine atony (failure of the uterus to contract and close off the woman's blood vessels that previously entered the placenta), lacerations of the birth canal from delivery or retention of placental tissue in the uterus. Obstetrics & Gynecology at 764-65; Williams Obstetrics at 707-15.

If third-trimester bleeding is caused by placenta previa (obstruction of the birth canal by the placenta) or by abruptio placentae, cesarean section may be required to prevent uncontrolled hemorrhage. Id. at 437-42. Potential complications of uncontrolled hemorrhage include kidney failure, stroke, loss of pituitary gland function and death. Id. at 438, 441-42. There are also potentially serious complications of the treatments for third-trimester hemorrhage. These include hepatitis or other diseases from blood transfusions, severe infections, and, if a hysterectomy is required, infertility. Id. at 438.

Pregnancy-induced diabetes occurs in approximately 1-3% of pregnancies. G. Burrow & T. Ferris, Medical Complications During Pregnancy 41 (3d ed. 1988). In addition, there are approximately 1.5 million women of childbearing age who are already known to have diabetes. Maternal-Fetal Medicine at 925. Diabetes has a number of adverse effects on the pregnant woman: there is a fourfold increase in the likelihood of hypertensive disease; infection occurs more often and with greater severity; injury to the birth canal during vaginal delivery is more common; cesarean sections are required more frequently; and hemorrhage after delivery (postpartum hemorrhage) is more likely. Williams Obstetrics at 600.

Three rare but life-threatening complications of childbirth are amniotic fluid embolism, pulmonary embolism and disseminated intravascular coagulation. Amniotic fluid embolism occurs in less than 0.1% of deliveries, but, because it is fatal in over 80% of cases, is responsible for up to 10% of maternal deaths in childbirth. Clinical Obstetrics at 779. In amniotic fluid embolism, amniotic fluid or other fetal tissue enters the woman's circulation where it obstructs the blood vessels in the mother's lung and/or precipitates disseminated in-travascular coagulation. Clinical Obstetrics at 779. Pulmonary embolus is a leading cause of maternal deaths after childbirth, although it occurs in less than 0.1% of deliveries. Clinical Obstetrics at 781. It is caused by obstruction of the lung's blood vessels from blood clots that originate in the veins of the legs. Disseminated intravascular coagulation, a severe bleeding disorder that results from a breakdown in the blood's system of coagulation, is seen in women with hypertensive disease of pregnancy, severe infections or abruptio placentae, as well as amniotic fluid embolism. Obstetrics & Gynecology at 540-41.

[17] Since attempts to determine the source of the bleeding may precipitate massive hemorrhage, investigation must take place where full medical and surgical treatments are available.

The nearly 25% of women who deliver by cesarean section are exposed to significantly higher risks of death and other, less severe side effects when compared with women who deliver vaginally. Maternal-Fetal Medicine at 530. Complications are very common. In 25%-50% of cesarean sections, the woman suffers some compromise of her health, including infection, hemorrhage, laceration of her reproductive, urinary or intestinal tract, and pulmonary embolism.[18] Miller, Maternal and Neonatal Morbidity and Mortality in Cesarean Section, 15 Obstet. Gynec. Clin. N.A. 629, 630 (1988); Rogers, Complications at Cesarean Section, 15 Obstet. Gynec. Clin. N.A. 673, 676, 679-80 (1988); Obstetrics & Gynecology at 738. The risk of maternal death is two to four times greater with cesarean section than with vaginal delivery. Clinical Obstetrics at 877.

In addition to causing new disease and complications, pregnancy may aggravate preexisting illnesses. A number of the conditions that increase the risk of pregnancy to the mother's health will make abortion strongly advisable. For example, for a woman who suffers from a congenital heart disease that causes severe malformations of the heart, the additional stress on her heart from pregnancy could pose as much as a 50 percent possibility of causing her death. Obstetrics & Gynecology at 494-97; Abortion, Medicine & the Law 251 (J. Butler & D. Walbert 3d ed. 1986). Pregnancy also jeopardizes the life of a woman with advanced coronary artery disease or severe impairment of a heart valve, Clinical Obstetrics at 630, and all pregnant women with heart disease have a higher risk of congestive heart failure, cardiac infections and arrhythmias (abnormal heart rhythms). Obstetrics & Gynecology at 492-97; Maternal-Fetal Medicine at 749-58.

[18] Other rare, but potentially fatal complications, may result from anesthesia. Rogers at 682-83. During general anesthesia, the woman's stomach contents may be aspirated into her lung where their acidity makes them extremely toxic, with death occurring in more than 50% of the cases. Clinical Obstetrics at 777; Hood, Anesthesia for Cesarean Section: Minimizing Risk and Complications, 15 Obset. Gynec. Clin. N.A. 639, 640-41 (1988). Spinal anesthesia can cause excessive paralysis of the nerves, leading to a profound decrease in blood pressure, loss of respiratory function and even cardiac arrest. Hood at 644.

Pregnancy also threatens the woman's life or is likely seriously to impair her health when she suffers from chronic renal failure, myasthenia gravis[19] or pulmonary embolism in a previous pregnancy.[20] Abortion, Medicine & the Law at 252-54. Cancer is the second leading cause of death among women in their reproductive years, and can threaten the fetus as well as the woman. Williams & Bitran, Cancer and Pregnancy, 12 Clin. Perinat. 609 (1985). If treatment of the disease requires radiation or chemotherapy, a choice must be made between the life of the patient and the fetus, since these forms of therapy are likely to result in fetal malformation or death.[21]

[19] 40% of women with myasthenia gravis (a degenerative nerve disease similar to polio) suffer an exacerbation during pregnancy and 3.4% die. Abortion, Medicine & the Law at 253.

[20] There is a high risk of a recurrence in subsequent pregnancies. Id.

[21] Abortions are sometimes performed because diagnostic testing has revealed severe fetal abnormalities, e.g., the fetus may suffer from a devastating genetic or other congenital defect such as anencephaly or Tay-Sachs disease. Or, the woman may have ingested substances that are harmful to the fetus. Abortion, Medicine & the Law at 254-55. A third fetal indication for abortion arises when the woman has developed certain viral infections, such as AIDS, during pregnancy. Finally, if the woman is exposed during Rovinsky & Guttmacher at 512-15. Furthermore, diagnosis and treatment of cancer in pregnant women is often delayed because the symptoms of pregnancy can mask the symptoms of cancer. Id. at 507, 508 and 512. Diagnosis of breast cancer, for example, is typically delayed by two to seven months in pregnant women. Williams & Bitran at 612. Other conditions exacerbated by pregnancy include asthma,[22] arthritis,[23] inflammatory bowel disease[24] and epilepsy.[25]

B. Individual Physical Effects from Abortion

As indicated previously, abortion can also involve adverse health effects. They are less frequent and generally less severe than those of childbirth. This difference reflects the fact that the stress from abortion is smaller in magnitude and has a shorter duration than the stress from childbirth. Nevertheless, a wide range of adverse health effects can result from abortion.

Many women suffer discomfort from the procedure, including pain, headache and nausea. Approximately 12% of women suffer more serious complications, and early pregnancy to radiation in doses as high as those used to treat cancer, the fetus usually will be malformed, if not spontaneously aborted. Id. at 256.

---

[22] Asthmatics have increased risks of complications during pregnancy such as toxemia or hemorrhage. Greenberger, Asthma in Pregnancy, 12 Clin. Perinat. 571, 579 (1985). Moreover, asthma is more difficult to treat during pregnancy because certain medications may be harmful to the fetus. Greenberger at 580.

[23] The pregnant woman may experience excessive pain because, with the exception of aspirin, all of the anti-inflammatory drugs generally prescribed for arthritis present a substantial risk of harm to the fetus. Rovinsky & Guttmacher at 73.

[24] Women with Crohn's disease or ulcerative colitis have a 50% risk of aggravation of their disease. Abortion, Medicine and the Law at 252.

[25] The frequency of seizures increases in 24-45% of pregnant women with epilepsy. Noronha, Neurological Disorders During Pregnancy and the Puerperium, 12 Clin. Perinat. 695, 695-96 (1985).

about 0.4% will suffer a major complication such as perforation of the uterus or hemorrhage severe enough to require a blood transfusion. Buehler, Schulz, Grimes & Hogue, The Risk of Serious Complications from Induced Abortion: Do Personal Characteristics Make a Difference?, 153 Am. J. Obstet. Gynec. 14, 16 (1985); J. Hodgson, Abortion and Sterilization: Medical and Social Aspects 155, 159-60 (1981).

The risk of an adverse health effect depends upon a number of factors, including the gestational age of the fetus, the procedure used to perform the abortion and the woman's age and general health. Buehler at 19. Problems that may arise during or after an abortion include perforation of the uterus or laceration of the cervix by the instruments used in dilation and evacuation. Obstetrics & Gynecology at 257; Stubblefield at 58. Small perforations or lacerations will heal without any treatment, Williams Obstetrics at 481, while larger tears must be repaired with sutures (stitches). In rare cases, an uterine perforation has severe consequences. It may require a hysterectomy, and it increases the risk of a fatal infection or hemorrhage by more than 100-fold. Grimes, Schulz & Cates, Prevention of Uterine Perforation During Curettage Abortion, 251 J.A.M.A. 2108, 2108 (1984).

Infections and hemorrhage are potential complications of all abortion techniques. As in a delivery, see supra at 14, hemorrhage may result from uterine atony or retention of placental tissue in the uterus. Rayburn & LaFerla, Mid-Gestational Abortion for Medical or Genetic Indications, 13 Clin. Perinat. 71, 78 (1986). Post-abortion infections, in contrast to other pelvic infections, generally respond rapidly to antibiotics and curettage of the uterine cavity. Obstetrics & Gynecology at 218. Spread of an infection beyond the uterus is a major risk factor for the development of a severe infection. Id. at 219.

Amniotic fluid embolism, pulmonary embolism and disseminated intravascular coagulation are three rare but particularly fatal complications in abortion, as they are in childbirth, supra at 15-16. Amniotic fluid embolism, for example, accounts for more than 10% of abortion deaths. Mulder, Amniotic Fluid Embolism: An Overview and Case Report, 152 Am. J. Obstet. Gynec. 430, 430 (1985).

It is unclear whether abortion compromises the outcomes of subsequent pregnancies. Williams Obstetrics at 483. Some studies have found that later pregnancies had a greater, though still slight, risk of spontaneous abortions, preterm deliveries and low birthweight infants. Id.; Abortion, Medicine & the Law at 259. More recent studies have not found a statistically significant increase in risk for any of these three complications. Linn, Schoenbaum, Monson, Rosner, Stubblefield & Ryan, The Relationship Between Induced Abortion and Outcome of Subsequent Pregnancies, 146 Am. J. Obstet. Gynec. 136, 140 (1983); Frank, Key, Scott, Hannaford & Haran, Pregnancy Following Induced Abortion: Maternal Morbidity, Congenital Abnormalities and Neonatal Death, 94 Br. J. Obstet. Gynec. 836 (1987). Nor does there appear to be an increase in infertility following abortion. Stubblefield, Monson, Schoenbaum, Wolfson, Cookson & Ryan, Fertility After Induced Abortion: A Prospective Follow-Up Study, 63 Obstet. Gynec. 186 (1984).

C. Individual Psychiatric Effects from Pregnancy and Abortion

As others have observed, including the U.S. Surgeon General, the research on the psychiatric effects of abortion is not sufficiently rigorous to yield a complete understanding of the extent to which abortion results in psychiatric problems. Nevertheless, certain observations can be made.

First, serious psychiatric disease after either abortion or childbirth is unusual.[26] Most women respond to abortion with relief, see infra at 22. Fewer than 0.3% of pregnant women will go on to develop serious mental illness after either abortion or childbirth. Comprehensive Textbook of Psychiatry/IV 1054 (H. Kaplan & B. Sadock 4th ed. 1985); Robinson & Stewart, Postpartum Psychiatric Disorders, 134 Can. Med. Ass'n J. 31, 42 (1986); David, Rasmussen & Holst, 13 Fam. Plann. Presp. 88, 88-89 (1981); Brewer, Incidence of Post-Abortion Psychosis: A Prospective Study, [1977] 1 Br. Med. J. 476, 476-77. Similarly, the vast majority of women derive very significant emotional and psychological benefits from bearing and raising children.

[26] Serious psychiatric disease is generally defined as mental illness severe enough to require hospitalization in a psychiatric facility. It is usually referred to as post-abortion or postpartum psychosis. David, Rasmussen & Holst, Postpartum and Postabortion Psychotic Reactions, 13 Fam. Plann. Persp. 88, 88 (1981); Brewer, Incidence of Post-abortion Psychosis: A Prospective Study, [1977] 1 Br. Med. J. 476, 476.

Second, transient negative feelings that are not serious enough to constitute psychiatric disease are commonly seen following either abortion or childbirth. Somewhere between 50% and 70% of mothers experience the "postpartum blues," which begin during the first week after delivery and last anywhere from a few hours to two weeks, usually 24-48 hours. Robinson & Stewart at 32; Zuckerman & Beardslee, Maternal Depression: A Concern for Pediatricians, 79 Pediat. 110, 111 (1987). Typical symptoms include sadness, weepiness, poor concentration, anxiety and confusion. Robinson & Stewart at 32. After abortion, 15%-40% of women experience feelings of regret, guilt and sadness that are mild and which generally disappear within two weeks. Lazarus & Stern, Psychiatric Aspects of Pregnancy Termination, 13 Clin. Obstet. Gynec. 125, 125-27 (1986); Blumberg & Golbus, Psychological Sequelae of Elective Abortion, 123 West J. Med. 188, 190-92 (1975).

Third, while a significant percentage of women suffer from mild to moderate psychiatric illness after childbirth, it is not clear to what extent abortion is followed by mild to moderate psychiatric illness. In any event, it appears that postpartum illness is more common than post-abortion illness. Approximately 20% of mothers develop "postpartum depression," a depression whose symptoms are typical of depressions generally and which usually lasts for 6-8 weeks. Zuckerman at 111; Hopkins, Marcus & Campbell, Postpartum Depression: A Critical Review, 95 Psychol. Bull. 498, 503 (1984). Experts disagree on the frequency of mild to moderate post-abortion psychiatric illness, with estimates ranging from a fraction of a percent to as much as 15%. The majority of experts estimate frequency at the low end of that spectrum. Lazarus at 125-27; Ashton, The Psychosocial Outcome of Induced Abortion, 87 Br. J. Obstet. Gynec. 1115, 1121 (1980); Ewing & Rouse, Therapeutic Abortion and Prior Psychiatric History, 130 Am. Psych. 37 (1973).

To the extent that there is psychiatric illness after abortion, it appears generally to be temporary and limited to those women who have a history of psychiatric problems or who choose to abort because of risks to their health or their fetuses rather than because the fetus is unwanted. Lazarus at 125-27; Lloyd & Laurence, Sequelae and Support After Termination of Pregnancy for Fetal Malformation, 290 Br. Med. J. 907 (1985); Blumberg at 193. Moreover, the predominant response to abortion is relief, and the positive feelings increase over time as the negative feelings diminish. Adolescent Abortion: Psychological and Legal Issues 84 (G. Melton, ed. 1986); Adler, Emotional Responses of Women Following Therapeutic Abortion, 45 Am. J. Orthopsych. 446, 447 (1975).

Women who have abortions also are less likely to suffer psychiatric disability than women who are denied abortions. When compared to women who have abortions, women denied abortions have a greater likelihood of both significant psychiatric disease and serious psychiatric disease. Comprehensive Textbook at 1055.

In sum, what this discussion of the medical background of abortions, fetal viability and the physical and psychiatric implications of childbirth and abortion reveals is that the Court in Roe was correct that "the abortion decision in all its aspects is inherently, and primarily, a medical decision. . . ." 410 U.S. at 166.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

I.

Amici do not argue here that the specific balance struck in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 153 (1973), between a woman's fundamental right to make a personal medical decision and the state's interest in protecting potential life should be reaffirmed or rejected. But amici do argue that the "right of privacy" embodied in the concept of personal liberty protected by the Fourteenth Amendment is, as held in Roe, "broad enough to encompass a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy." The Court should reaffirm that specific holding for three reasons.

A. In part, the Court reached its conclusion about the privacy right because it found that the nature of the woman's interest in the choice confronting her during pregnancy was essentially the same as other inherently private, individual decisions which the Constitution protects. Compare Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965). Specifically, the Court recognized that, by denying the woman a choice, "[s]pecific and direct harm medically diagnosable even in early pregnancy may be involved." Roe, 410 U.S. at 153. The Court's reasoning on that point is just as valid today as it was in 1973.

B. The Court's privacy holding is also supported by the fact that individual medical decisionmaking is a process "deeply rooted in this Nation's history and tradition," Moore v. City of East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494, 503 (1977) (Powell, J.). The Court has held that the liberty guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment includes "the right of the individual . . . to enjoy those privileges long recognized at common law. . . ." Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 399 (1923). And no right "is more carefully guarded by the common law, than the right of every individual to the possession and control of his own person." Union Pacific Ry. v. Botsford, 141 U.S. 250, 251 (1891). Thus, the quintessentially private choice of medical treatment options is entitled to constitutional protection.

C. The holding that a patient has a fundamental right drawn from the liberty component of the Due Process Clause to make a medical treatment decision is "rooted in accepted principles." U.S. Brief at 12. This Court has recognized in applying the broad mandates of both the Fourth and the Eighth Amendments that medical treatment is entitled to substantial protection from governmental interference or neglect. See, e.g., Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. 753, 767 (1985). The logic of those cases supports the holding that a privacy right derived from the Liberty Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment shields individual medical treatment choices from interference absent a compelling state interest.

D. The compelling interest analysis triggered by an infringement by the state of the fundamental right to terminate a pregnancy contains two components which must be independently satisfied: 1) the specific means chosen must be reasonably related to a compelling interest and thus consistent with sound medical practice and 2) the specific requirements of the state must be carefully tailored to the state's purposes. City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983).

II.

A. Section 188.029 of the Missouri statute, which the court of appeals construed to require a physician in making a viability determination to perform certain tests in order to support findings concerning the gestational age, weight and lung maturity of a fetus, is medically inappropriate and not reasonably related to any legitimate goal of the state. Instead, Missouri attempts to interfere with the physician's judgment and in so doing imposes needless risk to the mother's health without any corresponding gain to the state's interest in protecting the fetus.

Accordingly, the statute is unconstitutional. See Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379 (1979).

B. Section 188.205 of the Missouri statute, which the court of appeals held literally precludes a physician from "consulting," i.e., making any comment, about having an abortion unless necessary to save the mother's life, is unconstitutional. The statute clearly interferes with a physician's ethical obligations to discuss fully and accurately all information necessary to permit the patient to make an informed treatment choice. By mandating "a state-imposed blackout on the information necessary to make a decision" (851 F.2d at 1080), Section 188.205 forces a constitutionally impermissible "straightjacket" upon the physician's efforts fully to inform his or her patient. City of Akron, 462 U.S. at 445; Planned Parenthood v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976).

ARGUMENT

I. INDIVIDUALS HAVE A FUNDAMENTAL RIGHT TO MAKE DECISIONS ABOUT THEIR MEDICAL CARE, AND STATE LAWS WHICH INTERFERE WITH THAT RIGHT CAN BE JUSTIFIED ONLY IF THEY ARE NARROWLY TAILORED TO FURTHER A COMPELLING STATE INTEREST.

Appellants and their amici curiae—particularly the United States—ask this Court to overrule a decision interpreting the Constitution: Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973). In so doing, they ask the Court to take two major steps. First, they propose altering the balance struck previously by the Court between the interests of the pregnant woman and those of the state. Second, they ask the Court to declare that no fundamental privacy right exists in this case at all. They make this second, extraordinary request because they believe that the privacy right recognized in Roe cannot properly be derived from the Constitution. See U.S. Brief at 9-24.

Given the diversity of views of amici's members, this brief does not take a position on whether the balance of interests struck in Roe should be modified. However, amici firmly believe that the Court should reject the invitation of the federal government to deny constitutional protection to the well-established right of privacy that this Court applied in Roe v. Wade.

In the first place, the holding of this Court on the privacy issue was a common sense application of settled constitutional principles to a situation where a woman must make an individual choice about a matter which the Court found would have profound implications for her health and life. Since the same profound individual implications the Court identified in 1973 still exist (see supra at 3-23), the decision should be reaffirmed. Second, the holding on the privacy issue simply reflected the historic tradition, embodied in our common law, of recognizing that all medical treatment decisions ordinarily should be made by the patient, after consultation with a physician concerning the risks and benefits of treatment. Third, the holding on the privacy issue is fully consistent with the holdings of this Court in applying other abstract constitutional principles to medical treatment situations, where the Court has always respected the dignity of the individual and his or her right to obtain desired medical care. Each of these reasons independently supports the Court's holding that the decision to terminate a pregnancy implicates a fundamental right.

A. The Individual's Fundamental Privacy And Liberty Right To Be Free Of Governmental Interference Extends To Medical Treatment Decisions.

This Court has long recognized that, as part of the "liberty" protected by the Constitution's Due Process Clauses, the Constitution guarantees to each individual certain areas or zones of privacy which remain free from unjustified government interference or intrusion. See Carey v. Population Serv. Int'l, 431 U.S. 678, 684 (1977). The Court's privacy rulings rest on the theory that the constitutional text does not, on its face, specify all rights that warrant constitutional protection from executive or legislative intervention.[27]

The essence of the liberty interest denominated as the right to privacy is the concept that an individual in certain circumstances has a right to be let alone, Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438, 478 (1928) (Brandeis, J., dissenting), and that the individual must thus have "independence in making certain kinds of important decisions." Whalen v. Roe, 429 U.S. 589, 599-600 (1977). As this Court has recognized, that right encompasses matters concerning marriage and procreation. The specter of governmental agents unnecessarily interfering with such inherently private, individual decisions is antithetical to basic concepts of individual liberty in a free society. See Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965); Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967); Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972). See also Skinner v. Oklahoma ex rel. Williamson, 316 U.S. 535, 541 (1942).[28]

---

[27] The concept of "liberty" in the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment is a "broad" one. Board of Regents v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564, 572 (1972). For this reason, it has long been recognized as protecting certain personal choices. See, e.g., Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510, 534-535 (1925); Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 399-400 (1923).

Moreover, privacy is hardly the only value that has received constitutional recognition without being expressly specified in the constitutional text. For example, this Court found a right to travel in the Constitution without requiring any explicit textual basis. Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (1969). In addition, although "federalism" is nowhere mentioned in the Constitution, the doctrine is part of the constitutional scheme. See Coyle v. Smith, 221 U.S. 559, 565 (1911); Garcia v. San Antonio Metro. Transit Auth., 469 U.S. 528 (1985).

[28] The United States seems to accept Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), as a legitimate decision on the ground that enforcement of a statute prohibiting the use of contraceptives would require wholly impermissible governmental prying into the private lives of individuals. (U.S. Brief at 12 n.9.) Having accepted Griswold, however, the government's textual theory (U.S. Brief at 23-28) for rejecting Roe v. Wade collapses, because this Court did not locate the right recognized in Griswold in a specific constitutional provision and could not, as the United States suggests, have

Moreover, and of particular significance to amici and their members, the right to privacy which is derived from the concept of liberty also encompasses the right of an individual to make decisions about his or her medical care and treatment. As our discussion of the health implications of pregnancy and abortion makes clear, the Court's assumptions about the importance of this particular medical treatment decision are as true today as they were in 1973. Women face physiological and psychological risks and burdens when they become pregnant. Under this Court's decisions, individual choices become fundamental rights because they have a powerful and perhaps irreversible impact on who we are and who we will become. See Fitzgerald v. Porter, 523 F.2d 716, 719-20 (7th Cir. 1975): "These cases do not deal with the individuals' interest in protection from unwarranted public attention, comment, or exploitation. They deal, rather, with the individual's right to make certain unusually important decisions that will affect his own, or his family's destiny." Accordingly, it seems plain that the health effects of pregnancy and abortion, by themselves, should be sufficient to support the holding in Roe that the woman's choice should be constitutionally protected.

In holding that the abortion decision involved a fundamental right, the Court correctly noted that considerations of protecting the woman's health were vital. Specifically, the Court observed that:

> The detriment that the State would impose upon the pregnant woman by denying this choice altogether is apparent. Specific and direct harm medically diagnosable even in early pregnancy may be involved.

Roe, 410 U.S. at 153. Similarly, in explaining the basis for the protections afforded first trimester abortions, the located it in the Fourth Amendment alone. See Carey v. Population Serv. Int'l, 431 U.S. 678, 687 (1977). The United States' brief therefore bears "witness that the right of privacy which passes for recognition here is a legitimate one." Griswold, 381 U.S. at 485.

---

Court identified the important health concerns implicated by the woman's choice. "[U]ntil the end of the first trimester mortality in abortion may be less than mortality in normal childbirth . . . . This means . . . that . . . the attending physician, in consultation with his patient, is free to determine, without regulation by the State, that, in his medical judgment, the patient's pregnancy should be terminated." Id. at 163. See also City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416, 429 n.11 (1983).

The full extent of the importance attached to the pregnant woman's interest in being able to preserve her life and health is perhaps most apparent, however, in the context of third trimester abortions. At this stage, the State's interest in protecting fetal life is considered compelling. Roe, 410 U.S. at 163-165. Nonetheless, this Court has recognized that protection of the pregnant woman's health interests is still considered "paramount." Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747, 769 (1986). Consequently, while Roe otherwise permitted proscription of third trimester abortions, it did not do so in instances where abortion "is necessary to preserve the life or health of the mother." Roe, 410 U.S. at 163-164.

The importance of the health considerations underlying Roe's holdings has led this Court to observe:

> In concluding that the freedom of a woman to decide whether to terminate her pregnancy falls within the personal liberty protected by the Due Process Clause, the Court in Wade emphasized the fact that the woman's decision carries with it significant personal health implications—both physical and psychological . . . . [I]t could be argued that the freedom of a woman to decide whether to terminate her pregnancy for health reasons does in fact lie at the core of the constitutional liberty identified in Wade.

Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297, 316 (1980).

To the extent that the right in this case depends upon the importance to the woman of the consequences of her choice (see supra at 3-23), the decision whether or not to have an abortion should be considered a fundamental right.

B. This Court's Recognition That Every Individual Has A Fundamental Right To Make Decisions About His Or Her Medical Treatment Is Supported By The History And Traditions Of This Nation.

The Court's treatment of the woman's choice as a protected interest under the Constitution is supported by more than a common sense application of this Court's liberty and privacy rulings to the medical facts surrounding abortions. The Court's handling of the constitutional status of a medical treatment decision by the individual is also supported independently by the traditional respect this nation has always granted to the individual's interest in making personal medical treatment decisions in consultation with a physician.

The substantive guarantees afforded by the Due Process Clause encompass the protection of interests that are "deeply rooted in this Nation's history and tradition." Moore v. City of East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494, 503 (1977) (opinion of Powell, J.). In deciding whether a particular interest is so embedded, the Court's judgment has historically been informed by whether the interest was protected at common law. The Court has stated that the liberty guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment encompasses "the right of the individual . . . to enjoy those privileges long recognized in common law as essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men." Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 399 (1923).

In this regard, it is significant that: "No right is held more sacred, [n]or is more carefully guarded, by the common law, than the right of every individual to the possession and control of his own person." Union Pacific Ry. v. Botsford, 141 U.S. 250, 251 (1891). An individual's interest in being permitted to make personal decisions affecting bodily security, free from government coercion, is thus a traditionally protected interest.[29]

The interest in protecting the physical security and health of one's body is an ancient one. Blackstone classified this interest as one of the three principal articles—later embodied in our Constitution as "life, liberty and property"—constituting the "rights of the people of England." "[T]he preservation of a man's health from such practices as may prejudice or annoy it . . . are rights to which every man is entitled . . . ." W. Blackstone, Commentaries 1:134 (1765).

Indeed, both the common and statutory law of this country have consistently recognized the importance of the individual's interest in being able freely to make decisions designed to limit risks to his or her own health. In the law of torts, this interest is reflected, for example, in the requirement of informed consent to medical treatment. The principle which supports this doctrine is that the patient has a right to weigh whatever risks attend the particular treatment and to decide if they are intolerable.

> The root premise is the concept, fundamental in American jurisprudence, that '[e]very human being of adult years and sound mind has a right to determine what shall be done with his own body. . . .'

---

[29] Our general tradition of protecting the individual against coerced medical decisions posing a threat to health is more relevant than the narrow history of abortion regulation for determining the fundamental rights issue before this Court. That history of abortion is misleading because restrictions on the practice arose during an era when the procedure was dangerous. As noted in Roe, 410 U.S. at 148-49, "when most criminal abortion laws were first enacted, the procedure was a hazardous one for women . . . [;] [a]bortion mortality was high." Even then, abortion was frequently permitted when superceding health risks were present, e.g., when necessary to preserve the life of the woman. Id. at 138-39. However, "[m]odern medical techniques have altered this situation," as this Court recognized in Roe, id. at 149, so that abortion restrictions that once served to protect the woman's health could now jeopardize her health. See supra at 8-13.

Canterbury v. Spence, 464 F.2d 772, 780 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1064 (1972) (quoting Schloendorff v. Society of New Hosp., 211 N.Y. 125, 129, 105 N.E. 92, 93 (1914) (Cardozo, J.)). Accord Natanson v. Kline, 186 Kan. 393, 410, 350 P.2d 1093, 1106, clarified, 187 Kan. 186, 354 P.2d 670 (1960); F. Harper & F. James, The Law of Torts § 17.1 (2d ed. 1986).

Similarly, in order to guard the patient's ability to take steps essential to protecting his or her health, virtually every state in this country has recognized a physician-patient privilege. "The rationale of this privilege is to promote health by encouraging a patient to fully and freely disclose all relevant information which may assist the physician in treating the patient." Huzjak v. United States, 118 F.R.D. 61, 63 (N.D. Ohio 1987). See 8 J. Wigmore, Evidence § 2380a (McNaughton ed. 1961).

These examples illustrate this country's long-standing tradition of treating potential infringements upon an individual's ability to protect his or her health and autonomy with the utmost seriousness. That tradition is, in turn, constitutionally reflected in the Due Process Clause's substantive protection of life and liberty. "[T]he right to personal security constitutes a 'historic liberty interest' protected substantively by the Due Process Clause." Youngberg v. Romeo, 457 U.S. 307, 315 (1982). Accord Ingraham v. Wright, 430 U.S. 651, 673 (1977) ("Among the historic liberties so protected was a right to be free from, and to obtain judicial relief for, unjustified intrusions on personal security"). For that reason, the right to protect one's bodily security, and to make medical decisions to that end, has always been deemed to require more than a mere minimal justification for government infringements. Under those principles, a woman's choice whether or not to terminate her pregnancy should be deemed a fundamental liberty interest protected by the Due Process Clause.

C. This Court's Recognition That Every Individual Has A Fundamental Right To Make Decisions About His Or Her Medical Treatment Is Supported By This Court's Approach To The Protection Of Health Under Specific Constitutional Provisions.

The United States criticizes (U.S. Brief at 12) the holding that a woman has a fundamental right embodied in the liberty component of the Due Process Clause to choose the medical treatment that she wishes her physician to provide as not "rooted in accepted principles." But the legal reasoning that supports the right in this context is essentially the same as the approach taken by this Court in applying other constitutional provisions, with language that is equally inexact, to issues concerning the provision of medical treatment generally. Thus, in the Fourth Amendment context, this Court has held that "our society recognizes a significantly heightened privacy interest" when government interference in medical decisions creates any increased risk to individual health. Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. 753, 767 (1985).

In Winston, the government sought to perform a surgical procedure to remove a bullet from a criminal defendant's body. Presented with conflicting evaluations of the risk of the surgery, the court of appeals concluded that "the statistical risk of actual physical harm . . . is . . . very low [and could] be considered minimal." Lee v. Winston, 717 F.2d 888, 900 (4th Cir. 1983). Nonetheless, this Court reasoned:

> The operation sought will intrude substantially on respondent's protected interests. The medical risks of the operation, although apparently not extremely severe, are a subject of considerable dispute; the very uncertainty militates against finding the operation to be "reasonable."

Winston, 470 U.S. at 766 (emphasis supplied). The Court held that, in the absence of compelling countervailing interests, the very possibility of even marginal medical risk precluded the endangering government action. Id. As a matter of constitutional interpretation, the Winston Court's derivation of a privacy interest from the Fourth Amendment's general protection against "unreasonable searches and seizures" to protect a patient's medical treatment choice cannot be distinguished from the Roe Court's derivation of a privacy interest from the liberty clause to protect a conceptually identical right to make a medical treatment choice.

Similarly, the constitutional value attached to protection of personal health is also evident in this Court's decisions under the Eighth Amendment. This Court has held that the Eighth Amendment's proscription of cruel and unusual punishments is violated by 'deliberate indifference to serious medical needs of prisoners." Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 104 (1976). Thus, even an individual whose liberty interest has been constitutionally abridged retains a privacy right to receive medical care as part of the abstract protection against cruel and unusual punishment. Again, there is no basis for arguing that the process of recognizing this fundamental right of a prisoner to receive medical care is derived from anything more concrete or more settled than the right to make an individual treatment decision which can be drawn from the Due Process Clause.

Not only is the process of analysis under these other provisions similar to what amici propose here for the Due Process Clause, but also the entire fabric of the Court's holdings regarding medical treatment decisions reflects a basic pattern in the Constitution which supports the right asserted in this case. See Memorial Hosp. v. Maricopa County, 415 U.S. 250, 259 (1974) (medical care constitutes "a basic necessity of life"). Repeated protection for a right under disparate sections of the Constitution indicates that the right is fundamental to and underlies the design of the Constitution itself. That is the case here.

The consistent close scrutiny by this Court of government attempts to interfere with personal interests in health and bodily security is not inadvertent. Rather, it demonstrates that these interests warrant the "fundamental" constitutional status that they have been granted throughout this Court's decisions. In sum, the Court should reaffirm both that there is a right of privacy generally incorporated into the "liberty" component of the Due Process Clauses and that the right extends to individual medical treatment decisions, including whether or not to terminate a pregnancy.

D. State Interference With A Fundamental Right Triggers Searching Judicial Examination Pursuant To The Compelling State Interest Test.

State "interference" with or "infringement" of a fundamental right triggers a searching judicial examination pursuant to the compelling state interest test. See Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. at 155; City of Akron, 462 U.S. at 427. See also, Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (1969); Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974). A state law which infringes a fundamental right is "presumptively unconstitutional," Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297, 312 (1980) (quoting Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55, 76 (1980)). It cannot withstand judicial scrutiny unless the state has a "compelling interest" and, in the abortion context, two elements of the compelling state interest test are met: the specific means chosen must be "reasonably related" to the state's compelling goals and thus consistent with sound medical practice; and those specific requirements must be carefully tailored to the state's purposes. Failure to satisfy either of these elements is fatal to the state's effort to infringe the woman's fundamental right. City of Akron, 462 U.S. at 426-31.

In much fundamental rights adjudication, a holding of infringement will doom a law because the state has no constitutionally recognized "compelling interest" in such an infringing enactment. In the abortion context, however, this Court has clearly recognized two "compelling" goals which can justify regulation of the decision whether or not to terminate a pregnancy. Thus, the state has a compelling interest in protecting the mother's health. Roe

v. Wade, 410 U.S. at 162-163; City of Akron, 462 U.S. at 428. Similarly, the state has a compelling interest in preserving the potential life of the fetus. Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. at 162-163; City of Akron, 462 U.S. at 428.

However, the presence of a compelling purpose does not, ipso facto, ensure the constitutionality of the state's particular infringement of the fundamental right. As the Court explained in City of Akron, 462 U.S. at 434, "the existence of a compelling state interest in health, however, is only the beginning of the inquiry." Thus, a state's requirements must be "reasonably relate[d]" to the compelling goals. Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. at 163; City of Akron, 462 U.S. at 434 n.19 (quoting Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179, 194 (1973). Typically, this "reasonably related" element of the test involves an inquiry into whether the state's requirements have a reasonable medical basis. "The State's discretion to regulate . . . does not, however, permit it to adopt abortion regulations that depart from accepted medical practice." City of Akron, 462 U.S. at 431. See Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft, 462 U.S. 476, 487 (1983) (Powell, J.); Planned Parenthood v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52, 78-79 (1976).

Second, state laws that interfere with or burden the right must be carefully tailored to the state's objective. See Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. at 165; Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft, 462 U.S. at 485 n.8; City of Akron, 462 U.S. at 438. The law must, in other words, not be overbroad and must, therefore, advance the compelling state interest without any additional and unnecessary interference with the fundamental right. City of Akron, 462 U.S. at 438-439.

Application of the compelling state interest test and its elements, and the striking of any balance between fundamental rights and compelling state interests, ultimately turns, of course, on the nature of the fundamental rights that are involved. The United States, however, proposes that in determining the permissible scope of state interference with the abortion decision, under either a "compelling interest" or "undue burden" analysis, this Court should only take account of the effects of such interference on the woman's "interest in procreational choice." U.S. Brief at 22 n.16. This proposed approach is deeply flawed. It suggests that the Court should ignore the woman's fundamental interest in medical treatment decisions. Instead, abortions would be permitted only if the woman was "coerced" into becoming pregnant.

The United States' proposed analysis leaves no room for the woman to terminate a pregnancy to protect her own health or even to save her life. Obviously, denying her an abortion at that point is wholly irrelevant to the prior decision "whether or not to beget or bear a child," U.S. Brief at 22 (quoting Carey v. Population Serv. Int'l, 431 U.S. 678, 685 (1977)), which the government asserts should be the only "liberty interest" at stake. But, this Court already has held that the state cannot insist that there be a "trade-off" between the life of the mother and the survival of the fetus. Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747, 768 (1986), Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379, 400 (1979).[30]

It is difficult to accept that the government believes that serious threats to a woman's health or even her life are not relevant in assessing the balance between the woman's right and the state's interests. The manifest shortsightedness of the government's reasoning undermines completely its proposed approach. In our view, it would be inconsistent with any reasonable notion of a "narrowly tailored" statute to hold that, in order to protect its interest in potential life, a state may, regardless of circumstances and irrespective of the severity of the threat to the woman's life or health, flatly prohibit all women from choosing, in consultation with their physicians, to have an abortion performed.

[30] The direct one-to-one trade-off is what distinguishes this case from Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11 (1905). It is one thing to hold that the state can compel an individual to face a limited health risk in order to protect a significant number of other individuals and where even the specific individual's health is placed at significant risk if he or she is allowed to "opt out." It is fundamentally different to say that society can impose a direct and immediate burden and risk on one individual in order to benefit another.

II. SECTIONS 188.029 AND 188.205 OF THE MISSOURI STATUTE UNCONSTITUTIONALLY INFRINGE THE FUNDAMENTAL RIGHT OF PATIENTS TO MAKE MEDICAL DECISIONS IN CONSULTATION WITH THEIR PHYSICIANS.

Given the fundamental nature of the woman's right in being able to decide whether to terminate a pregnancy, there are two types of state action which trigger heightened judicial scrutiny. First, heightened scrutiny is required when state laws interfere with the woman's decisions whether to enter into a physician-patient relationship with respect to abortion and whether or not to terminate her pregnancy. This Court has recognized specific situations when the compelling interest test should be applied: when a state abortion law imposes certain additional health risks on the woman; when a state law attempts to influence the woman's informed choice between abortion or childbirth through the physician-patient relationship; or when a state law imposes costs on a woman unique to the abortion procedure and out of proportion to any health benefits.[31]

Second, heightened scrutiny is appropriate when state laws interfere with a physician's ability to enter into a physician-patient relationship, to counsel the patient and to provide medically indicated care and treatment pertaining to the patient's pregnancy termination decision. Thus, there is infringement when a state law interferes with a physician's best medical judgment or is otherwise inconsistent with the state of medical knowledge and sound medical practice, when a state law threatens the physician with sanctions which arise solely from abortion counseling and treatment, or when a state law imposes other burdens on a physician in the abortion context which could deter establishment of a physician-patient relationship or the discharge of professional obligations within that relationship.[32]

[31] See, e.g., Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. at 328 (White, J., concurring) (additional health risks); City of Akron, 462 U.S. at 444 (influence woman's choice); Planned Parenthood v. Danforth, 428 U.S. at 69 (share decision-making authority); and City of Akron, 462 U.S. at 435, 438, 447 (costs unique to abortion).

As explained below, two sections of the Missouri statute constitute infringements of this sort. These statutory sections deprive the physician of "the room he needs to make his best medical judgment" and to exercise that medical judgment "in the light of all factors . . . relevant to the well-being of the patient." Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179, 192 (1973). Moreover, these statutory sections also impermissibly burden the woman's decisionmaking ability by exposing her to unnecessary health risks and expense and by restricting her ability to obtain needed counseling. The net effect of these provisions is a regime of medically unsound practices that are contrary to the first principles of the patient-physician relationship. No legitimate state interest, much less a compelling one, justifies these departures from sound medical practice.

A. Section 188.029 Of The Missouri Statute Is An Unconstitutional Interference With The Right Of Patients To Make Important Medical Decisions In Consultation With Their Physicians.

Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.029 provides that a physician must determine fetal viability before performing an abortion on any woman whom the physician has reason to believe is carrying a fetus of 20 or more weeks gestational age. Amici do not object to this requirement. Indeed, they recognize that it is reasonably related and narrowly tailored to the state's compelling interest in protecting viable fetal life.

[32] See, e.g., Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. at 195-200; Planned Parenthood v. Danforth, 428 U.S. at 453-54, City of Akron, 462 U.S. at 445, 450 (interference with best medical judgment); Danforth, 428 U.S. at 64, City of Akron, 462 at 448 (inconsistent with state medical practice); Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. at 390, 394, 397 (sanctions solely from abortion role); Danforth, 428 U.S. at 79-80 (other burdens—record keeping requirement needs justification).

The statute, however, goes on to require:

> In making this determination of viability, the physician shall perform or cause to be performed such medical examinations and tests as are necessary to make a finding of the gestational age, weight, and lung maturity of the unborn child and shall enter such findings and determination of viability in the medical record of the mother.

Significantly, this provision, as construed by the court of appeals,[33] is far more than a requirement that certain findings be made and that tests be performed if they are necessary to determine viability. Rather, the statute requires these specific findings and tests regarding gestational age, weight and lung maturity of the fetus in all cases--even those in which they are unnecessary to determine fetal viability. This inflexible requirement is medically inappropriate and not reasonably related to any legitimate goal of the state. To the contrary, it interferes with the physician's ability to follow sound medical [33] Missouri asserts that its statute only requires a physician to perform tests that are "necessary to make appropriate findings in the case before him." Brief for Appellant at 34. However, as recognized by the court of appeals:

> The state's argument appears premised on an entirely different statute . . .; the Missouri statute does not require doctors to make those tests necessary to determine viability. Rather, the statute plainly declares that in determining viability, doctors must perform tests to find gestational age, fetal weight and lung maturity.

851 F.2d 1071, 1075 n.5 (emphasis in original).

practices and impermissibly burdens the pregnant woman's fundamental right to make medical decisions in consultation with her physician.

A determination of viability represents a medical assessment of the fetus' chance of survival, i.e., the physician's judgment that "there is a reasonable likelihood of the [particular] fetus' sustained survival outside the womb, with or without artificial support." Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. at 388. The viability determination is dependent upon a large number of factors, each of which may require complex medical assessment. The importance of each of these factors and the medically appropriate method of measuring them will vary with the circumstances of the individual pregnancy. Indeed, this Court has consistently stressed that viability must be determined by the pregnant woman's physician in the exercise of his or her professional judgment considering the circumstances of the individual pregnancy. Planned Parenthood v. Danforth, 428 U.S. at 61, 64.

The challenged statute singles out three factors that can affect viability. First, the Missouri statute requires that physicians perform tests to determine fetal lung maturity. As the district court found below, 662 F. Supp. at 422 "the only method to evaluate [fetal] lung maturity is by amniocentesis." Requiring amniocentesis in all abortions after 20 weeks is contrary to sound medical practice. The medical literature clearly establishes that amniocentesis is a procedure that would be useless and contrary to accepted medical practice for the purpose of determining fetal lung maturity until about 34 weeks of gestation.[34] More important, "aminocentesis imposes additional significant health risks for . . . the pregnant woman . . . ."[35] 662 F. Supp. at 422.

[34] Williams Obstetrics at 273. Methods to assess fetal lung maturity were developed to allow physicians to select the appropriate time in the third trimester to intervene in a problem pregnancy, so that the infant delivered would be free of the respiratory distress syndrome, a common clinical problem encountered by preterm infants. See Cruikshank, Amniocentesis for Determination of Fetal Maturity, 25 Clin. Obstet. Gynec. 773 (1982).

Second, the Missouri statute requires that physicians perform tests to determine gestational weight. However, in utero estimates of fetal weight are often not necessary or even useful in determining viability.[36] For example, a recent study observed that "obstetrical gestational age was found to be the best predictor of neonatal death, while sonographic estimated fetal weight [measured just 3 days before delivery] did not add significantly to this prediction." Chervenak, Berkowitz, Thornton, Kreiss, Youcha, Ehrenkranz, Hobbins & Berkowitz, A Comparison of Sonographic Estimation of Fetal Weight and Obstetrically Determined Gestational Age in the Prediction of Neonatal Outcome for the Very Low-Birth Weight Fetus, 152 Am. J. Obstet. Gynec. 47, 47 (1985).

Third, the Missouri statute requires that physicians perform tests to determine gestational age. Although gestational age is probably the best single determinant of fetal viability, it is often not necessary to perform any

---

[35] Amniocentesis increases the risks of hemorrhage, infection and hematoma formation. Golde & Platt, The Use of Ultrasound in the Diagnosis of Fetal Lung Maturity, 27 Clin. Obstet. Gynec. 391, 396 (1984). At least one maternal death due to complications of amniocentesis has been reported. S. Elias & G. Annas, Reproductive Genetics and The Law 129 (1987). It can be difficult to tap the amniotic sac safely, because of the location of the placenta or fetus, or the absence of a significant amniotic fluid pocket. Golde & Platt at 397. Further, the delay necessary to schedule a non-emergency amniocentesis (about two weeks) increases the risk of an abortion. See 662 F. Supp. at 422 n.41.

[36] "[T]he best obstetric estimate of gestational age [based on LMP, pregnancy testing, and ultrasound if necessary is] a better predictor of neonatal mortality than birthweight." Verloove-Vanhorick, Verwey, Brand, Gravenhorst, Kierse & Ruys, Neonatal Mortality Risk in Relation to Gestational Age and Birthweight, [1986] 1 Lancet 55, 55 .

"test" or "examination" to make this determination. "An accurate report of the last menstrual period ["LMP"] is the single most reliable piece of clinical information" in predicting gestational age. Smith, Frey & Johnson, Assessing Gestational Age, 33 Am. Fam. Physician 215, 219 (1986).[37] Thus, for example, if the physician has been seeing the woman regularly and is satisfied that her LMP date is accurate, there would be no need to perform any tests to determine gestational age. A physician who is uncertain as to the woman's LMP may utilize other means of determining gestational age. In order to obtain a more objective assessment, physicians rely on ultrasound, which still provides only a range of ages and may incorrectly date a pregnancy by as much as three weeks. Sabbagha, Tamura & Socol, The Use of Ultrasound in Obstetrics, 25 Clin. Obstet. Gynec. 735, 737-38 (1982). Thus, it must be left to the woman's physician to decide whether, and to what extent, to rely on such tests.

In sum, viability is a complicated medical determination to be made by an individual physician in light of all the circumstances of an individual pregnancy. There is no set of tests that is always necessary or even indicated. By requiring specific tests for all pregnancies of 20 weeks or more gestational age, regardless of the physician's professional judgment as to whether they are necessary or even useful to determine viability, Missouri attempts to interfere with the physician's medical judgment of whether an individual fetus is viable and which [37] Although some authors advocate routine use of ultrasound to determine gestational age, lack of accessibility and the high cost of this examination are often prohibitive. Moreover, recent research indicates that clinical markers [including LMP, the first appearance of auscultated fetal heart tones, the fetal height, and quickening], when consistently . . . applied, can be as accurate as ultrasound in assessing gestational age.

---

Smith, Frey & Johnson at 215.

variables are to be considered in the viability determination in a particular pregnancy. Compelling all physicians to perform such unnecessary tests in all cases imposes needless risk and expense on the pregnant woman and unconstitutionally interferes with the "central role of the physician" in "consulting with the woman about whether or not to have an abortion." Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. at 387. For these reasons, the Missouri statute is unconstitutional.[38]

B. Section 188.205 Of The Missouri Statute Impermissibly Burdens The Constitutional Right Of Patients To Make Informed Medical Decisions In Consultation With Their Physicians.

Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.205 (1986) provides:

> It shall be unlawful for any public funds to be expended for the purpose of . . . encouraging or counseling a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life.

This prohibition applies to all publicly funded Missouri physicians. By its terms, it precludes these physicians from "encouraging" or "counseling" a woman to have an abortion, except when the woman's life itself is at stake.[39]

---

[38] Even accepting that the state's interest in the preservation of potential life becomes compelling prior to viability, this provision of the statute would nevertheless be unconstitutional because it fails the second prong of the compelling state interest test. Specifically, as detailed above, the requirement of performing tests to establish specific fetal variables that may bear on viability "depart[s] from accepted medical practice," City of Akron, 462 U.S. at 431, and in at least one respect, significantly increases the risks to the mother's health. Therefore the law is not "rationally related" to the state's compelling interest.

[39] Appellants take the position that § 188.205 merely prohibits the use of public funds "for the purpose of directly urging a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life," Brief for Appellant at 38. A plain reading of the "encouraging or counseling" ban does not support this interpretation. Thus, the court of appeals found that "the scope of the encouraging or counseling ban appears literally to be much broader than the interpretation offered by the state." 851 F.2d at 1078. The breadth of the statutory language makes it virtually inevitable that at least some patients of publicly funded physicians will be denied " 'any . . . comment relative to abortion' ". Id. at 1078 n.11.

The result is to deprive the woman of a full understanding of her medical condition and options. This is contrary to the most fundamental principles of medical practice. It is justified by no state interest, compelling or otherwise.

1. It is a fundamental principle of medical practice in this country that the patient has a right to make his or her own decisions about medical treatment. See supra at 28-35. It follows that a physician must fully and accurately disclose all of the information necessary to permit the patient to make an informed choice. As stated in ¶ 8.07 of the American Medical Association's Current Opinions of the Council on Ethical and Judicial Affairs:

> The patient's right of self-decision can be effectively exercised only if the patient possesses enough information to enable an intelligent choice . . . . The physician's obligation is to present the medical facts accurately to the patient or to the individual responsible for his care and to make recommendations for management in accordance with good medical practice. The physician has an ethical obligation to help the patient make choices from among the therapeutic alternatives consistent with good medical practice.

In order to discharge the obligation to help the patient make an informed choice, a physician must be free to counsel a patient about all relevant facts within the physician's knowledge or expertise that bear upon the patient's decision. Comprehensive and appropriate counseling includes apprising the patient of his or her current medical condition and prognosis, explaining the need for further testing or treatment, disclosing the full spectrum of available medical options [40] and referral, if necessary, to an appropriate specialist or other provider.

2. Missouri's prohibition on the use of public funds for counseling a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life severely restricts the ability of physicians who receive public funds to provide their patients with necessary and appropriate medical information. By forbidding comprehensive medical counseling, § 188.205 unduly constricts and distorts the physician-patient dialogue in a manner which is inconsistent with professional ethics and the provision of sound medical care.

Specifically, § 188.205 would limit the ability of certain physicians to provide needed medical information about abortion to pregnant women where abortion is not "necessary" to save the woman's life—even if the pregnancy poses a serious threat to her life or health. See supra at 13-18. It would apply, moreover, even if pregnancy termination is an option which the physician, in his or her medical judgment, normally would discuss with the patient. In addition to threatening the life or health of the pregnant woman, certain maternal disorders greatly increase perinatal mortality and morbidity. For example, 20-50% of pregnant women with AIDS pass on their infection to the fetus. Minkoff, Care of Pregnant Women Infected With Human Immunodeficiency Virus, 258 J.A.M.A. 2714, 2715 (1987). A physician must be free to disclose to a pregnant woman the serious threat that her medical condition poses to her fetus, and

---

[40] For example, the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, Standards for Obstetric-Gynecologic Services 57 (6th ed. 1985), provides:

> In the event of an unwanted pregnancy, the physician should counsel the patient about her options of continuing the pregnancy to term and keeping the infant, continuing the pregnancy to term and offering the infant for legal adoption, or aborting the pregnancy.

to counsel the woman, if appropriate in the circumstances of the patient's medical situation, that pregnancy termination is an option. The prohibitions of § 188.205 prevent such necessary medical counseling and thereby impair the ability of physicians to act in accordance with medical ethics and their best medical judgment.

In short, the prohibitions of § 188.205 severely limit the free flow of vital medical information between physician and patient. They require physicians to withhold needed medical counseling and thereby compel them to give their patients medically incomplete and potentially misleading information. By prohibiting counseling for abortion without regard to the patient's individual medical needs, the statute effectively precludes an informed dialogue between patient and physician about her particular circumstances. Section 188.205 seriously intrudes upon the integrity of the physician-patient relationship and compels physicians who receive public funding to turn their backs on principles of medical ethics, sound medical practice, their own best clinical judgment and the medical needs of their patients.

3. This Court repeatedly has warned against governmental intrusions into the informed consent dialogue between physicians and their patients. In Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986), the statute at issue compelled physicians to provide, inter alia, five kinds of information to a woman prior to receiving her consent for pregnancy termination. The Court declared that this type of governmental intrusion into the decisionmaking process "is the antithesis of informed consent," id. at 764, and that it "intrudes upon the discretion of the pregnant woman's physician." Id. at 762. See also City of Akron, 462 U.S. 416.

Section 188.205 provides an even more constricting "straitjacket" than did the statutes at issue in Thornburgh and City of Akron. There, although required to provide certain information, physicians were free to supply their patients with any additional, medically appropriate information they wished to provide. Here, by contrast, physicians are forbidden from providing necessary and appropriate medical information that is responsive to the needs and requests of their individual patients.[41]

4. Missouri attempts to save its statute by analogizing § 188.205 to the statutes considered in Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980), and Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977). Brief for Appellant at 36-38. McRae and Maher are inapposite. In those cases, this Court held only that it was permissible for the government to exclude the performance of abortions from the medical procedures it was willing to fund. Neither case involved government distortion of the personal medical decisionmaking process that takes place between a physician and a patient. Indeed, in both cases the Court was careful to stress that a mere failure to pay created no obstacle to a woman's effectuation of her rights. McRae, 448 U.S. at 317.

By contrast, if the patient accepts the physician's state-limited information as trustworthy "medical advice," she will rely on the distorted consultation, often to her detriment. She will be given medically incomplete and [41] The court of appeals held that § 188.205 is unconstitutionally vague, "because the word 'counsel' is fraught with ambiguity; its range is incapable of objective measurement." 851 F.2d at 1078 (citing Baggett v. Bullitt, 377 U.S. 360, 367 (1967) (footnote omitted)). The court of appeals recognized:

---

> The prohibition on 'encouraging or counseling' implicates both first and fourteenth amendment rights of both physicians and their patients . . . .
>
> * * * *
>
> [P]ossible targets of the statute are chilled into avoiding even speech that is normally afforded the utmost protection under the Constitution.

851 F.2d at 1078. See supra note 39. Amici agree with this analysis.

often misleading information. The court of appeals correctly identified the burden the statute imposes and why it is unconstitutional:

> Missouri is not simply declining to fund abortions when it forbids its doctors to encourage or counsel women to have abortions. Instead, it is erecting an obstacle in the path of women seeking full and uncensored medical advice about alternatives to childbirth.

851 F.2d at 1080 (emphasis added).[42]

Like the court below, "[w]e can perceive of few obstacles more burdensome to the right to decide than a state-imposed blackout on the information necessary to make a decision." Id.[43]

---

[42] A state is not free to interfere with a patient's fundamental right to make an informed personal medical decision in consultation with her physician simply because that interference is accomplished as a condition for receipt of government funds. See e.g., Perry v. Sindermann, 408 U.S. 593, 597 (1972). Once the government undertakes to fund medical services, it may not interfere with the provision of sound medical advice by physicians who perform those services. To do so offends established standards of medical practice and ethics.

[43] The argument that the state's interest in protecting potential life is compelling prior to viability would not preserve the constitutionality of this provision of the statute. First, it is not rational for the state to effectuate even a compelling interest in fetal life by providing the woman with medically incomplete and misleading information in the context of the physician-patient dialogue. Second, the scope of the statute's restrictions is not narrowly tailored to any possible interest in protecting fetal life. For example, the statute would prohibit a physician from advising a pregnant patient about abortion as an option even in circumstances where there is no possibility that the fetus could survive, such as where an ultrasound examination has confirmed that the fetus is anencephalic.

CONCLUSION

The judgment of the court of appeals declaring Sections 188.029 and 186.205 of the Missouri statute unconstitutional should be affirmed.

Respectfully submitted,

Of Counsel:
KIRK B. JOHNSON
EDWARD B. HIRSHFELD
DAVID ORENTLICHER
AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION
535 N. Dearborn Street
Chicago, Illinois 60610
(312) 645-4600

STEPHAN E. LAWTON
REED SMITH SHAW & MCCLAY
1200 18th Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20036
(202) 331-8566

ANN E. ALLEN
AMERICAN COLLEGE OF OBSTETRICIANS AND GYNECOLOGISTS
409 12th Street, S.W.
Washington, D.C. 20024
(202) 638-5577

LAURIE R. ROCKETT
HOLLYER, JONES, BRADY, SMITH,
TROXELL, BARRETT & CHIRA
(COUNSEL TO THE AMERICAN MEDICAL WOMEN'S ASSOCIATION, INC.)
342 Madison Avenue
New York, New York 10173
(212) 818-1110

JOEL I. KLEIN
ONEK, KLEIN & FARR
2550 M Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20037
(202) 775-0184

JACK R. BIERIG
DAVID F. GRAHAM
LYNN D. FLEISHER
SIDLEY & AUSTIN
One First National Plaza
Chicago, Illinois 60603
(312) 853-7000

CARTER G. PHILLIPS *
ELIZABETH H. ESTY
JULI E. FARRIS
SIDLEY & AUSTIN
1722 Eye Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20006
(202) 429-4000

Counsel for the Amici Curiae

March 30, 1989

* Counsel of Record

AMICUS CURIAE

BRIEF

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
MAR 30 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

No. 88-605

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,

Appellants,

v.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,

Appellees.

On Appeal from the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit

---

BRIEF OF AMICI CURIAE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF WOMEN LAWYERS AND NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF WOMEN'S BAR ASSOCIATIONS IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEES

NICHOLAS DEB. KATZENBACH*
LEONA BEANE
JANINE D. HARRIS
ESTELLE H. ROGERS
ROBERT J. GILSON

Headquarters Plaza
One Speedwell Avenue
Morristown, New Jersey 07962-1981
(201) 538-0800

Attorneys for Amici Curiae
National Association of Women Lawyers and
National Conference of Women's Bar Associations

March 30, 1989 *Counsel of Record

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	PAGE
TABLE OF AUTHORITIES	ii
INTEREST OF THE AMICI CURIAE	1
ARGUMENT	5
I. OVERRULING ROE V. WADE WOULD ENDANGER PUBLIC CONFIDENCE IN THE INTEGRITY AND OBJECTIVITY OF THE COURT	5
A. No "Special Justification" Exists For Overruling Roe And None Of The Grounds Customarily Invoked Are Present Here	6
1. "The Force of Better Reasoning"	8
2. "The Lessons Of Experience"	10
B. Once Determined By This Court, Constitutional Rights Of Individuals Should Be Denied Only In The Most Exceptional Circumstances	11
C. Reversal Of Roe Would Be Publicly Perceived As Incompatible With Judicial Independence And Objectivity	13
CONCLUSION	15

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

	PAGE
Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983)	9
Arizona v. Rumsey, 467 U.S. 203 (1984)	6
Beal v. Doe, 432 U.S. 438 (1977)	9
Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622 (1979)	9
Bellotti v. Baird, 428 U.S. 132 (1976)	9
Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)	11
Burnet v. Coronado Oil & Gas Co., 285 U.S. 393 (1932)	6, 7
Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379 (1979)	9
Connecticut v. Menillo, 423 U.S. 9 (1975)	9
Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179 (1973)	9
Eric Railroad v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64 (1938)	7
Florida Department of Health and Rehabilitative Services v. Florida Nursing Home Association, 450 U.S. 147 (1981)	14
H.L. v. Matheson, 450 U.S. 398 (1981)	9
Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980)	9
Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507 (1976)	12
Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905)	11
Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977)	9
Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940)	12
Moragne v. States Marine Lines, Inc., 398 U.S. 375 (1970)	6

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES—Continued

	PAGE
Planned Parenthood Association v. Ashcroft, 462 U.S. 476 (1983)	9
Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976)	9
Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896)	11
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)	1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16
Simopoulos v. Virginia, 462 U.S. 506 (1983)	9
Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986)	9,11
United States v. Scott, 437 U.S. 82 (1978)	8
Vasquez v. Hillery, 474 U.S. 254 (1986)	6
West Virginia State Bd. of Ed. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)	12
OTHER
Monagham, Stare Decisis and Constitutional Adjudication, 88 Colum. L. Rev. 723 (1988)	6
Rawls, The Idea of An Overlapping Consensus, Oxford J. Legal Studies (1987)	13
Uniform Abortion Act, § 1(b)	3,4

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

No. 88-605

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,

Appellants,

v.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,

Appellees.

On Appeal from the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit

---

BRIEF OF AMICI CURIAE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF WOMEN LAWYERS AND NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF WOMEN'S BAR ASSOCIATIONS IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEES

INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE

The National Association of Women Lawyers ("NAWL") and the National Conference of Women's Bar Associations ("NCWBA") submit this brief as amici curiae, with the consent of the parties, in support of Appellees' position that Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973) not be overruled. This brief addresses only one of the seven questions presented to this Court: whether Roe v. Wade should be reconsidered. As organizations with strong interests in women's rights and securing justice for all, NAWL and NCWBA are concerned that the abandonment of the important and well-established precedent of Roe v. Wade would be harmful to the legal system and would endanger public confidence in the objectivity and independence of the Court.

The NCWBA is a non-profit professional organization of approximately 50,000 male and female attorneys. Membership is open to all individual state, regional, and local women's bar associations. The NCWBA was formed in 1981 to promote the highest standards of the legal profession, to advance justice, to promote and protect the interests of women, and to pursue these goals through appropriate legal, social and political action.

Founded in 1899, the NAWL is a voluntary national membership organization of the legal profession, having official representation in various organizations, commissions and governmental agencies, both national and international. It is comprised of approximately 1200 individual members and numerous women's bar association affiliate members (encompassing several thousand additional members) across the country. Its individual members, from each state and the District of Columbia, include prosecutors, public defenders, private attorneys, trial and appellate judges from the state and federal courts, legislators, law professors and law students. Although the members of the NAWL hold a broad spectrum of personal views, they share a common concern that the law be administered justly, fairly and predictably. As an organization made up primarily of women it has and continues to be a supporter of women's rights. As an organization of attorneys it supports the integrity of the justice system.

The NAWL favors the decriminalization of abortion in the early stages of pregnancy and the adoption of a uniform approach to abortion. As an affiliate of the American Bar Association, with a voting delegate in the House of Delegates, it has participated in efforts in this area of the law which included a resolution in 1972 approving the Uniform Abortion Act. That Act was promulgated by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, and adopted by the NAWL, because the proliferation of conflicting state policies on abortion was thought to be unwise and unworkable as a matter of legal administration and unjust as a matter of social policy. The Uniform Abortion Act declared lawful abortions performed by doctors during the first twenty (20) weeks of a pregnancy; abortions after the twentieth week were permitted, if at all, only under certain narrowly defined circumstances. Uniform Abortion Act, § 1(b).

The central concern underlying the original Uniform Abortion Act, and its support from the NAWL, was the need to assure uniformity in state laws in an area in which differences in state laws had produced undesirable social consequences. In the years immediately preceding Roe, abortions were unlawful in most states, although the procedure was lawful in a few states, most notably New York and California. As a consequence, literally hundreds of thousands of pregnant women residing in states with restrictive laws went to New York and California to have abortions. In 1972, the year preceding Roe, forty percent (40%) of all legal abortions in the United States, some two hundred thousand (200,000), were performed on women who had left their state of residency to have the procedure performed elsewhere. (See Chart, attached as Appendix A.)

For a significant part of the population, however, the costs of travel prohibited the option of an abortion. Indigent women, who could not afford such travel were thus denied a safe and lawful abortion simply because they could not afford an opportunity available to more affluent women. There was, thus, a divisive and unfair social consequence arising from the lack of uniformity in state laws concerning abortion. And that unfortunate consequence was compounded by the well-known fact that a disproportionate number of poor women are minorities.

The NAWL's and NCWBA's positions concerning abortion also reflected a recognition of the problems inherent in criminalizing an action which is fundamentally a personal, moral decision. Many individuals' choices regarding abortion are deeply personal and determined by particular religious and philosophic beliefs. To criminalize an act over which there are such strongly held conflicting views is perceived by the NAWL and NCWBA to be unwise.

Finally, because a significant portion of the population desired the option of an abortion, a prohibition on abortion was recognized to be unrealistic. Illegal abortions were a fact—and a significant social problem. The adverse medical and social consequences from illegal abortions were obvious.

Following the January 1973 decision in Roe, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Law approved a Revised Uniform Abortion Act. The Revised Act conformed to the principles set forth in Roe, and thus provides different rules governing abortions in each trimester of a pregnancy. The NAWL, again through its position with the American Bar Association, approved the Revised Act in February 1974, in recognition of the wisdom of a uniform approach to the complex issues raised by abortion and of the problems associated with inconsistent state by state legislation.

The NAWL has recently reaffirmed its position on legalized abortions. In February, 1989, it unanimously passed a resolution affirmatively endorsing the right to privacy recognized by the United States Supreme Court in Roe v. Wade, supporting every woman's right to reproductive self-determination and supporting efforts to secure equal protection of the laws for poor women by allowing the use of public funds for abortions for welfare recipients. The NAWL and NCWBA further believe that the right to reproductive choice is an indispensable step in the attainment of full equality for women, including their members, thousands of women lawyers.

In sum, the NAWL's and NCWBA's positions regarding abortion have consistently reflected three concerns: (1) that abortions be legally available to a uniform degree throughout the country; (2) that a procedure which involves highly charged and conflicting moral and social issues not be criminalized; and (3) that the realities of illegal abortion were detrimental to our society.

Both the NAWL and NCWBA are in short, national organizations of attorneys, with well-established positions favoring a uniform approach to the abortion issue that recognizes the core holding of Roe v. Wade: Women have a constitutional right to an abortion, although that right may be limited by the states during some later periods of pregnancy. Moreover, the NAWL and NCWBA have equally, if not greater, established positions favoring certainty, equality and justice in the law, policies that are, in this case, entirely consistent with the principles of stare decisis.

ARGUMENT

I. OVERRULING ROE V. WADE WOULD ENDANGER PUBLIC CONFIDENCE IN THE INTEGRITY AND OBJECTIVITY OF THE COURT

The doctrine of stare decisis is always an important consideration for this Court to weigh whether interpreting the Constitution or a statute. The fact that this Court has on a number of occasions overruled past decisions does not mean that it has done so lightly or without good and articulated reasons. A decision to follow or to overrule prior precedent lies at the heart of the judicial process. The interest and concern of the NAWL and NCWBA in this case is the preservation not simply of an orderly, consistent and predictable process of adjudication, but, even more importantly, the preservation of public confidence in the integrity, objectivity and independence of the judiciary.

In an age where legal realism has dominated philosophy and rapid change has characterized the social environment, it is too easy to overlook the important values embodied in adherence to precedent. The most important of these is the constraining or limiting function that precedent has on judicial action. It is, at bottom, what legitimates our unique constitutional system and which permits this Court its important voice in that system. As Justice Harlan wrote for a unanimous Court:

> Very weighty considerations underlie the principle that courts should not lightly overrule past decisions. Among these are the desirability that the law furnish a clear guide for the conduct of individuals, to enable them to plan their affairs with assurance against untoward surprise; the importance of furthering fair and expeditious adjudication by eliminating the need to relitigate every relevant proposition in every case; and the necessity of maintaining public faith in the judiciary as a source of impersonal and reasoned judgments.

Moragne v. States Marine Lines, Inc., 398 U.S. 375, 403 (1970).

In reconsidering the holding of Roe v. Wade, this Court should give great weight to stare decisis and particularly to "the necessity of maintaining public faith" in the system of judicial review. We submit that overruling Roe would damage that faith so essential to preserving the rule of law.

A. No "Special Justification" Exists For Overruling* Roe *And None Of The Grounds Customarily Invoked Are Present Here.

The doctrine of stare decisis has special importance in that it provides certainty to our legal system. While this Court has, for a variety of reasons, overruled prior precedent, the Court has never overruled established precedent simply because the Court as presently composed would have reached a different result. Rather, "[a]ny departure from the doctrine of stare decisis demands special justification". Arizona v. Rumsey, 467 U.S. 203, 212 (1984)[1].

[1] As this Court recently explained, the doctrine of stare decisis > permits society to presume that bedrock principles are founded in the law rather than in the proclivities of individuals, and thereby contributes to the integrity of our constitutional system of government, both in appearance and in fact. While stare decisis is not an inexorable command, the careful observer will discern that any detours from the straight path of stare decisis in our past have occurred for articulable reasons, and only when the Court has felt obliged "to bring its opinions into agreement with experience and with facts newly ascertained." Burnet v. Coronado Oil & Gas Co., 285 U.S. 393, 412, 76 L.Ed. 815, 52 S.Ct. 443 (1932) (Brandeis, J., dissenting).

>
> Our history does not impose any rigid formula to constrain the Court in the disposition of cases. Rather, its lesson is that every successful proponent of overruling precedent has borne the heavy burden of persuading the Court that changes in society or in the law dictate that the values served by stare decisis yield in favor of a greater objective.

Vasquez v. Hillery, 474 U.S. 254, 265-66 (1986). See generally, Monagham, Stare Decisis and Constitutional Adjudication, 88 Colum. L. Rev. 723 (1988).

Admittedly, reversal of a constitutional holding as opposed to a legislative interpretation is said to be more frequent on the Brandeisian rationale that, in constitutional matters, "correction through legislative action is practically impossible." Burnet v. Coronado Oil & Gas Company, 285 U.S. 393, 406 (1932) (Brandeis, J., dissenting).[2] Hence, reversal of a constitutional holding is arguably appropriately done more often. Where surrounding factual circumstances have so changed as to make a long-standing and originally sensible reading of the Constitution outmoded it makes practical sense for the Court to overrule precedent rather than insist on the difficult process of amendment; Erie Railroad v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64, 74-80 (1938) is a classic example and fits well into the Brandeis theory.

The argument regarding the difficulty of overruling constitutional precedent may, however, be overstated. On highly controversial matters a realistic Court undoubtedly can appreciate the legislative realities and the political persuasiveness of the Court's own pronouncement which often influences public attitudes and thereby the Congress. Just as the Court's most serious function is interpretation of our fundamental charter in the first instance, however, so too does it exercise particular restraint in overruling its prior view, precisely because it is so much more difficult for the political branches to change the result. Consensus once achieved is not lightly put aside. In interpreting the Constitution it is the Court's conviction about fundamental principles rather than the possibility of political reversal through amendment which motivates its holding in the first place. Attorneys, as well as the public, rightfully rely on the assumption that this Court's constitutional holdings are well-reasoned and binding. If that is true, then the process of judicial reversal should require at least the same somber consideration as did the original holding, uninfluenced by [2] The reference, of course, is to the difficulty of constitutional amendment. But it should be noted that in the case of Roe the Congress could not muster even a majority of votes to start the process of a constitutional amendment.

the politics of reversal. It is only where experience dictates the overruling of a precedent, as new and better reasoning is demanded by new facts presented to the Court that this Court has overruled prior constitutional holdings. Only then does the Court "bow to the lessons of experience and the force of better reasoning. . . ." United States v. Scott, 437 U.S. 82 (1978).

1. "The Force of Better Reasoning".

As the Court in Scott noted, "better reasoning" is coupled with, indeed arises from, the demand of new facts. But even assuming (which we do not concede) that better reasoning alone, without supervening facts, can justify overturning a decision based on the Constitution, we know of no arguments available today on the constitutional issues involved in Roe which were not available and in fact made when it was decided, and which have not been, explicitly or implicitly, invoked in its many progeny. Those arguments have not become "better reasoning" simply through repetition. Indeed, many objective observers might agree that the reasoning of the dissenters was "better" in 1973 (and now) than that of the then majority, but it is not "better" now because it has improved with age or by reason of its "lessons of experience". In short, the mere repetition of arguments made to and rejected by the Roe majority in 1973 should not justify reversal.

Reinforcing this point is the further fact of Roe's many progeny which accept that decision and its reasoning as settled. Indeed, this Court has repeatedly reaffirmed Roe and expressly recognized the importance of stare decisis in doing so:

> Legislative responses to the Court's decision have required us on several occasions, and again today, to define the limits of a State's authority to regulate the performance of abortions. And arguments continue to be made, in these cases as well, that we erred in interpreting the Constitution. Nevertheless, the doctrine of stare decisis, while perhaps never entirely persuasive on a constitutional question, is a doctrine > that demands respect in a society governed by the rule of law. We respect it today, and reaffirm Roe v. Wade.

Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416, 419-20 (1983) (footnote omitted); Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747, 759 (1986) ("Again today, we reaffirm the general principles laid down in Roe and Akron."); See also Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297, 312-14 (1980); Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379, 386 (1979); Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464, 471-72 (1977) ; Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52, 55, 60-61 (1976); Connecticut v. Menillo, 423 U.S. 9, 10-11 (1975); Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179, 182-83 (1973) . Cf. H.L. v. Matheson, 450 U.S. 398 (1981); Planned Parenthood Association v. Ashcroft, 462 U.S. 476 (1983); Simopoulos v. Virginia, 462 U.S. 506 (1983); Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622 (1979); Beal v. Doe, 432 U.S. 438 (1977) ; Bellotti v. Baird, 428 U.S. 132 (1976).

Of particular importance is avoidance of the equation of "better reasoning" with changes in the composition of the Court itself. The ever changing composition of the Court is frequently and properly a factor in changing general directions of judicial interpretation. But it is virtually always accompanied by other changes as well.

Here the point is the institutional character of the Court. Decisions by a majority of the Justices, however composed, are decisions of the Court itself entitled to institutional deference. Respect for past decisions of such a majority helps to build a mutual respect which, in turn, is important to the enormous public esteem in which the Court is held and which is essential to that respect for its decisions which leads to voluntary compliance. Absent such respect, politicians — and the public — will conclude that "court packing" can change this Court's constitutional holdings. History teaches us that that is a conclusion to be avoided if the Court is to retain its institutional respect.

2. "The Lessons Of Experience"

Clearly there are "lessons of experience" arising from the many cases finding their way to Courts of Appeals and especially to this Court. At first blush, one might wonder why the States have had such difficulty in interpreting Roe and why this Court has been called upon so many times to pass on its interpretation. Do these facts and these cases suggest any major flaw in the Roe decision? Do they come about because Roe was wrongly decided?

We respectfully suggest that the reasons for the continued controversy concerning Roe stem not from the lesson of experience or supervening social change, but from the political vigor of the debate about abortion. There would be continued dispute had Roe been decided differently simply because of the fact that the public forms opinions on this issue from deeply held religious, moral and philosophic convictions that go to the very core of the role of government and personal decision-making. Admittedly, if the Court had not invoked its prior privacy decisions to decide in Roe that a woman had a fourteenth amendment right to abortion which in certain circumstances the States can not constitutionally deny or frustrate, these cases, all of which test the circumstances and methods through which states may regulate the process of abortion, would not have arisen in a constitutional context. But it is always the case that when this Court extends a recognized constitutional right to new factual situations, the extent and nature of the "new" right is likely to be tested. The more controversial that right is, the more vigorously it will be both attacked and defended. That experience — the controversy over the limits of a constitutional holding — is not, however, a sufficient basis for overruling the holding.

As this Court itself has recently recognized:

> Constitutional rights do not always have easily ascertainable boundaries, and controversy over the meaning of our Nation's most majestic guarantees frequently has been turbulent. As judges, however, we are sworn to uphold the law > even when its content gives rise to bitter disputes. We recognized at the very beginning of our opinion in Roe, 410 U.S. at 116, that abortion raises moral and spiritual questions over which honorable persons can disagree sincerely and profoundly. But those disagreements did not then and do not now relieve us of our duty to apply the Constitution faithfully.

Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747, 771-72 (1986) (citation omitted).

The decision of the Court in Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954) to effectively overrule Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896) presents an excellent contrast to the question now before the Court. Plessy withheld a constitutional right and the "lessons of experience" in the more than a half a century between Plessy and Brown demonstrated that the right must exist under our constitutional system. Roe in contrast bestowed a right. In the fifteen (15) years since Roe was decided there are no similar lessons of experience that would justify the elimination of the right Roe recognized.

The analogy to Brown, however, is appropriate in another regard. In the initial years following Brown, as in the fifteen (15) years following Roe, state legislatures and the public who opposed the Brown ruling attempted in numerous ways to undermine this Court's core holding and sought repeated review of the Brown decision. It was this Court's steadfast adherence to Brown that thirty-five (35) years later has lead to its wide acceptance.

B. Once Determined By This Court, Constitutional Rights Of Individuals Should Be Denied Only In The Most Exceptional Circumstances

In the cases decided by this Court overruling precedent for one reason or another, it is virtually impossible to find any case which takes away individual rights previously held by this Court to have been guaranteed by the Constitution. If one eliminates those cases based on Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905), which were based on then current notions of economics and which so frustrated national policy as to threaten this Court's independence during the New Deal, one is left essentially empty handed. No case which purported to guarantee constitutional rights thought to be fundamental in any sense has been overturned.[3]

It is not an exaggeration to say that much of the respect which this Court has deservedly achieved over almost two centuries stems from the fact that it is the strong guarantor of rights against both the Federal and State Governments in our political system. As we have noted, decisions recognizing such constitutional rights are not always popular. Nevertheless, while the Court has sometimes refused to expand existing rights against governmental entities, it has never taken back the fundamental right once recognized.[4]

This history is significant in the Roe context. Restoring the pre-Roe status quo is a significantly different decision than the one the Court faced when it decided Roe. Prior to Roe there were no expectations to be frustrated, no deeply entrenched practices to be reversed through judicial pronouncement. After Roe, that is no longer true. Overruling precedent in such a unique circumstance can seriously threaten stability and continuity and, for that reason alone, should be avoided. See Rawls, The Idea Of An Overlapping Consensus, Oxford J. Legal Studies, 1, 12-15 (1987). Here, the reliance at issue differs from the normal argument for stare decisis in that it is not action taken in reliance on a rule, but an expectation—in the light of history a justifiable one—born of reliance on the integrity of our constitutional system. That the Court could strike down Roe without new facts, circumstance or reasoning, would be bound to raise anxiety by potential beneficiaries of other rights.

[3] It is true that this Court had considerable difficulty dealing with the problem of picketing and other exercises of free speech on the privately owned premises of shopping centers. Arguably, Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507 (1976) limits free speech in this respect, but the limitation is scarcely fundamental, and certainly it does not extinguish the basic underlying right of freedom of speech.

[4] The case of West Virginia State Bd. of Ed. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943) has been cited as authority for overruling even recent prior precedent and therefore relevant to overruling Roe. See Amicus Brief for the United States at 10. In fact Barnette cuts the other way. It recognized the rights of individuals on grounds of conscience, extending freedom rather than curtailing it, in a context which was hardly politically popular. In many ways it more nearly resembles Brown for it was protecting the right of a minority—in Barnett a small minority refused to yield to the demands of an often violent majority on first amendment grounds. The increasing mob violence, fueled by wartime sentiments, was a new circumstance of which the Court properly took account. The analogy to Roe would be apt if Barnette had preceded Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940), and the Court, yielding to popular pressure and a spate of violence, had taken back the right it had recognized in Barnette.

The issue is not whether a woman could simply rely, or in fact does rely, on her right to an abortion. The question is to what extent is one justified in counting on this Court to maintain, as it has always done in the past, its position of protecting what the Court itself has characterized as fundamental human rights. Such reliance in the area of fundamental constitutional rights is, and must be, justifiable. Without overwhelming reasons, and none exist here, this Court should not disappoint that reliance.

C. Reversal Of Roe Would Be Publicly Perceived As Incompatible With Judicial Independence And Objectivity

The fundamental basis for adhering to stare decisis in most cases is simply preserving the legitimacy and independence of the judicial system in our constitutional government.[5] It is

[5] Justice Stevens recognized the significance of the institutional stability of the Court when he stated:

> Of even greater importance, however, is my concern about the potential damage to the legal system that may be caused by frequent or sudden reversals of direction that may appear to have been occasioned by nothing more significant than a change in the identity of this Court's personnel. Granting that a zigzag is sometimes the best course, I am firmly convinced that we have a profound obligation to give recently decided cases the strongest presumption of validity. That presumption is supported by much more than the desire to foster an appearance of certainty and impartiality in the administration of justice, or the interest in facilitating the labors of judges. The presumption is an essential thread in the mantle of protection that the law affords the individual. Citizens must have confidence that the rules on which they rely in ordering their affairs—particularly when they are prepared to take issue with those in difficult to imagine a case which raises that issue more directly and more starkly than does the possibility of overruling Roe.

For deeply religious and moral reasons with which this Court is thoroughly familiar, the public is seriously divided on the fundamental question of permitting abortion at all, and, to a somewhat lesser extent, on the many subsidiary problems raised by permitting abortions. Because of the strength of these convictions and the large number of people involved on both sides of the threshold question, the abortion issue has become heavily politicized. Not only are people divided on the question in every state, but the states are divided on the question themselves. Arguments on both sides are passionate, often strident, demonstrations occur frequently and differences have occasionally lead to violence born of conviction in the rightness of one's position. Since Roe the Court itself and individual Justices and Judges in the Federal system have frequently been the targets of hostile comments, demonstrations and other abuses.

Roe, of course, did not create these strongly felt divisions. Roe has, however, brought about the only uniformity that exists today on abortion. By declaring a woman's right to abortion under the Constitution, Roe shifted the focus of attention in state legislatures and more forcefully brought the Federal Courts into the abortion controversy. Were Roe to be overruled it would remove for a period of time this Court from the eye of the storm. Debate, demonstrations and the host of political and human problems which unavoidably accompany State abortion regulations would continue unabated. And there would also continue to be political pressure on the President and Congress to use federal power to influence the states' rules and regulations in one direction or another. Divisions among pro-abortion states and anti-abortion states would create further demands for federal power in doing so—are rules of law and not merely the opinions of a small group of men who temporarily occupy high office. It is the unpopular or beleaguered individual—not the man in power—who has the greatest stake in the integrity of the law.

Florida Department of Health and Rehabilitative Services v. Florida Nursing Home Association, 450 U.S. 147, 153-54 (1981) (Stevens, J., concurring) (footnotes omitted).

intervention and there is the probability, whatever this Court does, that abortion problems will come before it in the future.

Understandably, but unfortunately from the Court's perspective, the abortion issue has entered national politics. The Solicitor General has urged and continues to urge this Court to reverse Roe, not because it runs counter to or frustrates some broad national policy[6] but simply because he, like the President, believes Roe was wrongly decided.

This politically-charged environment requires a heightened sensitivity to the traditional stare decisis doctrine. For this Court to reverse Roe in the absence of new persuasive and articulated facts and reasons would damage this Court in the public mind and adversely reflect upon its political independence and judicial impartiality. The press has already indicated that it will see any overruling of Roe in this light, and it is from the press that the public obtains its information.

An independent judiciary is one of the essential characteristics of a free society. Anything which damages the public's perception of judicial independence of the political branches damages the Court, the legal profession, and constitutional government so essential to our freedoms.

CONCLUSION

No new facts, circumstances or experience warrant the withdrawal of the constitutional right recognized in Roe v. Wade. It is respectfully submitted, therefore, that the Court should adhere to the considered decision announced in Roe v. Wade.

[6] In this respect the current abortion controversy contrasts with the constitutional revolution of 1937 and President Roosevelt's Court Packing Plan. While the Hughes Court clearly overruled long lines of precedent, essentially at the behest of the President and Congress, it did so to remove constitutional blocks to regulatory laws overwhelmingly voted by the chosen representatives of the people, and it did so without sacrifice of human liberty, but, arguably, to its enhancement.

Respectfully submitted,

NICHOLAS DEB. KATZENBACH*
LEONA BEANE
JANINE D. HARRIS
ESTELLE H. ROGERS
ROBERT J. GILSON

Headquarters Plaza
One Speedwell Ave
Morristown, New Jersey
07962-1981
(201) 538-0800

Attorneys for Amici Curiae
National Association of Women Lawyers and
National Conference of Women's Bar Associations

March 30, 1989

---

*Counsel of Record

Appendix A

WOMEN OBTAINING OUT OF STATE ABORTIONS: 1972 BY STATE OF RESIDENCE

State	Proportion of state residents obtaining their abortions out of state	Number of state residents obtaining out of state abortions
New Jersey	100.0%	22,832
Ohio	100.0%	16,666
Texas	100.0%	16,022
Michigan	100.0%	14,626
Illinois	100.0%	14,091
Missouri	100.0%	6,953
Indiana	100.0%	5,481
Kentucky	100.0%	3,132
Oklahoma	100.0%	2,843
Iowa	100.0%	2,356
Minnesota	100.0%	2,227
Rhode Island	100.0%	1,869
Maine	100.0%	1,690
Nevada	100.0%	1,630
West Virginia	100.0%	1,491
New Hampshire	100.0%	1,483
Louisiana	100.0%	1,210
Utah	100.0%	730
Wyoming	100.0%	269
Montana	100.0%	172
North Dakota	100.0%	148
South Dakota	100.0%	116
Idaho	100.0%	20
Tennessee	99.8%	4,279
Mississippi	93.0%	809
Arizona	90.4%	2,590
Vermont	81.7%	859
Massachusetts	80.7%	14,187
Wisconsin	76.0%	2,347
South Carolina	72.3%	2,208
Florida	70.9%	8,246
Connecticut	69.1%	5,757

Appendix A

State	Proportion of state residents obtaining their abortions out of state	Number of state residents obtaining out of state abortions
Georgia	64.5%	4,561
Pennsylvania	62.5%	14,232
Virginia	60.0%	6,707
Nebraska	56.1%	1,008
Arkansas	49.0%	762
Alabama	45.1%	948
Delaware	41.7%	914
Maryland	40.3%	6,002
North Carolina	30.0%	3,539
Colorado	10.6%	573
Kansas	6.8%	311
New Mexico	5.1%	100
District of Columbia	2.0%	145
Alaska	0.8%	9
Oregon	0.7%	49
Hawaii	0.3%	12
Washington	0.2%	42
California	0.1%	152
New York	0.0%	44
Total		199,489

Source: Hearings on Constitutional Amendments Relating to Abortion before the Subcommittee on the Constitution of the Senate Judiciary Committee, 97th Cong., 1st sess. (1981).

AMICUS CURIAE

BRIEF

No. 88-605

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
MAR 30 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,

Appellants,

—v.—

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,

Appellees.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT

BRIEF FOR CERTAIN MEMBERS OF THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES: SENATOR HOWARD METZENBAUM (D. OH.), SENATOR BOB PACKWOOD (R. OR.), SENATOR BARBARA MIKULSKI (D. MD.), REPRESENTATIVE DON EDWARDS (D. CA.), REPRESENTATIVE BILL GREEN (R. NY), REPRESENTATIVE PATRICIA SCHROEDER (D. CO.), REPRESENTATIVE OLYMPIA SNOWE (R. ME.) AND CERTAIN OTHER MEMBERS OF CONGRESS AS AMICUS CURIAE IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEES

BURKE MARSHALL*
127 Wall Street
New Haven, Connecticut 06520
(203) 432-4953
NORMAN REDLICH*
STEPHEN R. NEUWIRTH
Wachtell, Lipton, Rosen & Katz
299 Park Avenue
New York, New York 10171
(212) 371-9200

Attorneys for Certain Members of Congress as Amicus Curiae

Counsel of Record*

March 30, 1989

TABLE OF CONTENTS

PAGE

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES iii

CONSENT OF PARTIES 1

INTEREST OF AMICI 2

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT 5

ARGUMENT 8

I. THE DOCTRINE OF STARE DECISIS HAS PLAYED A CENTRAL ROLE IN CONSTITUTIONAL ADJUDICATION 8

II. ROE V. WADE IS ENTITLED TO STRONG RESPECT UNDER THE PRINCIPLES OF STARE DECISIS THAT HAVE BEEN FOLLOWED BY THIS COURT 11

A. The Overruling of Roe v. Wade Would Have Practical Consequences Unlike Those That Have Followed Any Other Decision of This Court 11

1. Overruling Roe v. Wade would produce the unprecedented effect of the criminalization of previously constitutionally protected conduct 11

2. The right of reproductive freedom is particularly ill-suited to a multiplicity of state regulation 12

B. Overruling Roe v. Wade Would Constitute an Unprecedented Withdrawal of a Fundamental Right Affecting Millions of Individuals in a Matter of Critical Importance to Their Lives 14

PAGE

III. WHEN THIS COURT HAS OVERTURNED CONSTITUTIONAL PRECEDENTS, IT HAS NOT DONE SO ON THE BASIS OF MERE DISAGREEMENT WITH AN EARLIER CASE, BUT ONLY IN THE PRESENCE OF SPECIAL CIRCUMSTANCES THAT DO NOT APPLY TO ROE V. WADE 18

A. Changed Conditions 19

B. Legal Developments 22

CONCLUSION 28

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

CASES: PAGE

A.L.A. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495 (1935) 17

Adams v. Tanner, 244 U.S. 590 (1917) 23

Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983) 7, 12, 23n, 25n

Allen v. Newberry, 21 How. (62 U.S.) 244 (1858) 19n

Amalgamated Food Employees Union v. Logan Valley Plaza, Inc., 391 U.S. 308 (1968) 15n, 22-23

Arizona v. Rumsey, 467 U.S. 203 (1984) 10, 19

Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962) 9, 20-21

Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622 (1979) 23n, 25n

Betts v. Brady, 316 U.S. 455 (1942) 7, 22

Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497 (1954) 24

Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954) 10, 14, 17

Brown v. Board of Education, 349 U.S. 294 (1955) 10

Bunting v. Oregon, 243 U.S. 426 (1917) 16n

Burnet v. Coronado Oil & Gas Co., 285 U.S. 393 (1932) 9, 19, 20, 21

Carter v. Carter Coal Co., 298 U.S. 238 (1936) 17

Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883) 15

PAGE

Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379 (1979).....23n, 25n

Colegrove v. Green, 328 U.S. 549 (1946) 21

Complete Auto Transit v. Brady, 430 U.S. 274 (1977).. 23

Crandall v. Nevada, 6 Wall. (73 U.S.) 35 (1868)..... 24

Dep't of Revenue v. Association of Washington Stevedoring Cos., 435 U.S. 734 (1978) 23

Dred Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. 393 (1857).....13, 15

Drollinger v. Millingan, 552 F.2d 1220 (7th Cir. 1977) . 26n

Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972)..... 23

Feldman v. United States, 322 U.S. 487 (1944) 23

Ferguson v. Skrupa, 372 U.S. 726 (1963) 23

Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, 469 U.S. 528 (1985).....24, 27

Gibson v. Berryhill, 411 U.S. 564 (1973)..... 24

Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963)..... 5, 22

Goesaert v. Cleary, 335 U.S. 464 (1948) 15

Green v. United States, 355 U.S. 184 (1957) 8

Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965).....11, 14, 23

Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 251 (1918)..... 22

Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980)..... 26n

Helvering v. Hallock, 309 U.S. 106 (1940) 18n

Hepburn v. Griswold, 8 Wall. (75 U.S.) 603 (1870) 19n

Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507 (1976) 15n, 22

PAGE

Joseph v. Carter & Weekes Stevedoring Co., 330 U.S. 422 (1947) 23

Kentucky v. Dennison, 24 How. (65 U.S.) 66 (1861) ... 23

Kewin v. Board of Education, 65 Mich. App. 472, 237 N.W.2d 514 (1975)..... 26n

Knapp v. Schweitzer, 357 U.S. 371 (1958) 23

Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944) 15

Legal Tender Cases, Knox v. Lee, 12 Wall. (79 U.S.) 457 (1871) 19n

Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905) 16, 17

Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967) 23

Lutz v. United States, 434 A.2d 442 (Dist. Col. App. 1981)..... 26n

Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977) 26n

Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961)..... 21

Memoirs v. Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413 (1977) 15n

Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923)..... 24

Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973) 15

Minersville School Dist. v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940) 14

Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)..... 5, 9

Moragne v. State Marine Lines, Inc., 398 U.S. 375 (1970) 18n

Muller v. Oregon, 208 U.S. 412 (1908) 16n

Murphy v. Waterfront Comm'n of New York Harbor, 378 U.S. 52 (1964)..... 23

NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449 (1958)..... 24

NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1 (1937)..... 20

PAGE

National League of Cities v. Usery, 426 U.S. 833 (1976) 7, 23, 24n, 26, 27

Newberry v. United States, 256 U.S. 232 (1921) 19n

Orozco v. Texas, 394 U.S. 324 (1969) 10

Owens v. Jennings Municipal Fire & Police Civil Service Bd., 454 So.2d 426 (La. App. 1984) 26n

Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925) 23

Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976) 23n, 25n

Planned Parenthood Assoc. v. Ashcroft, 462 U.S. 476 (1983) 23n, 25n

Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896) 15

Puerto Rico v. Branstad, 107 S. Ct. 2802 (1987) 23

Puget Sound Stevedoring Co. v. Tax Com., 302 U.S. 90 (1937) 23

Ravin v. State, 537 P.2d 494 (Alaska 1975) 26n

Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964) 9

Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980) 24

Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609 (1984) .. 24

Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973) ..... passim

Screws v. United States, 325 U.S. 91 (1945) 22

Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (1969) 24

Simopoulos v. Virginia, 462 U.S. 506 (1983) 25n

Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942) 14, 23

Spector Motor Service v. O'Connor, 340 U.S. 602 (1951) 23

PAGE

State v. Baker, 56 Hawaii 271, 535 P.2d 1394 (1975) ... 26n

State v. Henderson, 269 N.W.2d 404 (Iowa 1978) 26n

State v. Mueller, 66 Hawaii 616, 671 P.2d 1351 (1983) . 26n

State v. Murphy, 117 Ariz. 57, 570 P.2d 1070 (1977) ... 26n

Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Bd. of Education, 402 U.S. 1 (1971) 13

The Belfast, 7 Wall. (74 U.S.) 624 (1869) 19n

The Shreveport Rate Case, Houston, E. & W. T.R. Co. v. United States, 234 U.S. 342 (1914) 16n

Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians & Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986) 23n, 25n

United States v. Classic, 313 U.S. 299 (1941) 19n

United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100 (1941) 22

Vasquez v. Hillery, 474 U.S. 254 (1986) 9, 19, 27

West Virginia State Bd. of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943) 14

Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78 (1970) 18n

Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25 (1949) 7, 21

OTHER AUTHORITIES:

Bennett, Objectivity in Constitutional Law, 132 U. Pa. L. Rev. 445 (1984) 24

Cates & Rochat, Illegal Abortion in the United States, 8 Family Planning Perspectives 2 (1976) 11

PAGE

Fetal Extrauterine Survivability, Report to the New York State Task Force on Life and Law (January 1988) ... 22n

Goldstein, Mother—Love and Abortion (1988) 22n

Gunther, Constitutional Law (11th ed. 1985) 16n

Merritt, The Guarantee Clause and State Autonomy: Federalism for a Third Century, 88 Col. L. Rev. 1 (1988) 24n

Report of the Surgeon General to the President (Jan. 9, 1989) 11

Wasserstrom, The Judicial Decision (1961) 18n

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM 1988

No. 88-605

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,

Appellants,

—v.—

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,

Appellees.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT

BRIEF FOR CERTAIN MEMBERS OF THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES:

SENATOR HOWARD METZENBAUM (D. OH.), SENATOR BOB PACKWOOD (R. OR.), SENATOR BARBARA MIKULSKI (D. MD.), REPRESENTATIVE DON EDWARDS (D. CA.), REPRESENTATIVE BILL GREEN (R. NY), REPRESENTATIVE PATRICIA SCHROEDER (D. CO.), REPRESENTATIVE OLYMPIA SNOWE (R. ME.) AND CERTAIN OTHER MEMBERS OF CONGRESS AS AMICUS CURIAE IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEES

Consent of Parties

Appellants and appellees have consented to the filing of this brief, and their letters of consent are being filed separately herewith.

Interest of Amici

Amici are members of the Congress of the United States as follows:

Members of the United States Senate:

Brock Adams (D. WA.)
Max Baucus (D. MT.)
Jeff Bingaman (D. NM.)
Bill Bradley (D. NJ)
Quentin Burdick (D. N.DK.)
John Chafee (R. RI.)
William Cohen (R. ME.)
Alan Cranston (D. CA.)
Christopher Dodd (D. CT.)
John Glenn (D. OH.)
Daniel Inouye (D. HI.)
Jim Jeffords (R. VT.)
Edward Kennedy (D. MA.)
John Kerry (D. MA.)
Frank Lautenberg (D. NJ)
Patrick Leahy (D. VT.)
Carl Levin (D. MI.)
Spark Matsunaga (D. HI.)
Howard Metzenbaum (D. OH.)
Barbara Mikulski (D. MD.)
Bob Packwood (R. OR.)
Claiborne Pell (D. RI.)
Donald Riegle (D. MI.)
Paul Simon (D. IL.)
Tim Wirth (D. CO.)

Members of the United States House of Representatives:

Gary Ackerman (D. NY)
Dan Akaka (D. HI.)
Glen Anderson (D. CA.)
Chester Atkins (D. MA.)
Les AuCoin (D. OR.)
Jim Bate (D. CA.)
Anthony Beilenson (D. CA.)
Howard Berman (D. CA.)
Sherwood Boehlert (R. NY)
Rick Boucher (D. VA.)
Barbara Boxer (D. CA.)
George Brown (D. CA.)
John Bryant (D. TX.)
Albert Bustamante (D. TX.)
Ben Campbell (D. CO.)
Ben Cardin (D. MD.)
Tom Carper (D. DE.)
William Clay (D. MO.)
Tony Coelho (D. CA.)
Cardiss Collins (D. IL.)
John Conyers (D. MI.)
George Crockett (D. MI.)
Peter DeFazio (D. OR.)
Ron Dellums (D. CA.)
Butter Derrick (D. SC.)
Norman Dicks (D. WA.)
Julian Dixon (D. CA.)
Thomas Downey (D. NY)
Mervyn Dymally (D. CA.)
Don Edwards (D. CA.)
Eliot Engel (D. NY.)
Lane Evans (D. IL.)
Dante Fascell (D. FL.)
Walter Fauntroy (D. DC.)
Vic Fazio (D. CA.)
Harold Ford (D. TN.)
Barney Frank (D. MA.)
Bill Frenzel (R. MN.)

Martin Frost (D. TX.)
Sam Gejdenson (D. CT.)
Benjamin Gilman (R. NY)
William Gray (D. PA.)
Bill Green (R. NY)
Gus Hawkins (D. CA.)
Charles Hayes (D. IL.)
Steny Hoyer (D. MD.)
Nancy Johnson (R. CT.)
Harry Johnston (D. FL.)
Ben Jones (D. GA.)
Jim Jonts (D. IN.)
Robert Kastenmeier (D. WI.)
Joseph Kennedy (D. MA.)
Peter Kostmayer (D. PA.)
Tom Lantos (D. CA.)
Bill Lehman (D. FL.)
Richard Lehman (D. CA.)
Mickey Leland (D. TX.)
Sander Levin (D. MI.)
Mel Levine (D. CA.)
John Lewis (D. GA.)
Nita Lowey (D. NY)
Ronald Machtley (R. RI.)
Edward Markey (D. MA.)
Matt Martinez (D. CA.)
Robert Matsui (D. CA.)
Jim McDermott (D. WA.)
George Miller (D. CA.)
Norman Mineta (D. CA.)
Jim Moody (D. WI.)
Connie Morella (R. MD.)
Bruce Morrison (D. CT.)
Robert Mrazek (D. NY)
Stephen Neal (D. NC.)
Jim Olin (D. VA.)
Major Owens (D. NY)
Donald Payne (D. NJ)
Nancy Pelosi (D. CA.)
Owen Pickett (D. VA.)
Claude Pepper (D. FL.)
J.J. Pickle (D. TX.)
John Porter (R. IL.)
David Price (D. NC.)
Charles Rangel (D. NY)
Charles Rose (D. NC.)
Ed Roybal (D. CA.)
Martin Sabo (D. MN.)
Patricia Saiki (R. HI.)
James Scheuer (D. NY)
Claudine Schneider (R. RI.)
Patricia Schroeder (D. CO.)
Charles Schumer (D. NY)
Christopher Shays (R. CT.)
Dave Skaggs (D. CO.)
Louise Slaughter (D. NY)
Larry Smith (D. FL.)
Peter Smith (R. VT.)
Olympia Snowe (R. ME.)
Stephen Solarz (D. NY)
Pete Stark (D. CA.)
Louis Stokes (D. OH.)
Gerry Studds (D. MA.)
Al Swift (D. WA.)
Esteban Torres (D. CA.)
Robert Torricelli (D. NJ)
Ed Towns (D. NY)
James Traficant (D. OH.)
Mo Udall (D. AZ.)
Jolene Unsoeld (D. WA.)
Henry Waxman (D. CA.)
Ted Weiss (D. NY)
Alan Wheat (D. MO.)
Charles Wilson (D. TX.)
Howard Wolpe (D. MI.)
Ron Wyden (D. OR.)
Sidney Yates (D. IL.)

Members of Congress are sworn to uphold the Constitution of the United States and have an interest in the outcome of this case as members of a coordinate branch of government committed to the preservation of the rule of law. This brief is submitted in the conviction that the interpretation of individual liberties espoused by the Executive Branch is fundamentally at odds with the Constitution, and with the judiciary's role as a principled and independent guardian of constitutional liberties. Moreover, Amici have an institutional interest in the stability of constitutional precedent. Overruling Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), would threaten the repose of the nation. When public sentiment is most sharply divided, the independence of the judiciary is vital. It is precisely the task of this Court to insulate individual rights from the changing winds of politics. As members of a coordinate branch of government, Amici would find themselves in an untenable position with respect to their own responsibilities, both to uphold the Constitution and to urge their constituents and fellow citizens to accept the decisions of the Supreme Court, were a widespread perception to arise that the constitutional protection of rights depends merely on changing political events and the accident of new appointments to the Court. Fundamental rights cannot be subject to the cycles of changing political opinion if the Constitution is to represent the rule of law.

As members of Congress we are concerned that the overruling of Roe v. Wade would criminalize conduct that is now constitutionally protected, resulting in a sudden and unprecedented problem of non-compliance with individual state criminal laws. Congress is ill-equipped to design a national response to this problem. Nor can Congress remedy the patch work of state regulations that will result in burdensome and inequitable treatment of women based on income and, in all likelihood, race. Our respect for the rule of law, along with our recognition of the problems of law enforcement and equality in the administration of justice, lead us to urge this Court to place great weight on stare decisis with regard to Roe v. Wade.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The doctrine of stare decisis plays a central role in constitutional jurisprudence, as it does in the development of the common law or the interpretation of statutes. While recognizing that this Court has, in certain circumstances, determined that earlier cases should no longer be followed, we have concluded that the overruling of Roe v. Wade would be a sharp departure from the articulated principles that have guided this Court's application of the stare decisis doctrine.

For this Court to overturn a prior decision that recognized a fundamental right would be an unprecedented departure from two hundred years of American constitutional history. This tradition enables the judicial system to fulfill its role as a stabilizing force in American society, for there is a significant difference between overturning a decision that denied a right and doing so in order to take one away. Denying a right creates no broader horizon of personal freedom, no promise of a better way of life, and no expectation that the denial of the right will be permanent. Our tradition instead evokes a striving for the realization of rights and an expectation that a fundamental right, once established, will be retained.

In line with this tradition, individuals and institutions adjust to decisions recognizing rights, even if those rights may be modified in the course of normal constitutional litigation. Thus, the police have adjusted their practices to Miranda, the political process to the rule of one-person-one-vote, and the court system to the requirements of Gideon v. Wainright. These are but a few of the many decisions, once thought to be controversial, that have been accepted by individuals, governments, businesses, and other entities, and have become part of the fabric of the nation's daily existence. This Court should not take lightly the historic role of stare decisis in fulfilling the expectations of our people for the continued enjoyment of rights that the judicial process has recognized.

Moreover, the right of privacy, reaffirmed in Roe v. Wade, has a strong tradition in this Court's jurisprudence of fundamental rights. The inclusion within that right of a woman's freedom to terminate a pregnancy was based on decisions of this Court recognizing the right to be free from governmental control over decisions that determine an individual's pattern of life and the importance of free choice in matters of family life, including child rearing and procreation. As a part of this body of judicial precedent, Roe v. Wade warrants strong support under the stare decisis doctrine.

The practical consequences of overruling Roe v. Wade would be far-reaching. Criminalizing abortions will not eliminate them. Since illegal abortions would become commonplace, as was the case before state abortion prohibitions were deemed unconstitutional in 1973, overruling Roe v. Wade would criminalize the conduct of otherwise law-abiding citizens, as well as their physicians and others who assist them. Massive non-compliance can only foster a disrespect for the rule of law. Women with access to money will be able to travel to those states where abortion is legal, replicating the interstate traffic before the liberalizing of divorce laws. Driving abortions underground, or forcing women to travel to have one, will have a particularly cruel and disparate impact on poor women, who consist disproportionately of racial minorities.

Nor would overruling Roe v. Wade diminish the controversy that surrounds the issue of abortion; on the contrary, by shifting the controversy to the political arena, abortion can be expected to be a dominant issue in every legislative election, and in every contest where judges are elected. This Court has effectively adjusted the contours of the right recognized in Roe v. Wade; while the Court's decisions have been criticized and praised by both sides of the controversy, the process has taken the usual course that follows from the unambiguous enunciation of a right not hitherto established. That process should not be abandoned to the harsh arena of divisive single-issue politics.

When this Court has chosen to depart from the doctrine of stare decisis, it is generally because legal and factual changes have eroded the precedential legitimacy of earlier cases. Roe v. Wade, however, is encrusted with none of the frailties that have led to the abandonment of other constitutional decisions of this Court. Here we do not have the changed economic conditions that led to the abandonment of the narrow view of Congress' legislative powers that threatened to shackle the federal government's efforts to combat the Great Depression in the 1930s. Nor does Roe v. Wade resemble cases like Wolf v. Colorado or Betts v. Brady, where the actual functioning of the criminal justice system had demonstrated that new rules were necessary to protect Fourth and Sixth Amendment rights. And, unlike National League of Cities v. Usery, which set forth a rule that the lower courts, and ultimately this Court, found unworkable, Roe v. Wade has been applied in hundreds of cases throughout the country to adjudicate the validity of state laws regulating abortion.

The continuing legal vitality of Roe v. Wade was the basis for this Court's strong belief, expressed in Justice Powell's majority opinion in Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416, 420 n.1 (1983), that Roe v. Wade was entitled to special deference under the rule of stare decisis:

> There are especially compelling reasons for adhering to stare decisis in applying the principles of Roe v. Wade. That case was considered with special care. It was first argued during the 1971 Term, and reargued—with extensive briefing—the following Term. The decision was joined by The Chief Justice and six other Justices. Since Roe was decided in January 1973, the Court repeatedly and consistently has accepted and applied the basic principle that a woman has a fundamental right to make the highly personal choice whether or not to terminate her pregnancy.

Nor have there been any factual developments since 1973 to undermine the conclusion of Roe v. Wade that, prior to the point when a fetus possesses physical qualities to enable it to survive if separated from the womb, no compelling state interest exists for depriving a woman of her right to procreative choice. The recognition of that right has facilitated the movement of women toward full and equal participation in American life. Denying that right would re-impose on this discrete segment of our population a burden that had been lifted by this Court sixteen years ago.

The only ground advanced by those urging this Court to overrule Roe v. Wade is the argument that it was incorrectly decided. In the absence of changes in factual assumptions or of legal developments that undermine the reasoning of the earlier case, this Court has rarely, if ever, overturned a constitutional precedent simply because some members of the Court believe the earlier case to have been incorrectly decided. To do so where a fundamental right is abandoned would be unprecedented. Indeed, the only conclusion members of the public could draw from a decision to overrule Roe is that constitutional rights last only as long as the Court majorities that recognize them.

The doctrine of stare decisis insures that the decisions of this Court, absent compelling circumstances, will remain in effect over long periods of time. The stability of Supreme Court decisions is important to Members of Congress who must persuade their constituents to respect those decisions in spite of shifting political majorities. The abandonment of stare decisis principles in the context of Roe v. Wade would undermine not only the right of privacy but also the rule of law.

ARGUMENT

I

THE DOCTRINE OF STARE DECISIS HAS PLAYED A CENTRAL ROLE IN CONSTITUTIONAL ADJUDICATION

Notwithstanding the attention that the overruling of prior decisions often commands, such occurrences are comparatively rare and should not obscure the powerful influence of precedent in constitutional adjudication. In the words of Justice Frankfurter (Green v. United States, 355 U.S. 184, 215 (1957) (dissenting)):

> We should not be so unmindful, even when constitutional questions are involved, of the principle of stare decisis, by whose circumspect observance the wisdom of this Court as an institution transcending the moment can alone be brought to bear on the difficult problems that confront us.

To be sure, as Justice Brandeis pointed out over fifty years ago, stare decisis cannot be an "inexorable command" in constitutional law, where in most cases the Court alone has the power to modify a past decision. Burnet v. Coronado Oil & Gas Co., 285 U.S. 393, 405, 407 (1932) (Brandeis, J., dissenting). Nonetheless, in certain circumstances the doctrine of stare decisis is clearly of greater importance in constitutional adjudication than it is in non-constitutional adjudication. As the Court has said:

> stare decisis . . . permits society to presume that bedrock principles are founded in the law rather than in the proclivities of individuals, and thereby contributes to the integrity of our constitutional system of government, both in appearance and in fact.

Vasquez v. Hillery, 474 U.S. 254, 265-66 (1986) (emphasis added). Quite plainly, the Court cannot permit the expectation to develop that its pronouncements on "bedrock principles" are final for one Term or one Administration only.

Constitutional decisions often dramatically affect the rights of individuals and the practices of governments. When a constitutional decision, even of the most controversial nature, requires or permits readjustment of people's lives and important social institutions, a strong presumption should and does arise that the decision will be of continuing validity. The police, for example, have adjusted to Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966); the Miranda rules educated American citizens as to their rights upon arrest, and they have established an accepted, working framework in which both law enforcement and adjudication have come to function. The political structure assumes the continued validity of one-person-one-vote. Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962); Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964). The entire political and social fabric of the country accepts

Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), and 349 U.S. 294 (1955). These decisions may have been controversial in their time, but even those who may have disagreed with them now recognize their firm place in American law. When an expansion of constitutional rights has so worked itself into society's machinery, respect for stare decisis must be accorded potent consideration even by those who strenuously disagree with the initial decision. Orozco v. Texas, 394 U.S. 324, 327-28 (1969) (Harlan, J., dissenting) (acquiescing in Miranda). The presumption of long-term adherence to such cases is critical to the authority of this Court and indeed of the Constitution itself. Its dilution would carry with it the significant danger that those who disagree with such decisions will feel increasingly justified in refusing to accept them. The power of precedent is an important enforcement weapon for the branch of the government that has no direct force at its command.

For these and other reasons, the Court has consistently held that, even in constitutional cases, "any departure from stare decisis demands special justification." Arizona v. Rumsey, 467 U.S. 203, 212 (1984). With respect to Roe v. Wade, however, there are special—indeed unique—circumstances compelling adherence to stare decisis.

II

ROE V. WADE IS ENTITLED TO STRONG RESPECT UNDER THE PRINCIPLES OF STARE DECISIS THAT HAVE BEEN FOLLOWED BY THIS COURT

A. The Overruling of Roe v. Wade Would Have Practical Consequences Unlike Those That Have Followed Any Other Decision of This Court.

1. Overruling Roe v. Wade would produce the unprecedented effect of the criminalization of previously constitutionally protected conduct.

Never in two hundred years of constitutional jurisprudence has this Court decided a case as certain to lead to widespread disobedience of criminal laws by otherwise law-abiding citizens as would be a decision overruling Roe v. Wade. Law enforcement officials will be far less able to cope with such disobedience than they were before Roe was decided, when unlawful abortions were disturbingly common—perhaps in excess of one million per year. Report of the Surgeon General to the President 12 (January 9, 1989) (reasonable annual estimate of illegal abortions prior to 1973 would be 200,000 to 1,200,000). See also Cates & Rochat, Illegal Abortions in the United States, 8 Family Planning Perspectives 2 (1976). Disrespect for the rule of law will be inevitable since an entire generation of women has come to maturity believing that the right to reproductive choice was part of the fundamental freedom guaranteed to them by our Constitution. It is unquestionable that hundreds of thousands of women would be subject to criminal sanctions if abortion were criminalized in the states where they live. We can contemplate no constitutional means for policing the actions of individual women seeking secretly to terminate a pregnancy. See Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 485-86 (1965).

Not since the adoption of the Eighteenth Amendment would the country be faced with so sudden a conversion of hundreds of thousands of citizens into law-breakers. Nor is it women alone who would be turned into law-breakers, but also physicians, nurses, and family and friends who would help arrange for abortions. Poor women will inevitably be least able to bear the costs of disobedience, both in price and in health, but there is little doubt that the disobedience will be widespread.

To be sure, all laws are broken to one degree or another, and the fact that theft is so common is by no means an argument for constitutionalizing larceny. But the disobedience that would follow the overturning of Roe v. Wade presents a different issue for the Court. In pondering the role of stare decisis in constitutional decisionmaking, this Court should consider very seriously whether it is appropriate to permit the criminalization of conduct which, by the Court's own decision, has been properly perceived by millions of citizens not only as acceptable, but as protected by a fundamental right.

2. The right of reproductive freedom is particularly ill-suited to a multiplicity of state regulation.

As members of Congress, we reject the suggestion of the brief of the Acting Solicitor General that this Court return the abortion issue to the political agendas of 50 state legislatures, plus perhaps thousands of local governments (cf. Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983)). It would plainly be an unacceptable, indeed irresponsible, application of principles of federalism to permit virtually unrestricted regulation of a choice protected at a minimum against undue burdens imposed by state or local law, as this Court has solidly and repeatedly reaffirmed. For clearly the state regulation envisioned by the Acting Solicitor General would include, in many cases, an outright prohibition of the abortion procedure, possibly with some exceptions, varying from place to place, from the moment of conception. The notion that states would be able to prohibit their citizens from obtaining abortions should Roe be overturned is considerably weakened by the inefficacy—or worse, the unequal efficacy—from which such prohibitions would inevitably suffer in practice.

In the first place, returning the matter to the states would surely lead to an unseemly spectacle of interstate traffic in abortions. Travel by women to distant states to obtain abortions would become a national phenomenon, with abortions most accessible to those with the necessary financial resources and information, while those without such resources and information are relegated to illegality. The phenomenon of an interstate traffic in divorce, which primarily benefitted only some of our citizens, is surely too fresh in the nation's memory to be ignored. And in the case of abortion, those too poor or uninformed to travel would be left, as in the years prior to Roe, to seek unlawful and unregulated abortions, performed by incompetent persons and likely to cause permanent physical injury or even death.

Secondly, a controversy removed from the political agenda will become a political battle in all fifty states, and in every congressional, state and local election, including those for judicial office. The political atmosphere of the country is likely to be dominated by the abortion debate once state regulations criminalizing abortions, properly perceived by the people to have been deemed unconstitutional in Roe v. Wade, is placed on the country's political agenda.

That an issue has generated political controversy should not by itself be considered a ground for judicial intervention, much less constitutional intervention. Indeed, judicial intervention does not assure respite from controversy, whether the Court extends rights (e.g., Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Bd. of Education, 402 U.S. 1 (1971)) or denies them (Dred Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. 393 (1857)). Thus, in 1973 the Roe Court could properly disregard the likelihood that its abortion decision would provoke controversy. In 1989, however, sixteen years after judicial intervention, the situation is quite different.

The Court has adhered to Roe even as the predictable controversy has developed into a divisive battle. In considering whether Roe v. Wade commands deference under stare decisis, very weighty consideration should be given by the Court to its responsibility to hold its course. It would have been misguided federalism, indeed, if the Court had abandoned Brown during the 1960's or 1970's, when the impact of the case, particularly in northern cities, had begun to affect politics at all levels of government. We do not suggest that the Court is precluded from abandoning a decision when its factual and legal premises have been undermined simply because of the controversy it may create. Gobitis (Minersville School Dist. v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940)) was properly replaced by Barnette (West Virginia State Bd. of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)). The overruling of Roe v. Wade, however, is of a different dimension because, by turning this issue back to the states, the stabilizing role that the judicial process plays will be abandoned in favor of political strife necessarily fiercer than existed before the judicial intervention in 1973.

B. OVERRULING ROE V. WADE WOULD CONSTITUTE AN UNPRECEDENTED WITHDRAWAL OF A FUNDAMENTAL RIGHT AFFECTING MILLIONS OF INDIVIDUALS IN A MATTER OF CRITICAL IMPORTANCE TO THEIR LIVES.

Roe v. Wade secured a fundamental right—fundamental not only in the constitutional sense of that term, but also in the sense of the profound role that this right plays in the lives and futures of the women it effects. The right to reproductive choice recognized in Roe and related cases (e.g., Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942), and Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)) has enabled women to control a matter critically affecting the rest of their lives.

There is a clear, inevitable difference between overruling past practice to confer a right and doing so to withdraw a right theretofore recognized. In the former context, no expectations have been created and none will, by consequence, be defeated. In the latter context, people have been given to understand that they possess an entitlement, and in the case of a constitutional right, an unabridgeable entitlement—engendering the firmest possible expectations. While the costs of rejecting stare decisis can be substantial even when the Court confers something new under the authority of the Constitution, they are infinitely greater when it takes back what it has previously given.

This Court's history contains no precedent in which a constitutional right protecting conduct so determinative of so many individuals' futures was first bestowed and then withdrawn. See Appendix, "Survey of Overruled Supreme Court Decisions."[1] Concededly, numerous constitutional decisions of great importance to individuals' lives have later been overruled, superseded by amendment, or effectively discarded. For example, the Dred Scott case, supra, denied African-Americans a right of citizenship that would have profoundly altered their lives, at least in the territories; Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896), enshrined state-imposed racial segregation; the Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883), extinguished for the moment Congress' power to outlaw segregation in places of public accommodation; Goesaert v. Cleary, 335 U.S. 464 (1948), approved legislation that imposed on women a stereotype of dependency and inadequacy; and Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944), upheld the exclusion of Japanese-Americans from their areas of residence during World War II. These were cases, however, in which the Court declined to recognize a constitutional right and thereby left social practices and institutions unaltered.

Comparing Roe v. Wade to these instances in which constitutional precedents did not survive serves only to highlight the difference between Roe and the decisions that were later overruled or discarded. For the groups affected, these decisions created

---

1 To be sure, this Court has on occasion overruled prior decisions that had expanded constitutional rights. Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507 (1976) overruled Amalgamated Food Employees Union v. Logan Valley Plaza, Inc., 391 U.S. 308 (1968), finding that private shopping malls were not the equivalent of "company towns" for First Amendment purposes, and Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973) overruled Memoirs v. Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413 (1977), adjusting the constitutional test for obscenity. But in no such cases was the Court withdrawing an immunity conferred upon conduct that could in any meaningful sense have come to be central to the lives and futures of those affected. These are hardly precedents, therefore, for the complete eradication of the underlying right to terminate a pregnancy.

no better way of life, no release from legal restraints, and no reasonable expectation that new liberties could continue. Roe v. Wade, on the other hand, has substituted choice for state compulsion for millions of women for whom the inability to terminate an unwanted pregnancy had posed a barrier to their full participation in American life. Women throughout the country, and their families, have ordered their lives around the right to reproductive autonomy. Once a decided case has constitutionally secured certain essential choices affecting the lives and relationships of millions of individuals, that case has implicated the weightiest of stare decisis concerns.

This Court's rejection of Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905), cannot conceivably justify an overruling of Roe v. Wade. It is true that the Lochner Court spoke of a "right" of individuals to "make contracts . . . upon such terms as they think best." In reality, however, Lochner established no such right. Subsequent to Lochner, the Court upheld a large number of regulations of prices, wages, rates, and entry into businesses.[2] Thus Lochner, unlike Roe v. Wade, created no general expectation of the right of freedom from governmental restraint in a critically important area of human conduct. Justice Peckham's majority opinion in Lochner asserted no general "freedom of contract." Rather, it emphasized the rights of individuals "to make contracts regarding labor upon such terms as they may think best" and the "freedom of master and employee to contract with each other" with regard to employment. Lochner was wrong in viewing New York's maximum hour law for bakers as essentially a redistributive statute that transferred property from employers to employees. The cases that followed Lochner were wrong in giving such short shrift to the states' justifications for their restrictions on the use of property. These cases typified an era during which the Court often demonstrated a hostility to economic regulation by striking a very pro-business balance between the interest of the state and those of business. This period reached its culmination in the 1930's when the same hostility toward governmental regulation surfaced in a series of cases restricting the power of Congress to deal with the Great Depression. See, e.g., A.L.A. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495 (1935); Carter v. Carter Coal Co., 298 U.S. 238 (1936). When, in the spring of 1937, the Court embarked upon a new era of constitutional interpretation, it was not because a "right" was no longer recognized; rather, the Court decided to strike a different balance between governmental and business interests.

2 See, e.g., The Shreveport Rate Case, Houston, E & W.T.R. Co. v. United States, 234 U.S. 342 (1914); Muller v. Oregon, 208 U.S. 412 (1908); Bunting v. Oregon, 243 U.S. 426 (1917). In fact, while this Court struck down almost 200 state laws in the period from 1905 to 1936, a comprehensive survey concludes that "most challenged laws withstood attack." Gunther, Constitutional Law 453-54 (11th ed. 1985).

The repudiation of the Lochner era was, therefore, a repudiation of the Court's ability to second-guess legislatures as to whether given economic regulations genuinely furthered the public good. It was not the withdrawal of a fundamental freedom remotely comparable to the right established in Roe. To overrule Lochner and hold that states could require bakery owners to operate with 10-hour maximum shifts might have cost the bakery owners money, but it would not have deprived them of a fundamental liberty central to their basic life choices, their most intimate relationships, their very ability to participate in the economic and political sectors of society, and, in many cases, their entire future role in life.

One other case decided by this Court—Brown v. Board of Education, supra—is comparable with Roe in regard to its degree of affirmative impact on the daily lives of American citizens. Brown struck down legally mandated public school segregation and held out the promise, soon fully realized, of the end of all legally mandated segregation in public facilities. The right announced by Brown has become a part of the expectations and the lives of millions of Americans. The overruling of Brown would be as unthinkable to all Americans as the overruling of Roe is to the millions of American women, and for untold millions whose lives are affected by the right recognized in Roe.

This Court has created a substantial body of case law since 1973 delineating the contours of the right recognized in Roe v. Wade. In the course of doing so it has continued to honor the expectations of untold numbers of women that the fundamental right to decide whether to bear a child is constitutionally protected and continues into pregnancy. To eliminate the ground for those expectations would be an unprecedented event in American Constitutional history. Stare decisis "provides the stability and predictability required for the ordering of human affairs over the course of time."[3] We should not take lightly the expectation of our people, based on nearly two centuries of experience, that fundamental rights, once granted, will not be taken away.

III

WHEN THIS COURT HAS OVERTURNED CONSTITUTIONAL PRECEDENTS, IT HAS NOT DONE SO ON THE BASIS OF MERE DISAGREEMENT WITH AN EARLIER CASE, BUT ONLY IN THE PRESENCE OF SPECIAL CIRCUMSTANCES THAT DO NOT APPLY TO ROE V. WADE

The Court has recently said that "special justification" is necessary to permit the overturning of Constitutional prece-

3 Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78, 127 (1970) (Harlan, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). See also Helvering v. Hallock, 309 U.S. 106, 119 (1940) ("[S]tare decisis embodies an important social policy. It represents an element of continuity in law, and is rooted in the psychologic need to satisfy reasonable expectations."); Moragne v. State Marine Lines, Inc., 398 U.S. 375, 403 (1970) ("[V]ery weighty considerations [underlying principle of stare decisis include] the desirability that the law furnish a clear guide for the conduct of individuals, to enable them to plan their affairs with assurance against untoward surprise"); Wasserstrom, The Judicial Decision 66-67 (1961) (adherence to stare decisis is important where people commit themselves to "far-reaching, far from trivial, often irrevocable course of action" in reliance upon the law.) Moreover, arguments for stare decisis take on a certain "moral character": "Having induced persons to act in a certain manner, the legal system could only be blameworthy if it subsequently sought to punish or in any other way thwart the previously announced consequences of action." Id. at 68. The law is bound, in some sense, to respect the moral obligation to keep a promise.

dent. Arizona v. Rumsey, 467 U.S. 203, 212 (1984). See also, Vasquez v. Hillery, 474 U.S. 254, 267 (1986) (O'Connor, J., concurring). No rigid test exists to determine when such special justification is present. Nevertheless, the case law reveals certain recurring patterns of either factual or legal development that have operated to render precedent particularly susceptible to overruling. We are aware of no case where mere disagreement with an earlier case, absent such factual and legal developments, has been the basis for overturning precedent.[4]

A. Changed Conditions.

In the very opinion in which Justice Brandeis cogently articulated the reasons why stare decisis must not be absolute in Constitutional adjudication, he also set forth a framework through which the Court might determine whether a particular constitutional precedent should be open to reconsideration. See, Burnet v. Coronado Oil & Gas Co., 285 U.S. 393, 405-11 (1932) (Brandeis, J., dissenting). Justice Brandeis observed that with respect to many constitutional issues—for example, whether a given 4 There are three instances which might be argued to qualify this conclusion marginally. We believe, however, that none contradicts basic principles of stare decisis. In The Belfast, 7 Wall. (74 U.S.) 624, 641 (1869), this Court rejected certain "remarks" in the earlier case Allen v. Newberry, 21 How. (62 U.S.) 244 (1858), on grounds that those remarks "must be regarded as incorrect." 7 Wall. (74 U.S.) at 641. However, the Court in The Belfast observed that those earlier remarks "were not necessary to [the earlier] decision." Id. The Legal Tender Cases, Knox v. Lee, 12 Wall. (79 U.S.) 457, 553 (1871), overruled Hepburn v. Griswold, 8 Wall. (75 U.S.) 603 (1870), apparently because the earlier case was, in this Court's view, incorrectly decided. As the Court observed, however, Hepburn was decided "by a court having a less number of judges than the law then in existence provided this court shall have," and that the type of questions, concerning "constitutional power," at issue in the case normally are not to be decided "in the absence of a full court." 12 Wall. (79 U.S.) at 553-554. In United States v. Classic, 313 U.S. 299, 317 (1941), this Court reached a conclusion different from the plurality opinion in Newberry v. United States, 256 U.S. 232 (1921). However, because no majority opinion was promulgated for the Court in Newberry, the Court in Classic stated that the constitutional issue in question had "not been prejudged by any decision of this Court." 313 U.S. at 317.

statutory classification has a rational basis under the Equal Protection Clause—the Court's decision:

> is dependent upon the determination of what in legal parlance is called a fact, as distinguished from the declaration of a rule of law. When the underlying fact has been found, the legal result follows inevitably. The circumstance that the decision of that fact is made by a court, instead of by a jury, should not be allowed to obscure its real character.

Id. at 410-11 (emphasis added). In such instances, Justice Brandeis reasoned, the doctrine of stare decisis ought not to apply with full force.

> But the decision of the court, if, in essence, merely the determination of a fact, is not entitled, in later controversies between other parties, to that sanction which, under the policy of stare decisis, is accorded to the decision of a proposition purely of law. For not only may the decision of the fact have been rendered upon an inadequate presentation of then existing conditions, but the conditions may have changed meanwhile.

Id. at 412 (emphasis added) (citations omitted).

Consistent with Justice Brandeis' view, many of the cases in which this Court has exercised the power to overrule constitutional precedent have been instances in which the Court has had to come to grips with changing national conditions. Thus the inescapable fact of the Great Depression overtook the Lochner era, and in the same period, a different understanding of the degree to which each state's economy was tied to the economy as a whole led to the discarding of narrow constructions of the Commerce Clause. See, e.g., NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1 (1937).

Factual developments may also weaken precedents when a case implicitly rested on assumptions about the future that prove to be untrue. This Court reversed its decision not to enter the legislative reapportionment fray when it became apparent that state legislatures themselves were incapable of correcting their malapportioned structure. See Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962), rev'g Colegrove v. Green, 328 U.S. 549 (1946). Similarly, the denial of the exclusionary rule in state criminal cases was overruled when the Court became convinced that the underlying factual assumption of Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25 (1949)—that the guarantees of the Fourth Amendment would be secured by other, less drastic remedies—had proven false in practice. See, Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961).

By contrast, the recognition of a fundamental right under the Constitution is, in Justice Brandeis' phrase, "a proposition purely of law." Such was the holding of Roe v. Wade: that a woman has a fundamental right under the Constitution to make her own child-bearing decisions, and that, until the fetus has attained viability, her right to terminate a pregnancy is constitutionally guaranteed against state proscription or undue regulation. Even after viability, this court has held, where a woman's life or health is endangered, the woman's ability to safeguard her life or health must take precedence. Applications of this legal rule—questions of ascertaining viability or analyzing the burdensomeness of particular regulations—may be factual, but the critical holding of Roe v. Wade was without question "a declaration of a rule of law." Burnet, supra, 285 U.S. at 410-11 (Brandeis, J., dissenting). As such it is entitled to the strongest deference under the doctrine of stare decisis. Id.

As a rule of law, moreover, the central holding of Roe is not, and need not be, dependent on transitory factual assumptions. Roe determined that "[a]t some point in pregnancy, [the State's] respective interests [in safeguarding health, in maintaining medical standards, and in protecting potential life] become sufficiently compelling to sustain regulation of the factors that govern the abortion decision." 410 U.S. at 154. The point prior to which no such state interest is sufficiently compelling can be defined without reference to developments in technology or medical opinion, for there is an unalterable point in pregnancy—a biological developmental threshold—prior to which fetal organ systems are simply insufficiently developed to allow survival outside a womb.[5] Now, as in 1973, "[n]eonates less than 24 weeks gestational age have close to a 0% survivability rate."[6] While "it is likely that technological advances in the care of newborns will enhance survival at each gestational age above 24 weeks," such technology "will not lower the threshold for fetal extrauterine survival."[7] Thus, Roe's holding—that there is a point prior to which no state interest will justify an infringement on a woman's right to reproductive choice—has not been undermined by any medical or technological development.

B. Legal Developments.

There are also instances in which the legal framework surrounding a precedent has led inexorably to its overruling. Such is the case where a precedent has become a mere "sport in the law, . . . inconsistent with what preceded and what followed." Screws v. United States, 325 U.S. 91, 112 (1945) (plurality opinion); see also United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100 (1941), overruling Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 251 (1918). Similarly, where a previously announced legal standard is upheld only in principle and invariably excepted in practice, the Court has seen fit to revisit the prior decision. See, e.g., Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963) (overruling Betts v. Brady, 316 U.S. 455 (1942)).

In some instances, subsequent decisions will have convincingly "undermined the reasoning" of an earlier one; then, too, the older case may be cast aside. See, Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507 (1976) (overruling Amalgamated Food Employees

5 Prior to the twenty-third week of gestation, the brain, the kidneys, and the lungs are not sufficiently matured to perform the mutually sustaining functions that allow extra-wombal survival. See Fetal Extrauterine Survivability, Report to the New York State Task Force on Life and Law 9 (January 1988); Goldstein, Mother-Love and Abortion, 25 (1988). See also Brief Amicus Curiae of the American Medical Association.

6 Fetal Extrauterine Survivability, supra, at 10.

7 Id. at 12.

Union v. Logan Valley Plaza, Inc., 391 U.S. 308 (1968)); Ferguson v. Skrupa, 372 U.S. 726, 731 (1963) (overruling Adams v. Tanner, 244 U.S. 590 (1917)); Murphy v. Waterfront Comm'n of New York Harbor, 378 U.S. 52, 57, 77 (1964) (overruling Knapp v. Schweitzer, 357 U.S. 371 (1958), and Feldman v. United States, 322 U.S. 487 (1944)); Puerto Rico v. Branstad, 107 S. Ct. 2802, 2808 (1987) (overruling Kentucky v. Dennison, 24 How. (65 U.S.) 66 (1861)). Similarly, in the area of state taxation of interstate businesses, the rules in earlier cases were found, by experience, to have no relationship to their objective of protecting such businesses from burdensome state taxes. See Complete Auto Transit v. Brady, 430 U.S. 274 (1977) (overruling Spector Motor Service v. O'Connor, 340 U.S. 602 (1951)); Dept. of Revenue v. Association of Washington Stevedoring Cos., 435 U.S. 734 (1978) (overruling Puget Sound Stevedoring Co. v. Tax Com., 302 U.S. 90 (1937) and Joseph v. Carter & Weekes Stevedoring Co., 330 U.S. 422 (1947). In all these cases, the Court is in effect burying a doctrine or decision that is already legally dead.

The same cannot be said of the woman's right to autonomy in her reproductive decisions recognized in Roe v. Wade. Roe did not deviate from prior law, nor has it been followed by inconsistent law. Roe recognized a right to choose whether to bear a child, which stems directly from the Court's previous decisions identifying the right to procreation, Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942), rights to child-rearing, Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925), rights to marriage, Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1, 12 (1967), and rights to contraceptive choice, Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965) and Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972). Subsequently, Roe has been used repeatedly by this Court to overturn legislation,[8] unlike National League of Cities v. Usery, 426 U.S. 833 (1976), which was never used by this Court to strike another law before it was overturned by Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, 469 U.S. 528 (1985).[9] Cases holding that public funding of abortions is not required by Roe did not question the fundamental right to choose recognized in Roe, but simply concluded that this right did not preclude the state from allocating public funds in accordance with a preference for childbirth over abortion. Roe is clearly a step in the development of a larger body of law and, as such, fits neatly into an institutional continuum. See Bennett, Objectivity in Constitutional Law, 132 U. Pa. L. Rev. 445, 485-86 (1984).

8 Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians & Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986); Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983); Planned Parenthood Assoc. v. Ashcroft, 462 U.S. 476 (1983); Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379 (1979); Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622 (1979); Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976).

The core principle of Roe v. Wade is that the right to decide whether or not to bear a child is a fundamental right, protected against state laws by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, and that it survives the onset of pregnancy. It cannot seriously be argued that, by identifying as "fundamental" a right not specifically enumerated in the constitution, the Court departed from its constitutional role. In addition to the rights pertaining to family and stated decisions already referred to, the Court has through its history identified and protected many unenumerated rights not supported by specific text or history. Among them are the important right of freedom of association (e.g., NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449 (1958), progressing to the rights identified in Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609, 617-8 (1984)), the equal protection component of the Fifth Amendment (e.g., Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497 (1954)), the right to travel between states (Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (1969)), Crandall v. Nevada, 6 Wall. (73 U.S.) 35 (1868)), the right to attend and report on criminal trials (Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980)), and the right to choose and follow a profession (Gibson v. Berryhill, 411 U.S. 564 (1973), Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923)). Surely the right to decide whether to bear a child is as fundamental, and of as compelling importance, to the woman as any of these rights to the individuals and institutions involved.

9 National League of Cities deviated from prior law, and was not strengthened by later decisions. See Merritt, The Guarantee Clause and State Autonomy: Federalism for a Third Century, 88 Col. L. Rev. 1, 12-13 (1988).

Nor can it persuasively be argued that Roe has been unworkable or unmanageable. Roe had been consistently applied by this Court to overturn state requirements for spousal consent,[10] parental consent to abortions for minors,[11] particular procedures regarding "viable" fetuses,[12] requirements unrelated to maternal health for second trimester abortions,[13] and dissemination of information for consent or information to discourage women choosing abortions.[14] The Court has scrutinized regulation based on the state interest in maternal health without difficulty, resulting in consistent holdings.[15] These holdings are not

10 Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976).

11 Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976), Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622 (1979), Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983).

12 Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians & Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986); Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983); Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379 (1979); Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976).

13 Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983); Planned Parenthood Assoc. v. Ashcroft, 462 U.S. 476 (1983); Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976).

14 Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians & Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986); Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983).

15 For example, in Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52, 101-2 (1976), Justice Stevens, concurring in this part of the Court's opinion, stated that "a prohibition of the saline amniocentesis procedure was almost tantamount to a prohibition of any abortion in the State after the first 12 weeks of pregnancy", and therefore could not stand. The Court has consistently held that regulations requiring second trimester abortions to take place in hospitals are unconstitutional, Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983); Planned Parenthood Assoc. v. Ashcroft, 462 U.S. 476 (1983), but has upheld regulation requiring second trimester abortions to take place in a hospital or clinic. Simopoulos v. Virginia, 462 U.S. 506 (1983).

made unworkable by any technological advances increasing the safety of abortion that may in time extend the period in which a woman's right to choose to bear a child may not be curtailed by the state's concern for maternal health.[16] The funding cases[17] turned on the majority's conclusion that the funding regulations did not unduly burden the right recognized in Roe. Disagreement within this Court in these cases does not mean that Roe is "unworkable," but instead reflects disagreement over the scope of Roe's holding. In contrast to Roe, National League of Cities, supra, was found unmanageable both by the lower courts and by the Supreme Court because courts were unable to draw any principled distinction between traditional government functions and non-traditional government functions. Later decisions only confused that distinction, leading to the demise

16 Nor has Roe proven unworkable to the lower courts. It has been cited by them in various contexts approximately 2000 times, and has been relied on in numerous published opinions of the state attorneys general. Courts have found Roe useful in developing meaningful and reliable legal distinctions. An unpublished Rutgers-based survey, supervised by Professor Norma Davenport, shows that hundreds of state and lower federal courts have interpreted Roe not only to support a woman's right to choose to have an abortion, but also to provide authority for the determination of other privacy rights. See, e.g., Drollinger v. Millingan, 552 F.2d 1220, 1227 (7th Cir. 1977) (fundamental right to family relationship); Owens v. Jennings Municipal Fire & Police Civil Service Bd., 454 So.2d 426 (La. App. 1984) (right of female police officer to continue work after unwed pregnancy); Kewin v. Board of Education, 65 Mich. App. 472, 237 N.W.2d 514, 519 (1975) (mandatory pregancy leave overburdens constitutional right). Concurrently, courts have used Roe to distinguish this privacy right from other claims presented to the courts. For example, courts have found that the constitutional right to privacy does not encompass the right to smoke marijuana, see, e.g., Ravin v. State, 537 P.2d 494, 500, 502 (Alaska 1975); State v. Murphy, 117 Ariz. 57, 570 P.2d 1070 (1977); State v. Baker, 56 Hawaii 271, 535 P.2d 1394, 1401 (1975), or the right to prostitution, see, e.g., State v. Mueller, 66 Hawaii 616, 671 P.2d 1351, 1355, 1359 (1983); Lutz v. United States, 434 A.2d 442, 445 (Dist. Col. App. 1981); State v. Henderson, 269 N.W.2d 404, 406 (Iowa 1978).

17 Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977), Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980).

of National League of Cities in Garcia v. Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, supra.

* * * * *

Thus the cases are varied, but "the careful observer" of this Court's constitutional decisions "will discern that any detours from the straight path of stare decisis in our past have occurred for articulable reasons, and only when the Court has felt obliged 'to bring its opinions into agreement with experience and with facts newly ascertained.' " Vasquez, supra, 474 U.S. at 266 (quoting Burnet, supra, 285 U.S. at 412 (Brandeis, J., dissenting)). Roe v. Wade agrees today as fully as it did in 1973 with both the experience and the facts of criminalized abortion. Neither factual nor legal developments have in any way weakened its fundamental holding.

Conclusion

There is no precedent in the two hundred years of this Court's history for overruling a decision recognizing a fundamental right. Roe v. Wade recognized a fundamental right solidly based in constitutional principles and precedent. There are present here none of the reasons, such as changed circumstances or legal doctrine, relied on by this Court in the past for departing from the principles of stare decisis. We urge, therefore, that Roe v. Wade should be re-affirmed, as it was in 1983 and 1986, in Akron and Thornburgh, and that the debate over the continued validity of its core principles be put to rest.

Respectfully submitted,

/s/ BURKE MARSHALL
BURKE MARSHALL*
127 Wall Street
New Haven, Connecticut 06520

/s/ NORMAN REDLICH
NORMAN REDLICH*
STEPHEN R. NEUWIRTH
Wachtell, Lipton, Rosen & Katz
299 Park Avenue
New York, New York 10171

Attorneys for Certain Members of Congress as Amicus Curiae

* Counsel of Record

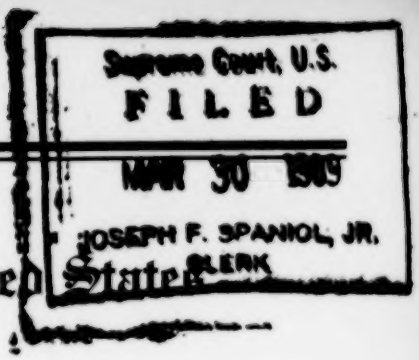
APPENDIX

No. 88-605



IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,

Appellants,

—v.—

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,

Appellees.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT

APPENDIX
TO THE BRIEF FOR CERTAIN MEMBERS OF THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES: SENATOR HOWARD METZENBAUM (D. OH.), SENATOR BOB PACKWOOD (R. OR.), SENATOR BARBARA MIKULSKI (D. MD.), REPRESENTATIVE DON EDWARDS (D. CA.), REPRESENTATIVE BILL GREEN (R. NY), REPRESENTATIVE PATRICIA SCHROEDER (D. CO.), REPRESENTATIVE OLYMPIA SNOWE (R. ME.), AND CERTAIN OTHER MEMBERS OF CONGRESS AS AMICUS CURIAE IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEES

BURKE MARSHALL*
127 Wall Street
New Haven, Connecticut 06520
(202) 432-4953

NORMAN REDLICH*
STEPHEN R. NEUWIRTH
Wachtell, Lipton, Rosen & Katz
299 Park Avenue
New York, New York 10171
(212) 371-9200

Attorneys for Certain Members of Congress as Amicus Curiae

Counsel of Record*

March 30, 1989

TABLE OF CONTENTS

PAGE

Explanation of Symbols A-1

Survey of Overruled Supreme Court Decisions A-2

SURVEY OF OVERRULED SUPREME COURT DECISIONS*

Categories of Cases:

COM. = Common law question
STAT. = Statute under consideration
CONST. = Constitutional question

Codes (For Constitutional Cases Only):

I = overruled case inconsistent with other authorities (usually prior or subsequent U.S. Supreme Court cases, Congress or "other English-speaking courts")
C = changed conditions (social, economic, etc.) since date of overruled case
L = overruling based on lessons of experience (e.g. unworkable rules of overruled case)
D = divided court (or court with less than full allotment of justices) reached overruled decision
F = lack of full consideration of issue in overruled case
W = overruled case widely criticized

---

* Based on research undertaken by Carl Willner, Esq., Wilmer, Cutler & Pickering, 2445 M Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20037. This Appendix contains a summary of cases overruled by decisions of this Court. It is intended to be inclusive, although the determination of whether a decision overrules an earlier one is frequently a matter of interpretation. It is therefore possible that some overrulings have been omitted because the overruling decisions did not explicitly indicate the Court's intention, or for some other inadvertent reason.

 Codes are in parentheses where the Court's opinion does not state grounds for overruling an earlier decision, but where the grounds for overruling are implicit in the context of the opinion.

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
1. COM.	Hudson & Smith v. Guestier, 6 Cr. (10 U.S.) 281, 285 (1810)	Rose v. Himley, 4 Cr. (8 U.S.) 241 (1808)	Whether French tribunal had seizure jurisdiction over vessel and cargo condemned and sold at auction while in port of another nation. (yes)
2. STAT.	Gordon v. Ogden, 3 Pet. (28 U.S.) 33, 34 (1830)	Wilson v. Daniel, 3 Dall. (3 U.S.) 401 (1798)	Whether, when plaintiff moves to dismiss appeal to Supreme Court for lack of jurisdictional amount, the amount in controversy is determined by judgment actually recovered rather than amount plaintiff had sought. (yes)
3. STAT.	Greene v. Lessee of Neal, 6 Pet. (31 U.S.) 291 (1832)	Patton's Lessee v. Easton, 1 Wheat. (14 U.S.) 476 (1816); Powell v. Harmon, 2 Pet. (27 U.S.) 241 (1829)	Whether statute of limitations in Tennessee for adverse possession of land requires that the possessor show a connected title to a grant. (no)
4. STAT.	United States v. Percheman, 7 Pet. (32 U.S.) 51 (1833)	Foster v. Elam, 2 Pet. (27 U.S.) 253 (1829)	Whether language in treaty ceding Florida to the United States providing that grants of land "shall be ratified and confirmed" to persons in possession of them was self-executing rather than contractual commitment requiring further legislative action. (yes)
5. CONST. L, I	Louisville, C. & C.R. Co. v. Letson, 2 How. (43 U.S.) 497, 554-556 (1844)	Commercial & Railroad Bank v. Slocomb, 14 Pet. (39 U.S.) 60 (1840); Strawbridge v. Curtiss, 3 Cr. (7 U.S.) 267 (1806); and qualifying, Bank of U.S. v. Deveaux, 5 Cr. (9 U.S.) 61 (1809)	Whether federal courts have jurisdiction over a suit between a citizen of one state and a corporation created by and transacting business in another state, without regard to the citizen-

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
			ship of the corporation's members. (yes)
6. CONST. C	The Propeller Genessee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How. (53 U.S.) 443, 456 (1852)	The S.B. Thomas Jefferson, 10 Wheat. (23 U.S.) 428 (1825); The S.B. Orleans v. Phoebus, 11 Pet. (36 U.S.) 175 (1837)	Whether the admiralty jurisdiction of the federal courts extends to all lakes and navigable waters rather than merely the high seas and tidewaters. (yes)
7. STAT.	Gazzam v. Lessee of Phillips, 20 How. (61 U.S.) 372, 377-378 (1858)	Lessee of Brown v. Clements, 3 How. (44 U.S.) 650 (1845)	Whether surveyor-general required to lay out fractional section of land grant in half-quarter sections in all practicable cases. (no)
8. COM.	Suydam v. Williamson, 24 How. (65 U.S.) 427, 431-35 (1861)	Williamson v. Berry, 8 How. (49 U.S.) 495 (1850); Williamson v. Irish Presbyterian Congregation, 8 How. (49 U.S.) 565 (1850); Williamson v. Ball, 8 How. (49 U.S.) 566 (1850)	Whether life tenant conferred valid title to property in New York upon purchaser. (yes)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
9. COM.	Mason v. Eldred, 6 Wall. (73 U.S.) 231, 236-38 (1868)	Sheehy v. Mandeville & Jameson, 6 Cr. (10 U.S.) 253 (1810)	Whether a judgment against one party to a joint contract bars subsequent action against the other parties to that contract under common law. (yes)
10. CONST. D	The Belfast, 7 Wall. (74 U.S.) 624, 641 (1869)	Allen v. Newberry, 21 How. (62 U.S.) 244 (1858) (in part)	Whether admiralty jurisdiction extends to commerce on navigable waters within a single state. (yes)
11. CONST. D	Knox v. Lee (Legal Tender Cases), 12 Wall. (79 U.S.) 457, 553 (1871)	Hepburn v. Griswold, 8 Wall. (75 U.S.) 603 (1870)	Whether Legal Tender Acts authorizing use of paper money as legal tender are constitutional as to contracts made before their enactment. (yes)
12. STAT.	Trebilcock v. Wilson, 12 Wall. (79 U.S.) 687 (1872)	Roosevelt v. Meyer, 1 Wall. (68 U.S.) 512 (1863)	Whether Supreme Court had jurisdiction, under judiciary Act if 1867,

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
			over appeal from state court judgment in which constitutional issue raised by defendant unsuccessfully to challenge federal statute. (yes)
13. CONST. I	Thompson v. Whitman, 18 Wall. (85 U.S.) 457, 464 (1874)	Landes v. Brant, 10 How. (51 U.S.) 348 (1850)	Whether full faith and credit precludes collateral attack on another state's judgment for want of jurisdiction. (no)
14. STAT.	Hornbuckle v. Toombs, 18 Wall. (85 U.S.) 648, 652-653 (1874)	Noonan v. Lee, 2 Bl. (67 U.S.) 499 (1863); Orchard v. Hughes, 1 Wall (68 U.S.) 73, 77 (1864); Dunphy v. Kleinsmith, 11 Wall. (78 U.S.) 610 (1871)	Whether territorial courts are permitted by Congress to combine legal and equitable jurisdiction in one action. (yes)
15. STAT.	Railway Co. v. McShane, 22 Wall. (89 U.S.) 444 (1874)	Railway Co. v. Prescott, 16 Wall. (83 U.S.) 603 (1873) (in part)	Whether lands granted to railroad were exempt from state taxation

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
			because of the government's contingent right of preemption. (no)
16. CONST. of state I	County of Cass v. Johnston, 95 U.S. 360 (1877)	Harshman v. Bates County, 92 U.S. 569 (1876)	Whether state statute authorizing townships to subscribe to railroad stock following a popular vote violated provisions of the Missouri constitution. (no)
17. CONST. of state I	Fairfield v. County of Gallatin, 100 U.S. 47 (1879)	Concord v. Portsmouth Sav. Bank, 92 U.S. 625 (1876)	Whether donations by counties and municipalities to railroad companies prohibited by Illinois constitution even where authorized by popular vote under preexisting law before constitutional restriction adopted. (no)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
18. STAT.	Tilghman v. Proctor, 102 U.S. 707 (1881)	Mitchell v. Tilghman, 19 Wall. (86 U.S.) 287 (1874)	Whether a patent was properly granted for a manufacturing process, regardless of the particular mode or apparatus specified for putting it into effect. (yes)
19. CONST. I	Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U.S. 168, 196-200 (1881)	Anderson v. Dunn, 6 Wheat. (19 U.S.) 204 (1821)	Whether Congress has a general power to punish for contempt. (no)
20. STAT.	United States v. Phelps, 107 U.S. 320, 323 (1883)	Shelton v. Collector, 5 Wall. (72 U.S.) 113, 118 (1867)	Whether claim for reduction of customs duty on goods by reason of damage sustained during voyage of importation could be allowed after goods already entered at full value at customs. (yes)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
21. STAT.	Kountze v. Omaha Hotel Co., 107 U.S. 378, 387 (1883)	Stafford v. Union Bank of Louisiana, 16 How. (57 U.S.) 135 (1854)	Whether appeal bond in foreclosure suit in federal courts operates as security for entire amount of mortgage debt. (no)
22. COM.	Morgan v. United States, 113 U.S. 476, 496 (1885)	Texas v. White, 7 Wall. (74 U.S.) 700 (1869)	Whether legislature could limit negotiability of bonds payable to bearer by statute of which all subsequent purchasers charged with notice. (no)
23. CONST. F, I	Wabash, S.L. & P. R. Co. v. Illinois, 118 U.S. 557, 567 (1886)	Peik v. Chicago & N.W. Ry. Co., 94 U.S. 164 (1877) (substantially though not expressly overruled)	Whether portion of interstate railroad transportation within a state is "interstate" commerce for which states may not regulate charges. (yes)
24. CONST. I	Philadelphia & Southern Mail S.S. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 122 U.S. 326, 340-46 (1887)	State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts, 15 Wall. (82 U.S.) 284 (1873) (basic grounds of decision repudiated)	Whether state tax upon gross receipts of steamship company engaged in interstate commerce is prohibited by commerce clause. (yes)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
25. CONST. I	In re Ayers, 123 U.S. 443 (1887)	Osborn v. Bank of the United States, 9 Wheat. (22 U.S.) 738 (1824)	Whether applicability of 11th Amend. is limited to situations where state is a party on record. (no)
26. CONST. I	Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U.S. 640, 647 (1888)	Osborne v. Mobile, 16 Wall. (83 U.S.) 479 (1873)	Whether state license tax imposed on all operations of a company engaged in interstate commerce violates commerce clause. (yes)
27. CONST. I	Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U.S. 100, 118 (1890)	Thurlow v. Massachusetts, 5 How. (46 U.S.) 504 (1847)	Whether state prohibition of sale of intoxicating liquors, as applied to imported liquors in original containers, violates commerce clause. (yes)
28. STAT.	Brenham v. German-American Bank, 144 U.S. 173, 187 (1892)	Rogers v. Burlington, 3 Wall. (70 U.S.) 654 (1866); Mitchell v. Burlington, 4 Wall. (71 U.S.) 270 (1867)	Whether city had power to issue negotiable bonds, based on general authority to borrow, absent spe-

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
			cific authority granted by legislature. (no)
29. STAT.	Roberts v. Lewis, 153 U.S. 367, 377 (1894)	Giles v. Little, 104 U.S. 291 (1881)	Whether under Nebraska law a will devising property should be construed to devise a fee simple estate, even absent specific words of inheritance. (yes)
30. CONST. I	Pollock v. Farmer's Loan & Trust Co., 158 U.S. 601 (1895)	Hylton v. United States, 3 Wall. (3 U.S.) 171 (1796)	Whether a tax on property, or income from property, is a direct tax that must be apportioned among the states. (yes)
31. CONST. C	Garland v. Washington, 232 U.S. 642, 646 (1914)	Crain v. United States, 162 U.S. 625 (1896)	Whether failure to arraign defendant in state criminal proceedings is deprivation of due process. (no)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
32. CONST. STAT. I	United States v. Nice, 241 U.S. 591, 601 (1916)	Re Heff, 197 U.S. 488 (1905)	Whether an Indian who had received a land allotment pursuant to the General Allotment Act of 1887 was released from national guardianship and became subject to state jurisdiction, so that federal prohibition on sale of liquor to him was unconstitutional. (no)
33. CONST. I	Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Towers, 245 U.S. 6, 17 (1917)	Lake Shore & M.S. R. Co. v. Smith, 173 U.S. 684 (1899) (in part)	Whether state regulation of carrier's intrastate rates so as to impose special charges for certain customers, where rates imposed are reasonable and carrier had initially voluntarily established rates for service, is deprivation of property without due process. (no)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
34. COM.	Rosen v. United States, 245 U.S. 467, 470 (1918)	United States v. Reid, 12 How. (53 U.S.) 361 (1851)	Whether witness previously convicted of crime was competent to testify against his co-defendants although such testimony not allowed at common law in 1789. (yes)
35. STAT.	Boston Store of Chicago v. American Graphophone Co., 246 U.S. 8, 25 (1918); and Motion Picture Patents Co. v. Universal Film Mfg. Co., 243 U.S. 502, 518 (1917)	Henry v. A. B. Dick Co., 224 U.S. 1 (1912)	Whether patent holder may continue to impose restrictions on use or resale of patented machine after sale. (no)
36. CONST. I	Eisner v. Macomber, 252 U.S. 189 (1920)	Collector v. Hubbard, 12 Wall. (79 U.S.) 1 (1871)	Whether Congress has power to tax stock dividends or accumulated earnings as income of the stockholder without apportionment. (no)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
37. CONST. I	Terral v. Burke Constr. Co., 257 U.S. 529, 533 (1922)	Doyle v. Continental Ins. Co., 94 U.S. 535 (1877); Security Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Prewitt, 202 U.S. 246 (1906)	Whether a state law revoking a foreign corporation's license to do business because the corporation resorts to federal courts in the state violates right of access to federal courts. (yes)
38. STAT.	Lee v. Chesapeake & O.R. Co., 260 U.S. 653, 659 (1923)	Ex Parte Wisner, 203 U.S. 449 (1906); and qualifying, In re Moore, 209 U.S. 490 (1908)	Whether an action brought by citizens of different states in a court of a state where neither is a citizen is removable to federal court in district where suit pending. (yes)
39. CONST. I	Alpha Portland Cement Co. v. Massachusetts, 268 U.S. 203, 218 (1925)	Baltic Mining Co. v. Massachusetts, 231 U.S. 68 (1913)	Whether a state excise tax imposed on a foreign corporation which does only interstate business within the state violates

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
			the commerce clause and 14th Amend. in taxing property beyond state's borders. (yes)
40. COM.	Gleason v. Seaboard A.L.R. Co., 278 U.S. 349, 357 (1929)	Friedlander v. Texas & P.R. Co., 130 U.S. 416 (1889) (in part)	Whether principal is exempted from responsibility for representations of agent where agent has secret purpose to be benefit himself. (no)
41. CONST. L, I	Farmers Loan & Trust Co. v. Minnesota, 280 U.S. 204, 209 (1930)	Blackstone v. Miller, 188 U.S. 189 (1903)	Whether inheritance tax imposed on negotiable bonds and certificates of indebtedness by issuing state violates 14th Amend. due process where bonds and certificates are owned by person domiciled in another state and kept there. (yes)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
42. CONST. I, F	East Ohio Gas Co. v. Tax Com. of Ohio, 283 U.S. 465, 472 (1931)	Pennsylvania Gas Co. v. Pub. Service Com., 252 U.S. 23 (1920)	Whether gas flowing through pipelines from outside state ceases to constitute interstate commerce and becomes subject to state excise tax when it passes into local distribution systems for delivery to customers. (yes)
43. STAT.	Chicago & E.I.R. Co. v. Industrial Com. of Illinois, 284 U.S. 296 (1932)	Erie R. Co. v. Collins, 253 U.S. 77 (1920); Erie R. Co. v. Szary, 253 U.S. 86 (1920)	Whether railway employee who suffered injury in oiling motor used to hoist coal into chute for locomotives was engaged in interstate transportation within coverage of FELA. (no)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
44. CONST. I	Fox Film Corp. v. Doyal, 286 U.S. 123 (1932)	Long v. Rockwood, 277 U.S. 142 (1928)	Whether royalties on copyrights and patents may be taxed by the states. (yes)
45. COM.	Funk v. United States, 290 U.S. 371, 373, 386 (1933); See also: Hawkins v. United States, 358 U.S. 74, 76 (1958)	Stein v. Bowman, 13 Pet. (38 U.S.) 209 (1839) (in part); Hendrix v. United States, 219 U.S. 79 (1911); Jin Fuey Moy v. United States, 254 U.S. 189 (1920)	Whether in federal court the spouse of a criminal defendant is competent to testify on the defendant's behalf. (yes)
46. STAT.	United States v. Hastings, 296 U.S. 188, 194 (1935)	United States v. Stevenson, 215 U.S. 190 (1909)	Whether government can appeal from district court decision quashing an indictment upon an independent ground in addition to invalidity or construction of statute. (no)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
47. CONST. I, C	West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish, 300 U.S. 379 (1937)	Adkins v. Children's Hospital of District of Columbia, 261 U.S. 525 (1923); Morehead v. N.Y. ex rel. Tipaldo, 298 U.S. 587 (1936)	Whether state regulation of minimum wages for women violates 14th Amend. substantive due process. (no)
48. CONST. I	Helvering v. Mountain Producers Corp., 303 U.S. 376 (1938)	Gillespie v. Oklahoma, 257 U.S. 501 (1922); Burnet v. Coronado Oil & Gas Co., 285 U.S. 393 (1932)	Whether profits of private party from operations under a government lease or contract may be subjected to nondiscriminatory tax by other governmental units. (yes)
49. CONST. L	Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64, 69, 79 (1938)	Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. (41 U.S.) 1 (1842)	Whether federal court exercising diversity jurisdiction must apply substantive law of state rather than federal common law. (yes)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
50. CONST. I	Graves v. New York, 306 U.S. 466 (1939)	Dobbins v. Commissioners of Erie County, 16 Pet. (41 U.S.) 435 (1842); Collector v. Day, 11 Wall. (78 U.S.) 113 (1871); N.Y. ex rel. Rogers v. Graves, 299 U.S. 410 (1937); Brush v. Commissioner, 300 U.S. 352 (1937)	Whether income of government employees may be subject to nondiscriminatory income tax by other governmental units. (yes)
51. CONST. STAT. L, I	Rochester Tel. Corp. v. United States, 307 U.S. 125 (1939)	Procter & Gamble Co. v. United States, 225 U.S. 282 (1912)	Whether federal courts have jurisdiction to review "negative orders" of administrative agencies which refuse to direct conduct by a third person with respect to complainant. (yes)
52. CONST. I, W	O'Malley v. Woodrough, 307 U.S. 277 (1939)	Evans v. Gore, 253 U.S. 245 (1920); Miles v. Graham, 268 U.S. 501 (1925)	Whether federal government may impose nondiscriminatory federal income taxation on income of federal judge. (yes)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
53. CONST. I	Madden v. Kentucky, 309 U.S. 83 (1940)	Colgate v. Harvey, 296 U.S. 404 (1935)	Whether state statute imposing higher tax on its citizens' deposits in banks outside state than on deposits within states violates equal protection, or violates privileges and immunity clause by abridging right to carry on business outside state of residence. (no)
54. STAT.	Helvering v. Hallock, 309 U.S. 106 (1940)	Helvering v. St. Louis Union Trust Co., 296 U.S. 39 (1935); Becker v. St. Louis Union Trust Co., 296 U.S. 48 (1935)	Whether remainder interest in trust for wife created during lifetime of decedent, the corpus of which was to pass to decedent's wife if she

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
			survived him but to revert to him if he survived, should be included in decedent's estate for tax purposes where wife survived. (yes)
55. CONST. I	Tigner v. Texas, 310 U.S. 141 (1940)	Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co., 184 U.S. 540 (1902)	Whether state statute exempting agricultural activities from prohibition on conspiracies in restraint of trade violates equal protection. (no)
56. CONST. I	United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100 (1941)	Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 251 (1918)	Whether federal minimum wage and maximum hours restrictions on employers under FLSA are excluded from Congress' power under commerce clause as regulation of "production." (no)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
57. CONST. I, D	United States v. Chicago, M. S. P. & P.R. Co., 312 U.S. 592 (1941)	United States v. Lynah, 188 U.S. 445 (1903) (in part); United States v. Heyward, 250 U.S. 633 (1919) (not recorded)	Whether federal government must compensate riparian owner for injury to structures between high and low water mark caused by government's raising of water level in navigable stream. (no)
58. STAT.	Nye v. United States, 313 U.S. 33 (1941)	Toledo Newspaper Co. v. United States, 247 U.S. 402 (1918)	Whether Congress, in the Act of March 2, 1831 (Section 268 of Judicial Code), limited the power of the courts to punish criminal contempt to misconduct within the vicinity of the court. (yes)
59. CONST. I	California v. Thompson, 313 U.S. 109 (1941)	Di Santo v. Pennsylvania, 273 U.S. 34 (1927)	Whether states are prohibited by commerce clause from nondiscrimi-

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
			natory regulation of interstate transportation on matters of local concern, in absence of legislation of Congress. (no)
60. CONST. D	United States v. Classic, 313 U.S. 299, 317 (1941)	Newberry v. United States, 256 U.S. 232 (1921)	Whether party primary election for United States Congress is an election subject to Congressional regulation under Article I, Sections 2 and 4 of Constitution. (yes)
61. CONST. I	Olsen v. Nebraska, 313 U.S. 236 (1941)	Ribnik v. McBride, 277 U.S. 350 (1928); Tyson & Brother v. Banton, 273 U.S. 418 (1927); Williams v. Standard Oil Co., 278 U.S. 235 (1929); Morehead v. New York, 298 U.S. 587 (1936)	Whether state statute limiting maximum compensation that employment agency could collect from applicable violated 14th Amend. substantive due process. (no)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
62. CONST. I	Alabama v. King & Boozer, 314 U.S. 1 (1941)	Panhandle Oil Co. v. Mississippi, 277 U.S. 218 (1928); Graves v. Texas Co., 298 U.S. 393 (1936)	Whether nondiscriminatory state sales taxes may be imposed on materials purchased by contractor in performing "cost-plus" contract for federal government. (yes)
63. STAT.	Toucey v. New York Life Ins. Co., 314 U.S. 118 (1941)	Supreme Tribe of Ben-Hur v. Cauble, 255 U.S. 356 (1921)	Whether federal court, under Section 265 of Judicial Code, can stay proceeding in state court on the basis of prior adjudication of claim by federal court. (no)
64. CONST. C	Edwards v. California, 314 U.S. 160, 176-77 (1941)	New York v. Miln, 11 Pet. (36 U.S.) 102 (1837)	Whether state statute prohibiting bringing of indigent person into state violates commerce clause. (yes)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
65. CONST. I	Graves v. Shmidlapp, 315 U.S. 657 (1942)	Wachovia Bank & Trust Co. v. Doughton, 272 U.S. 567 (1926)	Whether state taxation of domiciliary's exercise of power of appointment of intangibles in trust, which he held under will of resident of another state, violated 14th Amend. due process. (no)
66. CONST. I	State Tax Com. v. Aldrich, 316 U.S. 174 (1942)	First Nat. Bank v. Maine, 284 U.S. 312 (1932)	Whether 14th Amend. prohibits state from imposing inheritance transfer tax on shares of stock in a corporation of that state where stockholder's domicile and stock itself were in another state at time of death. (no)
67. CONST. L, I	Williams v. North Carolina, 317 U.S. 287 (1942)	Haddock v. Haddock, 201 U.S. 562 (1906)	Whether full faith and credit clause requires decree of divorce granted to a domiciliary in a proceeding consistent with due process to be treated as binding by courts of other states. (yes)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
68. STAT.	Brady v. Roosevelt S.S. Co., 317 U.S. 575 (1943)	Johnson v. U.S. Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corp., 280 U.S. 320 (1930)	Whether suits in Admiralty Act precludes suit against private corporation for maritime tort where corporation operates vessel owned by government agency and may have right of indemnity against government under contract. (no)
69. CONST. I	Oklahoma Tax Com. v. United States, 319 U.S. 598 (1943)	Childers v. Beaver, 270 U.S. 555 (1926)	Whether states may impose estate taxes on personal property and lands held by Indians. (yes)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
70. CONST. (L) (including reexamination of premises of earlier holding)	West Virginia State Bd. of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)	Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940)	Whether First Amend. prohibits school children from being compelled to salute flag and pledge allegiance. (yes)
71. STAT.	Federal Power Com. v. Hope Natural Gas Co., 320 U.S. 591 (1944)	United R. & Electric Co. v. West, 280 U.S. 234 (1930) (in part)	Whether annual depreciation, for ratemaking purposes under Natural Gas Act, is properly based on cost. (yes)
72. STAT.	Mercoid Corp. v. Mid-Continent Invest. Co., 320 U.S. 661 (1944)	Leeds & Catlin Co. v. Victor Talking Machine Co. (No. 2), 213 U.S. 325 (1909) (limited)	Whether defense of misuse of patent to protect unpatented element from competition is available to contributory infringer in action for infringement of a combination patent. (yes)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
73. COM.	Mahnich v. Southern S.S. Co., 321 U.S. 96 (1944)	Plamals v. Pinar Del Rio, 277 U.S. 151 (1928) (in part)	Whether owner could be held liable in admiralty for injuries to seaman, based on unseaworthiness of vessel, even if unseaworthy condition was caused by negligence of ship's officers or fellow servants in maintaining vessel. (yes)
74. CONST. I	Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649 (1944)	Grovey v. Townsend, 295 U.S. 45 (1935)	Whether exclusion of Negroes from voting in party primary to select candidates for general election, pursuant to pary rule limiting membership of whites, was "state action" for purposes of 14th Amend. (yes)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
75. CONST. I	United States v. South-Eastern Underwriters Asso., 322 U.S. 533 (1944)	Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. (75 U.S.) 168 (1869); Hooper v. California, 155 U.S. 648 (1895)	Whether engaging in insurance business is a transaction of commerce subject to regulation by Congress. (yes)
76. STAT.	Girouard v. United States, 328 U.S. 61 (1946)	United States v. Schwimmer, 279 U.S. 644 (1929): United States v. Macintosh, 283 U.S. 605 (1931): United States v. Bland, 283 U.S. 636 (1931)	Whether alien who is willing to take oath of allegiance and perform non-combatant service but is unwilling to bear arms for religious reasons may be admitted to citizenship. (yes)
77. CONST. I	Angel v. Bullington, 330 U.S. 183 (1947)	David Lupton's Sons Co. v. Automobile Club of America, 225 U.S. 489 (1912) (rendered obsolete by change in law)	Whether federal court sitting in diversity barred from entertaining case already adjudicated in state court and held barred by state statute. (yes)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
78. CONST. I	Sherrer v. Sherrer, 334 U.S. 343 (1948)	Andrews v. Andrews, 188 U.S. 14 (1903) (in part)	Whether full faith and credit precludes a collateral attack against a divorce decree on jurisdictional grounds by a party who participated in the divorce proceedings and had opportunity to raise jurisdictional issues, if courts of state that granted divorce would not allow collateral attack. (yes)
79. CONST. I	Lincoln Federal Labor Union v. Northwestern Iron & Metal Co., 335 U.S. 525 (1949); See also: Phelps Dodge Corp. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 177 (1941)	Adair v. United States, 208 U.S. 161 (1908); Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U.S. 1 (1915)	Whether state right-to-work laws deny due process right under 14th Amend. by precluding employers from discriminating based on union membership. (no)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
80. STAT.	Commissioner v. Estate of Church, 335 U.S. 632, 637 (1949)	May v. Heiner, 281 U.S. 238 (1930)	Whether corpus of trust properly included in estate for tax purposes where decedent who created trust had reserved income from trust property for life. (yes)
81. CONST. I	United States v. Detroit, 355 U.S. 466, 472 n.2 (1958)	Macallen Co. v. Massachusetts, 279 U.S. 620 (1929)	Whether state may include in income for purposes of tax measured by net income the interest earned from federal securities. (yes)
82. CONST. I	Ott v. Mississippi Valley Barge Line Co., 336 U.S. 169, 173 (1949)	St. Louis v. Ferry Company, 11 Wall. (78 U.S.) 423 (1870); Old Dominian Steamship Co. v. Virginia, 198 U.S. 299 (1905); Ayer & Lord Co. v. Kentucky, 202 U.S. 409 (1906)	Whether state ad valorem taxes imposed on foreign corporations operating barge lines on inland waters in interstate commerce, based on ratio of miles of line within state

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
			to total line, violated 14th Amend. due process or commerce clause. (no)
83. CONST. I	Oklahoma Tax Com. v. Texas Co., 336 U.S. 342 (1949)	Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. & Gulf R.R. v. Harrison, 235 U.S. 292 (1914); Indian Territory Illuminating Oil Co. v. Oklahoma, 240 U.S. 522 (1916); Howard v. Gipsy Oil Co., 247 U.S. 503 (1918); Large Oil Co. v. Howard, 248 U.S. 549 (1919); Oklahoma ex rel. Oklahoma Tax Com. v. Barnsdall Refineries, Inc., 296 U.S. 521 (1936)	Whether lessee of mineral rights in allotted and restricted Indian lands has constitutional immunity from payment of nondiscriminatory state production and excise taxes. (no)
84. STAT.	Cosmopolitan Shipping Co. v. McAllister, 337 U.S. 783 (1949)	Hust v. Moore-McCormack Lines, Inc., 328 U.S. 707 (1946)	Whether agent employed under wartime general agency agreement to manage ship owned by United States liable

A-32

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
			under Jones Act to crew members who suffered injury from negligence of master and officers. (no)
85. CONST. L	United States v. Rabinowitz, 339 U.S. 56, 66, 85 (1950), overruled, Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752 (1969)	Trupiano v. United States, 334 U.S. 699 (1948)	Whether search of entire room where defendant arrested was reasonable "search incident to lawful arrest" under Fourth Amend. regardless of practicability of obtaining warrant. (yes)
86. STAT.	Darr v. Burford, 339 U.S. 200, 208-10 (1950), overruled, Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391 (1963)	Wade v. Mayo, 334 U.S. 672 (1948)	Whether habeas petitioner required to petition Supreme Court for certiorari in order to exhaust all available remedies on direct review. (yes)

A-33

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
87. CONST. C, I	Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495, 502 (1952)	Mutual Film Corp. v. Idustrial Com. of Ohio, 236 U.S. 230 (1915)	Whether motion pictures protected by First Amend. against state censorship. (yes)
88. CONST. C	Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483, 491, 494-495 (1954)	Cumming v. Board of Education, 175 U.S. 528 (1899); Gong Lum v. Rice, 275 U.S. 78 (1927)	Whether "separate but equal" public education on basis of race violates equal protection. (yes)
89. CONST. (no reason given but (I), see Brown)	Gayle v. Browder, 352 U.S. 903 (1956)	Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896) (also substantially overruled by Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954))	Whether "separate but equal" public transportation on basis of race violates equal protection. (yes)
90. CONST. I	Vanderbilt v. Vanderbilt, 354 U.S. 416, 419 (1957); See also, Armstrong v. Armstrong, 350 U.S. 568, 581 (1956)	Thompson v. Thompson, 226 U.S. 551 (1913)	Whether state judgment violated full faith and credit in awarding alimony to wife after divorce had been granted to husband in another state in ex parte proceed-

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
			ing where wife not subject to court's jurisdiction. (no)
91. CONST. I	United States v. Raines, 362 U.S. 17, 24-26 (1960)	United States v. Reese, 92 U.S. 214, 220-221 (1876); Barney v. New York, 193 U.S. 430 (1904)	Whether court entitled to consider unconstitutionality of criminal statute as to persons or situations not before the court where statute is clearly constitutional as applied (no); whether action by state officials is "state action" even if not authorized by state law. (yes)
92. CONST. L, I	Elkins v. United States, 364 U.S. 206, 210, 212-213, 233 (1960); Rios v. United States, 364 U.S. 253 (1960)	Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383, 398 (1914) (in part); Center v. United States, 267 U.S. 575 (1925); Byars v. United States, 273 U.S. 28, 33 (1927) (in part)	Whether evidence obtained by state officers in search which would have violated defendant's Fourth Amend. rights if conducted by federal officers must be excluded upon timely objection in federal criminal trial. (yes)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
93. STAT.	James v. United States, 366 U.S. 213, 215, 221, 223, 241 (1961)	Commissioner v. Wilcox, 327 U.S. 404 (1946)	Whether embezzled money is taxable income of the embezzler in the year of embezzlement. (yes)
94. CONST. L, I	Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643, 653-655 (1961); See also Ker v. California, 374 U.S. 23, 45, 53, 59 (1963)	Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25 (1949) (in part); Irvine v. California, 347 U.S. 128 (1954) (in part)	Whether evidence obtained by searches and seizures in violation of Fourth Amend. is admissible in criminal trial in state court. (no)
95. CONST. I	Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 277, 280 (1962)	Colegrove v. Green, 328 U.S. 549 (1946) (in part); Colegrove v. Barrett, 330 U.S. 804 (1947)	Whether challenge on equal protection grounds to apportionment of state legislature among counties is justiciable cause of action. (yes)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
96. STAT.	Smith v. Evening News Asso., 371 U.S. 195, 199 (1962); See also Truck General Drivers, W. & H. v. Riss & Co., 372 U.S. 517, 520 (1963)	Association of Westinghouse Salaried Employees v. Westinghouse Electric Corp., 344 U.S. 437 (1955) (in part)	Whether courts have jurisdiction under § 301 of the Labor Management Relations Act over cases involving breach of individual employee rights contained in collective bargaining contract. (yes)
97. STAT.	Construction & General Laborers' Union v. Curry, 371 U.S. 542, 552, 554 (1963)	Montgomery Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council v. Ledbetter Erection Co., 344 U.S. 178 (1952) (in part)	Whether Supreme Court may review erroneous assertion of jurisdiction by state court to enter a preliminary injunction in a labor dispute. (yes)
98. CONST. I	Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963)	Betts v. Brady 316 U.S. 455 (1942)	Whether indigent defendant entitled under Sixth and Fourteenth Amends. to appointed counsel in state felony trial. (yes)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
99. CONST. I	Gray v. Sanders, 372 U.S. 368, 383 (1963)	Cook v. Fortson and Turman v. Duckworth, 329 U.S. 675 (1946); South v. Peters, 339 U.S. 276 (1950); Cox v. Peters, 342 U.S. 936 (1952); Hartsfield v. Sloan, 357 U.S. 916 (1958)	Whether county unit system in state primary violates equal protection because it fails to follow standard of one-person, one-vote. (yes)
100. STAT.	Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391, 435 (1963)	Darr v. Burford, 339 U.S. 200 (1950) (in part)	Whether habeas petitioner first required to seek certiorari in Supreme Court from adverse decision. (no)
101. CONST. I	Ferguson v. Skrupa, 372 U.S. 726, 731 (1963)	Adams v. Tanner, 244 U.S. 590 (1917)	Whether statute prohibiting engaging in debt adjusting business vio-
102. CONST. I	Wesberry v. Sanders, 376 U.S. 1 (1964)	Colegrove v. Green, 328 U.S. 549 (1946)	Whether challenge to apportionment of Congressional districts under one-man, one-vote principle is a justiciable cause of action. (yes)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
			lates substantive due process. (no)
103. CONST. I	Schneider v. Rusk, 377 U.S. 163, 170 (1964)	Mackenzie v. Hare, 239 U.S. 299 (1915)	Whether deprivation of citizenship for naturalized citizens who reside in country of origin violates due process where no restriction on foreign residence applies to native-born citizens. (yes)
104. CONST. I	Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1, 6 (1964)	Twining v. New Jersey, 211 U.S. 78 (1908); Adamson v. California, 332 U.S. 46 (1947)	Whether Fifth Amend. privilege against self-incrimination applies to states through 14th Amend. (yes)
105. CONST. I	Murphy v. Waterfront Com. of New York Harbor, 378 U.S. 52, 57, 77 (1964)	Jack v. Kansas, 199 U.S. 372 (1905); United States v. Murdock, 284 U.S. 141 (1931); U.S. v. Murdock, 290 U.S. 389 (1933); Feldman v. United	Whether state witness may be compelled to give testimony which may incriminate him under federal law where he has

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
		States, 322 U.S. 487 (1944); Knapp v. Schweitzer, 357 U.S. 371 (1958)	not been granted immunity from federal use of testimony; whether federal gov't. may use such evidence. (no)
106. CONST. L, I	Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368, 391 (1964)	Stein v. New York, 346 U.S. 156 (1953)	Whether court may receive confession into evidence and allow jury deciding merits of case also to determine voluntary character where "fair question" of voluntariness exists. (no)
107. CONST. L	Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478, 491-492 (1964)	Crooker v. California, 357 U.S. 433 (1958); Cicenia v. Lagay, 357 U.S. 504 (1958)	Whether confession admissible when obtained after suspect in police custody has requested and been denied assistance of counsel. (no)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
108. CONST. I	McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184 (1964)	Pace v. Alabama, 106 U.S. 583 (1883)	Whether cohabitation statute that applies only to interracial relationships violates equal protection. (yes)
109. CONST. I	Pointer v. Texas, 380 U.S. 400, 406 (1965)	West v. Louisiana, 194 U.S. 258 (1904)	Whether right of confrontation and cross-examination in 6th Amend. applies to state through 14th Amend. (yes)
110. CONST. (I)	Gold v. Di Carlo, 380 U.S. 520 (1965)	Tyson & Brother—United Theatre Ticket Office, Inc., v. Banton, 273 U.S. 418 (1927)	Whether prohibition on scalping tickets violates 14th Amend. substantive due process. (no)
111. STAT.	Swift & Co. v. Wickham, 382 U.S. 111 (1965)	Kesler v. Department of Public Safety, 369 U.S. 153 (1962)	Whether three-judge court requirement applies in Supremacy Clause preemption cases where constitutional issue apparent

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
			without statutory construction. (no)
112. STAT.	Harris v. United States, 382 U.S. 162 (1965)	Brown v. United States, 359 U.S. 41 (1959)	Whether criminal contempt may be punished summarily without notice and a hearing in the absence of exceptional circumstances posing threat to judicial procedures. (no)
113. CONST. C, I	Harper v. Virginia State Board of Elections, 383 U.S. 663 (1966)	Breedlove v. Shuttles, 302 U.S. 277 (1937); Butler v. Thompson, 341 U.S. 937 (1951)	Whether poll tax violates equal protection. (yes)
114. CONST. I	Spevak v. Klein, 385 U.S. 511 (1967)	Cohen v. Hurley, 366 U.S. 177 (1961)	Whether privilege against self-incrimination applies to lawyers in state disciplinary proceedings. (yes)
115. CONST. F	Keyishian v. Board of Regents, 385 U.S. 589 (1967)	Adler v. Board of Education, 342 U.S. 485 (1952)	Whether public employment may be conditioned

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
			on surrender of constitutional rights under First Amend. that government may not directly abridge. (no)
116. CONST. I, D	Afroyim v. Rusk, 387 U.S. 253 (1967)	Perez v. Brownell, 356 U.S. 44 (1958)	Whether Congress has power to divest a person of United States citizenship absent voluntary renunciation. (no)
117. CONST. I, L	Warden, Maryland Penitentiary v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294 (1967)	Gouled v. United States, 255 U.S. 298 (1921)	Whether search may be used to secure evidence that does not constitute instrumentalities, fruits or contraband of crime. (yes)
118. CONST. I, D	Camara v. Municipal Court of San Francisco, 387 U.S. 523 (1967)	Frank v. Maryland, 359 U.S. 360 (1959)	Whether Fourth Amend. requires warrant for government inspection of personal residence to enforce housing and health code. (yes)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
119. CONST. I	Berger v. New York, 388 U.S. 41 (1967)	Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928) (in part)	Whether electronic wire surveillance of telephone conversation is a search within meaning of 14th Amend. (yes)
120. CONST. I	Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967)	Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928); Goldman v. United States, 316 U.S. 129 (1942)	Whether fourth Amendment violation requires a physical intrusion or "trespass." (no)
121. CONST. I	Marchetti v. United States, 390 U.S. 39 (1968)	Lewis v. United States, 348 U.S. 419 (1955); United States v. Kahriger, 345 U.S. 22 (1953)	Whether statutory requirements of occupational tax and registration imposed on wagering violate privilege against self-incrimination. (yes)
122. STAT.	Peyton v. Rowe, 391 U.S. 54 (1968)	McNally v. Hill, 293 U.S. 131 (1934)	Whether prisoner may challenge on federal habeas consecutive senten-

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
			ces that he has not yet begun to serve. (yes)
123. CONST. I	Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123 (1968)	Delli Paoli v. United States, 352 U.S. 232 (1957)	Whether admission of co-defendant's confession in joint trial with instructions to disregard as to defendant violated right of confrontation and cross-examination. (yes)
124. CONST. I, F	Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145 (1968)	Maxwell v. Dow, 176 U.S. 581 (1900)	Whether right of trial by jury applies to state criminal proceedings to same extent as federal ones. (yes)
125. STAT.	Carafas v. La Vallee, 391 U.S. 234 (1968)	Parker v. Ellis, 362 U.S. 574 (1960)	Whether release of prisoner from custody defeats jurisdiction to adjudicate federal habeas claim. (no)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
126. STAT.	Lee v. Florida, 392 U.S. 378 (1968)	Schwartz v. Texas, 344 U.S. 199 (1952)	Whether telephone communications unlawfully intercepted in violation of Section 605 of the communications Act can be admitted in evidence at state criminal trials. (no)
127. CONST. I	Jones v. Alfred H. Mayer Co., 392 U.S. 409, 441-443 (1968)	Hodges v. United States, 203 U.S. 1 (1906)	Whether 13th Amend. empowers Congress to outlaw not only slavery itself but also all "badges and incidents" of slavery. (yes)
128. CONST. I	Moore v. Ogilvie, 394 U.S. 814 (1969)	MacDougall v. Green, 335 U.S. 281 (1948)	Whether nominating procedure for elections which gives disproportionate power to less populous counties violates equal protection. (yes)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
129. CONST. I	Bradenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969)	Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927)	Whether criminal syndicalism statute punishing mere advocacy of violent means to achieve political or economic change violates First. Amend. (yes)
130. CONST. L, I, W	Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752 (1969)	Harris v. United States, 331 U.S. 145 (1947); United States v. Rabinowitz, 339 U.S. 56 (1950)	Whether search incident to arrest can extend beyond person and areas within his immediate control. (no)
131. CONST. I	Benton v. Maryland, 395 U.S. 784 (1969)	Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319 (1937); Brock v. North Carolina, 344 U.S. 424 (1953)	Whether double jeopardy prohibition applies to states through 14th Amend. (yes)
132. CONST. I	Ashe v. Swenson, 397 U.S. 436 (1970)	Hoag v. New Jersey, 356 U.S. 464 (1958)	Whether double jeopardy embodies collateral estoppel requirement. (yes)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
133. STAT.	Boys Markets, Inc. v. Retail Clerks Union, 398 U.S. 235 (1970)	Sinclair Refining Co. v. Atkinson, 370 U.S. 195 (1962)	Whether federal district court can enjoin strike in breach of no-strike clause in collective bar gaining agreement containing binding arbitration provisions. (yes)
134. CONST. I	Price v. Georgia, 398 U.S. 323, 329-330 (1970)	Brantley v. Georgia, 217 U.S. 284 (1910)	Whether double jeopardy prohibits retrial on greater offense following successful appeal of conviction on lesser included offense. (yes)
135. COM.	Moragne v. States Marine Lines, Inc., 398 U.S. 375 (1970)	The Harrisburg, 119 U.S. 199 (1886)	Whether maritime law affords a cause of action for wrongful death. (yes)
136. CONST. F	Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78 (1970)	Thompson v. Utah, 170 U.S. 343 (1898) (in part); Maxwell v. Dow, 176 U.S. 581 (1900); Rassmussen v. United States,	Whether guarantee of jury trial requires 12-person jury. (no)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
		197 U.S. 516 (1905) (in part); Catham v. U.S., 281 U.S. 276 (1930)
137. COM.	Blonder-Tongue Laboratories, Inc. v. University of Illinois Foundation, 402 U.S. 313 (1971)	Triplett v. Lowell, 297 U.S. 638 (1936)	Whether determination of patent invalidity can be res judicata in subsequent litigation against different defendant for infringement. (yes)
138. STAT. CONST. I, L	Perez v. Campbell, 402 U.S. 637 (1971)	Kesler v. Dept. of Public Safety, 369 U.S. 153 (1962)	Whether state statute providing that discharge in bankruptcy does not relieve debtor of obligations under financial responsibility laws is unconstitutional as conflicting with Bankruptcy Act. (yes)
139. STAT.	Griffin v. Breckenridge, 403 U.S. 88 (1971)	Collins v. Hardyman, 341 U.S. 651 (1951) (in part)	Whether 42 U.S.C. § 1985(3) reaches private

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
			conspiracies in the absence of state action. (yes)
140. CONST. I	Dunn v. Blumstein, 405 U.S. 330, 337 n.7 (1972)	Pope v. Williams, 193 U.S. 621 (1904) (in part)	Whether duration of residence requirements for voting violate equal protection. (yes)
141. STAT. CONST. I	Andrews v. Louisiana & N.R. Co., 406 U.S. 320 (1972)	Moore v. Illinois C. R. Co., 312 U.S. 630 (1941)	Whether railroad employee allowed to file state court action challenging discharge where he has not exhausted grievance and arbitration procedures of Railway Labor Act. (no)
142. CONST. I, D	Lehnhausen v. Lake Shore Auto Parts Co., 410 U.S. 356 (1973)	Quaker City Cab Co. v. Pennsylvania, 277 U.S. 389 (1928)	Whether subjecting corporations to ad valorem taxes on personal property where individuals are exempt from such

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
			taxes violates equal protection. (no)
143. STAT.	Braden v. 30th Judicial Circuit Court, 410 U.S. 484 (1973)	Ahrens v. Clark, 335 U.S. 188 (1948)	Whether habeas corpus petitions must be brought in district of the petitioner's confinement. (no)
144. CONST. L, I, D	Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973)	A Book Named "John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure" v. Attorney General, 383 U.S. 413 (1966)	Whether sexual materials can be treated as obscene under First Amend. even if not "utterly without redeeming social value." (yes)
145. CONST. I	In re Griffiths, 413 U.S. 717 (1973)	Clarke v. Deckebach, 274 U.S. 392 (1927)	Whether state's exclusion of aliens from practice of law violates equal protection. (yes)
146. CONST. I	North Dakota State Board of Pharmacy v. Snyder's Drug Stores, 414 U.S. 156 (1973)	Liggett Co. v. Baldridge, 278 U.S. 105 (1929)	Whether state requirement that a pharmacy be owned or controlled by

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
			pharmacists violates substantive due process. (no)
147. CONST. F	Edelman v. Jordan, 415 U.S. 651, 670-71 (1974)	Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (1969) (in part); State Dept. of health & Rehabilitation Services v. Zarate, 407 U.S. 918 (1972); Sterrett v. Mothers' & Children's Rights Organization, 409 U.S. 809 (1973)	Whether 11th Amend. prohibits retroactive award of monetary benefits to private parties against state for violation of federal law. (yes)
148. CONST. (no reason given apart from superficially differing circumstances)	Mitchell v. W.T. Grant Co., 416 U.S. 600 (1974)	Fuentes v. Shevin, 407 U.S. 67 (1972) (in part) (not formally overruled)	Whether sequestration of property on ex parte application of creditor without prior notice or opportunity for hearing violates due process. (no)
149. CONST. C	Taylor v. Louisiana, 419 U.S. 522 (1975); see also Duren v. Missouri, 439 U.S. 357 (1978)	Hoyt v. Florida, 368 U.S. 57 (1971) (in effect)	Whether automatic exemption of women from jury service violates fair cross section requirement of Sixth Amend. (yes)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
150. COM.	United States v. Reliable Transfer Co., 421 U.S. 397 (1975)	Schooner Catharine v. Dickinson, 17 How. (58 U.S.) 170 (1854)	Whether comparative fault should replace equal division of liability for property damages among parties guilty of contributory fault in admiralty. (yes)
151. CONST. W, F, I	Michelin Tire Corp. v. Wages, 423 U.S. 276 (1976)	Low v. Austin, 13 Wall. (80 U.S.) 29 (1871)	Whether state's nondiscriminatory ad valorem property tax as applied to imported goods violates Import-Export Clause. (no)
152. COM.	Dove v. United States, 423 U.S. 325 (1976)	Durham v. United States, 401 U.S. 481 (1971)	Whether petitioner's death pending certiorari requires dismissal of petition to review criminal conviction. (yes)
153. CONST. I	Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507 (1976)	Amalgamated Food Employees Union v. Logan Valley Plaza, 391 U.S. 308 (1968)	Whether First Amend. confers right to picket employer within pri-

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
			vately owned shopping center. (no)
154. CONST. I	Virginia Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, 425 U.S. 748 (1976)	Valentine v. Chrestensen, 316 U.S. 52 (1942)	Whether "commercial speech" enjoys First Amend. protection. (yes)
155. CONST. L	National League of Cities v. Usery, 426 U.S. 833 (1976), overruled, Garcia v. San Antonio Metro Transit Auth., 469 U.S. 528 (1985)	Maryland v. Wirtz, 392 U.S. 183 (1968)	Whether "traditional government functions" of State and local governments are exempt from federal regulation pursuant to commerce clause. (yes)
156. STAT. CONST. I	International Assoc. of Machinists & Aerospace Workers v. WERC, 427 U.S. 132 (1976)	UAWA v. WERB, 336 U.S. 245 (1949)	Whether federal labor policy preempts state authority to enjoin union and its members from engaging in partial strike. (yes)
157. CONST. I	City of New Orleans v. Dukes, 427 U.S. 297 (1976)	Morey v. Doud, 354 U.S. 457 (1957)	Whether "grandfather provision" in state eco-

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
			nomic regulation violates equal protection. (no)
158. CONST. I	Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153, 195 n.47 (1976)	McGautha v. California, 402 U.S. 183 (1971)	Whether due process requires that juries be provided with standards to guide death penalty decision. (yes)
159. CONST. I	Craig v. Boren, 429 U.S. 190, 210 n.23 (1976)	Goesaert v. Cleary, 335 U.S. 464 (1948)	Whether gender-based differential in state restrictions on age for purchase of alcoholic beverages violates equal protection. (yes)
160. CONST. I	G.M. Leasing Corp. v. United States, 429 U.S. 338, 355-56 (1977)	Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616 (1886) (in part)	Whether Fourth Amend. warrant requirement applies to intrusions into privacy for enforcement of tax laws. (yes)
161. COM.	Oregon ex rel. State Land Bd. v. Corvallis Sand & Gravel Co., 429 U.S. 363 (1977)	Bonelli Cattle Co. v. Arizona, 414 U.S. 313 (1973)	Whether ownership of riverbed lands in navigable rivers that are not

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
			interstate boundaries should be determined by state law rather than federal common law. (yes)
162. CONST. L, I	Complete Auto Transit v. Brady, 430 U.S. 274 (1977)	Spector Motor Service v. O'Connor, 340 U.S. 602 (1951)	Whether tax on privilege of doing business in a state is prohibited when applied to interstate commerce. (no)
163. CONST. I, F	Trimble v. Gordon, 430 U.S. 762 (1977)	Labine v. Vincent, 401 U.S. 432 (1971)	Whether state law allowing illegitimate children to inherit by interstate succession only through their mothers violated equal protection. (yes)
164. STAT.	Continental T.V. v. GTE Sylvania, 433 U.S. 36, 58 (1977)	United States v. Arnold, Schwinn & Co., 388 U.S. 365 (1967)	Whether retail location restrictions constitute a per se violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. (no)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
165. CONST. I, W	Shaffer v. Heitner, 433 U.S. 186 (1977)	Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U.S. 714 (1878)	Whether jurisdiction can be based on presence of property within forum without regard to "minimum contacts" needed for personal jurisdiction. (no)
166. CONST. I	Dept. of Revenue v. Association of Washington Stevedoring Cos., 435 U.S. 734 (1978)	Puget Sound Stevedoring Co. v. Tax Com., 302 U.S. 90 (1937); Joseph v. Carter & Weekes Stevedoring Co., 330 U.S. 422 (1947)	Whether state business and occupations tax violates commerce clause by taxing interstate commerce activity of Stevedoring within state. (no)
167. STAT.	Monell v. New York City Department of Social Services, 436 U.S. 658 (1978)	Monroe v. Pape, 365 U.S. 167 (1961) (in part); City of Kenosha v. Bruno, 412 U.S. 507 (1973) (in part); Moor v. County of Alameda, 411 U.S. 693 (1973) (in part)	Whether local governments and municipalities are immune from suit under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. (no)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
168. CONST. I (including reexamination of premises of earlier holding)	Burks v. United States, 437 U.S. 1 (1978)	Bryan v. United States, 338 U.S. 552 (1950) (in part); Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1957) (in part); Foreman v. United States, 361 U.S. 416 (1960) (in part)	Whether defendant by having moved for new trial, waives right to judgment of acquittal on ground that reviewing court found insufficient evidence. (no)
169. CONST. I, C	United States v. Scott, 437 U.S. 82 (1978)	United States v. Jenkins, 420 U.S. 358 (1975); United States v. Wilson, 420 U.S. 332 (1975)	Whether government appeal from dismissal of indictment on defendant's motion is barred by double jeopardy. (no)
170. CONST. I, C	Duren v. Missouri, 439 U.S. 357, 370-76 (1979)	Hoyt v. Florida, 368 U.S. 57 (1961)	Whether exemption of women from jury service on request violates "fair cross section" requirement of Sixth Amend. (yes)
171. CONST. I	Hughes v. Oklahoma, 441 U.S. 322, 614-17 (1979)	Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U.S. 519 (1896)	Whether wild game is an article of commerce sub-

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
			ject to federal regulation under Commerce Clause. (yes)
172. COM.	Trammel v. United States, 445 U.S. 40 (1980)	Hawkins v. United States, 358 U.S. 74 (1958)	Whether defendant's consent required for spouse to testify against defendant. (no)
173. CONST. I	United States v. Salvucci, 448 U.S. 83 (1980)	Jones v. United States, 362 U.S. 257 (1960)	Whether defendants charged with crimes of possession may claim benefits of exclusionary rule where their own Fourth Amend. rights are not violated. (no)
174. CONST. I, L, W	Commonwealth Edison Co. v. Montana, 453 U.S. 609 (1981)	Heisler v. Thomas Colliery Co., 260 U.S. 245 (1922)	Whether state severance tax exempt from Commerce Clause review because it is imposed before goods enter the stream of interstate commerce. (no)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
175. CONST. F, D (overturning recent decision)	United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. 798, 824-25 (1982)	Robbins v. California, 453 U.S. 420 (1981)	Whether police who have probable cause to conduct warrantless search of an automobile may search entire vehicle's contents, including containers and packages. (yes)
176. CONST. I, F	Sporhase v. Nebraska, 458 U.S. 941 (1982)	Hudson County Water Co. v. McCarter, 209 U.S. 349 (1908)	Whether ground water is an article of commerce subject to federal regulation under Commerce Clause. (yes)
177. CONST. L, I, W, D	Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213 (1983)	Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 108 (1964); Spinelli v. United States, 393 U.S. 410 (1969)	Whether determination of probable cause for search based on informant's tip turns on "totality of the circumstances" rather than two-pronged "knowledge" and "veracity" test. (yes)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
178. CONST. I	Pennhurst State School & Hospital v. Halderman, 465 U.S. 89 (1984)	Rolston v. Missouri Fund Comm'rs., 120 U.S. 390 (1887) (in part); Siler v. Louisville & Nashville R.R. Co., 213 U.S. 175 (1909) (in part); Atchison, T. & S.F. Ry. Co. v. O'Connor, 223 U.S. 280 (1912) (in part); Greene v. Louisville & Interurban R.R. Co., 244 U.S. 499 (1917) (in part); Johnson v. Lankford, 245 U.S. 541 (1918) (in part); Numerous other cases fall more or less under the Pennhurst doctrine. See 465 U.S. 109-111 nn. 17-21, 117-121 (maj. op.), and id., 130-37, 159-163, 165-166 nn.50 & 52 (dissent) (listing 28 cases)	Whether 11th Amend. prohibits federal courts from granting injunctive relief against state officials for violations of state law, including state claims based on pendent jurisdiction. (yes)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
179. CONST. I	United States v. One Assortment of 89 Firearms, 465 U.S. 354 (1984)	Coffey v. United States, 116 U.S. 436 (1886)	Whether double jeopardy or collateral estoppel bars civil forfeiture proceeding following acquittal on related criminal charges. (no)
180. CONST. I	Limbach v. Hooven & Allison Co., 466 U.S. 353 (1984)	Hooven & Allison Co. v. Evatt, 324 U.S. 652 (1945)	Whether assessment of personal property tax on imported fibers in original packages for future manufacturing use violates Import-Export Clause. (no)
181. STAT.	Cooperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 760-62, 777 (1984)	United States v. Yellow Cab Co., 332 U.S. 218 (1947) (in part); United States v. Griffith, 334 U.S. 100 (1948); Schine Chain Theatres v. United States, 334 U.S. 110 (1948); Kiefer-Stewart Co. v.	Whether a corporation and its wholly owned subsidiary can engage in a "conspiracy" under Section 1 of the Sherman Act. (no)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
		Jos. E. Seagram & Sons, 340 U.S. 211 (1951)
182. CONST. L, I	Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, 469 U.S. 528 (1985)	National League of Cities v. Usery, 426 U.S. 833 (1976)	Whether "traditional governmental functions" of state and local governments are exempt from federal regulation pursuant to Commerce Clause. (no)
183. CONST. I	United States v. Miller, 471 U.S. 130 (1985)	Ex parte Bain, 121 U.S. 1 (1887) (in part)	Whether narrowing of an indictment is an "amendment" that renders indictment void. (no)
184. CONST. I	Daniels v. Williams, 474 U.S. 327 (1986)	Parratt v. Taylor, 451 U.S. 527 (1981) (in part)	Whether lack of due care by state official can constitute deprivation of life, liberty or property under 14th Amend. (no)
185. CONST. I	Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79 (1986)	Swain v. Alabama, 380 U.S. 202 (1965) (in part)	Whether equal protection prohibits prosecutor

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
			from using peremptory challenges to remove potential jurors solely on account of their race. (yes)
186. CONST. I	Attorney-General of New York v. Soto-Lopez, 476 U.S. 898 (1986)	August v. Bronstein, 417 U.S. 901 (1974)	Whether prior residence requirement for civil service preference violates equal protection. (yes)
187. CONST. I	Puerto Rico v. Branstad, 107 S.Ct. 2802, 2807-10 (1987)	Kentucky v. Dennison, 24 How. (65 U.S.) 66 (1861) (in part)	Whether federal courts have power to require performance of the duty of state officers to honor a fugitive extradition warrant from another state. (yes)
188. CONST. I	Tyler Pipe Industries, Inc. v. Washington State Dept. of Revenue, 483 U.S. 232, 107 S. Ct. 2810 (1987)	General Motors Corp. v. Washington, 377 U.S. 436 (1964) (in part)	Whether "multiple activities exemption" in business and occupations tax creating distinctions between in-state and out-of-state status violates commerce clause. (yes)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
189. CONST. I	Welch v. State Dept. of Highways and Public Transportation, 483 U.S. 468, 107 S. Ct. 2941 (1987)	Parden v. Terminal Railway of Alabama State Docks Dept., 377 U.S. 184 (1964)	Whether 11th Amend. prohibits suits by state resident against state under FELA and Jones Act. (yes) (plurality opinion)
190. CONST. I, L	Solorio v. United States, 483 U.S. 435, 107 S. Ct. 2924 (1987)	O'Callahan v. Parker, 395 U.S. 258 (1969); Relford v. Commandant, 401 U.S. 355 (1971)	Whether military tribunal can try serviceman for crime without service connection. (yes)
191. STAT.	Gulfstream Aerospace Corp. v. Mayacamas Corp., 108 S. Ct. 1133 (1988)	Enelow v. New York Life Ins. Co., 293 U.S. 379 (1935); Ettelson v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 317 U.S. 188 (1942); Shanferoke Coal & Supply Corp. v. Westchester Service Corp., 293 U.S. 449 (1935)	Whether denial of stay of federal case sought because of pendency of related state suit is immediately appealable. (no)

CATEGORY	OVERRULING CASE	OVERRULED CASE(S)	ISSUE
192. CONST. I	South Carolina v. Baker, 108 S. Ct. 1355 (1988)	Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 157 U.S. 429 (1895)	Whether interest on state and local bonds is constitutionally immune from federal taxation. (no)

AMICUS CURIAE

BRIEF

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
MAR 30 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

No. 88-605

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,

Appellants,

—v.—

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,

Appellees.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES
COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT

BRIEF FOR CATHOLICS FOR A FREE CHOICE, CHICAGO CATHOLIC WOMEN, NATIONAL COALITION OF AMERICAN NUNS, WOMEN IN SPIRIT OF COLORADO TASK FORCE, ET AL. AS AMICI CURIAE IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEES

PATRICIA HENNESSEY*
SOLIN & BREINDEL P.C.
501 Fifth Avenue
New York, New York 10017
(212) 973-8900
Attorney for Amici Curiae

*Counsel of Record

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Page

Table of Authorities.....i

Interest of Amici.....1

Summary of Argument.....5

Argument.....8

I. THERE IS NO CONSTANT TEACHING IN CATHOLIC THEOLOGY ON THE COMMENCEMENT OF PERSONHOOD.....8

II. REPRODUCTIVE AUTONOMY IS FUNDAMENTAL TO THE MORAL INDEPENDENCE OF WOMEN.....29

III. CONSTITUTIONAL MANDATES OF PRIVACY AND RELIGIOUS NEUTRALITY REQUIRE THAT WOMEN BE PERMITTED TO MAKE REPRODUCTIVE CHOICES FREE FROM GOVERNMENT INTRUSION OR COERCION.....34

Conclusion.....48

Appendix.....i

Statements of Individual Amici.....i

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

Cases: Page

Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Rights, 462 U.S. 416 (1983).....29,44

Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972).....29,45, 46,47

Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968).....42,44

Grand Rapids School District v. Ball, 473 U.S. 373, 87 L. Ed. 2d 267 (1985).....37,38

Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965).....45

Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)..36

McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420 (1961).....41,43

Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973).....passim

School District of Abington v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203 (1963).....35,41, 43

Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963).....41

Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942).....29,45, 46

Cases Page

Thomas v. Review Board, 450 U.S. 707 (1981).....41

Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, (1985).....35,36, 39,46

West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943).....39,45

Whalen v. Roe, 429 U.S. 589 (1977).....46

Wolman v. Walter, 433 U.S. 229 (1977)...42

OTHER AUTHORITIES

Page

Bible, Exodus 21:22-25.....9

Cates, W., Legal Abortion: The Public Health Record, 215 Science 1587 (1982).....31

Connery, J., Abortion: The Development of the Roman Catholic Perspective, 1977.....15

Curran, C., Towards an American Catholic Moral Theology (1987).....18

Declaration on Religious Freedom ¶ 3....27

Donceel "A Liberal Catholic's View" in Abortion and Catholicism: The American Debate (Jung and Shannon eds. 1980) at 48.....13,19, 23

Law, S., "Rethinking Sex and the Constitution", 132 U. Pa. L. R.....30,32, 33,34, 47

Maguire "The Catholic Legacy and Abortion: A Debate", 114 Commonweal 657 (1987).....14,15, 16

Page

The Moral Revolution, (1986).....20

The New Subversives (1982).....26

McBrian, R., Catholicism (1981).....24

McCartney, "Some Roman Catholic Concepts and Their Implications for the Ontological Status of the Unborn" in Abortion and the Status of the Fetus (Bondeson, et al. eds. 1984).....10

Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World ¶ 6.....27

Richards, D., Toleration and the Constitution (1986).....35

Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Declaration on Abortion, 1975,.....9,10, 11,17

Tauer "The Tradition of Probabilism and the Moral Status of the Early Embryo" in Abortion and Catholicism: The American Debate (Jung and Shannon eds. 1988)...passim

Tribe, L., Constitutional Law (2d Ed. 1987).....46

INTEREST OF AMICI

This brief amici curiae is submitted in support of appellees Reproductive Health Services, Inc. et al. By letters filed with the Clerk of the Court, appellants and appellees have consented to the filing of this brief.

Amici submit this brief limited to the question of the constitutionality and moral significance of Sec. 1.205 of the Missouri statute, which declares, as a matter of civil law, inter alia:

(1) The life of each human being begins at conception;

(2) Unborn children have protectable interests in life, health, and well-being.

Amici are individuals and organizations of persons of the Catholic faith who are committed to principles of religious liberty and constitutional privacy. The religious and moral beliefs and values of amici, which are deeply rooted in Catholic theology, include the beliefs that the abortion decision is a highly personal one made in the exercise of conscience, informed by an individual's religious and moral teachings and values, and that the individual woman's conscience is the final arbiter of any abortion decision. Amici recognize that other religious faiths permit, counsel and even mandate abortion in some circumstances. Amici strongly believe that a woman's decision about childbearing must be free of government burden, interference or coercion.

Amici believe that freedom of religious belief and conscience are protected by the constitutional doctrines of religious liberty and privacy which mandate invalidation of Sec. 1.205. The United States Constitution, as consistently interpreted by this Court, expressly denies to civil government the power to decide what is correct in debates over moral or religious values.

Amici strongly oppose reconsideration or overruling of Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973). The Constitutional principles of privacy and neutrality enunciated in Roe are sound and deserving of judicial respect. There are no medical advances or biological facts which compel reconsideration of Roe. Nor do the plethora of religious arguments advanced in support of appellants suggest a need for reconsideration of Roe. In Roe, this Court found that the question of beginning of personhood was not amenable to legislative or judicial resolution:

> We need not resolve the difficult question of when life begins. When those trained in the respective disciplines of medicine, philosophy, and theology are unable to arrive at > any consensus, the judiciary, at this point in the development of man's knowledge, is not in a position to speculate as to the answer.

>
> It should be sufficient to note briefly the wide divergence of thinking on this most sensitive and difficult question.

410 U.S. at 159.

Today, as in 1973, the question of whether abortion is morally right or wrong in particular circumstances is a matter which involves competing claims based on divergent moral and religious beliefs. The disciplines of medicine, philosophy and theology remain unable to arrive at a consensus on the question of when life begins. Roe, 410 U.S. at 159. The virulent theological and policy debate over the definition and value to be imputed to prenatal life underscores the religious or metaphysical nature of the inquiry. The State of Missouri cannot by legislative fiat put an end to the debate over abortion, as evidenced by the plethora of briefs filed in this case. The adoption by government of one competing religious viewpoint over others which are equally sincere, and equally rooted in serious theological tradition, violates the Constitution's prohibition to the states against taking sides in such religious and moral controversies.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

There is no constant teaching in Catholic theology on the commencement of personhood. At the core of the Roman Catholic belief system are the tenets that the question of personhood is spiritual, not scientific, and that personhood commences upon the infusion of the soul into the body. For many centuries Catholic theologians, including Thomas Aquinas, held that infusion of the soul is possible only when the embryo begins to show human form, i.e., a point after conception. Today a diversity opinion among committed Catholics on the subject of abortion.

Catholic tradition teaches probabilism as a method of moral decision-making. The teaching of Aquinas and others, and the scientific evidence regarding fetal development provide "good and solid reasons" for believing that the early embryo is not ensouled and thus not a person. These views are solidly rooted in Catholic theology and deeply held. Further, Catholic tradition and theology teach that on issues involving moral decision-making the conscience of the individual is supreme, and that once a conscientious decision is reached persons must be permitted to act in accordance with his or her conscience, especially on religious matters.

The right of reproductive autonomy is essential to the moral independence of women. The burdens of unwanted pregnancy fall entirely on the pregnant woman, affecting her health, her ability to provide care for her family and her ability to participate in society.

Constitutional mandates of privacy and religious neutrality require government to be completely neutral in the face of competing religious beliefs and claims of moral conscience. Sec. 1.205 is profoundly inconsistent with this Court's First Amendment decisions. In Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), this Court recognized that the question of the beginning of personhood is a religious and moral inquiry. Sec. 1.205 attempts to coerce uniformity on the subjects of fetal personhood and the morality of abortion. The First Amendment protects the exercise of conscience in daily life. The right of reproductive choice is a fundamental right which the Constitution protects from the "vicissitudes of political controversy."

This Court's formulation of the right of privacy in reproductive decision-making underscores the primacy of individual decision-making.

I.

THERE IS NO CONSTANT TEACHING IN CATHOLIC THEOLOGY ON THE COMMENCEMENT OF PERSONHOOD

Many faiths hold as a matter of theological truth that abortion is permissible or even mandated in certain circumstances.[1] Most religions, including the Roman Catholic Church, have not defined the moment when personhood begins. There is no scriptural evidence of divine revelation on the question of the beginning of personhood.[2] There is no reference to abortion in the New Testament of the Bible. In the Old Testament, Exodus 21:22-25 indicates that under Hebrew law the fetus was not a rights-bearing individual.[3]

[1] Amici respectfully refer this Court to the brief amici curiae filed by the Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights et al. in support at appellees.

The finding contained in Sec. 1.205 that a full rights-bearing person exists from the moment of conception is not now, nor has

[2] The Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of Faith confirmed this observation in its Declaration on Abortion, n. 5 (1975): "The authors of Scripture do not make any philosophical observations on when life begins . . . ."

[3] That passage states that if two men are fighting and wound a pregnant woman, they shall have to pay her husband a fine if she miscarries, but they will have to give a life for her life if she dies. While this passage is obviously not a reference to voluntary abortion, it clearly establishes that a fetus was not equivalent to a person. If the fetus possessed the degree of personhood conferred by the Missouri statute, the two fighting men would have to give a life, not a fine, for the miscarried fetus.

it ever been the constant teaching of the Roman Catholic Church. Historically the Roman Catholic Church has been indifferent to the question of the beginning of personhood. The official teaching of the Roman Catholic Church on prenatal life has not been uniform:

> Many people believe that the Roman Catholic Church's opposition to abortion stems from its conviction that a new human person exists from the first moment of conception and that this newly formed person has as much a right to exist as anyone else. It is clear that this is not now, nor ever has been, official church teaching on the matter.

McCartney, "Some Roman Catholic Concepts of Person and Their Implications for the Ontological Status of the Unborn", in Abortion and the Status of the Fetus 313 (Bondeson et al. eds. 1984) (emphasis added).

Catholic tradition has always held that the question of personhood is spiritual, not scientific. The Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of Faith shares that view in stating:

> It is not up to biological sciences to make a definitive judgment on questions which are properly philosophical and moral such as the moment when a human person is constituted or the legitimacy of abortion.

Declaration on Abortion 6 (1975).

At the core of the belief system of Roman Catholics is the tenet that God grants to each person an immortal soul. Possession of a soul is the characteristic that distinguishes persons from nonpersons. Before there is a soul there is no person. For centuries, Catholic theologians, including Thomas Aquinas, held that a human soul cannot be infused into a non-human shape. Aquinas required that the body-soul comprise one human substance. Under this theory "the human soul, which is a rational soul, can only exist in a highly organized body, probably one which contains the basic structure of a human cerebral cortex." Tauer, "The Tradition of Probabilism and the Moral Status of the Human Embryo" in Abortion and Catholicism: The American Debate 57 (Jung and Shannon eds. 1988). The human soul is not capable of either twinning or recombining as embryos are.

> The soul is indivisible and indestructible and souls cannot split, fuse or disappear. The soul is the principle of selfhood, which, like it, is a unique and indivisible manner.

Id. at 76.

Applying the most basic belief of Roman Catholic faith, ensoulment (and thus personhood) probably could not occur before that point in the pregnancy where twinning or recombination of embryos is no longer possible.

While there has been disagreement through the centuries about the exact point of ensoulment, the great weight of Catholic theological authority places the point well after conception for that reason: "Since the human soul is characteristically rational, it appears necessary that the physical structures be developed to the level where there is some capability for supporting minimal rational activity." Tauer, supra at 77.

For many centuries Catholic theology and philosophy held that personhood (i.e., infusion of the soul into the body) was possible only when the embryo began to show a distinctly human outline and possessed the basic human organs.

Thomas Aquinas articulated this theory called delayed animation. Aquinas held that "the human soul was infused into the body only when the latter began to show a human shape or outline and possessed the basic human organs." Donceel, "A Liberal Catholic's View" in Abortion and Catholicism: The American Debate 48 (Jung and Shannon eds. 1988).

From 1140 through 1869 Canon law "distinguished between the unensouled and the ensouled fetus in its treatment of the gravity of abortion and the penalties to be imposed." Tauer, supra at 58.

Analytical theology on the ethics of abortion began during the fifteenth century. Antoninus, the archbishop of Florence, and John of Naples allowed early abortions of unanimated fetuses to save the pregnant woman. Approval of direct early abortion became common in the church. Maguire, "The Catholic Legacy and Abortion," 114 Commonweal 657, 660 (1981) (hereafter "Catholic Legacy"). Theologian J. Connery notes: "From the time the case was introduced by John of Naples in the early 14th century abortion of the unanimated fetus to save the life of the mother won considerable support from theologians. Abortion: The Development of the Roman Catholic Perspective 122 (1977).

Sixteenth century Catholic theologian Antoninus de Corduba justified use of medicine to benefit the health of a woman even if the treatment caused the abortion of an animated fetus. De Corduba argued that the woman had a "prior right" to the preservation of her health. Maguire, "Catholic Legacy" at 660.

Late sixteenth century Jesuit theologian Sanchez confirmed that his contemporaries permitted early abortion to save the pregnant woman. Sanchez formulated a theological theory of the fetus as a "quasi-aggressor" Id.

The Catechism of the Council of Trent published in 1566 and republished continuously through 1923 taught that only in the miraculous conception of Jesus was a soul joined to a body at the moment of conception:

> As soon as the Blessed Virgin gave her consent to the Angel's words . . . at once the most holy body of Christ was formed and a rational soul was joined to it. . . . Nobody can doubt that this was something new and an admirable work of the Holy Spirit, since, in the natural order, no body can be informed by a human soul except after the prescribed space of time.

Cited in Tauer, supra at p. 77 (emphasis added).

Clearly the existence and content of these published and widely disseminated theological discussions by important Catholic theologians belie the existence of a factotum principle that defines and resolves all abortion questions. Maguire, "Catholic Legacy" at 660.

The Vatican II commission which developed a statement on prenatal life expressly refused to define the point of ensoulment for purposes of the abortion discussion. Acknowledging the canonical and theological history summarized above, the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith stated: "This declaration expressly leaves aside the question of the moment when the spiritual soul is infused. There is not a unanimous tradition on this point and authors are in disagreement. For some it dates from the first instant, for others it could not at least precede nidation." Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Declaration on Abortion n. 19 (1975).

There is not now and never has been an infallible proclamation on abortion.

Those who proclaim that Sec. 1.205 is reflective of the clear and constant teaching of the Roman Catholic Church ignore, insult or are unaware of the historical data and Catholic tradition set forth above.

Today a diversity of opinion exists among committed Catholics on the subject of abortion. There is "no basis for saying there is only one Catholic position on the legal aspects of abortion in this country." J. Curran, Towards an American Catholic Moral Theology 29 (1987). Many Catholic philosophers and theologians still hold with Aquinas' position on delayed animation. The soul requires appropriate physical development. Many modern Catholic theologians believe that adequate brain development is the necessary component of human form for ensoulment. The advancement of science and knowledge of fetal development strongly suggest that the point of ensoulment must be later than Aquinas posited, at a point closer to viability.

Joseph F. Donceel, contemporary theologian and an expert on Aquinas concludes that the theory of delayed animation is sound and reflective of other evident truths of personal development:

> Nobody can tell with certitude when a child is capable of performing his first free moral choice, but all of us are quite certain that, during the first months or years of his life, a human baby is not yet a free moral agent. Likewise, I do not know when the human soul is infused, when the embryo becomes human. But I feel certain that there is no human soul, hence no human person, during the first few weeks of pregnancy, as long as the embryo remains in the vegetative stage of its development.

Donceel, supra at 50.

Thus, for Donceel and other serious Catholic believers "the embryo is certainly not a person during the early stages of pregnancy and that consequently it is not immoral to terminate pregnancy during this time provided there are serious reasons for such termination." Id. at 32.

Another contemporary theologian, Charles E. Curran, holds: "In conflict situations I would allow abortion to save human life or for values that are commensurate with human life. This would obviously include grave but real threats to the psychological health of the woman and could also include other values of a socio-economic nature in extreme situations." Quoted in Maguire, The Moral Revolution, 152 (1986).

Catholic tradition and theology teach methods of moral decision-making for individuals on issues of liberty and law. Probabilism is the method of decision-making taught by the Catholic Church which is most appropriate in this context.

The theory of probabilism is stated as follows: "If there exists a really probable opinion in favor of liberty. . . . although the opinion in favor of the law is more probable I may use the former opinion and disregard the latter." Tauer, supra at 64.

An opinion is probable if there are "good and solid" reasons for holding it.

> Historically probabilistic methods have not only been used by theologians but have been recognized by the Church magisterium as a legitimate way of handling a doubt of law in some cases where a right to life or another basic human right is involved.

Tauer, supra at 72.

Indeed the Church has indicated that on questions where there is a doubt of law involving human rights probabilism offers the only possible guideline. Id. at 73.[4] Questions on the beginning of personhood and the morality of abortion are questions of both law and fact in the Catholic moral tradition.

Probabilism is the most appropriate method of decision-making for individuals facing difficult moral questions. Probabilism

---

[4] Probabalism was the method used by Church in issuing opinions on such subjects as castration of boys to preserve their high pitched voices for religious choirs and slavery. Tauer, supra at 72.

as a method is highly favored in pastoral counseling because of its sensitivity to individual conscience. Tauer, supra at 65.

The theological teachings of Aquinas, the theorists of delayed animation who followed him, and the contemporary scientific evidence regarding fetal development (e.g., capacity for twinning and recombination) provide "good and solid reasons" for believing that the early embryo is not ensouled and thus not a person. It may be said that the theory of immediate ensoulment, which is enacted by Sec. 1.205, is highly improbable to Catholics.

Personhood cannot be observed or measured. It is a non-physical quality or characteristic which may be made up of a group of attributes such as consciousness, self-awareness or possession of an immortal soul. In our society the status of person confers on a being certain rights, and requires other individuals in the society to act in a certain way toward that being. Sec. 1.205, in ascribing full personhood status to the conceptus, embryo and fetus would require Catholics to act in a manner which is contrary to their religious teachings. It had been widely accepted Catholic teaching over the centuries that embryos and fetuses which lack human shape or form may not be baptized, because those entities do not possess a soul. Donceel, supra at 49. It is not Catholic practice to hold funerals after miscarriages.

The search for truth on subjects of moral importance is a dynamic process in the Catholic Church. Declarations of the Church hierarchy, even by the Pope, on moral issues are not infallible.[5] Moreover, the content of

---

[5] Many moral theologians believe that it would be impossible for a Pope to issue an infallible teaching on a moral question (footnote continued)

Church teaching on moral issues involving serious claims of liberty and life change over time as a result of argument and reflection and no position should be taken as final. Popes from 650 through 1866 issued affirmations of the moral justification of slavery. Today that is not an approved or acceptable moral teaching. Similarly, for many years Popes issued opinions permitting castration of boys for religious choirs. That, too, is a practice not considered morally correct today.

Dissent, from even authoritative teaching, and debate on issues of moral significance is part of the tradition of the Catholic Church. Theologian Charles Curran notes that such debate is part of a dynamic process which has seen authoritative teaching change and corrections made in errors of moral because morality involves circumstances and no one can know the circumstances of each person. McBrian, R., Catholicism 1004 (1981).

---

(footnote continued from previous page)

judgment: "[I]n specific moral judgments on complex matters one cannot hope to attain a degree of certitude that excludes the possibility of error." Curran, "Abortion", cited in Tauer, supra at 62. Just as the Church cannot hope to correct errors in moral judgment without the debate and dissent which is part of its tradition, the civil government must allow the possibility of different moral and scientific truths by permitting free exchange of ideas and the exercise of conscience. (See Point III, infra).

The theological views held by Catholics who believe that the soul is infused at some point after conception and thus that embryos and early fetuses are not "persons" are solidly rooted in Catholic theology and deeply held. These views are of equal theological and moral weight as those expressed in Sec. 1.205. It is contrary to Catholic moral tradition to cut off debate, decision and reflection on a subject or moral significance by legislative fiat.

The morality of abortion is a subject of "respectable debate" within the Catholic Church just as it is within the society at large. "A moral option comes within respectable debate if it is supported by serious reasons which commend themselves to many people, and if it has been endorsed by a number of authorities in the field of ethics, and if it has been approved by reputable religious and other humanitarian bodies." D. Maguire, The New Subversives 121 (1982).

Catholic theology and tradition teach that in matters involving moral decision-making the conscience of an individual is supreme. "To obey [conscience] is the very dignity of man; according to it he will be judged. Conscience is the most secret core and sanctuary of a man. There he is alone with God whose voice echoes in his depths." Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, ¶ 16.

For Catholics the question of abortion is a matter of conscience to be resolved by reference to theology, church tradition and individual contemplation and prayer. Further, Catholic teaching is that once a conscientious decision has been reached a person must be permitted to act in a manner consistent with the dictates of conscience: No one is "to be forced to act in a manner contrary to his conscience. Nor, on the other hand, is he to be restrained from acting in accordance with his conscience especially on matters religious." Declaration on Religious Freedom, ¶ 13.

Sec. 1.205 denigrates the process of conscientious decision-making for Catholic women by declaring the correctness of one theory of life. For Catholics, this weighty question must be examined by each individual in the exercise of conscience. Sec. 1.205, if upheld, would act as a serious inhibitor of the theological mandate for Catholics to act in accordance with the dictates of conscience.

In Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), this Court recognized that there exists respectable debate on the issue of abortion. In the face of respectable debate on issues of religious, moral and metaphysical significance our Constitutional system does not permit civil authority, either legislative or judicial, to decide which view is correct or to impose one view over others which are equally sincerely held. See Point III, infra.

II.

REPRODUCTIVE AUTONOMY IS FUNDAMENTAL TO THE MORAL INDEPENDENCE OF WOMEN

The right of reproductive autonomy is essential to the moral independence of women. The decision to bear a child is at the core of the concept of human and civil rights concerning personal relationships. Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942), Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972).

Since Roe, this Court has consistently recognized the fundamental importance to women's lives of the right to choose abortion. The decision whether to terminate a pregnancy is encompassed by the "right of privacy, grounded in the concept of personal liberty, guaranteed by the Constitution." Akron v. Akron Center for Reprod. Health, 462

U.S. 416, 419 (1983); Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973).

Restricting the ability to make reproductive choices "dramatically impairs a woman's capacity for self-determination." Law, "Rethinking Sex and the Constitution", 132 U. Pa. Law Rev. 955, 1017 (1984). Unwanted pregnancy touches every aspect of a woman's life -- affecting her physical health and well being, her ability to create and maintain social relationships (including family) and her ability "to contribute through wage work and public life." Id.

The burdens of unwanted pregnancy are enormous and fall entirely on the pregnant woman. Neither society nor any other individual bears the physical risks of pregnancy. The physical burdens of unwanted pregnancy range from minor physical discomfort to serious risk of health impairment. The health risks of childbearing are heightened significantly when in an unwanted pregnancy. Cates, "Legal Abortion: The Public Health Record," 215 Science 1587, 1589 (1982). There is no instance in our society where a person is compelled to subject herself or himself to significant health impairment or risk for the sake of the health or even the life of another person.[6] The physical burdens imposed by pregnancy may also affect a woman's ability to provide physical, emotional and financial care to her existing children and other family members.

---

6 Constitutional concerns of privacy protect bodily integrity of persons and do not require exceptional samaritanism. A parent cannot be compelled to save the life of a born child by organ donation, transfusion or other invasive practice; nor could a fetus compel anyone (including the biological "father" of the fetus) to provide a blood transfusion in utero or after birth. There is no question that the individual's rights of privacy and physical integrity would prevail over the child's or the fetus' claim for assistance.

Sec. 1.205, with its implied condemnation of abortion fails, at a deep ethical level, to take seriously the moral independence of women. A pregnant woman in the exercise of her conscience takes into account the many factors relevant to the decision, which may include the consideration of the needs and relations of persons (including the pregnant woman herself and her already born children). "The decision to have an abortion or a child requires consideration of relations with existing people as well as the capacity to provide care for the child." Law, supra at 1018.

Sec. 1.205 equates fetal life and adult life for purposes of civil and criminal law. This equation ignores the unique relationship between the pregnant woman and the fetus. "Fetal life is starkly different from all other forms of human life in that the fetus is completely dependent upon the body of the woman who conceived it. It cannot survive without her." Law, supra, at 1023. Society cannot provide support, care or nurturance to a fetus. In all other instances where born persons (including infants, the infirm and the elderly) make claims for assistance, no other person is required by law to provide the requested assistance if the cost is the life, health or autonomy of the person called upon to assist.

The ability to make reproductive choice is essential to a woman's capacity to live as an equal person in this society. Professor Sylvia Law has described the important values of equality, the ability to act as moral beings and participate in society are at stake when reproductive choice is limited:

> If and when it becomes technologically possible to grow children outside of a woman's body, the moral and constitutional issues we confront in relation to abortion will > be categorically different than they are today. But for today, reproductive freedom is, inescapably, the core issue of women's equality and liberty.

Law, supra at 1023 (footnote omitted).

Abortion must remain a legal option for women to even begin to make a moral choice with real freedom.

III.

CONSTITUTIONAL MANDATES OF PRIVACY AND RELIGIOUS NEUTRALITY REQUIRE THAT WOMEN BE PERMITTED TO MAKE REPRODUCTIVE CHOICES FREE FROM GOVERNMENT INTRUSION OR COERCION

It is a fundamental precept of the American constitutional system that where competing religious beliefs and claims of moral conscience are concerned, the government is obliged to be rigorously neutral. Missouri's legislature violated this fundamental principle of neutrality when it enacted a statute which codifies a religious belief.

The principles of constitutional neutrality embodied in the First Amendment's free exercise and establishment clauses secure for the people the fullest scope for the exercise of moral choice. D. Richards, Toleration and the Constitution (1986) at 268. This constitutional neutrality requires that government and the law show equal respect for the moral independence of each person seeking truth on a fundamental moral issue such as abortion. Id. at 269. Sec. 1.205 debases the search for moral truth by Catholics and others.

The First Amendment's free exercise clause guarantees freedom of conscience by preventing government complusion in matters of belief. School District Abington v. Schemp, 374 U.S. 203 (1963). The clear intent of Sec. 1.205 is to compel conformity on the subject of the beginning of personhood.

The Constitution requires that "government must pursue a course of complete neutrality toward religion." Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 60 (1985). Here, as in Jaffree, the state itself has "spoken" on a religious subject, and that speech "intends to convey a message of endorsement." Id. at 60-61. As this Court noted in Jaffree, the values protected by First Amendment religion clauses are "fundamental" and the values may be eroded in "myriad, subtle ways." Id. at 61, citing Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. at 694.

Upholding this statute would be profoundly inconsistent with this Court's First Amendment decisions. In Jaffree, this Court stated: "the individual freedom of conscience protected by the First Amendment embraces the right to select any religious faith or none at all." Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. at 50. There can be no doubt that our society is divided on religious and conscientious grounds concerning the question of when personhood begins and the morality of abortion.

In Roe, this Court recognized that the point at which personhood begins is fundamentally a religious and moral inquiry. If there was ever any question that denominations or sects view issues of personhood of the fetus and the morality of abortion as essentially theological, the briefs submitted in this case on both sides provide proof beyond peradventure. That being so, it is proper and necessary to inquire whether Sec. 1.205 effects a "symbolic union of church and state" and further whether such union is "sufficiently likely to be perceived by adherents or [controlling] denominations as an endorsement and by nonadherents as a disapproval of their individual religious choices." Grand Rapids

School Dist. v. Ball, 473 U.S. 373, 390 (1985). Clearly Sec. 1.205 is a state endorsement of the explicitly religious beliefs of some denominations or groups. Concomitantly, amici and other religious groups and denominations perceive disapproval by the state of Missouri of their individual religious choices and the value of their search for religious truth. Enactment of legislation is quintessential government activity. When government activity "conveys a message of government endorsement or approval of religion, a core purpose of the establishment clause is violated." Id. at 389.

This Court has recognized that there will be controversy over issues of political, religious, and metaphysical significance and that the Constitution protects the right to believe, controvert others' beliefs, and to act in accordance with the dictates of one's own conscience:

> Struggles to coerce uniformity of sentiment in support of some end thought essential to their time have been waged by many good as well as evil men . . . Those who begin the coercive elimination of dissent soon find themselves exterminating dissenters. Compulsory unification of the opinion achieves only the unanimity of the graveyard.
>
> Freedom to differ is not limited to things that do not matter much. That would be a mere shadow of freedom. The test of its substance is the right to differ as to things that touch the heart of the existing order. If there is any fixed star in our constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty, can prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion, or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein.

West Virginia State Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 640-42 (1943).

Sec. 1.205 is unquestionably an attempt to coerce uniformity on the subject of fetal personhood and the morality of abortion.

As such it violates this most basic constitutional principle.

The First Amendment protects the exercise of conscience in daily life:

> The individual's freedom to choose his own creed is the counterpart of his right to refrain from accepting the creed established by the majority. . . . [W]hen the underlying principle has been examined in the crucible of litigation, the Court has unambiguously concluded that the individual freedom of conscience protected by the First Amendment embraces the right to select any religious faith or none at all. This conclusion derives support not only from the interest in respecting the individual's freedom of conscience, but also from the conviction that religious beliefs worthy of respect are the product of free and voluntary choice by the faithful.

Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. at 52-53 (footnotes omitted).

This principle of voluntarism is a central First Amendment concern. The Free Exercise clause is violated when a state, purposefully or not, puts "substantial pressure on an adherent to modify his behavior and to violate his belief." Thomas v. Review Board, 450 U.S. 707, 718 (1981), Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 404-07 (1963). Sec. 1.205 clearly intends to put pressure on women who do not conscientiously believe that personhood begins at conception to modify their behavior and perhaps violate their own deeply held moral or religious beliefs.

In codifying the belief that the fetus is an actual human life from conception, Sec. 1.205 goes "beyond legitimate legislative concern." It intrudes into "the specific but comprehensive area of human conduct: man's belief or disbelief in the verity of some transcendental idea . . . ." McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420, 466 (1961) (Frankfurter, J., concurring); School District of Abington v. Schempp, 374 U.S. at 244-45 (Brennan, J., concurring). "The realm of religion . . . is where knowledge leaves off, and where faith begins, and it never has needed the arm of the state for support, and wherever it has received it, it has harmed both the public and the religion that it would pretend to serve." Wolman v. Walter, 433 U.S. 229, 264 (1977) (Stevens, J. concurring and dissenting, quoting Clarence Darrow, Tr. of Oral Arg. at 7, Scopes v. State.) Sec. 1.205 enacts a particular religious view of the creation of personhood just as the Arkansas legislature enacted a preference for the theory of the divine creation of the world. Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968).

When values that are or were originally religious become widely accepted by social consensus and where they serve legitimate ends of civil governance (such as proscription of murder or the benefit of a day of rest) they become part of the secular fabric of society. School District of Abington v. Schempp, 374 U.S. at 264. (Brennan, J. concurring); McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. at 445. At this point in American history there is no such social consensus on matters of abortion. Indeed, in the years since Roe was decided there has been increasing social and moral debate on the issue. Nor is there a legitimate end of civil governance to be served by disfavoring or restricting abortion.

The belief that the fetus is a person from the moment of fertilization is identified with one group of religious teachings, and is sincerely rejected by other denominations including mainstream Jewish and Protestant denominations. (See Brief submitted by Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights). This significant and sincere division among religious faiths (and within denominations) makes clear that there is no moral consensus. And even if the religious belief reflected in Sec. 1.205 was shared by a majority, which amici contend clearly is not the case, its imposition as a matter of civil law is nonetheless a violation of the First Amendment. See, Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968).

Sec. 1.205 enacts as a matter of civil law a theory of life which is fundamentally religious in nature. In 1983 this Court reaffirmed the critical holding of Roe that a "state may not adopt one theory of when life begins to justify its regulation of abortions." Akron v. Akron Center for Reprod. Health, 472 U.S. 416, 444 (1983). In Akron, the state attempted to justify its unconstitutional regulation by reference to "medical" findings. This Court rejected that justification, as it must here.

Our constitutional system of government was structured to insulate the exercise fundamental rights from the changing tides of the political process: "The very purpose of the Bill of Rights was to withdraw certain subjects from the vicissitudes of political controversy . . . [F]undamental rights may not be submitted to a vote. They depend on the outcome of no elections. . ." West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. at 638. The rights involved in this case -- to make an individual decision regarding childbearing free from government coercion and to the exercise of one's religious beliefs and conscience free from government endorsement or disapproval -- are fundamental rights, as this Court has recognized in a series of decisions over the last half-century, including Skinner v. Oklahoma, Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438

(1972), Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985) and Roe v. Wade 410 U.S. 113 (1973).

This Court's formulation of the right to privacy underscores the significance of independence for the "individual in making certain kinds of important decisions." Whalen v. Roe, 429 U.S. 589, 599-600 (1977).

In Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 35 (1942), this Court recognized that the state's usurpation from the individual of decision-making on the issue of whether to beget or bear a child risks invidious discrimination, even genocide. Skinner is an acknowledgment of the "fundamental personal character of the right to reproductive autonomy", that the people and the Constitution do not entrust to government for regulation. L. Tribe, Constitutional Law 1339 (2d ed. 1987).

In Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1974) a case involving contraception this Court noted that decisions regarding child-bearing are at the core of constitutionally protected privacy concerns: "If the right of privacy means anything it is the right to the individual, married or single, to be free from unwanted government intrusions so fundamentally affecting a person as the decision whether to bear or beget a child." (Id. at 453 emphasis in the original.)

The constitutional guarantees of privacy and religious liberty protect the right of Catholics and others to refuse to consider abortion. The same protections must be preserved to protect equally the rights of Catholics and others whose moral and religious beliefs concerning the well-being of existing life and of responsible parenthood counsel that abortion is an appropriate choice for the realization of important moral goals. "[W]here moral values are in such sharp conflict the First Amendment requires respect for diversity." Law, supra at 1026.

CONCLUSION

For all of the foregoing reasons, amici respectfully request this Court affirm the decision of the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals holding Sec. 1.205 unconstitutional.

Respectfully submitted,

PATRICIA HENNESSEY*
Solin & Breindel P.C.
501 Fifth Avenue
New York, New York 10017
(212) 973-8900
Attorney for Amici Curiae

*Counsel of Record
March 30, 1989

---

* Amici acknowledge the assistance of Professor Daniel Maguire, Doctor of Sacred Theology (S.T.D.), former President of the Society of Christian Ethics, in the research and preparation of this brief. Dr. Maguire is Professor of Theology at Marquette University.

APPENDIX

STATEMENT OF INDIVIDUAL AMICI

Catholics for a Free Choice is an independent national membership organization established in 1974. One of CFFC's objectives is to protect the legal right of all women and girls to act as moral agents in decisions related to sexuality and reproductive health care without coercive legal or quasi-legal interference by religious institutions. As Catholics, CFFC members support policies of strict separation of church and state based not only on the U.S. Constitution but also on the Roman Catholic Declaration on Religious Liberty (Vatican II Dignitatis humanae, 7 December (1965) which declares

> ". . . the civil authority must see to is that the equality of the citizens before the law, which is itself society, is never violated either openly or covertly for religious reasons and that there is no discrimination among its citizens."

Chicago Catholic Women is an organization committed to working toward structural change within church and society in order to promote the full giftedness and personhood of women and a world of justice for all. We know that a woman's choice regarding her body must be respected. We have heard the pain of women who had illegal abortions before 1973 and we will work to keep a woman's choice legal.

Feminist Action Coalition/New Jersey is a coalition of members from Emmaus Community of Christian Hope, the New Jersey National Assembly of Religious Women, New Jersey Network and New Jersey Women's Ordination Conference. We work together on issues affecting women in church and society.

The Loretto Women's Network is a voluntary association of feminists in the Loretto Community committed to act for the empowerment of women. Among other things, we agree women are, and of right ought to be, the primary agents of moral decision-making in matters of reproduction.

The National Coalition of American Nuns is an organization of 1800 Roman Catholic sisters from different orders from over the United States. NCAN was organized in 1969 "to speak, study and work for social justice and human rights." NCAN is directed by a board of 24 sisters who set the policies based on the opinions registered by its members.

Women in Spirit of Colorado Task Force is a covenant community of prophetic persons committed to supporting and facilitating individual and collective journeys of faith from bondage to liberation. The complexity and pluralism of religious and medical viewpoints regarding when life begins are so varied in U.S. society that any governmental attempt to legislate a "single mindset morality" is a violation of basic American freedoms. Every child should be a wanted child; the morality and responsibility of that decision is a private, not governmental, matter. We view with great suspicion and alarm the motives of those who feel they have the right to make this weighty decision for others.

INDIVIDUALS*

Claudia Adamson, Chicago, IL
Harriet Lane Baggett, M.Div., St. Louis Catholics for Choice, St. Louis, MO
William R. Barnett, Ph.D., Le Moyne College, Syracuse, NY
Sr. Deborah H. Barrett, SFCC, Idyllwild, CA
Mary S. Blake, Chicago, IL
Mary Buckley, retired associate professor, St. John's University, Queens, NY
Warren R. Carlin, O.Carm., Joliet, IL
Roddy O'Neil Cleary, Shilburne, VT
Camy Condon, Director, Intergenerational Program, New Mexico Conference of Churches, Albuquerque, NM
William V. D'Antonio, Executive Director, American Sociological Association, Washington, DC
Maurice C. Duchaine, San Francisco, CA
Robert Edgerly, W. Hollywood, CA
Barbara Ferraro, Charleston, WV
Geraldine A. Ferraro, Esq., New York, NY
Ruth McDonough Fitzpatrick, Women's Ordination Conference, Fairfax, VA
Trisha Flynn, Rocky Mountain News, Denver, CO
Robert Francoeur, Ph.D., Professor of Human Embryology, Fairleigh Dickinson University, Madison, NJ
Mary Clare Freeman, Wausau, WI
Kevin Gordon, Brooklyn College, CUNY, New York, NY
Christine E. Gudorf, Ph.D., Cinncinnati, OH

*Organizations listed for identification only.

Marian Gumbleton, Rochester, MI
Gerrard Gumbleton, Rochester, MI
Claire Fox Haughey, wife, mother of 7, grandmother of 10, Denver, CO
Dr. Francis J. Haughey, Professor, Rutgers University, Flemington, NJ
Kay Norton Haughey, Denver, CO
Robert J. Haughey, Denver, CO
Patricia Hussey, Charleston, WV
Judith S. Jordan, San Bernandino, CA
Sue Julian, Frametown, WV
Janet Kalven, Grail Women Task Force, Loveland, OH
Helen Kauffman, Women-Church Baltimore, Baltimore, MD
Joseph A. LaBarge, Jr., Ph.D., Dept. of Religion, Bucknell University, Lewisburg, PA
Mary Ann Lamanna, Dept. of Sociology, University of Nebraska at Omaha, Omaha, NE
Daniel C. Maguire, S.T.D., Marquette University, Milwaukee, WI
Marjorie Reiley Maguire, Ph.D. (from the Catholic University of America), Milwaukee, WI
Mary Jo Meadow, Professor of Psychology and Director of Religious Studies, Mankato State University, Mankato, MN
Anne Lally Milhaven, MTS candidate, Harvard University, Providence, RI
John Giles Milhaven, Brown University, Providence, RI
Eileen G. Moran, Ph.D., St. Thomas Aquinas Parish, Brooklyn, NY
Marysa Navarro, Ph.D. Dartmouth College, Hanover, NH
Joseph O'Rourke, L.Th., Ph.L., Director of Executive Education, University of Illinois, Chicago, IL
Donna Quinn, O.P., Chicago, IL
Dolly Pomerleau, Quixote Center

Diane Reese, Sister of Notre Dame de Namur, Frametown, WV
Rosemary Radford Ruether, Ph.D., Garrett Evangelical Seminary, Evanston, IL
Lidia H. Runkel, Bozeman, MT
Mary Jane Schutzius, Florissant, MO
Dr. Michael J. Sullivan III, Drexel University, Abington, PA
Lori Valencia-Greene, Legislative Director for Congressman Bruce Morrison, Washington, DC
E. Jane Via, former Associate Professor of Religious Studies, Deputy District Attorney, San Diego, CA
Mary Jo Weaver, Bloomington, IN

AMICUS CURIAE

BRIEF

FILED
MAR 30 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

No. 88-605

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,

Appellants,

v.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,

Appellees.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT

BRIEF AMICI CURIAE OF THE COMMITTEES ON CIVIL RIGHTS, MEDICINE AND LAW, AND SEX AND LAW OF THE ASSOCIATION OF THE BAR OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK AND OTHERS† ON BEHALF OF APPELLEES

SHELDON OLIENSIS, President
JONATHAN LANG*
DIANE S. WILNER
ARTHUR S. LEONARD
The Association of the Bar of
The City of New York
42 West 44th Street
New York, New York 10036-6690
(212) 307-6262

*Counsel of Record

AUDREY S. FEINBERG
JANICE GOODMAN
MARY SUE HENIFIN
LINDA C. McCLAIN
Of Counsel

March 30, 1989

†Other amici listed on inside front cover.

39 pp

Other amici:

ARIZONA ATTORNEYS ACTION COUNCIL

THE BEVERLY HILLS BAR ASSOCIATION

COMMITTEE ON WOMEN'S RIGHTS OF THE NEW YORK COUNTY LAWYERS' ASSOCIATION

LAWYERS CLUB OF SAN DIEGO, INC.

WOMEN'S BAR ASSOCIATION OF ILLINIOIS

WOMEN'S BAR ASSOCIATION OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Page
TABLE OF AUTHORITIES	iii
INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE	2
INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT	5
I. ROE v. WADE SHOULD BE UPHELD ...	6
A. Roe v. Wade was correctly decided ...	6
B. Principles of stare decisis dictate that Roe v. Wade should be upheld ...	10
1. Stare decisis plays a crucial role in this case	10
2. No change in law or experience has occurred to justify re-examining, much less overruling, Roe v. Wade	11
3. Settled expectations militate against overruling Roe v. Wade ..	15
4. The overruling of Roe v. Wade would place an extraordinary burden on New York State	16
II. THE MISSOURI STATUTE IMPERMISSIBLY BURDENS A WOMAN'S FUNDAMENTAL PRIVACY RIGHT TO MAKE INFORMED REPRODUCTIVE DECISIONS	17

Page

III. THE MISSOURI STATUTE VIOLATES THE FIRST AMENDMENT FREE SPEECH RIGHTS OF HEALTH CARE PROVIDERS AND THEIR PATIENTS BY DISCRIMINATING ON THE BASIS OF VIEWPOINT 22

A. Medical standards of care require speech about all reproductive alternatives, including abortion 22

1. Health care providers have a duty to provide information about abortion 22

2. Uncensored communications between physician and patient are essential to maternal and fetal health 24

B. Abortion information is a protected form of speech 25

C. The Missouri statute unconstitutionally censors speech on the basis of viewpoint about abortion 26

CONCLUSION 29

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

Page

CASES

American Council of the Blind v. Boorstin, 644 F. Supp. 811 (D.D.C. 1986) 27

Arkansas Electric Cooperative Corp. v. Arkansas Public Service Commission, 461 U.S. 375 (1983) 12

Arkansas Writers' Project, Inc. v. Ragland, 481 U.S. 221 (1987) 27

Beal v. Doe, 432 U.S. 438 (1977) 12

Becker v. Schwartz, 46 N.Y. 2d 401, 386 N.E. 2d 807 (1978) 24

Bellotti v. Baird, 428 U.S. 132 (1976) 12

Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622 (1979) 12

Berman v. Allan, 80 N.J. 421, 404 A.2d 8 (1979) 24

Betesh v. United States, 400 F. Supp. 238 (D.D.C. 1974) 23

Bigelow v. Virginia, 421 U.S. 809 (1975) 25

Board of Education v. Pico, 457 U.S. 853 (1982) 27

Bonaparte v. Floyd, 291 S.C. 427, 354 S.E.2d 40 (Ct. App. 1987) 23

Boys Markets, Inc. v. Retail Clerks Union, Local 770, 398 U.S. 235 (1970) 12

Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954) 15

	Page
Bullfrog Films, Inc. v. Wick, 847 F.2d 502 (9th Cir. 1988)	27
City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983)	passim
Cobbs v. Grant, 8 Cal. 3d 229, 104 Cal. Rptr. 505, 502 P.2d 1 (1972)	20, 24
Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379 (1979)	12
Connecticut v. Menillo, 423 U.S. 9 (1975)	12
Consolidated Edison Co. v. Public Service Comm'n, 447 U.S. 530 (1980)	26
Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc., 473 U.S. 788 (1985)	28
DKT Memorial Fund Ltd. v. Agency for International Development, 691 F. Supp. 137 (D. Mass. 1988)	26
FCC v. League of Women Voters, 468 U.S. 364 (1984)	26, 27
Franklin v. Fitzpatrick, 428 U.S. 901 (1976)	26
Gay & Lesbian Law Students Ass'n v. Gohn, 850 F.2d 361 (8th Cir. 1988)	27
Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)	8-9
Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980)	12, 19, 20, 21, 27
H.L. v. Matheson, 450 U.S. 398 (1981)	12
In re Farrell, 108 N.J. 355, 529 A.2d 404 (1987)	24
Lee v. Andrews, 545 S.W.2d 238 (Tex. Ct. App. 1976)	23

	Page
Lindquist v. Dengel, 92 Wash. 2d 257, 595 P.2d 934 (1979)	23
Lyng v. United Auto Workers, 108 S. Ct. 1184 (1988)	27, 28
Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977)	12, 19, 20, 21
Massachusetts v. Bowen, 679 F. Supp. 137 (D. Mass. 1988)	26
Moragne v. States Marine Lines, Inc., 398 U.S. 375 (1970)	10, 11, 16
New York v. Bowen, 690 F. Supp. 1261 (S.D.N.Y. 1988), appeal filed, No. 88-6204 (2d Cir. filed 1988)	26
Phillips v. United States, 508 F. Supp. 544 (D.S.C. 1981)	24
Planned Parenthood v. Arizona, 718 F.2d 938 (9th Cir. 1983), appeal after remand, 789 F.2d 1348 (9th Cir.), aff'd mem. sub nom. Babbitt v. Planned Parenthood, 479 U.S. 925 (1986)	26
Planned Parenthood v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976)	12
Planned Parenthood Ass'n v. Fitzpatrick, 401 F. Supp. 554 (E.D. Pa. 1975), aff'd mem. sub nom. Franklin v. Fitzpatrick, 428 U.S. 901 (1976)	26
Planned Parenthood Ass'n v. Kempiners, 531 F. Supp. 320 (N.D. Ill. 1981), vacated and remanded on other grounds, 700 F.2d 1115 (7th Cir. 1983)	26

Page

Planned Parenthood Ass'n, Inc. v Ashcroft, 462 U.S. 476 (1983) 12

Planned Parenthood Fed'n v. Bowen, 680 F. Supp. 1465 (D. Colo. 1988) 26

Police Department v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92 (1972) 22

Regan v. Taxation With Representation of Washington, 461 U.S. 540 (1983) 27, 28

Reproductive Health Service v. Webster, 851 F.2d 1071 (8th Cir. 1988), prob. juris. noted, 109 S. Ct. 780 (1989) 5, 18, 21

Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973) ..... passim

Thomas v. Washington Gas Light Co., 448 U.S. 261 (1980) 12, 17, 19

Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986) ..... passim

Truman v. Thomas, 27 Cal. 3d 285, 165 Cal. Rptr. 308, 611 P.2d 902 (1980) 23

Union Carbide & Carbon Corp. v. Stapleton, 237 F.2d 229 (6th Cir. 1956) 23

United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100 (1941) 15

Valley Family Planning v. North Dakota, 489 F. Supp. 238 (D.N.D. 1980), aff'd on other grounds, 661 F.2d 99 (8th Cir. 1981) 26

Vasquez v. Hillery, 474 U.S. 254 (1986) 10, 11

Virginia State Bd. of Pharmacy v Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, 425 U.S. 748 (1976) 22

Page

West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish, 300 U.S. 379 (1937) 15

William v. Zbaraz, 448 U.S. 358 (1980) 12

Wooley v. Maynard, 430 U.S. 705 (1977) 27-28

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS

U.S. Constitution, First Amendment 5, 6, 18, 22, 23, 26, 27, 28

U.S. Constitution, Fourteenth Amendment 5, 18

STATUTES

MISSOURI

Mo. Ann. Stat. § 188.210 22

OTHER AUTHORITIES

Adler, Sex Roles and Unwanted Pregnancy in Adolescent and Adult Women, Prof. Psychology 12 (1981) 25

American Academy of Pediatrics, Pregnancy and Abortion Counseling, 63 Pediatrics 920 (1979) 23

American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, Standards for Obstetric-Gynecologic Services (6th ed. 1985) 23

American Medical Association, Current Opinions on Ethical and Judicial Affairs (1986) 23

American Psychiatric Association, Principles of Medical Ethics with Annotations Especially Applicable to Psychiatry (1981) 23

	Page
American Psychological Association, Ethical Principles of Psychologists, 36 Am. Psychologist 580 (1981)	23
American Public Health Association, Recommended Program Guide for Abortion Services (Revised 1979), 70 Am. J. Pub. Health 652 (1980)	23
Birdsall & Chester, Contraception and the Status of Women: What is the Link?, 19 Fam. Plan. Persp. 14 (1987)	25
H. P. David, et al., ed., Born Unwanted § 17 (1988)	14
President's Commission for the Study of Ethical Problems in Medicine and Biomedical and Behavioral Research, Making Health Care Decisions: the Ethical and Legal Implications of Informed Consent in the Patient-Practitioner Relationship, Vol. 1 at 69 (1982)	25
Report of the Committee on Fetal Extrauterine Survivability to the New York State Task Force in Life and the Law (Jan. 1988)	15
Sen. Com. on the Judiciary, (afternoon Sess., Dec. 14, 1987) (Transcript of Proceedings, Miller Reporting Co., Inc., Washington, D.C.)	10
Sen. Com. on the Judiciary, S. Hrg. 99-1064, Serial No. J-99-119, 99th Cong., 2d Sess. (Aug. 5 and 6, 1986)	10
Sen. Com. on the Judiciary, S. Hrg., Serial No. J-97-51, 97th Cong., 1st Sess. (Sept. 9, 10 and 11, 1981)	10

No. 88-605

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,

Appellants,

v.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,

Appellees.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT

BRIEF AMICI CURIAE OF THE COMMITTEES ON CIVIL RIGHTS, MEDICINE AND LAW, AND SEX AND LAW OF THE ASSOCIATION OF THE BAR OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK AND OTHERS ON BEHALF OF APPELLEES

The Committees on Civil Rights, Medicine and Law, and Sex and Law of The Association of the Bar of the City of New York (the "Association") and others, with the consent of counsel to both parties, respectfully submit this brief in support of appellees.

INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE

The Association of the Bar of the City of New York ("the Association"), chartered by the State of New York in 1871, is an organization of over 18,000 attorneys. While most of its members practice in the New York City metropolitan area, the Association has members in nearly every state and in 40 foreign countries. Two important purposes of the Association, as set forth in its Constitution, are "promoting reforms in the law" and "facilitating and improving the administration of justice". The Association accordingly has devoted itself to supporting and defending reforms in the law in cases of substantial public importance before the courts, including this Court.

The Association is committed to the principle of individual liberty enunciated in Roe v. Wade. In addition, as a professional group of practicing attorneys, the Association is always troubled when well settled cases of the Court, like Roe v. Wade, are threatened by litigants such as appellants, who would have the Court repudiate over 16 years of its own jurisprudence and that of the lower courts as well. Principles of stare decisis mandate that the continuity of well established decisions like Roe v. Wade should not be undermined by the considerations upon which the current challenge is grounded.

The Association is also committed to the right of women to secure information relating to reproductive decisions free from governmental coercion. The Association is particularly concerned that the questions presented by this appeal, if resolved in the way in which appellants suggest they should be resolved, would substantially curtail, if not altogether eliminate, the rights of women in this critical area of private concern.

The Association is equally committed to the right of freedom of expression, and believes that the statute at issue impinges upon the free speech rights of both physicians and their patients. Physicians and their patients share a relationship similar to that which exists between lawyers and their clients. The Association's long–standing concern with legislation, like that at issue here, which interferes with the abilities of physicians and their patients to speak freely about reproductive alternatives compels it to urge affirmance of the decision below.

All of these issues are of great significance to the Association. It therefore urges that the Court uphold Roe v. Wade and the judgment of the court of appeals finding the Missouri statute in part unconstitutional.

The Arizona Attorneys Action Council is an organization of lawyers dedicated to the preservation of women's rights to the free exercise of family planning decisions, including the right to an abortion. The Council views any limitations on these rights as an invasion of women's right to privacy as protected by the United States Constitution.

The Beverly Hills Bar Association ("BHBA") is a voluntary bar association formed on December 2, 1931 which currently has 3,000 members. The members of BHBA practice in and around the City of Beverly Hills, California. BHBA is committed to the protection of individual liberties and to the promotion of respect for the legal system. BHBA believes that a reversal of the landmark decision in Roe v. Wade would impinge on individual liberties and would undermine public confidence in the legal system.

The Committee on Women's Rights of the New York County Lawyers' Association ("NYCLA") is a committee composed of both female and male attorneys who concentrate their efforts on the elimination of discrimination against women. Founded in 1908, NYCLA is a Bar Association with a membership of approximately 11,000 attorneys, most of whom live or work in New York County. NYCLA's concerns include civil liberties, among other issues of social and legal significance. The Committee on Women's Rights, created in 1972, has prepared reports, commented on legislation, organized forums on issues of concern to the legal profession and participated as amicus curiae in litigation directed to the furtherance of women's and civil rights.

Lawyers Club of San Diego, Inc. ("Lawyers Club") is a California bar association founded in 1872, with current membership of almost 700 men and women, most of whom practice and reside in San Diego County, California. The purpose of Lawyers Club is "to advance the status of women in the law, to support and improve the administration of justice and to promote equality of the sexes in our society." The rights of liberty and privacy are key to equality of the sexes. Lawyers Club believes that any encroachment on the protections afforded by the Constitution and Roe v. Wade would destroy the fundamental rights of women to control their pregnancies and their bodies.

The Women's Bar Association of Illinois ("WBAI") was founded in 1914 for the purpose of promoting and fostering the interests and welfare of women and women attorneys and to maintain the honor and dignity of the legal profession. WBAI's 1,000 members have long campaigned for individual rights and liberties, including the right of women to make reproductive decisions free from governmental interference. WBAI has filed briefs amicus curiae before this Court on behalf of parties whose rights were in jeopardy, most recently on behalf of respondent in Hishon v. King & Spaulding, October Term, 1982, No. 82-940.

The Women's Bar Association of the State of New York ("WBASNY") is an organization of over 3,000 attorneys comprising fifteen chapters throughout the State. Founded in 1980, its stated purposes include the following: to cooperate with, aid and support organizations and causes which advance the status and progress of women in the society; to facilitate the administration of justice; and to cultivate the science of jurisprudence. The members of WBASNY support the principles enunciated in Roe v. Wade, including the recognition of a constitutionally guaranteed right to privacy.

INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The decision of the lower court was correct in all respects.[1] This brief addresses those issues on appeal of particular concern to amici: whether the Court should reconsider and overrule Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), and whether the lower court correctly held unconstitutional the Missouri statute's prohibition on "encouraging and counseling" a woman concerning abortion when her life is not at risk. Amici submit that the decision of the court of appeals should be affirmed for at least three reasons.

First, Roe v. Wade was correctly decided and has become a decision of great significance to millions of Americans who have premised their expectations about reproductive choices upon it. Principles of stare decisis dictate that this Court uphold Roe v. Wade. Indeed, in prior decisions reaffirming Roe v. Wade and applying its principles, the Court has expressly indicated its respect for stare decisis. Appellants have presented no evidence of changes in law or experience that now would warrant a different result. In addition, settled expectations premised upon Roe v. Wade also favor the Court's continued adherence to stare decisis and to the principles of Roe v. Wade.

Second, the court of appeals correctly applied the Court's principles in City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983), and Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986), in holding unconstitutional that part of the Missouri statute which prohibits state and state-funded health care providers from "encouraging and counseling" a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life. See Reproductive Health Service v. Webster, 851 F.2d 1071, 1077-80 (8th Cir. 1988), prob. juris. noted, 109 S. Ct. 780 (1989). The Missouri statute clearly violates a woman's First and Fourteenth Amendment rights to liberty and privacy. The Court has consistently held that the government may not interfere with a woman's fundamental right to decide, in consultation with her doctor, whether to terminate a pregnancy by precluding her from obtaining the very information necessary to make that decision. Missouri's statutory prohibition on the provision and receipt of information about abortion places an impermissible restriction on the counseling relationship and on a woman's range of choices.

---

1 Amici assume that the parties will brief all issues before this Court on appeal and confine their focus to the three points addressed below.

Third, by prohibiting physicians from "encouraging and counseling" a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life, the Missouri statute violates the First Amendment free speech rights of health care providers and their patients by discriminating on the basis of viewpoint. While professional standards require that a physician disclose all relevant information to a patient, the Missouri statute would compel a health care provider to compromise professional obligations in the service of the state's views on abortion. The restrictions on disclosure also would have serious impact on the relationship between physician and patient, in which uncensored communication is essential to maternal and fetal health. The Court has held that dissemination of information about abortion is a protected form of speech. By providing public funding for reproductive health services but prohibiting dissemination by health care professionals of information about abortion, the Missouri statute unconstitutionally censors speech based on viewpoint.

I. ROE v. WADE SHOULD BE UPHELD.

A. Roe v. Wade was correctly decided.

Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), is a decision of great significance—both to the millions of women who rely on the constitutional protections recognized by the case and as the proclamation of a rule that sets the rights of the individual above the views of the state. As Justice Blackmun eloquently wrote, over a decade after Roe v. Wade:

> Few decisions are more personal and intimate, more properly private, or more basic to individual dignity and autonomy, than a woman's decision—with the guidance of her physician and within the limits specified in Roe—whether to end her pregnancy. A woman's right to make that choice freely is fundamental. Any other result, in our view, would protect inadequately a central part of the sphere of liberty that our law guarantees equally to all.

Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747, 772 (1986).

In lieu of analyzing all the decisions that came after Roe v. Wade, all the commentary about the decision, and the suggested alternative grounds for the decision, we observe three important aspects of the decision that are as sound today as they were 16 years ago. First, the Court in Roe v. Wade was determined to resolve the issue "free of emotion" and based on the Constitution. 410 U.S. at 116-17. Second, both the majority and the dissenters believe that there is a fundamental constitutional right to liberty, which includes a woman's decision whether or not to bear a child. And third, a survey of the legal history of abortion indicates that only in modern times have there been statutes outlawing abortion.

In the current climate, it may be easy to forget that the controversy over abortion long preceded the decision in Roe v. Wade. As the Court wrote at the outset in Roe v. Wade:

> We forthwith acknowledge our awareness of the sensitive and emotional nature of the abortion controversy, of the vigorous opposing views, even among physicians, and of the deep and seemingly absolute convictions that the subject inspires. One's philosophy, one's experiences, one's exposure to the raw edges of human existence, one's religious training, one's attitudes toward life and family and their values, and the moral standards one establishes and seeks to observe, are all likely to influence and to color one's thinking and conclusions about abortion.

> In addition, population growth, pollution, poverty, and racial overtones tend to complicate and not to simplify the problem.
>
> Our task, of course, is to resolve the issue by constitutional measurement, free of emotion and of predilection.

410 U.S. at 116-17.

This sentiment was echoed by the Court in 1986, in Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, when it said:

> Constitutional rights do not always have easily ascertainable boundaries, and controversy over the meaning of our Nation's most majestic guarantees frequently has been turbulent. As judges, however, we are sworn to uphold the law even when its content gives rise to bitter dispute. . . . We recognized at the very beginning of our opinion in Roe, . . . that abortion raises moral and spiritual questions over which honorable persons can disagree sincerely and profoundly. But those disagreements did not then and do not now relieve us of our duty to apply the Constitution faithfully.

476 U.S. 747, 771-72 (citations omitted).

Thus the continuing controversy over abortion is nothing new, and does not suggest a lack of constitutional validity in Roe v. Wade. Indeed, the fact that abortion is so controversial and that any decision on abortion is so deeply rooted in personal, moral and religious beliefs, argues in favor of leaving the choice to the individual—free from governmental actions that burden or restrict individual choices and possibilities.

Further, the legal basis for a constitutional liberty right is indisputably sound. The dissenters in Roe v. Wade have fully supported the Court's decisions recognizing a right to privacy and have accepted the precedent of Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), from which Roe v. Wade evolved. See Thornburgh, 476 U.S. at 773-76 (Stevens, J., concurring). The Roe dissenters agreed that "a woman's ability to choose an abortion is a species of 'liberty' that is subject to the general protections of the Due Process Clause". Id. at 776 (quoting id. at 790 (White, J., dissenting)).

Absent adoption of the view that life begins at conception, which would effectively create a federal law outlawing abortions in almost all circumstances—and which no Justice of this Court has ever accepted[2]—our constitutional system mandates that the abortion decision be left to the individual, not to state legislatures.

In addition, the Court in Roe v. Wade did an extensive survey of legal history in this area, which among other things uncovered that at common law, an abortion performed before "quickening", movement of the fetus in utero, was generally not a crime. After quickening, if abortion was a crime at all, it was a minor crime. Id. at 132-36.[3] Such was the law in the United States when the Constitution was written. Id. at 138, 140. This remained the law in all but a few states until the mid-19th century. Id. at 138. Gradually, beginning in the the mid-19th century, state statutory law replaced the common law, first imposing, then increasing the penalties on abortions. By the end of the 1950s, a large majority of states had statutes banning abortions other than those done to preserve the life of the mother. Id. at 139.[4]

Accordingly, three predicates of Roe v. Wade—the sensitive and controversial nature of the issue, the constitutional

---

2 The Roe v. Wade dissenters refused to adopt the view that life begins at conception, instead positing a state interest in the potentiality of life represented by a fetus. Id. at 779 (Stevens, J., concurring) (citing id. at 792 (White, J., dissenting)).

3 As the Court wrote, anti-abortion legislation was "of relatively recent vintage". Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. at 129.

4 See Brief Amicus Curiae of American Historians.

right to privacy, and the legal history of abortions—were sound when this Court rendered its decision and are equally sound today.

B. Principles of stare decisis dictate that Roe v. Wade should be upheld.

1. Stare decisis plays a crucial role in this case.

The doctrine of stare decisis is vital to maintain the appearance and actuality of fairness and impartiality by preserving the continuity of the Court's legal principles. In addition, stare decisis furthers the important goal of stability in the law, allowing individuals to rely on established legal principles to guide their behavior and affairs. The doctrine also promotes expeditious adjudication by limiting the need to relitigate issues. Moragne v. States Marine Lines, Inc., 398 U.S. 375, 403 (1970).

As the Court has made clear, stare decisis is not to be departed from lightly:

> [S]tare decisis, [is] the means by which we insure that the law will not merely change erratically, but will develop in a principled and intelligent fashion. That doctrine permits society to presume that bedrock principles are founded in the law rather than in the proclivities of individuals, and thereby contributes to the integrity of our constitutional system of government, both in appearance and in fact.

Vasquez v. Hillery, 474 U.S. 254, 265-66 (1986).[5]

The Court has stressed that the doctrine shields the Court and its decisions "from the vicissitudes of political 5 The crucial role of stare decisis has been repeatedly affirmed by the Court and by its Justices. See, e.g., Sen. Com. on the Judiciary (afternoon sess., Dec. 14, 1987) (Transcript of Proceedings at 212, Miller Reporting Co., Inc., Washington, D.C.); Sen. Com. on the Judiciary, S. Hrg. 99-1064, Serial No. J-99-119, 99th Cong., 2d sess., at 32, 38 (Aug. 5 and 6, 1986); Sen. Com. on the Judiciary, S. Hrg., Serial No. J-97-51, 97th Cong., 1st Sess., at 83 (Sept. 9, 10 and 11, 1981).

controversy". As Justice Stevens wrote in a decision reaffirming Roe v. Wade:

> The very purpose of a Bill of Rights was to withdraw certain subjects from the vicissitudes of political controversy, to place them beyond the reach of majorities and officials and to establish them as legal principles to be applied by the courts. One's right to life, liberty, and property, to free speech, a free press, freedom of worship and assembly, and other fundamental rights may not be submitted to a vote; they depend on the outcome of no elections.

Thornburgh, 476 U.S. at 782 n.12 (Stevens, J., concurring) (quoting West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 638 (1943)); see also Moragne v. States Marine Lines, Inc., 398 U.S. at 403.

As the Court recognized in Roe v. Wade, cases involving abortion should be decided "free of emotion and of predilection". 410 U.S. at 117. Adherence to stare decisis serves this purpose.

2. No change in law or experience has occurred to justify re-examining, much less overruling, Roe v. Wade.

As a general rule, stare decisis requires a significant change in facts or experience in order to overrule settled precedent. As the Court recently observed:

> While stare decisis is not an inexorable command, the careful observer will discern that any detours from the straight path of stare decisis in our past have occurred for articulable reasons, and only when the Court has felt obliged "to bring its opinions into agreement with experience and with facts newly ascertained." Burnet v. Coronado Oil & Gas Co., 285 U.S. 393, 412 (1932) (Brandeis, J., dissenting).

Vasquez v. Hillery, 474 U.S. at 266.

In rare cases, the Court has declined to apply the doctrine of stare decisis and have overruled a precedent when evolving law has so eroded the precedent or made it so inconsistent with other law that it has become a destabilizing and confusing aberration. See Thomas v. Washington Gas Light Co., 448 U.S. 261, 272-77 (1980) (overruling decision interpreting full faith and credit clause because it had been previously narrowed so that it "no longer had any significant practical impact" and because other courts had "overwhelmingly" failed to follow it); see also Arkansas Elec. Coop. Corp. v. Arkansas Pub. Serv. Comm'n, 461 U.S. 375, 391-93 (1983); Boys Markets, Inc. v. Retail Clerks Union, Local 770, 398 U.S. 235, 240-41 (1970).

Just the opposite has occurred with Roe v. Wade. In the over 16 years since the decision, the Court has reaffirmed and applied the holding that women have a constitutional right to make private choices on terminating pregnancy at least 13 times. Connecticut v. Menillo, 423 U.S. 9 (1975); Planned Parenthood v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976); Bellotti v. Baird, 428 U.S. 132 (1976); Beal v. Doe, 432 U.S. 438 (1977); Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977); Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379 (1979); Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622 (1979); Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980); Williams v. Zbaraz, 448 U.S. 358 (1980); H. L. v. Matheson, 450 U.S. 398 (1981); City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983); Planned Parenthood Ass'n. v. Ashcroft, 462 U.S. 476 (1983); Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986).

The Court has also cited Roe v. Wade as precedent in every term of the Court. Shepard's lists 177 entries for citations of Roe by this Court alone.[6]

Indeed, in two of the cases explicitly reconsidering and upholding Roe v. Wade, the application of stare decisis is discussed. See Thornburgh, 476 U.S. at 780-82; City of Akron, 6 Shepard's United States Citations, entry for Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973) (LEXIS, through 2/89 Supp.).

462 U.S. at 419-20 & n.1 (1982). In City of Akron, the Court wrote:

> [T]he doctrine of stare decisis while perhaps never entirely persuasive on a constitutional question, is a doctrine that demands respect in a society governed by the rule of law. We respect it today, and reaffirm Roe v. Wade. . . .
>
> There are especially compelling reasons for adhering to stare decisis in applying the principles of Roe v. Wade. That case was considered with special care. It was first argued during the 1971 Term, and reargued—with extensive briefing—the following Term. The decision was joined by THE CHIEF JUSTICE and six other Justices. Since Roe was decided in January 1973, the Court repeatedly and consistently has accepted and applied the basic principle that a woman has a fundamental right to make the highly personal choice whether or not to terminate her pregnancy. [Citations omitted.]

462 U.S. at 419-20 & n.1. The principles set forth in City of Akron in 1982, for applying stare decisis to uphold Roe v. Wade are equally compelling today. Roe remains a carefully considered, albeit controversial, opinion. And since 1982, it has been repeatedly reaffirmed.

Further, the principle of stare decisis was invoked as recently as 1986, in reaffirming Roe v. Wade, and discussed at some length. Justice Stevens wrote:

> Nor does the fact that the doctrine of stare decisis is not an absolute bar to the reexamination of past interpretations of the Constitution mean that the values underlying that doctrine may be summarily put to one side. There is a strong public interest in stability, and in the orderly conduct of our affairs that is served by a consistent course of constitutional adjudication. Acceptance of the fundamental premises that underlie the decision in Roe v. Wade, as well as the application of those premises in that case, places the primary responsibility for decision in matters of childbearing squarely in the private sector of our society. The majority remains free to preach the evils of birth control and abortion and to persuade others to make correct decisions while the individual faced with the reality of a difficult choice having serious and personal consequences of major importance to her own future—perhaps to the salvation of her own immortal soul—remains free to seek and to obtain sympathetic guidance from those who share her own value preferences.

In the final analysis, the holding in Roe v. Wade presumes that it is far better to permit some individuals to make incorrect decisions than to deny all individuals the right to make decisions that have a profound effect upon their destiny. . . . the lawmakers who placed a special premium on the protection of individual liberty have recognized that certain values are more important than the will of a transient majority.

Thornburgh, 476 U.S. at 780-82 (1986) (Stevens, J., concurring). In the majority opinion in Thornburgh, Justice Blackmun wrote:

> [I]t should go without saying that the vitality of these constitutional principles cannot be allowed to yield simply because of disagreement with them.

Id. at 759 (Blackmun, J.) (quoting Brown v. Board of Education, 349 U.S. 294, 300 (1955)).[7]

Moreover, in the international arena, we are aware of only two nations that have recently drastically restricted abortions after initial liberalization: Rumania in 1984, and Iran after the fall of the Shah. H.P. David, et al., ed., Born Unwanted § 17 (1988). Few governments more repressive and more antithetical to American democracy could be found.

---

7 Moreover, Justice Stevens responded to the dissenting opinion in Thornburgh, which urged that stare decisis not be applied because the original decision in Roe was "mistaken." 476 U.S. at 787. The dissent had stated that "history has been far kinder to those who departed from precedent" that was incorrect, citing as examples the 1930s unwarranted restrictions on governmental power to enact social and economic legislation (see United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100 (1941); West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish, 300 U.S. 379 (1937)); and rejection of racially segregated schools (see Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)). Id. at 788 (White, J., dissenting). In addition to the response given by Justice Stevens, 476 U.S. at 779-82, it should be pointed out that in neither of the examples cited in the Thornburgh dissent was a decision overruled merely because it was mistaken; in each example there were also changes in law or experience. The decision in United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. at 115-17, cited the changing law in upholding a wage and hour statute. The decision in West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish, 300 U.S. at 397-400, cited the recent experience of the Depression and the exploitation of those with weak bargaining powers in upholding the minimum wage for women. The Court stated that the decisions those cases overruled were aberrations from established legal principles and precedents. Further, Brown v. Board of Education was expressly based on the prior erosion of the separate but equal doctrine in cases involving graduate education, 347 U.S. at 491-92, and the then current experience in public education, id. at 492-95.

In short, neither evolving law nor changing experience supports departure from the doctrine of stare decisis with respect to Roe v. Wade.[8]

3. Settled expectations militate against overruling Roe v. Wade.

One principle underlying stare decisis is the need for stability in the law, so that settled expectations are not thrown

---

8 Appellants rely upon medical evidence of fetal viability to justify revisiting and overruling Roe v. Wade, suggesting that this evidence constitutes a change in facts sufficient to overcome stare decisis. This approach is erroneous for two reasons. First, the earliest time at which a fetus can survive has changed little since Roe v. Wade. See Brief Amicus Curiae of the American Medical Association et al. See also Report of The Committee on Fetal Extrauterine Survivability to the New York State Task Force on Life and the Law (Jan. 1988). Second, Roe v. Wade does not turn upon a particular point of viability; it simply permits abortions up to the point of viability, as determined by the physician. See 410 U.S. at 164-65. Thus, Missouri's attempt to use fetal viability as a lever to overturn Roe v. Wade must fail, as the profferred evidence does not undermine the principle of the case. The other change, the increasing safety of abortions, only supports Roe. See City of Akron, 462 U.S. at 429 n. 11.

into chaos. As the Court described this principle, termed "the mainstay of stare decisis":

> [it is] the desirability that the law furnish a clear guide for the conduct of individuals, to enable them to plan their affairs with assurance against untoward surprise; . . .

Moragne v. States Marine Lines, Inc., 398 U.S. at 403.

The need for preserving settled expectations is particularly acute in the context of Roe v. Wade. Decisions involving pregnancy, children, marriage and relationships have long-term consequences that cannot easily be undone. Moreover, such decisions impact more strongly on the lives of the women and men who make them than decisions in any other sphere.

There are many circumstances in which the decision about whether to carry a fetus to term impacts irrevocably on the lives of the woman involved. See Brief Amicus Curiae of Women Who Have Had Abortions and Others Who Have Supported Them in That Choice in Support of Appellees.

Roe v. Wade has become an accepted part of the judicial landscape. Expectations premised upon it should not be overturned, nor should the case.

4. The overruling of Roe v. Wade would place an extraordinary burden on New York State.

As an organization chartered by the State of New York and composed of a membership largely residing in or practicing in the New York City area, the Association is particularly concerned with the impact on New York City and New York State were the Court to overrule Roe v. Wade, as are other New York amici. That impact may be gauged by the burden resulting from the large number of nonresident women seeking abortion in New York State subsequent to the State's 1970 amendment of its penal law to permit abortion under certain circumstances and prior to the Court's decision in Roe v. Wade.[9] In the face of a reversal of Roe v. Wade, New York and other states whose laws permit abortion would once again be overburdened with nonresidents seeking abortion. In all likelihood, that burden would be even greater today, given the increased acceptance of abortion since Roe v. Wade.

* * *

In sum, any decision overruling Roe v. Wade would be a departure from the Court's long history of adhering to its prior positions, absent compelling reasons to do otherwise. Neither changes in the law nor experience since Roe support its overruling. Further, it is important to maintain settled expectations with regard to family life and pregnancy. As Justice Holmes wrote:

> [I]mitation of the past, until we have a clear reason for a change, no more needs justification than appetite. It is a form of the inevitable to be accepted until we have a clear vision of what different things we want.

Thomas v. Washington Gas Light Co., 448 U.S. at 272 n.17 (1980) (quoting O. Holmes, Collected Legal Papers 290 (1920)). Holmes's words are as apt today—in the context of Roe v. Wade—as when he first penned them.

II. THE MISSOURI STATUTE IMPERMISSIBLY BURDENS A WOMAN'S FUNDAMENTAL PRIVACY RIGHT TO MAKE INFORMED REPRODUCTIVE DECISIONS.

The Court has consistently recognized that a woman's fundamental right to decide, in consultation with her doctor, whether to terminate a pregnancy is part of her constitutionally protected right to liberty and privacy. Roe v. Wade, 410

---

9 See Brief of the Attorneys General of the States of New York et al. as Amici Curiae in Support of Appellees for a discussion of the history of New York's abortion legislation and the significant number of nonresident women obtaining abortions in New York State subsequent to adoption of that legislation and prior to Roe v. Wade.

U.S. 113 (1973); City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983); Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986). In order to protect this fundamental right, the Supreme Court has consistently struck down laws that would obstruct the decision-making process by requiring that health care providers disseminate incomplete information designed to steer a woman's choice in favor of childbirth.

In Akron, the Court declared unconstitutional a statute compelling physicians to communicate specific information "designed to influence the woman's informed choice between abortion or childbirth". 462 U.S. at 444. The Court explained: "By insisting upon recitation of a lengthy and inflexible list of information, Akron unreasonably has placed obstacles in the path of the doctor upon whom [the woman is] entitled to rely for advice in connection with her decision". Id. at 445 (quoting Whalen v. Roe, 429 U.S. 589, 604 n.33 (1977)).

The principle that the government may not unduly interfere with a woman's right to privacy by precluding her from obtaining the very information necessary for her to make constitutionally protected reproductive choices was reaffirmed in Thornburgh. There, the Court struck down a state statute requiring a physician to provide a woman with a list of agencies offering alternatives to abortion as "nothing less than an outright attempt to wedge the [government's] message discouraging abortion into the privacy of the informed consent dialogue between the woman and her physician". 476 U.S. at 762.

The court of appeals correctly followed the principles of Thornburgh and Akron in holding that the part of the Missouri statute prohibiting state and state-funded health care providers from "encouraging or counseling" a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life is unconstitutionally vague and an impermissible invasion of a woman's First and Fourteenth Amendment rights to liberty and privacy. See Reproductive Health Service v. Webster, 851 F.2d at 1077-80.

The statute's prohibition of encouraging or counseling women about abortion as an option to childbirth is directly at odds with Akron and Thornburgh. Through this prohibition, Missouri interferes with the woman's decision-making process, and places an impermissible "straitjacket" on the counseling relationship, thus precluding the right to informed consent. Thornburgh, 476 U.S. at 762, (quoting Planned Parenthood v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52, 67 n.8 (1976)).

The Court's decisions in Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977), and Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980), relied upon erroneously by appellants, are in fact supportive of appellees. Both McRae and Maher stand for the proposition that although the state does not have to provide the benefit of abortion services through subsidy of abortion procedures, it cannot unduly burden a woman's decision whether to have an abortion. In both cases, the statutes involved funded childbirth but not abortion, but neither statute prevented a woman from exercising her constitutional right to have an abortion. As the Court observed in McRae, an indigent woman was left with "at least the same range of choice in deciding whether to obtain a[n] . . . abortion as she would have had if Congress had chosen to subsidize no health care costs at all". Id., 448 U.S. at 317.

Unlike the restrictions at issue in Maher and McRae, the Missouri law would not leave a woman with the same range of choices she otherwise has because it would drastically restrict the information that a woman may receive regarding reproductive options. Under the Missouri statute, a doctor would be prohibited from "counseling" a woman about her option to have an abortion even when the doctor believes the procedure is medically indicated, although not technically necessary to save her life.

Women are entitled to obtain all medical information relevant to a diagnosed pregnancy. Roe v. Wade recognized that carrying a pregnancy to term is generally more dangerous than a first trimester abortion. 410 U.S. at 149.[10] Pregnant women are entitled to know this and any other relevant medical information. In addition, the pregnant woman who suffers from diabetes, hypertension or sickle-cell anemia would not be told that carrying the fetus to term is a serious threat to her future health and that termination of the pregnancy is a medically indicated option. Such a woman would have no opportunity to decide whether to terminate her pregnancy, a decision protected by the Constitution. She would be denied information or deliberately misinformed, because for her doctor to share such information might well be construed to be "counseling an abortion". Under Missouri's law, women's trust in their doctors would be dangerously misplaced, and women would be misled by partial information, dangerously eroding the physician-patient relationship. See Cobbs v. Grant, 8 Cal. Rptr. 229, 243, 104 Cal. Rptr. 505, 514, 502 P.2d 1, 9 (1972).[11]

Equally important, the Court in Roe v. Wade recognized the unconditional and constitutionally protected right of a woman to consider and have an abortion up to the point of fetal viability. This right would be substantially impaired by the Missouri statute.

Missouri's statute would create an unwarranted burden on a woman's constitutional right of privacy and would differ substantially from a state's simple refusal to subsidize a

---

10 In Akron, the Court recognized that since Roe, "the safety of second-trimester abortions has increased dramatically". 462 U.S. at 435-36. Recent medical literature indicates that the risk of death from legal abortion is no higher at any point in gestation than in carrying a pregancy to term. See Brief Amicus Curiae of National Abortion Rights Action League and authorities cited therein.

11 The doctor-patient relationship is based on trust and recognized by law as a fiduciary relationship. Because patients must be able to rely on their physicians to act in good faith and in their best interest, principles of law and ethics require physicians to do so. The physician thus has an obligation to be truthful, to respect the rights of the patient, and to disclose to the patient all pertinent facts regarding the patient's condition and treatment options including the risks and benefits of each.

woman's right to terminate her pregnancy. It would cast its net much further than either McRae or Maher permits. Under those cases, a woman is free, after obtaining the information upon which to make a decision, to proceed to obtain medical assistance outside of a government subsidized program. In this case, however, women, and particularly the many pregnant teenagers who avail themselves of public services, would be kept ignorant, or worse, would be misled about their options. The court of appeals was therefore correct when it said:

> Missouri is not simply declining to fund abortions when it forbids its doctors to encourage or counsel women to have abortions. Instead, it is erecting an obstacle in the path of women seeking full and uncensored medical advice about alternatives to childbirth. The state's limitation on doctor-patient discussions reflects the state's choice for childbirth over abortion in a way that prevents the patient from making a fully informed and intelligent choice.

Webster, 851 F.2d at 1080.

The "blackout" on abortion information that would be imposed by the Missouri law strikes at the heart of the right announced in Roe v. Wade and reaffirmed in Akron and Thornburgh: the right to be free from unwarranted governmental interference in the inherently private process of deciding, in consultation with experts, whether or not to bear a child. By requiring physicians and health professionals in state funded programs to withhold relevant health information from pregnant women, the Missouri statute would mislead women and prevent them from freely making an informed choice between childbirth and abortion.

III. THE MISSOURI STATUTE VIOLATES THE FIRST AMENDMENT FREE SPEECH RIGHTS OF HEALTH CARE PROVIDERS AND THEIR PATIENTS BY DISCRIMINATING ON THE BASIS OF VIEWPOINT.

A. Medical standards of care require speech about all reproductive alternatives, including abortion.

The First Amendment issue raised by the Missouri statute is simple and significant. The Missouri statute would compel what the First Amendment expressly forbids by restricting expression "because of its message, its ideas, its subject matter, or its content". Police Dep't v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92, 95 (1972).

The Missouri statute makes it "unlawful" for a doctor, nurse, social worker or other health care provider "who is a public employee within the scope of his public employment to encourage or counsel a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life". Mo. Ann. Stat. § 188.210. This provision would have a devastating impact on the First Amendment rights of government-funded health care providers as well as their patients.[12] By requiring physicians and other health care professionals to withhold information from their patients, contrary to standards promulgated by their professional organizations, the statute would interfere with the constitutional rights of health care providers freely to express their professional opinions.

1. Health care providers have a duty to provide information about abortion.

Once a health care provider accepts a patient, he or she must exercise the standard of care expected of a reasonably prudent member of the profession by providing appropriate referrals and seeking informed consent for treatment, such as provision of contraceptives. Professional standards require 12 First Amendment protections extend to the physician as well as the patient who receives the information. Virginia State Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, 425 U.S. 748, 756 (1976).

performing a pregnancy test before prescribing contraceptives and counseling a patient on health risks and reproductive alternatives, including abortion.[13]

In decision after decision, courts have held that a physician has a duty to disclose all relevant information to a patient. See, e.g., Betesh v. United States, 400 F. Supp. 238, 247 (D.D.C. 1974) ("[A] physician undertaking a physical examination has a duty to disclose what he had found and to warn the examinee of any finding that would indicate that the patient is in danger and should seek further medical evaluation and treatment."); Union Carbide & Carbon Corp. v. Stapleton, 237 F.2d 229, 232-33 (6th Cir. 1956) (A patient has a right to "rely on the expectation that he would be told of any dangerous condition actually disclosed by [the] examination."); Bonaparte v. Floyd, 291 S.C. 427, 354 S.E.2d 40, 45 (Ct. App. 1987) (physician must properly refer patient and provide relevant information); Truman v. Thomas, 27 Cal. 3d 285, 293, 165 Cal. Rptr. 308, 312, 611 P.2d 902, 906 (1980) (physician obligated to provide patient "[a]ll the information material to [the patient's] decision"); Lindquist v. Dengel, 92 Wash. 2d 257, 595 P.2d 934, 937 (1979) ("[T]o delay a referral . . . could itself be a breach of the general practitioner's duty."); Lee v. Andrews, 545 S.W.2d 238, 243 (Tex. Ct. App. 1976) (failure by physician to refer medical problems he cannot treat to specialist may be malpractice). A physician's duty is no less when the information concerns abortion and its alternatives; and a state may not, consistent with constitutional principles, compel a health care provider to com-

13 See American Public Health Association Recommended Program Guide for Abortion Services (Revised 1979), 70 Am. J. Pub. Health 652 (1980); American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, Standards for Obstetric-Gynecologic Services (6th ed. 1985), American Academy of Pediatrics, Pregnancy and Abortion Counseling, 63 Pediatrics 920 (1979); American Psychological Association, Ethical Principles of Psychologists, 36 Am. Psychologist 580, 633-38 (1981); American Medical Association, Current Opinions of the Council on Ethical and Judicial Affairs (1986); American Psychiatric Association, Principles of Medical Ethics with Annotations Especially Applicable to Psychiatry (1981).

promise professional obligations in the service of the state's particular views on any subject, including abortion.[14]

2. Uncensored communications between physician and patient are essential to maternal and fetal health.

The right to make fully informed medical decisions is grounded in the "well-recognized common-law right of self-determination that '[e]very human being of adult years and sound mind has a right to determine what shall be done with [her] own body. . . .'" In re Farrell, 108 N.J. 335, 347, 529 A.2d 404, 410 (1987) (quoting Schloendorff v. Society of New York Hospital, 211 N.Y. 125, 129-130, 105 N.E. 92, 93 (1914)). The censored speech on the part of health care professionals required by the Missouri statute would have a devastating effect on pregnant women. The relationship between health care provider and patient is generally marked by an imbalance in knowledge. A patient often has a "dependence upon and trust in [her] physician for the information upon which [she] relies during the decisional process, thus raising an obligation in the physician that transcends arms-length transactions". Cobbs v. Grant, 8 Cal. 3d 229, 242, 104 Cal. Rptr. 505, 513, 502 P.2d 1, 9 (1972).

The element of trust in her health care provider is particularly important when a woman has just been told that she is pregnant. At that moment, she may be upset and frightened, uncertain as to what she should do. She will often turn to her health care provider for the accurate, complete, and unbiased information she needs to make decisions. If the government steps between the doctor and patient at the precise moment when she most needs a trusting relationship, 14 Indeed, a number of state courts have found that physicians have a duty to inform parents at risk of giving birth to a child with a disability of prenatal diagnostic tests, if they are available, and of the option of abortion. See, e.g., Phillips v. United States, 508 F. Supp. 544 (D.S.C. 1981); Berman v. Allan, 80 N.J. 421, 404 A.2d 8 (1979); Becker v. Schwartz, 46 N.Y.2d 401, 386 N.E.2d 807 (1978).

the relationship is tainted; indeed, it is likely to be destroyed, leaving the client without any assistance and reluctant to seek health care at all.

Good communication between physician and patient promotes a number of important therapeutic goals. Patients who are involved in making decisions about their own treatment are "likely to emerge from therapy in better health". President's Commission for the Study of Ethical Problems in Medicine and Biomedical and Behavioral Research, Making Health Care Decisions: the Ethical and Legal Implications of Informed Consent in the Patient-Practitioner Relationship, Vol. 1 at 69 (1982). This is because patients who are fully informed by their physicians about their conditions and the treatment alternatives are more likely to comply with proposed therapies, have reduced levels of anxiety, experience speedier recovery, and protect their own well-being by monitoring their medication dosages or by recognizing and reporting any symptoms requiring reevaluation of a particular therapy. Id. at 69-70. Moreover, patients who make informed decisions about their health care are more likely to advance their own life plans. Id. at 70. In particular, women who have a full range of reproductive options open to them in an environment supportive of their needs are more likely to take charge of their lives and their fertility.[15]

B. Abortion information is a protected form of speech.

The dissemination of information about abortion has been recognized as a protected form of speech. Bigelow v. Virginia, 421 U.S. 809 (1975). In Bigelow, the Court held a state statute making it a misdemeanor to encourage abortion unconstitutional. The Court found that advertisement of 15 See Birdsall & Chester, Contraception and the Status of Women: What is the Link?, 19 Fam. Plan. Persp. 14, 17 (1987) ("Low fertility . . . is not sufficient or even necessary for improving the status of women. Rather, women's knowledge that they can control the timing of their childbearing enlarges [their] economic choices and enhances their status."); Adler, Sex Roles and Unwanted Pregnancy in Adolescent and Adult Women, Prof. Psychology 12, 63 (1981).

abortion services was a form of expression protected by the First Amendment.[16]

The Court consistently has struck down regulations that limit expressions of opinion on issues of public controversy. See, e.g., Consolidated Edison Co. v. Public Service Comm'n, 447 U.S. 530 (1980); FCC v. League of Women Voters, 468 U.S. 364 (1984). The prohibited information here is similarly of great public interest. Not only would those who need abortion services be denied the information, but those interested in reproductive health also would be deprived of access to unbiased information as well as opinions about abortion.

C. The Missouri statute unconstitutionally censors speech on the basis of viewpoint about abortion.

In funding reproductive health services, Missouri has opened a forum for the discussion of pregnancy and reproductive health. Information is provided through reproductive counseling as well as through libraries in public facilities containing comprehensive references on health care, including books, pamphlets and individual materials for patient and public use. Having opened this forum, the government must maintain strict viewpoint neutrality and ensure that the information given is nondiscriminatory.

---

16 Accordingly, other courts have granted First Amendment protection to such speech. Planned Parenthood v. Arizona, 718 F.2d 938, 942 (9th Cir. 1983), appeal after remand, 789 F.2d 1348 (9th Cir.), aff'd mem. sub nom. Babbitt v. Planned Parenthood, 107 S. Ct. 391 (1986); Planned Parenthood Ass'n v. Fitzpatrick, 401 F. Supp. 554, 577-78 (E.D. Pa. 1975), aff'd mem. sub nom. Franklin v. Fitzpatrick, 428 U.S. 901 (1976). Planned Parenthood Ass'n v. Kempiners, 531 F. Supp. 320, 330-33 (N.D. Ill. 1981), vacated and remanded on other grounds, 700 F.2d 1115 (7th Cir.), on remand, 568 F. Supp. 1490 (N.D. Ill. 1983); Valley Family Planning v. North Dakota, 489 F. Supp. 238, 242 (D.N.D. 1980), aff'd on other grounds, 661 F.2d 99(8th Cir. 1981); DKT Memorial Fund Ltd. v. Agency for International Development, 691 F. Supp. 394 (D.D.C. 1988); Massachusetts v. Bowen, 679 F. Supp. 137 (D. Mass. 1988); Planned Parenthood Federation v. Bowen, 680 F. Supp. 1465 (D. Colo. 1988). But see New York v. Bowen, 690 F. Supp. 1261, 1273 (S.D.N.Y. 1988), appeal filed, No. 88-6204 (2d Cir. filed 1988).

For example, in Board of Education v. Pico, 457 U.S. 853 (1982), a plurality of the Court held that, despite a school board's broad discretion in determining how to spend its money on books for the school library, if board members ordered the removal of books with the intent "to deny respondents access to ideas with which petitioners disagreed", their action would violate the Constitution. Id. at 871.[17]

Constitutional principles of viewpoint neutrality dictate that the allocation of public funds may not be motivated by the desire to suppress "unacceptable" ideas while subsidizing "acceptable" ones. In FCC v. League of Women Voters, 468 U.S. 364, 383-84 (1984), the Court struck down a ban on editorializing by publicly funded radio stations because the ban was "motivated by nothing more than a desire to curtail expression of a particular point of view on controversial issues of general interest". Id. See also Arkansas Writers' Project, Inc. v. Ragland, 481 U.S. 221 (1987) (government regulation of publications on the basis of their content violates the First Amendment.)[18] As the Court has observed, "where the State's interest is to disseminate an ideology, no

---

17 See also Gay & Lesbian Law Students Ass'n v. Gohn, 850 F. 2d 361, 366-68 (8th Cir. 1988) (public university may not withhold funding from student group because it "dislikes their ideas"); Bullfrog Films v. Wick, 847 F.2d 502, 509-10 & n.11 (United States Information Agency may not deny various benefits, including certification for exemption from import duties, because of content of films or viewpoints expressed therein); American Council of the Blind v. Boorstin, 644 F. Supp. 811, 815-16 (D.D.C. 1986) (Library of Congress may not stop government-subsidized production of Braille editions of Playboy because of the sexual content of the magazine).

18 Missouri argues that its statute simply effects a legislative decision not to fund activities promoting abortion and accordingly does not implicate free speech principles, invoking Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980). See Brief for Appellants at pp. 35-38. McRae is not supportive of Missouri's position, however, because it is impossible to distinguish family planning counseling that includes information on abortion from counseling that does not without restricting freedom of expression.

Nor do Regan v. Taxation with Representation, 461 U.S. 540 (1983) ("TWR"), or Lyng v. United Auto Workers, 108 S. Ct. 1184 (1988), apply. In TWR, the Court upheld against a First Amendment challenge the provision matter how acceptable to some, such interest cannot outweigh an individual's First Amendment right to avoid becoming the courier for such a message". Wooley v. Maynard, 430 U.S. 705, 717 (1977).[19]

By forcing the physician—viewed by the patient as the source of accurate, impartial medical information—to act as the mouthpiece for the government's disapproval of abortion, Missouri unconstitutionally circumvents the First Amendment while minimizing women's access to abortion information. Its statute simply does not withstand scrutiny.

---

of the Internal Revenue Code denying tax-exempt status to organizations, a substantial part of whose activities consists of lobbying. In Lyng, the Court found constitutional an amendment to the Food Stamp Act prohibiting a grant of food stamps to a striker's household when need is based on income loss during a strike. In both cases, the Court found that the challenged legislation simply represented a decision not to subsidize particular kinds of activity–political lobbying (TWR) and striking (Lyng). In contrast, abortion counseling cannot be viewed as a distinct activity, such as lobbying or going on strike, which the government may refuse to subsidize without encroaching on First Amendment concerns. Missouri has decided to provide its citizens with information about reproductive health services. Although it need not pay for abortions, it may not prohibit its employees even from mentioning them.

19 In Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc., 473 U.S. 788, 800 (1985), the Court upheld an Executive Order banning access by legal defense and political advocacy organizations to a forum only because the ban was viewpoint neutral. The Court noted, moreover, that even a facially neutral regulation would fall if it were "in reality a facade for viewpoint-based discrimination". 473 U.S. at 811. The Missouri statute explicitly discriminates on the basis of viewpoint about abortion and thus fails Cornelius' test.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, amici urge this Court to uphold Roe v. Wade and to affirm the decision of the Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit in this case.

Dated: New York, New York
March 30, 1989

Respectfully submitted,

SHELDON OLIENSIS
President, The Association of the Bar of the City of New York

JONATHAN LANG*
Chair, Committee on Civil Rights

DIANE S. WILNER
Chair, Committee on Medicine and Law

ARTHUR S. LEONARD
Chair, Committee on Sex and Law

Attorneys for amici curiae

Of Counsel:

Audrey S. Feinberg
Janice Goodman
Mary Sue Henifin
Linda C. McClain

Amici curiae acknowledge and thank Deborah A. Lindberg, Legal Assistant, for her research assistance.

*Counsel of Record

AMICUS CURIAE

BRIEF

FILED
MAR 30
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

No. 88-605

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,
Appellants,

v.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,
Appellees.

On Appeal from the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit

---

AMICI CURIAE BRIEF OF 167 DISTINGUISHED SCIENTISTS AND PHYSICIANS, INCLUDING 11 NOBEL LAUREATES, IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEES †

JAY KELLY WRIGHT *
DAVID T. COHEN
ARNOLD & PORTER
1200 New Hampshire Ave., N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20036
(202) 872-6700
Attorneys for Amici Curiae

* Counsel of Record

†Amici listed inside front cover.

WILSON - EPES PRINTING CO., INC. - 789-0096 - WASHINGTON, D.C. 20001

COMPLETE LIST OF REPRESENTED AMICI

Lawrence J. Aber
S. Artavanis-Tsakonas
Julius Axelrod
Francisco J. Ayala
Carl Jay Bajema
David Baltimore
John N. Barrett
Andrew H. Bass
Margaret E. Beard
Baruj Benacerraf
Michael V.L. Bennett
Seymour Benzer
Ronald Booker
Douglas M. Bourden
Lila Braine
Theodore H. Bullock
Mary B. Bunge
Richard P. Bunge
Guy L. Bush
Wendy Cammer
John R. Carlson
Edward L. Chambers
Avis H. Cohen
Lawrence B. Cohen
Francis Crick
Wayne E. Crill
James E. Darnell, Jr.
Eric H. Davidson
Susan A. DeRiemer
Marion Diamond
Mark F. Dubach
Renato Dulbecco
Stephen Easter
Barbara E. Ehrlich
Judith S. Eisen
Russell D. Fernald
Kay Louise Fields
Gerald D. Fischbach
Michael J. Flower
Robert T. Francoeur
Christine Gall
Nori Geary
Walter Gilbert
Patricia S. Goldman-Rakic
Timothy H. Goldsmith
Corey Goodman
Barbara Gordon-Licky
Marvin Gordon-Licky
Dennis L. Gorlick
Alan D. Grinnell
Zach W. Hall
Garrett Hardin
Ronald M. Harris-Warrick
Norman B. Hecht
Howard H. Hiatt
John G. Hildebrand
Bertil Hille
Robert W. Holley
Eric Holtzman
Carl D. Hopkins
Norman H. Horowitz
Robert H. Horvitz
Howard C. Howland
Ronald R. Hoy
David H. Hubel
Bruce R. Johnson
Eric R. Kandel
Douglas R. Kankel
David B. Karpf
Robert W. Keane
Darcy B. Kelley
Mary B. Kennedy
Haig Keshishian
Seymour Kety
Daniel P. Kimble
Charles B. Kimmel
Naomi Kleitman
Masakazu Konishi
Sheldon B. Korones
Daniel E. Koshland, Jr.
David Landowne
Joshua Lederberg
Leonard S. Lerman
Cyrus Levinthal

Francoise Levinthal
Edward B. Lewis
Rodolfo R. Llinas
Gary Lynch
Eduardo R. Macagno
Boris Magasanik
Karl L. Magleby
Eve Marder
Ernst Mayr
David H. McCulloh
Ellen McGlade-McCulloh
Valerie K.L. Merrill
Theodore A. Molskness
Betty C. Moore
John A. Moore
Kenneth J. Muller
Wendi S. Neckameyer
Marshall Nirenberg
Peter M. O'Day
Sergio R. Ojeda
Everett C. Olson
Mary Lou Pardue
Martha Constantine Paton
Gary W. Perry
Thomas R. Podleski
Mu-ming Poo
Dale Purves
Pasko Rakic
Linda L. Restifo
Stephen A. Richardson
William M. Roberts
Diane M. Robins
Lorna W. Role
Birgit Rose
Leon E. Rosenberg
Walter A. Rosenblith
Taube P. Rothman
Rodolfo Ruibal
Joan E. Rutila
George M. Ryan, Jr.
Gene P. Sackett
Berta Scharrer
Allen M. Scher
Anne M. Schneiderman
George J. Schwartz
Douglas R. Shanklin
Elie A. Shneour
Eric M. Shooter
Baha M. Sibai
Richard L. Sidman
Steven A. Siegelbaum
Philip Siekevitz
Rae Silver
Ann-Judith Silverman
Orville A. Smith
Roger Sperry
Adrian Spitzer
David C. Spray
Lisa Steiner
Robert A. Steiner
Richard L. Stouffer
Ann E. Stuart
Terry T. Takahashi
Annamaria Torriani
Nathan J. Tublitz
David Van Essen
Leigh M. Van Valen
Herbert G. Vaughan, Jr.
Salome G. Waelsch
George Wald
Janis C. Weeks
Harold M. Weintraub
David S. Weiss
James A. Weston
Kalpana White
Christina L. Williams
David L. Wilson
Edward O. Wilson
Joan W. Witkin
Barbara J. Wold
Robert J. Wyman
Mary Beth Zelinski-Wooten
R. Suzanne Zukin

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Page
TABLE OF AUTHORITIES	ii
DESCRIPTION AND INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE	1
SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT	2
ARGUMENT:
I. THERE IS NO SCIENTIFIC CONSENSUS ON WHEN A HUMAN LIFE BEGINS	3
II. ROE v. WADE HAS NOT BEEN RENDERED OBSOLETE BY SUBSEQUENT ADVANCEMENTS IN SCIENCE	8
A. The Point Of Viability Has Not Changed Significantly Since 1973 And Such Change Is Not Likely To Occur In The Foreseeable Future	9
B. The Organic Capacity For Human Thought Is Absent Until After 28 Weeks Of Gestation	14
CONCLUSION	16
APPENDIX: LIST OF AMICI AND PROFESSIONAL AFFILIATIONS	1a

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

CASES: Page

City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416 (1982) 8, 12
Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379 (1979) 9
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973) ..... passim

STATUTES AND LEGISLATIVE MATERIALS:

The Human Life Bill: Hearings Before the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 97th Cong., 1st Sess. (1981) 4, 5, 6, 7
The Human Life Bill—S.158: Report by the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers, Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 97th Cong. 1st Sess. (1981) 7

MISCELLANEOUS:

Beddis, Collins, Levy, Godfrey & Silverman, New technique for servo-control of arterial oxygen tension in preterm infants, 54 Archives of Disease in Childhood 278 (1979) 10
Buckwald, Zorn & Egan, Mortality and Follow-up Data for Neonates Weighing 500 to 800 g at Birth, 138 American Journal of Diseases of Children 779 (1984) 9
M. Flower, Neuromaturation and the Moral Status of Human Fetal Life in ABORTION RIGHTS AND FETAL PERSONHOOD 71 (Doerr & Prescott ed. 1989) (forthcoming) 14, 15
Gerdes, Abbasi, Bhutani & Bowen, Improved Survival and Short-Term Outcome of Inborn "Micropremies," 25 Clinical Pediatrics 391 (1986) 9
Koops, Morgan & Battaglia, Neonatal Mortality Risk in Relation to Birth Weight and Gestational Age: Update, 101 Journal of Pediatrics 969 (1982) 9, 10
Kopelman, The Smallest Preterm Infants: Reasons for Optimism and New Dilemmas, 132 American Journal of Diseases of Children 461 (1978) 13

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES—Continued

Page

Kostovic & Goldman-Rakic, Transient Cholinesterase Staining in the Mediodorsal Nucleus of the Thalamus and its Connections in the Developing Human and Monkey Brain, 219 Journal of Comparative Neurology 431 (1983) 15
Kostovic & Rakic, Development of Prestriate Visual Projections in the Monkey and Human Fetal Cerebrum Revealed by Transient Cholinesterase Staining, 4 Journal of Neuroscience 25 (1984) .. 15
Law, Rethinking Sex and the Constitution, 132 U. Pa. L. Rev. 955 (1984) 13, 14
Milner & Beard, Limit of Fetal Viability, 1 Lancet 1079 (1984) 9, 12
Molliver, Kostovic & Van Der Loos, The development of synapses in cerebral cortex of the human fetus, 50 Brain Research 403 (1973) 15
Phillip, Little, Polivy & Lucey, Neonatal Mortality Risk for the Eighties: The Importance of Birth Weight/Gestational Age Groups, 68 Pediatrics 122 (1981) 12, 13
Pleasure, Dhand & Kaur, What is the Lower Limit of Viability, 138 American Journal of Diseases of Children 783 (1984) 9
Pollner, Abortion: Are medicine and the law on a collision course?, Medical World News, July 8, 1985 ..... 10, 11
D.P. Purpura, Morphogenesis of Visual Cortex in the Preterm Infant in GROWTH AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE BRAIN 33, 46 (M.A.B. Brazier ed. 1975) (examining the visual cortex) 15
Report of the Committee on Fetal Extrauterine Survivability to the New York State Task Force on Life and the Law, Fetal Extrauterine Survivability (1988) 10, 11, 12
Shewmon, Capron, Warwick & Schulman, The Use of Anencephalic Infants as Organ Donors: A Critique, 261 Journal of American Medical Association 1773 (1989) 15
Stern, Intensive Care for the Pre-Term Infant, 26 Danish Med. Bull. 144 (1979) 13, 14

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

No. 88-605

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,
Appellants,

v.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,
Appellees.

On Appeal from the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit

---

AMICI CURIAE BRIEF OF 167 DISTINGUISHED SCIENTISTS AND PHYSICIANS, INCLUDING 11 NOBEL LAUREATES, IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEES

DESCRIPTION AND INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE

Amici are distinguished scientists and physicians having specialized training and expertise in, among others, the fields of developmental biology, neurobiology, molecular biology and obstetrics and gynecology. Amici have been recognized for their contributions to their respective fields. Eleven of amici, for example, have been awarded the Nobel Prize in their respective disciplines. A complete list of amici and their professional affiliations appears in the Appendix.

Amici have observed that appellants and some amici urging that Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), be overruled have purported to ground their arguments, in part, upon alleged scientific "truth." For example, appellants characterize the proposition that life begins at conception as a "biological fact," comparable to the "truth" that the "Earth still moves around the sun." (Brief for Appellants, p. 26.) Other amici aligned with appellants have asserted that subsequent advancements in science since Roe v. Wade was decided have rendered the decision obsolete.

As scientists, amici have a special ability to provide the Court with accurate scientific information bearing upon such arguments. Amici also have a unique interest in seeing that scientific learning is not distorted or misused in arguments concerning abortion. Accordingly, amici submit this brief supporting appellees.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

There is no scientific consensus that a human life begins at conception, at a given stage of fetal development, or at birth. The question of "when a human life begins" cannot be answered by reference to scientific principles like those with which we predict planetary movement. The answer to that question will depend on each individual's social, religious, philosophical, ethical and moral beliefs and values.

Science can, however, provide answers to certain concrete questions regarding prenatal development that have arisen in the controversy over abortion and Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973). For example, appellants and several amici assert that medical advances are undermining Roe v. Wade by moving the point of fetal viability briskly and inexorably toward the date of conception. Science is capable of addressing—and in this case refuting—such arguments.

The earliest point of viability has remained virtually unchanged at approximately 24 weeks of gestation since 1973, and there is no reason to believe that a change is either imminent or inevitable. The reason that viability has not been pushed significantly back toward the point of conception is that critical organs, particularly lungs and kidneys, do not mature before that time. Progress in science, therefore, has not made obsolete the trimester framework based on viability articulated in Roe v. Wade. The trimester framework, moreover, corresponds with another aspect of fetal development—the chronology of human brain development. Not until after 28 weeks of gestation does the fetus attain sufficient neocortical complexity to exhibit those sentient capacities that are present in full-term newborns. In lay terms, the capacity for the human thought process as we know it cannot exist until sometime after 28 weeks of gestation.

This Court's decision in Roe v. Wade is as well grounded in "biological justifications," 410 U.S. at 163, today as in 1973, and the basic chronology of human development recognized in the Court's opinion remains accurate. Accordingly, the Court should reject arguments for overruling the decision because of alleged inconsistency with scientific advancement or "truth."

ARGUMENT

I. THERE IS NO SCIENTIFIC CONSENSUS ON WHEN A HUMAN LIFE BEGINS

Appellants and several amici aligned with them argue that the controversy over abortion and Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), may be resolved by what they contend is scientific "truth." Appellants, for example, contend that, as surely as "[t]he Earth still moves around the sun," it is an undisputed "biological fact" that a human life begins at conception.[1] Certain amici likewise argue that Roe v. Wade is contrary to an alleged "scientific truth" or "fact" that life begins at conception.[2] Others

---

[1] Brief for Appellants at 26.

[2] See, e.g., Brief Amicus Curiae of Hon. Christopher H. Smith, Hon. Alan B. Mollohan, Hon. John C. Danforth, and Other United cite alleged technological advances as the justification for reconsidering and overruling Roe v. Wade.[3]

Amici submit that such arguments are an attempt to distort the teachings of science to fit preconceived conclusions based upon values that science alone does not and cannot dictate. The question of when a human life begins cannot be answered with reference to a scientific law or principle, such as the empirically-testable propositions with which we predict planetary movement. Individual scientists will have individual answers to that question, based upon their individual values and beliefs. These answers do not represent any "scientific" truth, because they are based upon values and beliefs, not upon science alone.

The only "consensus" that may be said to exist among scientists on the question of when a human life begins is that science alone cannot answer that question. This is demonstrated by the response of the scientific community when in 1981 a Senate subcommittee held hearings on a bill to declare "that present day scientific evidence indicates a significant likelihood that actual human life exists from conception." See, The Human Life Bill: Hearings Before the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 97th Cong., 1st Sess. (1981) [hereinafter Hearings]. As distinguished scientists testified, science alone does not provide the answer to this question.

States Senators and Members of Congress at 21; Brief Amici Curiae of Doctors for Life, Missouri Doctors for Life, Missouri Citizens for Life, Missouri Nurses for Life, and Lawyers for Life, Inc. at 21-23; Amicus Alabama Lawyers for Unborn Children, Inc. at 13-17; Brief for Amicus Curiae, The New England Christian Action Council, Inc. at 7.

[3] See, e.g., Brief for the United States as Amicus Curiae at 19; Brief of the Knights of Columbus as Amicus Curiae at 6.

For example, Dr. Leon Rosenberg, then Chairman of the Department of Human Genetics, Yale University Medical School, and a signatory of this brief, testified:

> When does this potential for human life become actual? As a scientist, I must answer I do not know. Moreover, I have not been able to find a single piece of scientific evidence which helps me with that question.
>
> Not surprisingly, a great deal has been spoken and written on the subject. Some people argue, as you have heard, that life begins at conception . . . .
>
> I have no quarrel with anyone's ideas on this matter so long as it is clearly understood that they are personal beliefs based on personal judgments and not scientific truths.

Id. at 50.

Dr. Rosenberg then explained the reason science alone cannot answer the question—the inability to test the hypothesis by the scientific method:

> The scientific method depends on two essential things—a thesis or idea and a means of testing that idea. Scientists have been able to determine, for instance, that the Earth is round or that genes are composed of DNA because, and only because, experiments could be performed to test these ideas. Without experiments there is no science, no way to prove or disprove any idea. I maintain that concepts such as humanness are beyond the purview of science because no idea about them can be tested experimentally.

Id.

The National Academy of Sciences was equally emphatic:

> It is the view of the National Academy of Sciences that the statement in [Senate Bill S. 158] cannot stand up to the scrutiny of science. This section reads, "The Congress finds that present day scientific > evidence indicates a significant likelihood that actual human life exists from conception." This statement purports to derive its conclusions from science, but it deals with a question to which science can provide no answer. The proposal in S158 that the term "person" shall include "all human life" has no basis within our scientific understanding. Defining the time at which the developing embryo becomes a person must remain a matter of moral or religious value.

Id. at 74. See also id. at 1035-36 (statement of Joseph Boyle, M.D., chairman of the board of trustees of the American Medical Association) (there is no scientific consensus that a human life begins at conception; that question goes "far beyond the realm of medical science and into social, religious, philosophical, ethical, and moral concerns").

As shown in the next section of this brief, science can indeed provide valuable information and can answer concrete questions regarding prenatal development by identifying, for example, the stages of fetal brain development. But the question of when a human life truly begins calls for a conclusion as to which characteristics define the essence of human life. While science can tell us when certain biological attributes can be detected, science cannot tell us which biological attributes establish the existence of a human being.

Many other physicians and scientists made these observations at the 1981 hearings. See, e.g., id. at 68 (statement of Robert H. Ebert, M.D., President of Milbank Memorial Fund, Caroline Shields Walker Professor of Medicine Emeritus, Harvard University) (whether a human life begins at conception is not a medical or scientific question, but a philosophical and religious question that "can be debated endlessly and has to do with how one defines a person and 'self' "); id. at 69-70 (statement of Sherman M. Mellinkoff, M.D., Dean of the UCLA School of Medicine) (same); id. at 71 (statement of Arno G. Motulsky, M.D., Professor of Medicine and Genetics, University of Washington) (same); id. at 113-14 (statement of Dr. Jessica G. Davis, Director, Child Development Center, Chief, Division of Genetics, North Shore University Hospital) (same). The subcommittee also received hundreds of letters from scientists and physicians across the country echoing Dr. Rosenberg's views. See e.g., Hearings app. at 414, 669, 716, 718.[4]

Science cannot define the essential attributes of human life any more than science can define such concepts as love, faith or trust. Hearings at 50. This Court was indisputably correct when it observed in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. at 159, that the question of when a human life begins cannot simply be referred to an expert discipline for resolution.

Science can, however, offer to this controversy concrete information concerning the physiology of prenatal development—particularly, scientific observations about viability and brain development. As shown below, these observations support the chronology of fetal development recognized in Roe v. Wade.

---

[4] The fact that the subcommittee itself could not reach agreement on the question further highlights the inability to find the answer in scientific truth. The Human Life Bill—S. 158: Report by the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers, Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 97th Cong., 1st Sess. 39, 41 (1981) (minority view of Senator Baucus) ("If the hearings on S. 158 held by the Separation of Powers Subcommittee were conclusive on any point it is that in 1981 there remains no consensus among scientists, philosophers and theologians on the question of when life begins."). Indeed, the current Commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration, Frank E. Young, M.D., stated in 1981 that "science and medicine cannot unequivocally establish the time in the continuum of development where human life begins"; the decision is "in part moral, ethical, philosophical and religious." Hearings app. at 781.

II. ROE v. WADE HAS NOT BEEN RENDERED OBSOLETE BY SUBSEQUENT ADVANCEMENTS IN SCIENCE

Appellants and several amici, including the United States, cite developments in science and technology as a justification for reconsidering and overruling Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973). Citing Justice O'Connor's dissenting opinion in City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416, 456-58 (1983), these litigants and aligned amici suggest that there has been enormous movement in the point of viability since 1973.[5] Although Justice O'Connor's opinion in Akron stated that "fetal viability in the first trimester of pregnancy may be possible in the not too distant future," id. at 457 (emphasis added), these advocates have tried to use her observations to catapult themselves to the conclusion that the point of viability is marching briskly and inexorably toward the date of conception because of technological change.[6]

Assertions that viability has moved significantly earlier in fetal development are flatly contrary to the scientific evidence. Although advances in technology have improved the chances of survival for premature birth within the range of 24 to 28 weeks, the outer limit of viability at 24 weeks has not significantly changed. Moreover, there is no reason to believe that a change in this outer limit is either imminent or inevitable.

---

[5] See, e.g., Brief for Appellants at 12-14; Brief for the United States as Amicus Curiae at 19; Brief of the Association for Public Justice, and the Value of Life Committee, Inc., as Amici Curiae at 25; Brief of Catholics United for Life, National Organization of Episcopalians for Life, Presbyterians Pro-Life, American Baptist Friends of Life, Baptists for Life, Southern Baptists for Life, Lutherans for Life, Moravians for Life, United Church of Christ Friends for Life, Task Force of United Methodists on Abortion and Sexuality, and the Christian Action Council as Amici Curiae at 19, 21.

[6] See, e.g., Brief for Appellants at 12-14.

A. The Point Of Viability Has Not Changed Significantly Since 1973 And Such Change Is Not Likely To Occur In The Foreseeable Future

In Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. at 160, this Court recognized that viability occurs at approximately 24 to 28 weeks of gestation. In Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379 (1979), the Court emphasized that the date of viability was not intended to be fixed and arbitrary, but rather left "flexible for anticipated advancements in medical skill." Id. at 397. The Court further stated: "Viability is reached when, in the judgment of the attending physician on the particular facts of the case before him, there is a reasonable likelihood of the fetus' sustained survival outside the womb, with or without artificial support." Id. at 388.

Since Roe v. Wade was decided, great strides have been made in medicine, but the significance of those strides should not be misunderstood. Advances in medical technology have enhanced the probability of survival of infants born prematurely at 24 weeks and later. See, e.g., Gerdes, Abbasi, Bhutani & Bowen, Improved Survival and Short-Term Outcome of Inborn "Micropremies," 25 Clinical Pediatrics 391, 393 (1986); Buckwald, Zorn & Egan, Mortality and Follow-up Data for Neonates Weighing 500 to 800 g at Birth, 138 American Journal of Diseases of Children 779 (1984); Pleasure, Dhand & Kaur, What is the Lower Limit of Viability, 138 American Journal of Diseases of Children 783 (1984).

However, these advances have not significantly changed the earliest date of viability, which remains approximately at the 24-week mark recognized in Roe v. Wade. See, e.g., Pleasure, Dhand & Kaur, What is the Lower Limit of Viability, 138 American Journal of Diseases of Children 783 (1984); Milner & Beard, Limit of Fetal Viability, 1 Lancet 1079 (1984); Koops, Morgan & Battaglia, Neonatal Mortality Risk in Relation to Birth Weight and Gestational Age: Update, 101 Journal of Pediatrics 969-77 (1982). Thus, the scientific evidence supports the finding made by the District Court:

> Testimony by medical experts for both plaintiffs and defendants, in addition to recent medical literature, provides clear evidence that 23 1/2 to 24 weeks gestation is the earliest point in pregnancy where a reasonable probability of viability exists.

Reproductive Health Services v. Webster, 662 F. Supp. 407, 420 (W.D. Mo. 1987) (citations omitted).

The reason that viability has not advanced to a point significantly earlier than 24 weeks of gestation is that critical organs, particularly the lungs and kidneys, do not mature before that time. While a number of factors, such as immaturity of the immune system, contribute to the mortality rate for premature infants, the most important determinant of viability is lung development—specifically, the development of the air sacs through which gases are passed into and out of the blood stream.

Air sac development sufficient for gas exchange does not occur until at least 23 weeks after gestation and often later. Report of the Committee on Fetal Extrauterine Survivability to the New York State Task Force on Life and the Law, Fetal Extrauterine Survivability 7 (1988) (hereinafter Fetal Extrauterine Survivability). Respirators have been developed that significantly enhance the operation of immature air sacs,[7] but no known technology will accelerate the date at which air sacs begin to form and to link up with the crucial blood vessels. For example, Dr. John Kattwinkel, a member of the American Academy of Pediatrics's fetus and newborn committee, has stated:

> At 24 weeks or less, fetal lung development is at a glandular stage and the lung capillaries have not migrated into the airways. You can't force respiration when there is no surface through which to exchange gases. Oxygen simply cannot reach the blood no matter how much air is forced into the lungs by machine.

[7] See Beddis, Collins, Levy, Godfrey & Silverman, New technique for servo-control of arterial oxygen tension in preterm infants, 54 Archives of Disease in Childhood 278-80 (1979).

Pollner, Abortion: Are medicine and the law on a collision course?, Medical World News, July 8, 1985, at 73. See also Fetal Extrauterine Survivability at 7 ("Clinical experience and anatomic studies suggest that gas exchange is almost never possible before 23 weeks of gestation, but is not uncommon after 26 weeks.").[8] There are no medical developments anticipated in the foreseeable future that would bring about adequate fetal lung function prior to 23 to 24 weeks of gestation.

A minimal level of kidney development is also a prerequisite of viability. As observed in Fetal Extrauterine Survivability:

> Although the maturational limitations in renal function are an important factor in the morbidity and mortality of [premature] infants with a gestational age less than 26 weeks, renal function is generally not the sole determinant of survival—even down to 24 weeks of gestation. In the earlier 20-24 week gestational period, inadequate kidney development potentially determines fetal survivability.

Fetal Extrauterine Survivability at 6 (footnote omitted).

Amici agree with the overall conclusions expressed in Fetal Extrauterine Survivability:

> The increasing ability over the past decade to save progressively younger neonates is primarily due to [8] Air sac development is not the only aspect of lung development that affects viability; it is, however, the factor that sets the outside limit of lung function. For example, the lungs cannot operate without an adequate supply of surfactant, a chemical which prevents the air sacs from collapsing. Inadequate surfactant production is a significant cause of premature infant mortality. The development of surfactant-producing cells cannot be considered an absolute and independent limitation on viability, however, inasmuch as surfactant does not even come into play until the air sacs reach the level of structural sophistication needed to sustain life.

> the ability to support and assist, at an earlier age, the organs already present in the fetus. The developmental biology of the fetus, however, has not changed. After reviewing the developmental biology of several crucial fetal organs, including the brain, the kidneys, and the lungs, the Committee concluded that a point exists before which the fetal organs are too immature to function, even with the assistance of sophisticated medical technology. This point in time is 23-24 weeks of gestation; prior to that time, fetal life cannot be maintained outside the womb.

Id. at 9 (emphasis added).[9]

These conclusions are not contradicted by the studies cited in footnote five of Justice O'Connor's dissenting opinion in Akron, 462 U.S. at 457 n. 5, which were characterized as having "demonstrated increasingly earlier fetal viability." One study—Phillip, Little, Polivy & Lucey, Neonatal Mortality Risk for the Eighties: The Importance of Birth Weight/Gestational Age Groups, 68 Pediatrics 122 (1981)—presents data on premature infant mortality at two medical centers. At one center, data were presented for 523 premature infants treated in an intensive care nursery between 1976 and 1979; of these, five were 25 weeks of gestation or less and only one of the five survived. Id. at 125, Table 4.[10] The data from a second regional medical center showed that infants born alive with a gestational age of less than 25 weeks and weight between 500 and 1,249 grams had only [9] It should also be noted that even the advance of viability from 24 to 23 weeks is still largely hypothetical. In fact, it is very rare for a fetus delivered before 24 weeks to survive. See, e.g., Milner & Beard, Limit of Fetal Viability, 1 Lancet 1079 (1984).

---

[10] Two of these premature babies weighed between 500 and 749 grams and both died; one baby weighed between 750 and 999 grams and died; and two babies weighed between 1,000 and 1,249 grams and one survived.

a 9% survival rate. Id. The data in the study do not support the proposition that the point of fetal viability has been moved significantly closer to conception.

The same observations apply to other studies cited in the footnote, and two authors of studies cited there have disassociated themselves from any attempt to use their work as a basis for inferring a shift of the point of viability. For example, Dr. Arthur E. Kopelman, Head of Neonatology at East Carolina School of Medicine—whose study, The Smallest Preterm Infants: Reasons for Optimism and New Dilemmas, 132 American Journal of Diseases of Children 461 (1978) is cited at 462 U.S. at 457 n. 5—subsequently commented:

> I would respond emphatically that my article does not in any way, shape or form support such a contention. Furthermore, I know of no current research which would lead me to believe that a fetus of less than 22 weeks of gestation can be or soon will be able to be sustained outside the uterus . . . .
>
> Below 24 weeks of gestation the fetus' lungs are simply not adequately developed to sustain oxygenation even with ventilator support.

Law, Rethinking Sex and the Constitution, 132 U. Pa. L. Rev. 955, 1023-24 n.245 (1984) (quoting Dr. Kopelman's communication).[11]

---

[11] Similarly, Dr. Leo Stern, Professor and Chairman of Pediatrics at Brown University and the author of Intensive Care for the Pre-Term Infant, 26 Danish Med. Bull. 144 (1979), cited at 462 U.S. at 457 n.5, subsequently wrote:

> It may well be that some of the other references quoted in the footnote have demonstrated "increasingly earlier fetal viability," but that is certainly not what I said in my article . . . . It is highly likely that the lower limit beyond which human gestation is simply incapable of survival has already been virtually reached in its entirety, at least insofar as we intend such survival to be possible without the intervention of some

In short, the basic scientific observations concerning the outer limit of viability recognized in Roe v. Wade remain accurate.

B. The Organic Capacity For Human Thought Is Absent Until After 28 Weeks Of Gestation

Roe v. Wade established a trimester-based framework for evaluating the interests of a state in protecting fetal life. That framework was supported by reference to the concept of viability. While not mentioned by the Court in Roe v. Wade, it is also true that the trimester-based framework corresponds to the chronology of fetal brain development. It is not until sometime after 28 weeks of gestation that the fetal brain has the capacity to carry on the same range of neurological activity as the brain in a full-term newborn.

Fetal brain development is obviously a long and incremental process. Brain cells in the neocortex, the portion of the brain in which the processes we call thought, emotion and consciousness occur, must be sufficiently developed to permit this kind of neurological activity to take place. At about 28 weeks of gestation, brain development is marked by the sudden emergence of dendritic spines in the neocortex. Dendritic spines are essential components in the brain's cellular circuitry.[12] form of artificial extrauterine environment that could be provided by the successful creation of an artificial placenta.

---

Law, Rethinking Sex and the Constitution, 132 U. Pa. L. Rev. 955, 1023-24 n.245 (1984) (quoting Dr. Stern's communication).

Regarding the development of an artificial placenta, Dr. Stern observed:

> Even if such a procedure could be successfully achieved, not only are its economic costs staggering to imagine but the potential for ever being able to supply the technology in sufficiently large numbers of units to make any kind of impact on the total number of threatened or spontaneously terminated first term gestations would be in practical terms most unlikely.

Id.

[12] M. Flower, Neuromaturation and the Moral Status of Human Fetal Life in ABORTION RIGHTS AND FETAL PERSONHOOD 71, 77 (Doerr & Prescott ed. 1989) (emphasis in original) (forthcoming).

One study has indicated that neocortical cells possess no dendritic spines as late as 24 to 27 weeks of gestation.[13] It is also at that time that large-scale neocortical synaptogenesis (the development of neural connections between brain cells in the neocortex) begins,[14] although limited synaptogenesis may begin as early as 19 to 22 weeks of gestation.[15]

Some primitive motor activities, such as swallowing and spontaneous movement of limbs, begin between eight and thirteen weeks of gestation.[16] However, the thalamocortical connections which are prerequisites for neocortical reception of bodily sensation do not begin to develop until approximately 22 or 23 weeks.[17] In addition, regular patterned electroencephalograms (EEGs) with characteristics of an adult EEG appear at approximately 30 weeks.[18] Of course, the fact that the fetus develops the bare biological capacity for crucial neurological processes does not necessarily mean that these neurological processes actually begin to occur in this period. Indeed, the cerebral cortex is relatively nonfunctional even in normal newborns.[19]

---

[13] D.P. Purpura, Morphogenesis of Visual Cortex in the Preterm Infant in GROWTH AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE BRAIN, 33, 46 (M.A.B. Brazier ed. 1975) (examining the visual cortex).

[14] Id. at 45-46.

[15] Molliver, Kostovic & Van Der Loos, The development of synapses in cerebral cortex of the human fetus, 50 Brain Research 403-07 (1973).

[16] Flower, supra note 12, at 75.

[17] Kostovic & Goldman-Rakic, Transient Cholinesterase Staining in the Mediodorsal Nucleus of the Thalamus and its Connections in the Developing Human and Monkey Brain, 219 Journal of Comparative Neurology 431-47 (1983); Kostovic & Rakic, Development of Prestriate Visual Projections in the Monkey and Human Fetal Cerebrum Revealed by Transient Cholinesterase Staining, 4 Journal of Neuroscience 25-42 (1984).

[18] Flower, supra note 12, at 79.

[19] Shewmon, Capron, Warwick & Schulman, The Use of Anencephalic Infants as Organ Donors: A Critique, 261 Journal of American Medical Association 1773-81 (1989).

The neurobiological data indicate that the fetus lacks the physical capacity for the neurological activities we associate with human thought until sometime after 28 weeks of gestation. In other words, the capacity for the human thought process as we know it cannot exist before that time. Amici believe that these neurobiological facts support the chronology of development this Court recognized in Roe v. Wade.

CONCLUSION

The parties and the various amici in this case may disagree about when a human life begins. Indeed, the signatories of this brief may, as individuals, have different answers to this fundamental question. But such differences are a product of philosophical, moral and religious differences which cannot be resolved by resort to scientific "truth" alone. Those who claim that the Court's decision in Roe v. Wade is refuted by scientific law or fact are merely expressing their own value judgments. Amici respectfully urge this Court to reject the assertion that Roe v. Wade should be overruled on the basis of alleged inconsistency with scientific "truth" and to reaffirm its decision in that case.

Respectfully submitted,

JAY KELLY WRIGHT *
DAVID T. COHEN
ARNOLD & PORTER
1200 New Hampshire Ave., N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20036
(202) 872-6700
Attorneys for Amici Curiae †

March 30, 1989

* Counsel of Record

† David A. Wollin contributed to the preparation of this brief.

APPENDIX

APPENDIX

Aber, J. Lawrence	Assistant Professor of Psychology Barnard College of Columbia University
Artavanis-Tsakonas, S.	Professor of Biology Yale University
Axelrod, Julius	Nobel Prize, Medicine, 1970 Neuroscientist, National Institute of Mental Health
Ayala, Francisco J.	Distinguished Professor of Biological Sciences University of California
Bajema, Carl Jay	Professor of Biology Grand Valley State University
Baltimore, David	Nobel Prize, Physiology or Medicine, 1975 Director, Whitehead Institute Professor of Biology Massachusetts Institute of Technology
Barrett, John N.	Professor University of Miami
Bass, Andrew H.	Assistant Professor Cornell University
Beard, Margaret E.	Senior Research Scientist Nathan Kline Institute
Benacerraf, Baruj	Chairman, Department of Pathology Harvard Medical School
Bennett, Michael V.L.	Professor and Chairman of Neuroscience Albert Einstein College of Medicine
Benzer, Seymour	National Medal of Science, 1983 James G. Boswell Professor of Neuroscience California Institute of Technology

Booker, Ronald	Assistant Professor Cornell University
Bourden, Douglas M.	Professor of Psychiatry and Behavioral Sciences University of Washington Director, Regional Primate Research Center
Braine, Lila	Professor Barnard College of Columbia University
Bullock, Theodore H.	Professor of Neurosciences, Emeritus University of California
Bunge, Mary B.	Professor of Anatomy and Neurobiology Washington University School of Medicine
Bunge, Richard P.	Professor of Anatomy and Neurobiology Washington University School of Medicine
Bush, Guy L.	Professor Department of Zoology Michigan State University
Cammer, Wendy	Professor of Neurology and Neuroscience Albert Einstein College of Medicine
Carlson, John R.	Assistant Professor of Biology Yale University
Chambers, Edward L.	Professor of Physiology and Biophysics University of Miami School of Medicine
Cohen, Avis H.	Senior Research Associate Cornell University

Cohen, Lawrence B.	Professor Department of Physiology Yale University School of Medicine
Crick, Francis	Nobel Prize, Physiology, 1962 The Salk Institute
Crill, Wayne E.	Professor and Chairman Department of Physiology and Biophysics University of Washington
Darnell, James E., Jr.	Professor of Molecular Cell Biology Rockefeller University
Davidson, Eric H.	Norman Chandler Professor of Cell Biology California Institute of Technology
DeRiemer, Susan A.	Assistant Professor of Biological Sciences Columbia University
Diamond, Marion	Professor of Anatomy University of California
Dubach, Mark F.	Assistant Professor University of Washington School of Medicine
Dulbecco, Renato	Nobel Prize, Physiology or Medicine, 1975 Distinguished Research Professor and Acting President The Salk Institute for Biological Studies
Easter, Stephen	Professor of Biology University of Michigan
Ehrlich, Barbara E.	Assistant Professor Department of Medicine/Cardiology and Physiology University of Connecticut

Eisen, Judith S.	Assistant Professor of Biology Institute of Neuroscience University of Oregon
Fernald, Russell D.	Institute of Neuroscience University of Oregon
Fields, Kay Louise	Professor of Neurology and Neuroscience Albert Einstein College of Medicine
Fischbach, Gerald D.	Professor and Chairman Department of Anatomy and Neurobiology Washington University School of Medicine
Flower, Michael J.	Associate Professor of Biology Lewis and Clark College
Francoeur, Robert T.	Professor of Human Embryology and Medical Ethics Fairleigh Dickinson University
Gall, Christine	Associate Professor of Anatomy University of California
Geary, Nori	Associate Professor Biology Department Columbia University
Gilbert, Walter	Nobel Prize, Chemistry, 1980 Carl M. Loeb University Professor Harvard University
Goldman-Rakic, Patricia S.	Professor of Neuroscience Yale University School of Medicine
Goldsmith, Timothy H.	Professor of Biology and of Ophthamology and Visual Science Yale University
Goodman, Corey	Professor Department of Biochemistry University of California

Gordon-Licky, Barbara	Professor of Psychology Institute of Neuroscience University of Oregon
Gordon-Licky, Marvin	Professor of Psychology Institute of Neuroscience University of Oregon
Gorlick, Dennis L.	Associate Research Scientist Columbia University
Grinnell, Alan D.	Professor of Physiology UCLA School of Medicine
Hall, Zach W.	Professor and Chairman Department of Physiology University of California
Hardin, Garrett	Professor Emeritus of Human Ecology University of California
Harris-Warrick, Ronald M.	Associate Professor of Neurobiology and Behavior Cornell University
Hecht, Norman B.	Professor of Biology Tufts University
Hiatt, Howard H.	Professor of Medicine Harvard Medical School
Hildebrand, John G.	Professor of Neurobiology University of Arizona
Hille, Bertil	Professor of Physiology and Biophysics University of Washington School of Medicine
Holley, Robert W.	Nobel Prize, Physiology or Medicine, 1968 Resident Fellow, Molecular Biology The Salk Institute
Holtzman, Eric	Professor of Biological Sciences Columbia University

Hopkins, Carl D.	Professor Cornell University
Horowitz, Norman H.	Professor of Biology Emeritus California Institute of Technology
Horvitz, H. Robert	Professor of Biology Massachusetts Institute of Technology
Howland, Howard C.	Professor of Neurobiology and Behavior Cornell University
Hoy, Ronald R.	Professor and Chairman Section of Neurobiology and Behavior Cornell University
Hubel, David H.	Nobel Prize, Physiology or Medicine, 1981 Professor of Neurobiology Harvard Medical School
Johnson, Bruce R.	Senior Research Associate Section of Neurobiology and Behavior Cornell University
Kandel, Eric R.	National Medal of Science, 1988 Professor Columbia University College of Physicians and Surgeons Senior Investigator, Howard Hughes Medical Institute of Molecular Neurobiology and Behavior Columbia University
Kankel, Douglas R.	Associate Professor of Biology Yale University
Karpf, David B.	Associate Professor Department of Medicine San Francisco School of Medicine Associate Investigator in Endocrine–Research VA Medical Center, San Francisco

Keane, Robert W.	Assistant Professor University of Miami School of Medicine
Kelley, Darcy B.	Professor, Department of Biological Sciences Columbia University
Kennedy, Mary B.	Associate Professor of Biology California Institute of Technology
Keshishian, Haig	Assistant Professor Biology Department Yale University
Kety, Seymour	Professor Emeritus of Neuroscience in Psychiatry Harvard Medical School Senior Scientist, National Institute of Mental Health
Kimble, Daniel P.	Professor of Psychology University of Oregon
Kimmel, Charles B.	Professor of Biology Institute of Neuroscience University of Oregon
Kleitman, Naomi	Research Associate Washington University School of Medicine
Konishi, Masakazu	Bing Professor of Behavioral Biology California Institute of Technology
Korones, Sheldon B.	Professor of Pediatrics and of Obstetrics and Gynecology Director, the Newborn Center University of Tennessee
Koshland, Daniel E., Jr.	Editor of Science Professor of Biochemistry University of California
Landowne, David	Associate Professor University of Miami

Lederberg, Joshua	Nobel Prize, Medicine, 1958 President The Rockefeller University
Lerman, Leonard S.	Senior Lecturer Department of Biology Massachusetts Institute of Technology
Levinthal, Cyrus	Professor of Biology Columbia University
Levinthal, Francoise	Senior Research Associate Columbia University
Lewis, Edward B.	Thomas Hunt Morgan Professor of Biology, Emeritus California Institute of Technology
Llinas, Rodolfo R.	Chairman and Professor New York University Medical Center
Lynch, Gary	Professor, Above Scale Department of Psychobiology University of California
Macagno, Eduardo R.	Professor Columbia University
Magasanik, Boris	Jacques Monod Professor of Microbiology Massachusetts Institute of Technology
Magleby, Karl L.	Professor of Physiology and Biophysics University of Miami School of Medicine
Marder, Eve	Associate Professor Brandeis University
Mayr, Ernst	National Medal of Science Professor Emeritus Harvard University

McCulloh, David H.	Research Assistant Professor Department of Physiology and Biophysics University of Miami School of Medicine
McGlade-McCulloh, Ellen	Research Associate Department of Physiology and Biophysics University of Miami School of Medicine
Merrill, Valerie K. L.	Postdoctoral Fellow Brandeis University
Molskness, Theodore A.	Research Associate Oregon Regional Primate Research Center
Moore, Betty C.	Research Associate in Biology University of California
Moore, John A.	Professor of Biology University of California
Muller, Kenneth J.	Professor University of Miami School of Medicine
Neckameyer, Wendi S.	Research Associate Brandeis University
Nirenberg, Marshall	Nobel Prize, Physiology or Medicine, 1968 National Institute of Health
O'Day, Peter M.	Assistant Professor of Biology and Neuroscience University of Oregon
Ojeda, Sergio R.	Head, Division of Neuroscience Oregon Regional Primate Research Center
Olson, Everett C.	Professor Emeritus of Biology University of California

Pardue, Mary Lou	Professor of Biology Massachusetts Institute of Technology
Paton, Martha Constantine	Professor of Biology Yale University
Perry, Gary W.	Research Assistant Professor Department of Physiology and Biophysics University of Miami School of Medicine
Podleski, Thomas R.	Professor of Neurobiology Section of Neurobiology and Behavior Cornell University
Poo, Mu-ming	Professor of Biological Sciences Columbia University
Purves, Dale	Professor of Neurobiology Washington University School of Medicine
Rakic, Pasko	Professor of Neuroscience Yale University School of Medicine
Restifo, Linda L.	Postdoctoral Research Associate Brandeis University
Richardson, Stephen A.	Professor Emeritus Department of Pediatrics Albert Einstein College of Medicine
Roberts, William M.	Assistant Professor Institute of Neuroscience University of Oregon
Robins, Diane M.	Assistant Professor of Molecular Biology Columbia University
Role, Lorna W.	Assistant Professor Department of Anatomy and Cell Biology Columbia University, College of Physicians and Surgeons

Rose, Birgit	Research Associate Professor Department of Physiology and Biophysics University of Miami School of Medicine
Rosenberg, Leon E.	C.N.H. Long Professor of Human Genetics Yale University School of Medicine
Rosenblith, Walter A.	Institute Professor Emeritus Massachusetts Institute of Technology
Rothman, Taube P.	Research Scientist Columbia University
Ruibal, Rodolfo	Professor University of California
Rutila, Joan E.	Postdoctoral Fellow Brandeis University
Ryan, George M.	Professor of Obstetrics and Gynecology Past President of American College of Obstetrics and Gynecology University of Tennessee
Sackett, Gene P.	Professor University of Washington
Scharrer, Berta	National Medal of Science, 1983 Distinguished Professor Emerita of Anatomy and Neuroscience Albert Einstein College of Medicine
Scher, Allen M.	Professor Department of Physiology University of Washington
Schneiderman, Anne M.	Assistant Professor of Neurobiology & Behavior Cornell University

Schwartz, George J.	Professor of Pediatrics Associate Professor of Physiology/Biophysics Albert Einstein College of Medicine
Shanklin, Douglas R.	Professor of Pathology and of Obstetrics and Gynecology Chief of Perinatal Pathology and Perinatal Neuropathology University of Tennessee
Shneour, Elie A.	Director Biosystems Research Institute
Shooter, Eric M.	Professor and Former Chairman of Neurobiology Stanford University School of Medicine
Sibai, Baha M.	Professor of Obstetrics and Gynecology University of Tennessee
Sidman, Richard L.	Bullard Professor of Neuropathology Harvard Medical School
Siegelbaum, Steven A.	Associate Professor Howard Hughes Institute Center for Neurobiology and Behavior Columbia University
Siekevitz, Philip	Professor Rockefeller University
Silver, Rae	Professor Barnard College of Columbia University
Silverman, Ann-Judith	Professor Department of Anatomy and Cell Biology Columbia University, College of Physicians and Surgeons

Smith, Orville A.	Professor University of Washington School of Medicine Director, Regional Primate Research Center
Sperry, Roger	Nobel Prize, Physiology or Medicine, 1981 Board of Trustees, Professor of Psychobiology, Emeritus California Institute of Technology
Spitzer, Adrian	Professor of Pediatrics Albert Einstein College of Medicine
Spray, David C.	Professor of Neuroscience Albert Einstein College of Medicine
Steiner, Lisa	Professor Massachusetts Institute of Technology
Steiner, Robert A.	Professor Department of Physiology and Biophysics University of Washington
Stouffer, Richard L.	Scientist, Oregon Regional Primate Research Center
Stuart, Ann E.	Professor of Physiology and Ophthamology University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
Takahashi, Terry T.	Assistant Professor of Biology Institute of Neuroscience University of Oregon
Torriani, Annamaria	Professor of Biology Massachusetts Institute of Technology
Tublitz, Nathan J.	Assistant Professor of Biology University of Oregon

Van Essen, David	Professor and Executive Officer for Neurobiology California Institute of Technology
Van Valen, Leigh M.	Professor of Biology University of Chicago
Vaughan, Herbert G., Jr.	Professor of Neuroscience, Neurology and Pediatrics Director, Rose F. Kennedy Center for Research in Mental Retardation and Human Development Albert Einstein College of Medicine
Waelsch, Salome G.	Professor of Molecular Genetics Albert Einstein College of Medicine
Wald, George	Nobel Prize, Physiology or Medicine, 1967 Professor Emeritus of Biology Harvard University
Weeks, Janis C.	Associate Professor of Biology Institute of Neuroscience University of Oregon
Weintraub, Harold M.	Member Fred Hutchinson Cancer Research Center
Weiss, David S.	Post Doctoral Fellow Department of Physiology and Biophysics University of Miami School of Medicine
Weston, James A.	Professor of Biology Institute of Neuroscience University of Oregon
White, Kalpana	Associate Professor of Biology Brandeis University
Williams, Christina L.	Associate Professor Barnard College of Columbia University

Wilson, David L.	Dean, College of Arts and Sciences and Professor of Biology University of Miami
Wilson, Edward O.	National Medal of Science, 1977 Baird Professor of Science Harvard University
Witkin, Joan W.	Associate Research Scientist Department of Anatomy and Cell Biology Columbia University, College of Physicians and Surgeons
Wold, Barbara J.	Associate Professor of Biology California Institute of Technology
Wyman, Robert J.	Professor Biology Department Yale University
Zelinski-Wooten, Mary Beth	Research Fellow Department of Reproductive Biology and Behavior Oregon Regional Primate Research Center
Zukin, R. Suzanne	Professor of Neuroscience Albert Einstein College of Medicine

AMICUS CURIAE

BRIEF

No. 88-605

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
MAR 30 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

IN THE
Supreme Court of the United States
OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,
Appellants,
v.
REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,
Appellees.

On Appeal from the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit

---

BRIEF OF THE NATIONAL FAMILY PLANNING AND REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH ASSOCIATION AS AMICUS CURIAE IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEES

JAMES L. FELDESMAN
(Counsel of Record)
JEFFREY K. STITH
FELDESMAN, TUCKER, LEIFER,
FIDELL & BANK
2001 L Street, N.W.
Suite 300
Washington, D.C. 20036
(202) 466-8960
Attorneys for Amicus Curiae

Of Counsel:
THOMAS E. ZEMAITIS
STEPHEN J. CIPOLLA
PEPPER, HAMILTON & SHEETZ
3000 Two Logan Square
Eighteenth and Arch Streets
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania 19103
(215) 981-4000

March 30, 1989

WILSON - EPES PRINTING CO., INC. - 789-0096 - WASHINGTON, D.C. 20001

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Page
TABLE OF AUTHORITIES	ii
INTEREST OF AMICUS CURIAE	1
SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT	3
ARGUMENT	4
I. THERE IS NO ACTUAL, ONGOING CONTROVERSY BETWEEN THE LITIGANTS ON THE PUBLIC FUNDING QUESTION	4
II. THE MISSOURI STATUTE IS UNCONSTITUTIONAL	7
A. The Missouri Statute Directly Interferes With the Privacy Right of a Family Planning Patient to Make an Informed Choice Between Abortion and Childbirth	9
B. The Missouri Statute Violates the First Amendment Free Speech Rights of Both Family Planning Patients and Their Physicians	11
C. The Missouri Statute Does Not Leave Family Planning Patients With at Least the Same Range of Choice in Deciding Whether to Obtain an Abortion as They Would Have Had if the State Had Chosen Not to Fund Family Planning Programs at All	13
D. The Missouri Statute Impermissibly Discriminates on the Basis of Viewpoint	15
CONCLUSION	16

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

CASES — Page

Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Haworth, 300 U.S. 227 (1937) 4
Bigelow v. Virginia, 421 U.S. 809 (1975) 12
Board of Education v. Pico, 457 U.S. 853 (1982) 12
Boos v. Barry, 108 S.Ct. 1157 (1988) 15
City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983) 10
Consolidated Edison v. Public Serv. Comm'n, 447 U.S. 530 (1980) 15
Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Def. & Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788 (1985) 15
Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536 (1965) 15
Deakins v. Monaghan, 108 S.Ct. 523 (1988) 4
Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179 (1973) 9
FCC v. League of Women Voters, 468 U.S. 364 (1984) 13, 15
Frost & Frost Trucking Co. v. Railroad Comm'n of California, 271 U.S. 583 (1926) 12
Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965) 12
Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980) 7-8, 13
Honig v. Doe, 108 S.Ct. 592 (1988) 4
Kremens v. Bartley, 431 U.S. 119 (1977) 5-7
Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977) 7-8, 12
Massachusetts v. Bowen, 679 F.Supp. 1465 (D. Colo. 1988) 2, 14
Moore v. Preventive Medicine Medical Group, Inc., 178 Cal. App. 3d 428, 223 Cal. Rptr. 859 (Cal. App. 1986) 9
New York v. Bowen, 690 F.Supp. 1261 (S.D.N.Y. 1988) 3
Perry v. Sinderman, 408 U.S. 593 (1972) 11-12, 15
Planned Parenthood v. Arizona, 718 F.2d 938, 944 (9th Cir.), aff'd sub nom. Babbit v. Planned Parenthood, 107 S.Ct. 391 (1986) 12
Planned Parenthood v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976) 10

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES—Continued

Page

Planned Parenthood Ass'n v. Kempiners, 531 F. Supp. 320 (N.D. Ill. 1981), vacated and remanded on other grounds, 700 F.2d 1115 (7th Cir. 1983), aff'd on remand, 568 F.Supp. 1490 (N.D. Ill. 1983) 14
Planned Parenthood Fed'n v. Bowen, 680 F.Supp. 1465 (D. Colo. 1988) 3
Planned Parenthood League of Mass. v. Belotti, 641 F.2d 1006 (1st Cir. 1981) 14
Police Department of Chicago v. Mosely, 408 U.S. 92 (1972) 15
Preiser v. Newkirk, 422 U.S. 395 (1975) 5
Regan v. Taxation with Representation, 461 U.S. 540 (1983) 15
Reproductive Health Services v. Webster, 662 F. Supp. 407 (W.D. Mo. 1987), aff'd, 851 F.2d 7071 (8th Cir. 1988) 5
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973) 7-9, 11
Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 106 S.Ct. 2169 (1986) 10-11
Virginia St. Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, 425 U.S. 748 (1976) 12
Whalen v. Roe, 429 U.S. 589 (1977) 9

STATUTES

53 Fed. Reg. 2922 (February 2, 1988) (to be codified at 42 C.F.R. § 59.8) 2
Mo. Ann. Stat. §§ 188.205, .210, .215 ..... 2, 5-8, 16
Title X, Public Health Services Act of 1970, 42 U.S.C. § 300 1-3
U.S. Const., Art. III 3-4, 6

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

No. 88-605

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,
Appellants,

v.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,
Appellees.

On Appeal from the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit

---

BRIEF OF THE NATIONAL FAMILY PLANNING AND REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH ASSOCIATION AS AMICUS CURIAE IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEES

INTEREST OF AMICUS CURIAE

The National Family Planning and Reproductive Health Association, Inc. ("NFPRHA"), is a nonprofit membership corporation designed to improve and expand the delivery of comprehensive family planning and reproductive health care information and services throughout the United States. NFPRHA represents over 85 percent of the agencies and organizations that operate family planning programs with funds received under Title X of the Public Health Services Act of 1970, 42 U.S.C. § 300 et seq.

This case raises a number of issues of constitutional dimension, including: whether the State may determine that human life begins at conception, whether the State may require that physicians perform medical examinations and tests to determine characteristics of fetal viability, and whether the State can make it unlawful for public employees, public facilities and public funding to be involved in the performance or assistance of elective abortions. Appellants have also specifically asked that the Court reconsider the trimester approach to determining the State interest in regulating abortion services, first enunciated in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973). It is, however, only the issues relating to the expenditure of public funds for counseling on abortion that will be addressed by NFPRHA in this brief.*

In the present case, the Court of Appeals declared unconstitutional portions of a Missouri statute prohibiting the use of public funds, employees, and facilities for the purpose of encouraging or counseling a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life. See Mo. Ann. Stat. §§ 188.205, .210, .215. In 1988, the United States Department of Health and Human Services ("HHS") promulgated regulations similar to the public funds provision of the Missouri statute, which inter alia, prohibited Title X funding recipients from mentioning abortion as an option in counseling patients with unintended pregnancies. See 53 Fed. Reg. 2922 (February 2, 1988) (to be codified at 42 C.F.R. § 59.8).

NFPRHA joined with Massachusetts in challenging HHS' Title X regulations and obtained a permanent injunction preventing their implementation. See Massachusetts v. Bowen, 679 F.Supp. 137 (D. Mass. 1988), appeal pending, No. 88-1279 (1st Cir.) These same Title

* This Amicus Curiae Brief is filed with the consent of all parties to this appeal and letters to this effect have been filed with the Clerk of the Court.

X regulations were also held unconstitutional and permanently enjoined in Planned Parenthood Fed'n v. Bowen, 680 F.Supp. 1465 (D. Colo. 1988), appeal pending, No. 88-2251 (10th Cir.), but were upheld in New York v. Bowen, 690 F.Supp. 1261 (S.D.N.Y. 1988), appeal pending, No. 88-6204 (2d Cir.).

In all three cases, plaintiffs argued that the HHS regulations: (1) were unauthorized and contrary to the intent of Congress in enacting and reenacting Title X; (2) violated a woman's First and Fifth Amendment rights to make an informed reproductive choice in consultation with her physician; and (3) violated a physician's First Amendment right to provide necessary medical information and counseling to his or her patient without government censorship or interference. All three cases have been appealed, briefed, and argued in their respective circuits and await decisions. This Court's ruling as to the relationship between the use of public funds and counseling on abortion may well affect the outcome of these pending challenges to the Title X regulations.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

According to Article III of the Constitution, there must be an actual, ongoing controversy between the parties at all stages of litigation, including review before this Court. The Missouri statute at issue in this case prohibits the use of public funds, public employees, and public facilities in counseling a woman on abortion. The lower courts struck down all three provisions as unconstitutional.

The State's decision to appeal only the public funding component of the statute, along with certain representations made by the State during the pendency of this appeal, results in broad protection of most of the unidentified plaintiff class members and settlement of the controversy as between the identified litigants. Consequently, this case must now be remanded to the district court for reconsideration of the class definition, exclusion of those whose claims are moot, and substitution of class representatives with live claims pertaining to the public funding question.

Even if the Court reaches the public funding prohibition, it must declare the Missouri statute unconstitutional. First, it directly interferes with the privacy right of a woman to make an informed decision between abortion and childbirth.

Second, it violates the protected First Amendment free speech rights of both the patient and the physician to both speak and receive information freely. As a result, patients are not left with the same range of choice as they would have had if the State had chosen not to fund family planning programs at all.

Finally, the Missouri statute openly discriminates on the basis of viewpoint. Viewpoint discrimination by the State cannot be excused or justified because it is accomplished through the manipulation of its public funds.

ARGUMENT

I. THERE IS NO ACTUAL, ONGOING CONTROVERSY BETWEEN THE LITIGANTS ON THE PUBLIC FUNDING QUESTION.

Under Article III of the Constitution, an essential prerequisite to the exercise of jurisdiction by this Court is the existence of an "actual, ongoing" controversy between the litigants. Honig v. Doe, 108 S.Ct. 592, 601 (1988); Deakins v. Monaghan, 108 S.Ct. 523, 528 (1988). In addition, this Court requires that:

> [t]he controversy must be definite and concrete, touching the legal relations of parties having adverse legal interests. It must be a real and substantial controversy admitting of specific relief through a decree of a conclusive character . . .

Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Haworth, 300 U.S. 227, 240-241 (1937) (citations omitted). Finally, the controversy must exist at all stages of litigation, including review before this Court. See Kremens v. Bartley, 431 U.S. 119 (1977); Preiser v. Newkirk, 422 U.S. 395, 401-04 (1975).

The Missouri statute prohibits the use of public funds (§ 188.205), public employees (§ 188.210), and public facilities (§ 188.215) in counseling a woman on abortion. These provisions were challenged in a class action brought by five publicly-employed health care professionals and two non-profit corporations.[1] Both the district court and the court of appeals struck down these three sections as violative of rights guaranteed under the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution. See Reproductive Health Services v. Webster, 851 F.2d 1071, 1077-80 (8th Cir. 1988); Reproductive Health Services v. Webster, 662 F. Supp. 407, 423-28 (W.D. Mo. 1987).

Missouri neglected to appeal the court of appeals' holding that the statutory prohibition on the involvement of public employees and facilities in abortion counseling is unconstitutional. Consequently, those statutory provisions are not now properly before the Court. The State's appeal of only the public funding component of the statute is based on the assertion that it "does not implicate the First Amendment rights of any person. Section 188.205 merely directs officials not to expend public funds under their control . . . . The statute . . . does not forbid anyone from discussing the subject of abortion." J.S. at 24-25.

Indeed, the State maintains that § 188.205 "does not prohibit the use of public funds to provide information regarding abortion or to inform a woman of the options she may have . . ." J.S. at 25. Rather, the State contends that § 188.205 prohibits "the use of public funds for the purpose of directly urging a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life." Brief for Appellants at 38 (emphasis added).

---

[1] The district court certified a plaintiff class consisting of (1) facilities, physicians and other health care professionals offering abortion counseling and services; and (2) pregnant women seeking abortion counseling and services in Missouri. See Reproductive Health Services v. Webster, 662 F. Supp. 407, 411 (W.D. Missouri 1987).

The Court need not address the merits of the State's interpretation of § 188.205. Because of the State's currently-expressed reading of the funding restriction, pregnant women can receive counseling on all options, including abortion, notwithstanding the fact that public funds may be used to pay for that counseling. While it is, of course, true that the funding restriction still prohibits a physician from advocating in favor of abortion unless a life-threatening condition exists, the ability to counsel generally on the abortion option certainly relieves the tension originally associated with § 188.205.

And since Missouri has not appealed the Eighth Circuit's decision with respect to public employees or facilities, as it now stands, anyone in Missouri receiving or operating with public funds, including a public employee, is free to counsel pregnant women on the abortion option, and may do so even in a State-supported facility. The public employees and public facilities rulings of the court of appeals, coupled with the State's representations on public funding, result in a broad protection toward the vast majority of the members of the plaintiff class. As the Court concluded in Kremens, any remaining "disputes are so unfocused as to make informed resolution of them almost impossible." 431 U.S. at 134. Under the circumstances of this case, this Court should not exercise its judicial power under Article III to address Missouri's public funding restriction, and should instead remand that question to the district court "for reconsideration of the class definition, exclusion of those whose claims are moot, and substitution of class representatives with live claims." Kremens, 431 U.S. at 134-135.

II. THE MISSOURI STATUTE IS UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

The public financing limitations raise a number of troubling constitutional questions, irrespective of any reconsideration of Roe v. Wade, for even if the Court overrules Roe v. Wade, it is still likely that many States will allow abortions under some circumstances. Regardless of the Roe v. Wade question, it will remain proper for physicians to counsel pregnant patients on the abortion option.

Notwithstanding Missouri's attempt to narrow and soften the meaning of § 188.205, the line between what Missouri will label mere counseling and what it will interpret as "directly urging" is seductive at best. Thus, for purposes of analysis of the underlying constitutionality of § 188.205, this Court should recognize that the normal physician-patient counseling which takes place when pregnancy is diagnosed will be at least somewhat impeded by § 188.205. For purposes of constitutional analysis, accordingly, the State's attempt to portray § 188.205 as being something other than an intrusion into the ordinary relationship between physician and patient must be disregarded.

The State's argument regarding § 188.205 is that it has no affirmative obligation to fund abortion counseling in the programs it supports. The State maintains that it may refuse to subsidize activities that may facilitate the abortion decision as a logical extension of the Court's rulings in Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977), and Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980).

In Maher, the Court held that Connecticut could refuse to pay for elective abortions from its Medicaid funds. Although the Court explicitly reaffirmed its decision in Roe v. Wade, it upheld the government's right to make a value judgment in the public interest favoring childbirth over abortion and indicated that such a preference could be reflected in the allocation of public funds. 432 U.S. at 474.

The Maher Court explained that the privacy right recognized in Roe v. Wade was passive in nature—a right to choose between childbirth and abortion without direct State interference. It did not necessarily follow that the government had an affirmative duty to underwrite the actual performance of abortions in order to effectuate that choice.

In Harris v. McRae, the Court upheld the "Hyde Amendment," which prohibited federal Medicaid reimbursements for abortions except in the event of rape, incest, or threat to the life of the woman. In McRae, the Court emphasized that the government's refusal to pay for the abortion itself did not necessarily constitute an undue burden or create an obstacle to an indigent woman's right to choose one. She has "at least the same range of choice in deciding" as she would have had if the government had not funded family planning services at all. 448 U.S. at 317.

The same cannot be said of the statute at issue here. Section 188.205 directly and actively interferes with the woman's right to make an informed decision regarding abortion. The State attempts to harmonize the present case with Maher v. Roe and Harris v. McRae by characterizing the § 188.205 issue as "only concerned with the spending of public money." Brief of Appellants at 38. However, neither Maher nor McRae involved government intrusion into the highly personal nature of the medical decision-making process that must take place between physician and patient. In these cases, no government encroached upon a woman's deliberative process, only upon her ability to use public money to act on a particular choice—abortion.

The Missouri statute in question here is far more insidious in that it conditions receipt of public funds upon the health professional's willingness to compromise medical, ethical, and possibly legal[2] judgment to accommodate the State's political view of the moment, in this case, antipathy to abortion. The fundamental question before this Court is whether the State may administer public funds in such a way as to manipulate an indigent woman's choice between abortion and childbirth by censoring certain medically necessary information that her physician would otherwise have given according to his or her best clinical judgment and professional standards of practice and ethics.

A. The Missouri Statute Directly Interferes With the Privacy Right of a Family Planning Patient to Make an Informed Choice Between Abortion and Childbirth.

In Roe v. Wade, this Court recognized that there exists a zone of personal privacy and autonomy that protects the woman's right to make informed decisions affecting her body, including under certain circumstances, the decision to terminate her pregnancy. 410 U.S. at 152-53, 165-66. Included in this zone of personal autonomy is the right to make important choices about one's own medical care in consultation with a qualified physician. See Whalen v. Roe, 429 U.S. 589, 603 (1977) (referring to patient's "right to decide independently, with the advice of his physician, to acquire and to use needed medication"); see also Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179, 219 (1973) (Douglas, J., concurring) ("The right of privacy has–no more conspicuous place than in the physician-patient relationship.").

---

[2] See, e.g., Moore v. Preventive Medicine Medical Group, Inc., 178 Cal. App. 3d 428, 223 Cal. Rptr. 859 (Cal. App. 1986) (physician liable for failure to advise patient of risk).

In City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983), the Court reiterated that reproductive decisions are inherently and primarily medical in nature and stressed the central role of the physician in the deliberative process:

> It remains primarily the responsibility of the physician to ensure that appropriate information is conveyed to his patient, depending on her particular circumstances.

Id. at 443.

Akron is similar to the instant case in that it too involved direct government interference in the physician-patient relationship. In Akron, the Court struck down a requirement that physicians recite to each pregnant patient a list of so-called abortion 'facts,' specifically "designed to influence the woman's informed choice" between abortion and childbirth. Id. at 444-45 ("parade of horribles"). The Court warned "against placing the physician in . . . such an 'undesired and uncomfortable straightjacket.'" Id. at 445 (quoting Planned Parenthood v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52, 67 n.8 (1976)).

In Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 106 S.Ct. 2169 (1986), the Court again encountered a statute directing physicians to provide certain information in the process of obtaining the woman's consent to abortion, and again, it was invalidated:

> Even the listing of agencies in the printed Pennsylvania form presents serious problems; it contains names of agencies that well may be out of step with needs of the particular woman and thus places the physician in an awkward position and infringes upon his or her professional responsibilities. Forcing the physician or counselor to present the materials and the list to the woman makes him or her in effect an agent of the State in treating the woman and places his or her imprimatur upon both the materials and the list.
>
> * * * *
>
> [T]he rigid requirement that a specific body of information be given in all cases, irrespective of the particular needs of the patient, intrudes upon the discretion of the pregnant woman's physician and thereby imposes the 'undesired and uncomfortable straightjacket' with which the Court in Danforth was concerned.

Id. at 2179-80 (citations omitted).

In Thornburgh, the Court criticized the government's intrusion as "the antithesis of informed consent" and "an outright attempt to wedge [Pennsylvania's] message discouraging abortion into the privacy of the informed-consent dialogue between the woman and her physician." Id.

This Court has consistently and unequivocally rejected, on privacy grounds, government attempts to dictate what is permissible in the physician-patient dialogue.

B. The Missouri Statute Violates the First Amendment Free Speech Rights of Both Family Planning Patients and Their Physicians.

An equally-compelling argument can be made that the free speech guarantee of the First Amendment protects the necessary exchange of information between doctor and patient in this case. This argument transcends any reconsideration of the privacy interest enunciated in Roe v. Wade.

In Perry v. Sinderman, 408 U.S. 593, 597 (1972), it was stated that:

> [for] at least a quarter-century, this Court has made clear that even though a person has no 'right' to a valuable government benefit and even though the government may deny him the benefit for a > number of reasons, there are some reasons upon which the government may not rely. It may not deny a benefit to a person on a basis that infringes his constitutionally protected interests—especially, his interest in freedom of speech.

See also Maher, 432 U.S. at 474-75 n.8; McRae, 448 U.S. at 317 n.19; see generally Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 482 (1965); Planned Parenthood v. Arizona, 718 F.2d 938, 944 (9th Cir.), aff'd sub nom. Babbit v. Planned Parenthood, 107 S.Ct. 391 (1986).

The First Amendment protects both the physician's right to counsel, and the patient's right to receive such counseling, regardless of whether the discussion includes the topic of abortion. See Bigelow v. Virginia, 421 U.S. 809 (1975) (abortion counseling protected speech); see also Board of Education v. Pico, 457 U.S. 853 (1982) (plurality opinion) (right to receive information protected); Virginia St. Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, 425 U.S. 748, 756-57 (1976) (same). Although the State may deny persons the 'benefit' of public funding it may not do so on a basis that infringes their constitutionally protected right to speak and receive information freely.

In the context of the immediate case, this means that the State may choose not to pay for family planning programs at all, or it may simply refuse to subsidize certain procedures such as abortions. However, if the State decides to fund medical services, it may not pick and choose between persons to fund based solely upon what those persons may say or hear.

According to Perry v. Sinderman, the State, no matter how well-intentioned, simply cannot use its power to allocate public funds as a means of circumscribing free speech and managing the otherwise free flow of information. See Frost & Frost Trucking Co. v. Railroad Comm'n of California, 271 U.S. 583, 594 (1926) ("If the State may compel the surrender of one constitutional right as a condition of its favor, it may, in like manner, compel a surrender of all"); FCC v. League of Women Voters, 468 U.S. 364 (1984) (striking down ban of editorials on federally funded public broadcasting stations).

C. The Missouri Statute Does Not Leave Family Planning Patients With at Least the Same Range of Choice in Deciding Whether to Obtain an Abortion as They Would Have Had if the State Had Chosen Not to Fund Family Planning Programs at All.

In the present case, the State of Missouri is attempting to do through funding restrictions what it could never do directly—ban discussion of abortion as an alternative to childbirth. Unfortunately, the effects of the State's action inevitably hit those who are most vulnerable the hardest—poor and teenage women. It simply cannot be said that these women are left with "at least the same range of choice in deciding whether to obtain a[n] . . . abortion as [they] would have had" if the State had chosen not to fund family planning programs at all. McRae, 448 U.S. at 317.

State-supported programs, such as Missouri's, are typically designed to serve areas that, because of economics or demographics, do not receive adequate health care and family planning services. These programs have traditionally offered a wide range of comprehensive health services that these women could not obtain elsewhere. Poor and teenage women in these medically-underserved areas are often entirely dependent upon the free family planning counseling and services offered there.

Under the Missouri statute, these women would in fact be worse off than if there was no funded program at all. In practice, through public funding women are lured into their local family planning program by its offer of free, comprehensive reproductive health counseling and services. Such women grow to rely upon the advice and skill of the attending physician as in any other doctor-patient relationship. But then, at the point of pregnancy, Missouri denies these women their constitutional right to receive what may well be medically necessary information [3] regarding their options.

Women patients clearly would not be left in the same position that they would have been in if there was no program at all. In fact, having reasonably relied on the expectation of comprehensive care, they will be worse off for it: uninformed, uncounseled, delayed, and subjected to the State's message that there is no option available but childbirth.[4] See generally Planned Parenthood Ass'n v. Kempiners, 531 F.Supp. 320 (N.D. Ill. 1981), vacated and remanded on other grounds, 700 F.2d 1115 (7th Cir. 1983), aff'd on remand, 568 F.Supp. 1490 (N.D. Ill. 1983).

This same objection is a cornerstone in NFPRHA's argument now pending before the First Circuit in Massachusetts v. Bowen, supra. In that case, there are two additional compelling arguments: (1) that the regulations at issue impose unconstitutional limits on private, as well as public, funds; and (2) that the counseling and

---

[3] Continued pregnancy may pose a serious threat to the health of women with certain conditions, such as heart disease, hypertenion, sickle cell anemia, diabetes, renal disease, and cancer. In some of these instances, a pregnancy may be life-threatening. Similarly, diseases such as AIDS and rubella may pose a severe threat to the fetus.

[4] In Planned Parenthood League of Mass. v. Belotti, 641 F.2d 1006, 1014 (1st Cir. 1981), the court of appeals struck down a 24-hour waiting period for an abortion as an unlawful "state-created obstacle" and "direct state interference." As in Belotti, Missouri's statute imposes substantial "burdens in terms of time, money, travel and work schedules; for many women, particularly the poor, the rural and those with pressing obligations. The burdens will be substantial." Id. at 1015 (citations omitted).

other activities, which the regulations outlaw, actually are mandated by the statute. Thus, while a decision in this case favorable to appellees may well decide the constitutionality of the regulations, if it is unfavorable, serious constitutional and statutory issues will remain.

D. The Missouri Statute Impermissibly Discriminates on the Basis of Viewpoint.

Regardless of the degree of State interest in protecting fetal life, it simply cannot act in such a way as to ban speech solely on the basis of the speaker's viewpoint. See League of Women Voters, 468 U.S. at 383; Regan v. Taxation with Representation, 461 U.S. 540, 548 (1983); see also Perry v. Sinderman, 408 U.S. at 597. In Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Def. & Educ. Fund, 473 U.S. 788, 811 (1985), this Court held that it would be unconstitutional for even a facially-neutral executive order to exclude an organization from participating in a federal employee charity drive, if it "is in fact based on the desire to suppress a particular view" with which the government disagrees.

In the present appeal, the State's prohibition goes beyond the discussion of a particular viewpoint, to ban discussion of an entire topic—abortion. This Court has stated elsewhere that:

> [the] First Amendment's hostility to content-based regulation extends not only to restrictions on particular viewpoints, but also to prohibition of public discussion of an entire topic. As a general matter, 'the First Amendment means that government has no power to restrict expression because of its message, its ideas, its subject matter, or its content.'

Consolidated Edison v. Public Serv. Comm'n, 447 U.S. 530, 537 (1980), citing Police Department of Chicago v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92, 95 (1972); Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536, 580-81 (1965) (opinion of Black, J.); see also Boos v. Barry, 108 S.Ct. 1157 (1988).

Section 188.205 creates a real and substantial obstacle to the typical family planning program patient. A line must be drawn somewhere—the State has simply gone too far in this case.

There is no support in the caselaw for the State's proposition that viewpoint discrimination is somehow acceptable in publicly-funded programs. Viewpoint discrimination by the State cannot be excused or justified because it is accomplished through manipulation of public funding. The Missouri statute plainly violates the First Amendment.

CONCLUSION

The Court should not address the public funding issue and instead should remand the issue to the district court for reconsideration of class definition, exclusion of moot claims, and substitution of class representatives.

Should the Court decide to reach the public funding of abortion counseling issue, it should affirm the court of appeals' ruling that § 188.205 is unconstitutional for the reasons set forth in argument II above.

Respectfully submitted,

JAMES L. FELDESMAN
(Counsel of Record)
JEFFREY K. STITH
FELDESMAN, TUCKER, LEIFER,
FIDELL & BANK
2001 L Street, N.W.
Suite 300
Washington, D.C. 20036
(202) 466-8960
Attorneys for Amicus Curiae

Of Counsel:
THOMAS E. ZEMAITIS
STEPHEN J. CIPOLLA
PEPPER, HAMILTON & SHEETZ
3000 Two Logan Square
Eighteenth and Arch Streets
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania 19103
(215) 981-4000

March 30, 1989

AMICUS CURIAE

BRIEF

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
MAR 30 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

No. 88-605

IN THE
Supreme Court of the United States
OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,
Appellants,

v.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,
Appellees.

On Appeal from the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit

---

BRIEF OF 281 AMERICAN HISTORIANS AS AMICI CURIAE SUPPORTING APPELLEES

CLYDE SPILLENGER
JANE E. LARSON
POWELL, GOLDSTEIN, FRAZER & MURPHY
1001 Pennsylvania Ave., N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20004
(202) 347-0066

SYLVIA A. LAW *
40 Washington Sq. So.
New York, N.Y. 10012
(212) 998-6265

* Counsel of Record

WILSON - EPES PRINTING CO., INC. - 789-0096 - WASHINGTON, D.C. 20001

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Page
TABLE OF AUTHORITIES	iii
INTEREST OF AMICI	1
SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT	1
ARGUMENT	2
I. OUR TRADITIONS AND HISTORY DEFINE THE CONTOURS OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT TO PRIVACY	2
II. AT THE TIME THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION WAS ADOPTED, ABORTION WAS KNOWN AND NOT ILLEGAL	4
III. THROUGH THE NINETEENTH CENTURY, ABORTION BECAME EVEN MORE WIDELY ACCEPTED AND HIGHLY VISIBLE	8
IV. NINETEENTH-CENTURY ABORTION RESTRICTIONS SOUGHT TO PROMOTE OBJECTIVES THAT ARE TODAY PLAINLY EITHER INAPPLICABLE OR CONSTITUTIONALLY IMPERMISSIBLE	11
A. From 1820-1860, Abortion Regulation In The States Rejected Broader English Restrictions And Sought To Protect Women From Particularly Dangerous Forms Of Abortion	11
B. From The Mid-Nineteenth Century, A Central Purpose Of Abortion Regulation Was To Define Who Should Be Allowed To Control Medical Practice	13
C. Enforcement Of Sharply Differentiated Concepts Of The Roles And Choices Of Men And Women Underlay Regulation Of Abortion And Contraception In The Nineteenth Century	17

TABLE OF CONTENTS—Continued

Page

D. Nineteenth-Century Contraception And Abortion Regulation Also Reflected Ethnocentric Fears About The Relative Birthrates Of Immigrants And Yankee Protestants..... 20

V. ENFORCEMENT OF ABORTION RESTRICTIONS IN THE FIRST HALF OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY FOLLOWED HISTORIC ETHNIC AND CLASS DIFFERENTIATIONS, AFFIRMED HISTORIC CONCERNS ABOUT ENFORCING GENDER ROLES, AND IMPOSED ENORMOUS COSTS UPON WOMEN, THEIR FAMILIES AND PHYSICIANS 22

VI. THE MORAL VALUE ATTACHED TO THE FETUS BECAME A CENTRAL ISSUE IN AMERICAN CULTURE AND LAW ONLY IN THE LATE TWENTIETH CENTURY, WHEN TRADITIONAL JUSTIFICATIONS FOR RESTRICTING ACCESS TO ABORTION BECAME CULTURALLY ANACHRONISTIC OR CONSTITUTIONALLY IMPERMISSIBLE 25

VII. A PRESUMED INTEREST IN PROTECTING FETAL LIFE DOES NOT JUSTIFY DENYING WOMEN THEIR HISTORIC LIBERTY TO CHOOSE ABORTION 29

CONCLUSION 30

APPENDIX: LIST OF AMICI 1a

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

CASES:

Page

Abrams v. Foshee, 3 Iowa 274, 66 Am. Dec. 77 (1856) 5

Bradwell v. Illinois, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 130 (1872) 18

Commonwealth v. Follansbee, 155 Mass. 274, 29 N.E. 471 (1892) 5

Commonwealth v. Parker, 50 Mass. (9 Met.) 263, 43 Am. Dec. 396 (1845) 5

Cooper v. State, 22 N.J.L. (2 Zab.) 52 (1849) 26

Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972) 29

Frontiero v. Richardson, 411 U.S. 677 (1973) 18

Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965) 19, 29

Hatfield v. Gano, 15 Iowa 177 (1863) 5

Martin v. Struthers, 319 U.S. 141 (1943) 2

McCollum v. Board of Education, 333 U.S. 203 (1948) 3

McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316 (1819) 2

McRae v. Califano, 491 F. Supp. 630 (E.D.N.Y. 1980) 24

Moore v. East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494 (1977) 2

Orr v. Orr, 440 U.S. 268 (1979) 29

Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497 (1961) 2

Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973) ..... passim

Stanton v. Stanton, 421 U.S. 7 (1975) 29

Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986) 2

United States v. Foote, 25 Fed. Cas. 1140 (S.D.N.Y. 1876) 19

CONSTITUTION, STATUTES, AND REGULATIONS:

Comstock Act, Ch. 258,§ 1, 17 Stat. 598 (1873) 19

18 U.S.C. § 1461 (West 1984) 19

Pub. L. 91-662, 84 Stat. 1973 (1971) 19

The Public Statute Laws of the State of Connecticut 152-153 (1821) 12

N.Y. Rev. Stat., pt. IV, ch. I, tit. VI, § 21 (1828 to 1835) 12

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES—Continued

MISCELLANEOUS: Page

AMA Editorial, Abortion or Removal of Pregnant Uterus, 96 J. Am. Med. Ass'n 1169, April 14, 1931 23
Antebellum American Culture (D. Davis ed. 1977) 14
Aries, P., Centuries of Childhood: A Social History of Family Life (R. Baldick trans. 1962) 7
Atlee & O'Donnell, Report of the Committee on Criminal Abortion, XXII Transactions of the American Medical Association 241 (1871) 18
Baxandall, R., L. Gordon & S. Reverby, eds., America's Working Women: A Documentary History—1600 to the Present (1976) 23
Beck, T., Elements of Medical Jurisprudence (1823) 10
Bender, "The Erosion of Public Culture: Cities, Discourses, and Professional Disciplines," in The Authority of Experts: Studies in History and Theory (T. Haskell ed. 1984) 14
Bledstein, B., The Culture of Professionalism: The Middle Class and the Development of Higher Education in America (1976) 14
Brodie, J., Family Limitation in American Culture, PhD Dissertation, University of Chicago, 1982 6
Chicago Tribune, Nov. 21, 1912, p. 1 23
Culpeper, N., The English Physician (1799) 6
Cott, Eighteenth-Century Family and Social Life Revealed in Massachusetts Divorce Records, 10 J. of Soc. Hist. 20 (1976) 7
Davis, D., From Homicide to Slavery: Studies in American Culture (1986) 20
D'Emilio, J. & E. Freedman, Intimate Matters: A History of Sexuality in America (1988) 6, 7
Degler, C., At Odds: Women and the Family in America from the Revolution to the Present (1980) ..... passim

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES—Continued

Page

Demos, "Images of The American Family, Then and Now," in Changing Images of the Family (V. Tufte & B. Myerhoff eds. 1979) 9
Ehrenreich, B. & D. English, For Her Own Good: 150 Years of the Experts' Advice to Women (1979) 15
Faragher, History from the Inside-Out: Writing the History of Women in Rural America, 33 Am. Q. 536 (1981) 9
Flaherty, D., Privacy in Colonial New England (1972) 7
Flexner, E., Century of Struggle: The Woman's Right's Movement in the United States (rev. ed. 1975) 17
Foner, E., Free Soil, Free Labor, Free Men: The Ideology of the Republican Party Before the Civil War (1970) 20
Frederickson, G., The Inner Civil War: Northern Intellectuals and the Crisis of the Union (1965).. 20
Geison, G., ed., Professions and Professional Ideologies in America (1983) 14
Gordon, L., Woman's Body, Woman's Right: A Social History of Birth Control in America (1976) 10, 18, 19, 21
Gordon, M., The American Family: Past, Present, and Future (1978) 7
Grossberg, M., Governing the Hearth (1985)..6, 12, 19, 25
Haggard, Abortion: Accidental, Essential, Criminal, Address Before the Nashville Academy of Medicine, Aug. 4, 1898 8
Hartog, Pigs and Positivism, 1985 Wis. L. Rev. 899 4
Haskell, T., The Emergence of Professional Social Science: The American Social Science Association and the Nineteenth-Century Crisis of Authority (1977) 14
Hawthorne, N., The Scarlet Letter (1850) 7
Higham, J., Strangers in the Land: Patterns of American Nativism 1860-1925 (1963) 21

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES—Continued

Page

Hoff-Wilson, "The Illusion of Change: Women and the American Revolution," in The American Revolution: Explorations in the History of American Radicalism (A. Young ed. 1976) 7
Hofstadter, R., Social Darwinism in American Thought (1955) 20
Kennedy, D. Birth Control in America: The Career of Margaret Sanger (1971) 21
Kevles, D., In the Name of Eugenics: Genetics and the Uses of Human Heredity (1985) 21
Lader, L., Abortion (1966) 23
Laslett, P., The World We Have Lost (1972) 7
LaSorte, Nineteenth Century Family Planning Practices, 14 J. of Psychohistory 163 (1976) 10
Leavitt, J., Brought to Bed: Child-Bearing in America, 1750-1950 (1986) 14
Leavitt, The Growth of Medical Authority: Technology and Morals in Turn-of-the-Century Obstetrics, 1 Med. Anthropology Q. 230 (1987) 27, 28
Lipset, S. & E. Raab, The Politics of Unreason: Right-Wing Extremism in America, 1790-1970 (1970) 20
Luker, K., Abortion and the Politics of Motherhood (1984) 22, 23, 24, 28
McLaren, A., Reproductive Rituals (1983) 5
Means, The Phoenix of Abortional Freedom, 17 N.Y. L. Forum 335 ..... 5, 12
Mohr, J., Abortion in America: The Origins and Evolution of National Policy (1978) ..... passim
Mohr, J., Iowa's Abortion Battles of the Late 1960s and Early 1970s, forthcoming in 1989 from the Center for the Study of the Recent History of the United States, Iowa City, Iowa 24
New York Times, Aug. 23, 1871 10
Norton, M., Liberty's Daughters: The Revolutionary Experience of American Women, 1750-1800 (1980) 8
Petchesky, R., Abortion and Woman's Choice (1986) 8, 9, 11

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES—Continued

Page

Petchesky, Fetal Images: The Power of Visual Culture in the Politics of Reproduction, 13 Feminist Studies 263 (1987) 29
Proceedings of the Philadelphia County Medical Society 132 (1892) 27
Reed, J., From Private Vice to Public Virtue: The Birth Control Movement and American Society Since 1830 (1978) 21
Quay, Justifiable Abortion—Medical and Legal Foundations, 49 Georgetown L. Rev. 173 (1960-61) 12
Reagan, L., When is Abortion Necessary to Save a Woman's Life?: The Political Dimension of Therapeutic Abortion During the Period of Criminalized Abortion in the United States, 1880-1973 (unpublished paper, Univ. of Wisconsin, Madison, June 20, 1987) 23
Rothman, B., The Tentative Pregnancy: Prenatal Diagnosis and the Future of Motherhood (1986) 29
Rothstein, W., American Physicians in the Nineteenth Century: From Sects to Science (1972) 14
Ryan, M., Womanhood in America: From Colonial Times to the Present (1975) 23
Ryan, M., Cradle of the Middle Class: The Family in Oneida County, New York, 1790-1865 (1981) 17
Smith, "Family Limitation, Sexual Control, and Domestic Feminism in Victorian America," in A Heritage of Her Own (N. Cott. & E. Pleck eds. 1979) 8
Smith & Hindus, Premarital Pregnancy in America, 1640-1971: An Overview and Interpretation, 5 J. Interdisciplinary Hist. 537 (1975) 7
Smith-Rosenberg, C., Disorderly Conduct (1985) ..... passim
Stanton, "Declaration of Sentiments 1848," reprinted in L. Kerber & J. Mathers, Woman's America: Refocusing the Past (1982) 17

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES—Continued

	Page
Starr, P., The Social Transformation of American Medicine: The Rise of a Sovereign Profession and the Making of a Vast Industry (1982)	13, 14
Stix & Wiehl, Abortion and Public Health, 28 Am. J. Pub. Health 622 (1938)	22
Stix, A Study of Pregnancy Wastage, 13 Milbank Memorial Fund Q. 347 (1935)	22
Taussig, F. Abortion, Spontaneous and Induced: Medical and Social Aspects (1936)	22
Ulrich, "Martha Moore Ballard and the Medical Challenge to Midwifery," in From Revolution to Statehood: Maine in the Early Republic, 1783 to 1820 (J. Leamon & C. Clark eds. 1988)	6
Veysey, "Intellectual History and the New Social History," in New Directions in American Intellectual History 3-26 (J. Higham & P. Conkin eds. 1979)	4
Wells, R., Family Size and Fertility Control in Eighteenth Century America: A Study of Quaker Families, 25 Population Studies 73 (1971)	8
Wertz, R. & D. Wertz, Lying-In: A History of Childbirth in America (1977)	14

BRIEF OF 281 AMERICAN HISTORIANS AS AMICI CURIAE SUPPORTING APPELLEES

INTEREST OF AMICI

Amici are two hundred and eighty-one American historians who, with the permission of the parties, here seek to provide a rich and accurate description of our national history and tradition in relation to women's liberty to choose whether to terminate a pregnancy. Never before have so many professional historians sought to address this Honorable Court in this way. Amici have widely diverse perspectives and knowledge, but are united in the conviction that Roe v. Wade is essential to women's liberty and equality and consistent with the most noble and enduring understanding of our history and traditions.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Established constitutional principles require examination of our history and tradition as a Nation to determine the existence and contours of fundamental constitutional rights. The United States asserts that our history unambiguously supports the constitutionality of laws restricting women's access to abortion.

This brief will demonstrate that for much of our nation's history abortion was not illegal; that for much of the nineteenth century abortion remained legal prior to quickening; and that, in most states, the statutes regulating abortion did not punish women. It discusses the prevalence and visibility of abortion in the nineteenth century. It shows that a variety of complex factors underlay the nineteenth-century laws restricting abortion: concern for women's health, the medical profession's desire to control the practice of medicine, openly discriminatory concepts of the appropriate role of women, opposition to non-procreative sexual activity and to the dissemination of information concerning birth control, and hostility to those who did not fit the white Anglo-Saxon Protestant model. Our brief shows that concern for the fetus has become a central argument for anti-abortion laws only as these earlier justifications have become either anachronistic or constitutionally and culturally impermissible.

Restricting access to abortion imposes ponderous burdens on the liberty and equality of women. A state cannot constitutionally justify the imposition of such burdens by adopting one, highly contested, metaphysical concept of the value of fetal life. This Court should affirm Roe v. Wade.

ARGUMENT

I. OUR TRADITIONS AND HISTORY DEFINE THE CONTOURS OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT TO PRIVACY.

Since John Marshall, no Justice of this Court has seriously disputed that the wise and intended meaning of our Constitution is determined by interpreting its words in light of our nation's history and traditions.[1] Our history and tradition shape the meaning of the relatively concrete provisions of the Constitution, such as the First Amendment.[2] History and tradition also give content to the

[1] See, e.g., McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316, 400-06 (1819) (Marshall, C.J.); Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497, 542-44 (1961) (Harlan, J., dissenting); Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973); Moore v. East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494, 503-05 (1977) (plurality opinion). Justice White has expressed this view eloquently:

> [T]his Court does not subscribe to the simplistic view that constitutional interpretation can possibly be limited to the 'plain meaning' of the Constitution's text or to the subjective intention of the Framers. The Constitution is not a deed setting forth the precise metes and bounds of its subject matter; rather it is a document announcing fundamental principles in value-laden terms that leave ample scope for the exercise of normative judgment by those charged with interpreting and applying it.

Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747, 789 (1986) (White, J., dissenting).

[2] See, e.g., Martin v. Struthers, 319 U.S. 141, 145 (1943) (door-to-door distribution of literature protected by First Amendment because "in accordance with the best tradition of free discussion").

more open-textured provisions of our Constitution—the prohibition in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments of state actions that deprive citizens of life, liberty or property without due process of law; the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of equal treatment under the law; and the Ninth Amendment's command that the "enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people."

Justice Frankfurter, a staunch defender of judicial restraint, underscored the role of history and tradition, joining this Court's invalidation of "released-time" religious instruction in public schools:

> Accommodation of legislative freedom and constitutional limitations upon that freedom cannot be achieved by a mere phrase. We cannot illuminatingly apply the "wall-of-separation" metaphor until we have considered the relevant history of religious education in America, the place of the "released time" movement in that history, and its precise manifestation in the case before us.

McCollum v. Board of Education, 333 U.S. 203, 213 (1948) (Frankfurter, J., concurring). Justice Frankfurter frankly acknowledged that " 'released time' ha[d] attained substantial proportions," but recognized that that fact did not decide the case. Id. at 224. A more exhaustive examination of our traditions led Justice Frankfurter, and seven other Justices, to strike down Illinois's "released-time" program.

While there is little disagreement that history and tradition are important guides to decision in this area of the law, there is significant dispute about what our history actually demonstrates.[3] This Court's 1973 decision in

[3] The brief amicus curiae of the United States, in the instant case, seeks to show that our history does not support women's claim of right to terminate pregnancy. It relies upon only one historical work: James Mohr's Abortion in America: The Origins and Evolution of National Policy (1978). Brief amicus curiae of the United States at 13, 16-17. Among historians this book is

Roe v. Wade provided a rich and sound description of the history of abortion. Since 1973 much historical work has expanded and deepened this understanding. An important part of American historical inquiry has shifted from the study of wars, formal legal rules, economics and elections, to provide a fuller and far more rounded account of American social history through exploration of diaries, letters, and other artifacts of what "ordinary people" did and believed.

In searching our nation's history for evidence of our society's basic beliefs, practices, and understandings, statutes are neither the only sources nor the best ones. As legal historian Hendrik Hartog has pointed out, "[i]n defining law as the command of the sovereign we ordinarily deny the legitimacy of interpretative stances other than those . . . which have the benefit of formal authoritativeness."[4] In any calculus of traditions and "fundamental" values, the moral beliefs and practices of ordinary people are entitled to consideration.[5]

II. AT THE TIME THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION WAS ADOPTED, ABORTION WAS KNOWN AND NOT ILLEGAL.

As the Court demonstrated in Roe v. Wade, abortion was not illegal at common law.[6] Through the nineteenth century American common law decisions uniformly reaffirmed that women committed no offense in seeking widely regarded as accurate and comprehensive. Professor Mohr is among the historians on whose behalf our brief is submitted. Yet, as we shall demonstrate, the United States misapprehends both Mohr's work and the historical record.

---

[4] Hartog, Pigs and Positivism, 1985 Wis. L. Rev. 899, 934-35.

[5] See Veysey, "Intellectual History and the New Social History," in New Directions in American Intellectual History 3-26 (J. Higham & P. Conkin eds. 1979).

[6] Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 132-36 & n.21 (1973). See also J. Mohr, supra note 3, at 3-19.

abortions.[7] Both common law and popular American understanding drew distinctions depending upon whether the fetus was "quick," i.e. whether the woman perceived signs of independent life.[8] There was some dispute whether a common law misdemeanor occurred when a third party destroyed a fetus, after quickening, without the woman's consent. But early recognition of this particular crime against pregnant women did not diminish the liberty of the woman herself to end a pregnancy in its early stages.[9]

Abortion was not uncommon in colonial America.[10]

---

[7] For example, in 1845, Chief Judge Shaw of Massachusetts held that abortion, with the woman's consent, is not punishable at common law unless the fetus were quick. Commonwealth v. Parker, 50 Mass. (9 Met.) 263, 43 Am. Dec. 396 (1845). In 1892 the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court held that, despite statutory enactments regulating abortion, the woman having an abortion was not a principal or an accomplice. Commonwealth v. Follansbee, 155 Mass. 274, 29 N.E. 471 (1892). In Abrams v. Foshee, 3 Iowa 274, 278, 66 Am. Dec. 77, 80 (1856), the Iowa Supreme Court held that abortion, prior to quickening, was no crime. Hatfield v. Gano, 15 Iowa 177 (1863), held that Iowa's statutory enactment did not apply to abortion produced by a woman herself. See C. Smith-Rosenberg, Disorderly Conduct 219-20 (1985).

[8] See Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. at 134-36; J. Mohr, supra note 3, at 24-26. In ordinary language in the eighteenth century and much of the nineteenth century the term "abortion" meant the termination of pregnancy after the point of quickening. Id. at 3-5.

[9] See Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. at 134-36; J. Mohr, supra note 3, at 24-26. Means, The Phoenix of Abortional Freedom, 17 N.Y. L. Forum 335, 336-53 (1971) demonstrates that commentators who asserted that a misdemeanor could be charged against third parties who destroy a fetus by assaulting a women late in pregnancy misread the common law precedents upon which they purported to rely. Even in cases involving brutal beatings of women in the late stages of pregnancy, common-law courts refused to recognize abortion as a crime, independent of assault upon the woman, or in one case "witchcraft." See A. McLaren, Reproductive Rituals 119-121 (1983).

[10] "[O]bservers in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries made repeated references to employment of abortifacients by both the single and the married." A. McLaren, supra note 9, at 114 and generally at 113-44.

Herbal abortifacients were widely known,[11] and cookbooks and women's diaries of the era contained recipes for medicines.[12] Recent studies of the work of midwives in the 1700s report cases in which the midwives provided women abortifacient compounds. More significantly, these cases are described as routine and are unaccompanied by any particular disapproval.[13]

The absence of legal condemnation of abortion in colonial America is all the more remarkable because both families and society valued children and population growth in a rural economy, with vast unsettled lands, where diseases of infancy claimed many lives. For these reasons, single women more often sought abortions in the Colonial era.[14] The absence of legal condemnation is particularly striking in the New England culture of tight-knit, religiously homogeneous communities in which neighbor observed the private behavior of neighbor and did not hesitate to chastise those who violated pervasive moral norms of the community.[15] In an era characterized

---

[11] The classic work was N. Culpeper, The English Physician (1799). See J. Brodie, Family Limitations in American Culture, PhD Dissertation, University of Chicago 1982, at 224-30.

[12] C. Smith-Rosenberg, supra note 7, at 228.

[13] For example, a midwife reported, "She is suffering from obstructions and I prescribed the use of particular herbs." Diary of Martha Moore Ballard, Sept. 27, 1789, Maine State Manuscript Library. For a general discussion, see Ulrich, "Martha Moore Ballard and the Medical Challenge to Midwifery," in From Revolution to Statehood: Maine in the Early Republic, 1783 to 1820 (J. Leamon & C. Clark eds. 1988).

[14] M. Grossberg, Governing the Hearth 159 (1985). J. D'Emilio & E. Freedman, Intimate Matters: A History of Sexuality in America (1988), report, "Cases of attempted abortion usually involved illicit lovers, not married couples. 'When a single woman,' Margaret Lakes later confessed, she 'used means to destroy the fruit of her body to conceal her sin and shame.' Elizabeth Robins of Maryland confessed that she had twice taken savin, an abortifacient; her husband suspected that she had an incestuous relationship with her brother." Id. at 26.

[15] Adultery, incest, insubordination by children, and even "living alone not subject to the governance of family life," were condemned by extensive oral and written moral prescripts from community and religious leaders, birth control and abortion were rarely the subject for moralizing. Where abortion is noted, it is not the practice itself that is subject of comment, but rather the violation of other social/sexual norms that gave rise to the perceived need to attempt to abort.[16]

In the late eighteenth century, strictures on sexual behavior loosened considerably. The incidence of premarital pregnancy rose sharply; in the late eighteenth century, one third of all New England brides were pregnant at the time of marriage, compared to less than ten percent in the seventeenth century.[17] Falling birth rates in the 1780s suggest that, at the same time our founders drafted the Constitution, including the Ninth Amendment's guarantee that the enumeration of certain rights "shall not be construed to deny or disparage others re-by the criminal law, when abortion was not. See Cott, Eighteenth-Century Family and Social Life Revealed in Massachusetts Divorce Records, 10 J. of Soc. Hist. 20, 22-24, 33 (1976); P. Laslett, The World We Have Lost 37-38 (1973); D. Flaherty, Privacy in Colonial New England 42-43, 76 (1972); P. Aries, Centuries of Childhood: A Social History of Family Life 405-07 (R. Baldick trans. 1962). For a more popular, fictional treatment, see N. Hawthorne, The Scarlet Letter (1850).

---

[16] J. D'Emilio & E. Freedman, supra note 14, at 12, report the following case from the 1600s. "Captain William Mitchell, an influential Marylander who served on the governor's council, not only impregnated Mrs. Susan Warren and gave her a 'physic' to abort the child, but he also 'lived in fornication' with his pretended wife, Joan Toaste. Even so, the first charge filed against Mitchell by the Maryland attorney was that he professed himself to be an Atheist and openly mocked all Religion."

[17] M. Gordon, The American Family: Past, Present, and Future 173 (1978). For comprehensive discussions see D. Smith & M. Hindus, Premarital Pregnancy in America, 1640-1971: An Overview and Interpretation, 5 J. Interdisciplinary Hist. 537, 553-57 (1975); Hoff-Wilson, "The Illusion of Change: Women and the American Revolution," in The American Revolution: Explorations in the History of American Radicalism 404 (A. Young ed. 1976).

tained by the people," the use of birth control and abortion increased.[18]

III. THROUGH THE NINETEENTH CENTURY, ABORTION BECAME EVEN MORE WIDELY ACCEPTED AND HIGHLY VISIBLE.

Through the nineteenth century and well into the twentieth, abortion remained a widely accepted popular practice, despite increasingly vigorous efforts to prohibit it after 1860.[19] Changing patterns of abortion practice and attitudes towards it can only be understood against a more general background of dramatic change in American economic and family life. During the period between ratification of the Constitution and adoption of the Civil War Amendments, Americans moved to cities and increasingly worked for wages.[20] In 1787, the average white American woman bore seven children; by the late 1870s, the average was down to fewer than 5; by 1900 it was 3.56.[21] Carl Degler calls this decline in fertility "the single most important fact about women and the family in American history." [22]

Economic reasons motivated urban couples to limit their family size. Working class married women, faced with the material difficulty of managing a family budget on a single male wage, resorted to abortion as the most effective available means of "conscious fertility control."[23]

But more than economic factors were at work in the restriction of fertility.[24] White middle-class Americans were, in particular, influenced by changing family conceptions and definitions of motherhood. As men's work patterns deviated farther from those of women, "wife" and "home" became powerful symbols of men's economic security and social standing.[25] Nineteenth-century women faced sharply conflicting demands. "The True Woman was domestic, docile, and reproductive. The good bourgeois wife was to limit her fertility, symbolize her husband's affluence, and do good within the world." [26]

---

[18] Wells, Family Size and Fertility Control in Eighteenth Century America: A Study of Quaker Families, 25 Population Studies 73 (1971); M. Norton, Liberty's Daughters: The Revolutionary Experience of American Women, 1750-1800 232 (1980).

[19] C. Degler, At Odds: Women and the Family in America from the Revolution to the Present 243-46 (1980). Several studies by physicians in various parts of the U.S. suggest that in the mid-nineteenth century one abortion was performed for every four live births. See J. Mohr, supra note 3, at 76-80. Reports from the late 1870s estimated even greater numbers. Id. at 81-82. The Michigan Board of Health estimated in 1898 that one-third of all pregnancies in that state ended in abortion. Haggard, Abortion: Accidental, Essential, Criminal, Address Before the Nashville Academy of Medicine, Aug. 4, 1898, at 10, discussed in C. Smith-Rosenberg, supra note 7, at 221.

[20] See C. Degler, supra note 19.

[21] Smith, "Family Limitation, Sexual Control, and Domestic Feminism in Victorian America," in A Heritage of Her Own 226 (N. Cott & E. Pleck eds. 1979). For discussion of continual decline in family size in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, see R. Petchesky, Abortion and Woman's Choice 73-74 (1986).

[22] C. Degler, supra note 19, at 191.

[23] See R. Petchesky, supra note 21, at 53.

[24] The size of rural families also declined sharply during the nineteenth century. Faragher, History From the Inside-Out: Writing the History of Women in Rural America, 33 Am. Q. 536, 549 (1981); R. Petchesky, supra note 21, at 74. James Mohr observes that by the 1860s abortion "seemed to thrive as well on the prairies as in large urban centers." J. Mohr, supra note 3, at 100.

[25] The home was conceived as "a bastion of peace, of repose, of orderliness, of unwavering devotion to people and principles beyond the self . . . safe from the grinding pressures and dark temptations of the world at large. . . . The husband-father undertook an exclusive responsibility for productive labor. . . . [F]amily life was wrenched apart from the world of work—a veritable sea-change in social history. . . . [T]he wife-mother . . . became the centerpiece in a developing cult of Home." Demos, "Images of The American Family, Then and Now," in Changing Images of the Family 51, 52 (V. Tufte and B. Myerhoff eds. 1979).

[26] C. Smith-Rosenberg, supra note 7, at 225.

To limit the number of children they bore, women adopted a range of strategies, including abortion.[27] Through the 1870s abortion was "common," a "matter of fact" and often "safe and successful." [28] The most common methods of abortion in the nineteenth century involved herbs and devices that women could purchase from pharmacists and use themselves.[29] Nonetheless, in 1871, New York City, with a population of less than one million, supported two hundred full-time abortionists, not including doctors who sometimes performed abortions.[30]

For most of the nineteenth century, abortion was highly visible. "Beginning in the early 1840s abortion became, for all intents and purposes, a business, a service openly traded in the free market. . . . [Pervasive advertising told Americans] not only that many practitioners would provide abortion services, but that some practitioners had made the abortion business their chief livelihood. Indeed, abortions became one of the first specialties in American medical history." [31]

---

[27] One physician wrote that "abortion is not always associated with crime and disgrace; it may arise from causes perfectly natural and altogether beyond the control of the female." T. Beck, 1 Elements of Medical Jurisprudence 207 (1823), quoted in M. Grossberg, supra note 14, at 160.

[28] L. Gordon, Woman's Body, Woman's Right: A Social History of Birth Control in America 51-52 (1976).

[29] See LaSorte, Nineteenth Century Family Planning Practices, 41 J. of Psychohistory 163, 166-70 (1976).

[30] New York Times, Aug. 23, 1871, at 6.

[31] J. Mohr, supra note 3, at 47. "[A] genuinely flourishing market in abortion services existed in the United States from the 1840s through the 1870s." Id. at 98. In the 1860s and 1870s both the popular press and medical journals were full of advice about abortion servicse. Id. at 67-68. See also C. Degler, supra note 19, at 230.

IV. NINETEENTH-CENTURY ABORTION RESTRICTIONS SOUGHT TO PROMOTE OBJECTIVES THAT ARE TODAY PLAINLY EITHER INAPPLICABLE OR CONSTITUTIONALLY IMPERMISSIBLE.

Between 1850 and 1880, the newly formed American Medical Association, through some of its vigorously active members, became the "single most important factor in altering the legal policies toward abortion in this country." [32] Nineteenth-century "regular" physicians enlisted state power to limit access to abortion for reasons that are, in retrospect, parochial, and have long since been rejected by organized medicine.[33] The doctors found an audience for their effort to restrict abortion because they appealed to broader concerns: maternal health, consumer protection, a discriminatory idea of the natural subordination of women, nativist fears generated by the fact that elite Protestant women often sought abortions. Some of those seeking these diverse objectives also sought to attribute moral status to the fetus.

A. From 1820-1860, Abortion Regulation in the States Rejected Broader English Restrictions And Sought To Protect Women From Particularly Dangerous Forms Of Abortion.

In 1803, English law made all forms of abortion criminal.[34] Despite this model, for two decades, no American state restricted access to abortion. In 1821, when one state, Connecticut, acted, it prohibited only the administration of a "deadly poison, or other noxious and de-

---

[32] J. Mohr, supra note 3, at 157 (emphasis supplied). See also R. Petchesky, supra note 21, at 79.

[33] See brief amicus curiae of the American Medical Association in the instant case.

[34] The law was passed as part of a comprehensive revision of the criminal code, urged by Lord Ellenborough, broadening the sweep of the criminal law and increasing penalties. J. Mohr, supra note 3, at 23; Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 136-38 (1973).

structive substance."[35] Moreover, the act applied only after quickening, and punished only the person who administered the poison, not the woman who consumed it. In the late 1820s, three other states followed the Connecticut model, prohibiting the use of dangerous poisons after quickening.[36] Most American states did not see abortion as a problem demanding legislative attention.

In 1830, Connecticut became the first state to punish abortion after quickening.[37] In the same year, New York, also animated by a concern for patient safety, considered a law to prohibit any surgery, unless two physicians approved it as essential. Prior to scientific understanding of germ theory and antisepsis, any surgical intervention was likely to be fatal. The act finally adopted applied only to surgical abortion and included the first "therapeutic" exception, approving abortion where two physicians agreed that it was "necessary."[38] As the Court recognized in Roe v. Wade, until the twentieth century, abortion, particularly when done through surgical intervention, remained significantly more dangerous to the woman than childbirth.[39] Because nineteenth-century abortion laws were drafted and justified to protect women, they did not punish women as parties to an abortion.[40]

---

[35] The Public Statute Laws of the State of Connecticut 152-53 (1821). See J. Mohr, supra note 3, at 22. See also Quay, Justifiable Abortion—Medical and Legal Foundations, 49 Georgetown L. Rev. 395 (1960-61).

[36] Missouri adopted such a statute in 1825, Illinois in 1827, and New York in 1828. See J. Mohr, supra note 3, at 25-27.

[37] Conn. Stat. Tit. 22, § 14 at 152 (1821), reported by Quay, supra note 35, at 453.

[38] See N.Y. Rev. Stat., pt. IV, Ch. I, tit. VI § 21, at 578 (1828-1835), reported by Quay, supra note 35, at 499.

[39] See Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. at 148-50; Means, supra note 9, at 353-54, 358-59, 382-96.

[40] Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. at 151-52; M. Grossberg, supra note 14, at 163-64.

None of these early laws, restricting forms of abortion thought to be particularly unsafe, were enforced.[41] That absence itself speaks powerfully, particularly since abortion was prevalent. Despite legislative action and medical opposition, common, openly tolerated practice suggests that many Americans did not perceive abortion as morally wrong.[42]

B. From The Mid-Nineteenth Century, A Central Purpose Of Abortion Regulation Was To Define Who Should Be Allowed To Control Medical Practice.

Without exception, physicians were the principal nineteenth-century proponents of laws to restrict abortion. A core purpose of the nineteenth-century laws, and of doctors in supporting them, was to "control medical practice in the interest of public safety."[43] This is not to deny that some doctors had moral objections to abortion, as well as moral and social views about women and race. But the most significant explanation for the drive by medical doctors for statutes regulating abortion is the fact that these doctors were undergoing the historical process of professionalization.

Medicine was not then the organized, highly regulated profession we know today. It was an occupation in which conventional and scientifically authoritative modes of practice still contended for stature and authority with more popular modes, such as botanic medicine, homeopathy, herbalists, midwives and abortionists. Allopathic physicians sought to establish and consolidate professional sovereignty.[44] This struggle was not easy, nor

---

[41] J. Mohr, supra note 3, at 37.

[42] C. Degler, supra note 19, at 233-34, cites physicians who observe that women who are "otherwise quite intelligent and refined, with a keen sense of their moral and religious obligations to themselves and to others, deem it nothing amiss to destroy the embryo during the first few months of its growth."

[43] J. Mohr, supra note 3, at 31-32.

[44] See P. Starr, The Social Transformation of American Medicine: The Rise of a Sovereign Profession and the Making of a Vast Industry (1982).

was its outcome certain. The professionalizing spirit, illustrated by pressures to require licensure for doctors, was contrary to the egalitarian spirit of public life in Jacksonian America.[45] It was only by mid-century, with the founding of the American Medical Association, that professional sovereignty was tentatively established for "scientific" medicine.[46]

Most nineteenth-century Americans did not seek the help of physicians in dealing with pregnancy, abortion and childbirth.[47] Childbirth remained an affair of family, friends, and midwives until well into the nineteenth century.[48] The process by which childbirth became asso-

[45] From the 1820s through the 1840s, the prevailing political ideology in the United States was strongly opposed to all forms of monopoly or elitism. Thus, exclusive political clubs or economic associations were regarded with suspicion. See Antebellum American Culture 187-95 (D. Davis ed. 1977).

[46] See generally P. Starr, supra note 44; W. Rothstein, American Physicians in the Nineteenth Century: From Sects to Science (1972). The phenomenon of professionalization in American culture has been much studied. See, e.g., T. Haskell, The Emergence of Professional Social Science: The American Social Science Association and the Nineteenth-Century Crisis of Authority (1977); G. Geison, ed., Professions and Professional Ideologies in America (1983); Bender, "The Erosion of Public Culture: Cities, Discourses, and Professional Disciplines," in The Authority of Experts: Studies in History and Theory 84-106 (T. Haskell ed. 1984); and B. Bledstein, The Culture of Professionalism: The Middle Class and the Development of Higher Education in America (1976). Although some historians celebrate the effects of professionalization on our culture and others criticize them, all agree on two basic propositions: the professionalizing impulse is a response to needs pereceived by practioners regarding the establishment and maintenance of legitimate social authority, and the professionalizing of numerous disciplines has resulted in a less public and less egalitarian nature of those disciplines. The development of the medical profession in America is a vivid example of these larger developments.

[47] No group of physicians was more insecure than those specializing in problems of women's reproductive health. C. Smith-Rosenberg, supra note 7, at 231.

[48] See J. Leavitt, Brought to Bed: Child-Bearing in America, 1750-1950 (1986); R. Wertz & D. Wertz, Lying-In: A History of Childbirth in America (1977); B. Ehrenreich & D. English, For Her Own Good: 150 Years of the Experts' Advice to Women (1979).

ciated with doctors and hospitals, and with a heightened degree of medical intervention, is a well-documented example of the medical profession's gradual consolidation of authority. This development was not necessarily coercive or conspiratorial. Women were eager for services and knowledge that might lessen the risks and pain of childbirth. But the physician's effort to move childbirth to the hospital involved more than clinical considerations. Similarly, the deep involvement of doctors in the early abortion statutes was intimately connected with professional struggles between proponents of "scientific medicine" and those who practiced less conventional modes of healing.

As we have seen, the first anti-abortion laws were "anti-poisoning" statutes rather than sweeping prohibitions on all abortions. Because certain abortifacients derived from herbs and purgatives could be fatal if taken in overly large quantities, it became a crime to "administer" such remedies.[49] These laws did not express an abhorrence of abortion any more than current laws banning the unauthorized practice of law represent an abhorrence of legal representation. Rather, they served the dual function of protecting the public and solidifying the bounds of professional authority.

More significant, the nineteenth century movement to regulate abortions was one chapter in a campaign by doctors that reflected a professional conflict between "regulars" (those who ultimately became the practitioners and proponents of scientific medicine) and "irregulars." As James Mohr explains:

> Practically, the regular physicians saw in abortion a medical procedure that not only gave the competition an edge but also undermined the solidarity of their own regular ranks. If a regular doctor refused to perform an abortion he knew the woman could go to one of several types of irregulars and probably receive one. . . . As more and more irregulars began to advertise abortion services openly, especially after 1840, regular physicians grew more and more nervous about losing their practices to healers who would provide a service that more and more American women after 1840 began to want. Yet, if a regular gave in to the temptation to perform an occasional discreet abortion, and physicians testified repeatedly that this frequently happened among the regulars, he would be compromising his own commitment to an American medical practice that would conform to Hippocratic standards of behavior. The best way out of these dilemmas was to persuade state legislators to make abortion a criminal offense. Anti-abortion laws would weaken the appeal of the competition and take the pressure off the more marginal members of the regulars' own sect.[50]

[49] J. Mohr, supra note 3, at 21-22.

To be sure, some "regulars" were morally troubled by abortion, and not all "irregulars" were willing to perform them. A variety of reasons explain why "regular physicians became interested in abortion policy from an early date and repeatedly dragged it into their prolonged struggle to control the practice of medicine in the United States." [51] In the larger context, however, public consideration of abortion in antebellum America was more an issue of medical authority and professional sovereignty than of any particular social or moral attitude toward abortion. Without such an explanation centering on professional imperatives, it is difficult to account for the fact that the American Medical Association and its members became primary proponents of twentieth-century statutes legalizing abortion. See Section V, infra.

---

[50] Id. at 37 (citation omitted, emphasis added).

[51] Id.

C. Enforcement Of Sharply Differentiated Concepts Of The Roles And Choices Of Men And Women Underlay Regulation Of Abortion And Contraception In The Nineteenth Century.

The American Medical Association's campaign to restrict access to abortion succeeded for many reasons. Concerns over the dangers of surgical abortion to women were well founded. Further, physicians persuaded male political leaders that "abortion constituted a threat to social order and to male authority." [52] Since the 1840s, a growing movement for women's suffrage and equality had generated popular fears that women were departing from their purely maternal role.[53] These fears were fueled by the fact that family size declined sharply in the nineteenth century.[54]

In 1871, the American Medical Association's Committee on Criminal Abortion described the woman who sought an abortion:

> She becomes unmindful of the course marked out for her by Providence, she overlooks the duties imposed on her by the marriage contract. She yields to the pleasures—but shrinks from the pains and responsibilities of maternity; and, destitute of all delicacy and refinements, resigns herself, body and soul, into the hands of unscrupulous and wicked men. Let not

---

[52] C. Smith-Rosenberg, supra note 7, at 235.

[53] The moral fervor of the abolitionist cause drew Northern women more deeply into public life than ever before in our history. See E. Flexner, Century of Struggle: The Woman's Rights Movement in the United States, Ch. 13 (rev. ed. 1975). Some of the women who were active in the anti-slavery movement perceived parallels between the subjugation and disenfranchisement of black people and the oppression of women. In 1848, the first Women's Rights Convention, held in Seneca Falls, New York, issued a proclamation that closely tracked the original Declaration of Independence. Stanton, "Declaration of Sentiments 1848," reprinted in L. Kerber & J. Mathers, Women's America: Refocusing the Past 431-33 (1982).

[54] M. Ryan, Cradle of the Middle Class: The Family in Oneida County, New York, 1790-1865 155-57 (1983).

> the husband of such a wife flatter himself that he possesses her affection. Nor can she in turn ever merit even the respect of a virtuous husband. She sinks into old age like a withered tree, stripped of its foliage; with the stain of blood upon her soul, she dies without the hand of affection to smooth her pillow.[55]

The nineteenth-century American Medical Association's view of women is strikingly similar to that adopted by this Court in 1872, when women were denied the right to practice law because "divine ordinance," and "the nature of things," prescribed a "family institution [that] is repugnant to the idea of a woman adopting a distinct and independent career from that of her husband."[56] This Court has, of course, now come to see this view as part of our "long and unfortunate history of sex discrimination," and as constitutionally illegitimate.[57]

The women's movement of the nineteenth century affirmed that women should always have the right to decide whether to bear a child and sought to enhance women's control of reproduction through "voluntary motherhood," ideally to be achieved through periodic abstinence.[58] Anxieties about changing family functions and gender

---

[55] Atlee & O'Donnell, Report of the Committee on Criminal Abortion, 22 Transactions of the American Medical Association 241 (1871), quoted in C. Smith-Rosenberg, supra note 7, at 236-37. Smith-Rosenberg observes that, although middle-class husbands were undoubtedly active participants in their wives' decisions about abortion, the nineteenth-century "AMA linked doctor and husband as the equally wronged and innocent parties. The aborting wife, in contrast, was unnaturally selfish and ruthless." Id. at 236.

[56] Bradwell v. Illinois, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 130, 141 (1872) (Bradley, J., concurring).

[57] Frontiero v. Richardson, 411 U.S. 677, 684 (1973).

[58] See L. Gordon, supra note 28, at 109. During this period, much scientific and folk wisdom held a flatly inaccurate view of the cycle of female fertility. Id. at 101. This inaccurate belief, combined with hard data on declining birthrates, see notes 21-23 supra, underscore how common abortion must have been.

roles were critical factors motivating the all-male legislatures that adopted restrictions on abortion.[59]

In contrast to the feminist demand for control of reproduction, the federal government, in 1873, took the lead in banning access to information about both contraception and abortion. The Comstock law[60] restricted not only medical information on abortion and contraception, such as a medical text on physiology written by an eminent Harvard scientist, but also literary depictions, such as Leo Tolstoy's disapproving tale of infidelity, The Kreutzer Sonata, as well as moral literature, including a pamphlet urging total chastity.[61] An 1876 federal court decision rejected a claim that physicians should have the right to distribute contraceptive information.[62]

In the nineteenth century, opposition to abortion and contraception were closely linked, just as political and doctrinal support for this Court's decisions in Griswold v. Connecticut and Roe v. Wade are linked in this century. Michael Grossberg observes that "Anthony Comstock had labeled as abortionists everyone who advocated or dealt in family-limitation materials and services."[63]

---

[59] C. Smith-Rosenberg, supra note 7, at 218.

[60] The act prohibits mailing, transporting or importing "obscene, lewd or lascivious" items, specifically including all devices and information pertaining to "preventing conception and producing abortion." See Comstock Act, Ch. 258, § 1, 17 Stat. 598 (1873). It was not until 1971 that an amendment was passed deleting the prohibition as to contraception. Pub. L. 91-662, 84 Stat. 1973 (1971). The ban as to information about abortion remains. See 18 U.S.C. § 1461 (1988) (current version of Act).

[61] See M. Grossberg, supra note 14, at 190.

[62] United States v. Foote, 25 Fed. Cas. 1140, 1141 (S.D.N.Y. 1876), discussed in M. Grossberg, supra note 14, at 191. Edward Bliss Foote, the defendant, was an advocate of free-thought, civil liberties, women's rights and birth control. After his arrest, Foote wrote, "It is my conscientious conviction that every married woman should have it within her power to decide for herself just when and just how often she will receive the germ of a new offspring." See id.; L. Gordon, supra note 28, at 168.

[63] M. Grossberg, supra note 14, at 193.

The core purposes of the Comstock Act were to enforce chastity on the young and unmarried and to preserve the subservient position of women within a "traditional" family structure. Nineteenth-century restrictions on abortion and contraception can only sensibly be understood as a reaction to the uncertainties generated by large shifts in family functions and anxieties generated by women's challenges to their historic roles of silence and subservience.

D. Nineteenth-Century Contraception And Abortion Regulation Also Reflected Ethnocentric Fears About The Relative Birthrates Of Immigrants And Yankee Protestants.

Nativism, notably anti-Catholicism, had been part of American politics and culture as early as the Jacksonian period.[64] The Civil War and Reconstruction Era dramatically raised consciousness about national identity and citizenship. Social conservatives in the 1850s articulated an "organicist" ideal in which social unity would predominate over diversity.[65] By the 1870s social thought was turning the insights of Charles Darwin toward racist ends.[66] The political ideology of "free labor," forged in the nascent Republican Party in the years preceding the Civil War,[67] was severely challenged by an influx of foreign labor in the latter part of the nineteenth century. The discriminatory immigration policies and nativist fears of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries had their roots in a far earlier period, when [64] D. Davis, From Homicide to Slavery: Studies in American Culture 137-54 (1986); S. Lipset & E. Raab, The Politics of Unreason: Right-Wing Extremism in America, 1790-1970 (1970).

[65] See G. Frederickson, The Inner Civil War: Northern Intellectuals and the Crisis of the Union (1965).

[66] See R. Hofstadter, Social Darwinism in American Thought (1955).

[67] E. Foner, Free Soil, Free Labor, Free Men: The Ideology of the Republican Party Before the Civil War (1970).

Americans first became concerned about the creation of an urban population of wage workers.[68]

Beginning in the 1890s, and continuing through the first decades of the twentieth century, these nativist fears coalesced into a drive against what was then called "race suicide."[69] The "race suicide" alarmists worried that women of "good stock"—prosperous, white, and Protestant—were not having enough children to maintain the political and social supremacy of their group.[70] Anxiety over the falling birth rates of Protestant whites in comparison with other groups helped shape policy governing both birth control and abortion.[71] As James Mohr points out, "The doctors both used and were influenced by blatant nativism. . . . There can be little doubt that Protestants' fears about not keeping up with the reproductive rates of Catholic immigrants played a greater role in the drive for anti-abortion laws in nineteenth-century America than Catholic opposition to abortion did."[72]

[68] The classic work on this issue is J. Higham, Strangers in the Land: Patterns of American Nativism 1860-1925 (1988).

[69] See L. Gordon, supra note 28, at 136-58.

[70] See C. Degler, supra note 19, at 229-30, on the concern of physicians that women of "good stock" were particularly likely to obtain abortions. In Buffalo in 1855, the fertility ratio of Irish women of ages 30-34 was over twice that of native white women. Id. at 134.

[71] J. Reed, From Private Vice to Public Virtue: The Birth Control Movement and American Society Since 1830 (1978); D. Kevles, In the Name of Eugenics: Genetics and the Uses of Human Heredity (1985); D. Kennedy, Birth Control in America: The Career of Margaret Sanger (1971).

[72] See J. Mohr, supra note 3, at 167. Horatio Robinson Storer, who spearheaded the American Medical Association's mid-nineteenth century anti-abortion campaign, frequently referred to racial themes. See id. at 180-90. One doctor lamented in 1874 that, owing to the prevalence of abortion among Protestant women, "the Puritanic blood of '76 will be but sparingly represented in the approaching centenary." Id. at 167. Carl Degler also documents that physicians of the 1850s and 1860s expressed particular concern

V. ENFORCEMENT OF ABORTION RESTRICTIONS IN THE FIRST HALF OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY FOLLOWED HISTORIC ETHNIC AND CLASS DIFFERENTIATIONS, AFFIRMED HISTORIC CONCERNS ABOUT ENFORCING GENDER ROLES, AND IMPOSED ENORMOUS COSTS UPON WOMEN, THEIR FAMILIES AND PHYSICIANS.

Statutory restrictions on abortion remained virtually unchanged until the 1960s. Physicians were allowed to perform abortions only "to preserve the mother's life." Nonetheless, the incidence of abortion remained high, ranging from one pregnancy in seven at the turn of the century, to one in three in 1936.[73] Most abortions were performed illegally.[74] Legal restrictions did not stop abortion, but made it furtive, humiliating, and dangerous.[75]

In the first half of the twentieth century, a two-tiered abortion system emerged in which services depended on the class, race, age and residence of the woman. Poor and rural women obtained illegal abortions, performed by people, physicians and others, who were willing to defy the law out of sympathy for the woman or for the fee. More privileged women steadily pressed physicians for legal abortions and many obtained them. Some doctors could be persuaded that deliveries would endanger women's health; the dilation and curetage procedure was indicated for numerous other gynecological health problems.

---

that abortion was increasingly sought by married women of "high repute." C. Degler, supra note 19, at 229.

[73] See F. Taussig, Abortion, Spontaneous and Induced: Medical and Social Aspects 338, and Appendix A, 453-75 (1936). See also Stix, A Study of Pregnancy Wastage, 13 Milbank Memorial Fund Q. 347 (1935); Stix & Wiehl, Abortion and Public Health, 28 Am. J. Pub. Health 622, Table I (1938).

[74] See K. Luker, Abortion and the Politics of Motherhood 48-54 (1984).

[75] See brief amicus curiae of the National Abortion Rights Action League in the instant case.

Shifts in the definition of "therapeutic" abortion responded to larger social forces.[76] Early in the century, "race suicide" fears fueled efforts to suppress both abortion and birth control.[77] During the Depression, abortions increased as the medical profession recognized impoverishment as an indication for therapeutic abortion.[78] In the 1940s and 1950s the definition of therapeutic abortion expanded to include psychiatric indications.[79] Physicians were caught in a double bind: abortion was criminal, but the reasons women sought them were so multiple and compelling that they were difficult to resist.

In the 1950s, more restrictive attitudes toward both legal and illegal abortions[80] were part of a conservative response to growing female labor-force participation and independence.[81] The 1960s movement to legalize abortion arose in response to this, rather brief, wave of anti-abor-

---

[76] L. Reagan, When is Abortion Necessary to Save a Woman's Life?: The Political Dimension of Therapeutic Abortion During the Period of Criminalized Abortion in the United States, 1880-1973 (unpublished paper, Univ. of Wisconsin, Madison, June 20, 1987).

[77] On November 20, 1912, 390 federal postal inspectors arrested 173 people for using the mails to disseminate information about abortion and contraception in violation of the Comstock Act. The campaign was called the "federal war on race suicide." "Take Chicagoans in Federal War on Race Suicide," Chicago Tribune, Nov. 21, 1912, p. 1.

[78] In 1931 an American Medical Association editorial noted that "poverty . . . does not constitute an indication for abortion, [but] there is no doubt that in the United States many abortions are performed for borderline cases in which there is a strong ethical indication plus a more or less minor medical ailment." Abortion or Removal of Pregnant Uterus, 95 J. Am. Med. Ass'n 1169 (1931).

[79] K. Luker, supra note 74, at 45-47, 54-57.

[80] L. Lader, Abortion 42-51 (1966).

[81] M. Ryan, Womanhood in America: From Colonial Times to the Present 198-215 (1975); America's Working Women: A Documentary History—1600 to the Present 299-308 (R. Baxandall, L. Gordon & S. Reverly eds. 1976).

tion enforcement. Physicians, particularly those who worked in public hospitals and clinics, saw women who needlessly suffered and died as a consequence of illegal abortions.[82] Others were disturbed that most of those women were poor and black.[83] Many were distressed by the class bias inherent in the psychiatric indications for therapeutic abortions.[84] In the late 1960s, concerned physicians were joined by women who had come to understand that control of reproductive capacity is the sine qua non of women's self-governance and moral personhood.[85]

As a number of states acted to legalize abortion, additional concerns heightened pressure for recognition of constitutional protection for the basic right of abortion choice. Debate over abortion, now revolving around insoluble metaphysical disputes about the moral status of the fetus, preoccupied state legislatures and often prevented them from addressing other vital issues.[86] Class and regional differentiations were accentuated as it became possible for women with resources to travel to states where abortion was legal. In Roe v. Wade, this Court responded to all of these forces in holding that constitutional rights of liberty and privacy protect the right of the woman and her physician to choose abortion.

---

[82] See brief amicus curiae of the American Public Health Association and brief amicus curiae of the Attorneys General in Support of Appellees.

[83] See brief amicus curiae of Organizations of Women of Color.

[84] See McRae v. Califano, 491 F. Supp. 630, 668-76 (E.D.N.Y. 1980).

[85] K. Luker, supra note 74, at 92-125.

[86] See J. Mohr, Iowa's Abortion Battles of the Late 1960s and Early 1970s, forthcoming in 1989 from the Center for the Study of the Recent History of the United States, Iowa City, Iowa; K. Luker, supra note 74, at 66-91.

VI. THE MORAL VALUE ATTACHED TO THE FETUS BECAME A CENTRAL ISSUE IN AMERICAN CULTURE AND LAW ONLY IN THE LATE TWENTIETH CENTURY, WHEN TRADITIONAL JUSTIFICATIONS FOR RESTRICTING ACCESS TO ABORTION BECAME CULTURALLY ANACHRONISTIC OR CONSTITUTIONALLY IMPERMISSIBLE.

Some of those seeking to enlist the power of the state to deny women's liberty to choose abortion have long articulated a concern for the fetus.[87] Yet until the late twentieth century, this concern was always subsidiary to more mundane social visions and anxieties. The mid-nineteenth century physicians' campaign sought to prohibit the practice of botanic medicine and chiropractic, as well as abortion. Protection of fetal life is plainly not the driving concern of such a movement. Those who opposed abortion and birth control to stanch "race suicide," sought to protect the privilege of elite white Anglo-Saxon Protestants, not to protect fetuses.

Religious support for the physicians' campaign to bar abortion was practically non-existent.[88] Physicians vigorously sought to enlist moral authority and organized

---

[87] See J. Mohr, supra note 3, at 165-66.

[88] The extensive religious press of the United States, both Catholic and Protestant, "maintained a total blackout on the issue of abortion from the beginning of the nineteenth century through the end of the Civil War." J. Mohr, supra note 3, at 183. It was not until 1869 that a papal declaration condemned abortion as a violation of the fetus prior to "ensoulment," held to be 40 days gestational age for a male fetus and 80 days for a female. Before that time, Catholic theology condemned early abortion on precisely the same terms as it had condemned masturbation and contraception, i.e. a distrust of sexuality and an interference with natural processes. In Catholic doctrine late abortions were always held to be a form of homicide. No American diocesan newspaper reported the Pope's 1869 statement. Id. at 187. In that same year, the Bishop of Baltimore issued the only formal nineteenth-century Catholic condemnation of abortion in America, id. at 186, and the Old School Presbyterians became the only major Protestant denomination to condemn abortion. Id. at 192. No other religious denominations or leaders followed.

religion in their campaign to restrict abortion, and "were openly disgusted when the established voices of moral authority refused to speak on their behalf. . . . Medical journals accused the religious journals of valuing abortifacient advertising revenue too highly to risk criticizing the practice." [89]

Further, the small support that physicians found among Protestant religious leaders appeared to be "more worried about falling birth-rates among their adherents than about the morality of abortion itself." [90] The conspicuous absence of religious support for the physicians' anti-abortion crusade is particularly striking compared to extensive religious involvement in other nineteenth-century movements for changing social morality, such as temperance.[91]

Nineteenth-century laws restricting access to abortion were not based on a belief that the fetus is a human being. To the contrary, New Jersey Chief Justice Green expressed the prevailing judicial opinion in 1849 when he asserted that although it was "true, for certain purposes, [that] the law regards an infant as in being from the time of conception, yet it seems nowhere to regard it as in life, or to have respect to its preservation as a living being." [92] Michael Grossberg summarizes the nineteenth-century cases, saying, "[A] fetus enjoyed rights only in property law and then only if successfully born. It had no standing in criminal law until quickening, and none at all in tort. The law highly prized children, not fetuses." [93]

Judith Walzer Leavitt's analysis of medical decisions about the procedure of craniotomy (a surgical mutila-

[89] J. Mohr, supra note 3, at 184.

[90] Id. at 195.

[91] Id. at 182-96.

[92] Cooper v. State, 22 N.J. L. (2 Zab.) 52, 56-57 (1849) (emphasis in the original), discussed in M. Grossberg, supra note 14, at 165.

[93] M. Grossberg, supra note 14, at 165.

tion of the live fetal head to permit vaginal extraction) provides one complex window on the moral status of the fetus, during the period from 1880 to 1920. At this time, most women gave birth at home. When a woman's pelvis was too small to permit delivery, two alternatives were possible.[94] A Caesarean section would ordinarily save the fetus, but posed high risks to the woman's life. A craniotomy killed the fully formed fetus, but with significantly less risk to the woman.

Most physicians thought craniotomy, which could save the life of the woman, the more appropriate choice in this difficult situation.[95] Others based their assessment on their judgment of the social and moral worth of the woman.[96] But the core issue for physicians was the principle that "the obstetrician alone must be the judge of what is to be done." [97] Roman Catholic writers widely condemned craniotomy in popular medical journals, informing obstetricians in 1917 that it was "[b]etter that a million mothers die than that one innocent creature be [94] In some cases, physicians could attempt to avoid this dilemma by stretching or breaking the woman's pelvis. See Leavitt, The Growth of Medical Authority: Technology and Morals in Turn-of-the-Century Obstetrics, 1 Med. Anthropology Q. 230, 233-35 (1987).

[95] Craniotomy was, of course, a brutal and distasteful procedure. Nonetheless, one medical leader, speaking to a medical society audience, in 1892 explained:

> I should much prefer Caesarean section in these cases, but I scarcely expect in the near future that a larger number will consent to it. The husband, if told the truth [about the dangers to the woman of cesarean section], will demand craniotomy, and I think moreover that every one of us would do the same under similar circumstances. I know I should, and I feel confident that every gentleman here to-night would too, if his own wife were in question.

T. Barker, When is Emryotomy Justifiable? Proceedings of the Philadelphia County Medical Society 132-39 (1892), quoted in Leavitt, supra note 94, at 240.

[96] Leavitt, supra note 94, at 246.

[97] Id. at 244.

killed." [98] But continued medical practice and dialogue demonstrate that neither patients nor physicians attached such high, absolute value to the fetus, even when it was plainly viable.

As this Court observed in Roe v. Wade, the pattern of American abortion laws does not support the view that they were designed principally to incorporate a view of the fetus as a person. Both the lesser punishment for abortion than for homicide, and the various exceptions allowing the physician to determine that abortion is justified, rebut the assumption that laws against abortion reflect that belief.[99]

Further, increasing "scientific" understanding does not support attributing enhanced moral value to the fetus. That pregnancy is a biologically continuous process has long been recognized by Americans even when the common law recognized a woman's right to choose abortion. For example, a popular home medical book published in 1817 and dedicated to the Wives of the Ministers of the Gospel of the United States, stated: "[T]he contents of the pregnant womb, formed in miniature at conception, are the child, the waters, the membranes holding them, the navel cord, and afterbirth." [100] The book goes on to describe in detail embryonic and fetal development. Historically, claims that startling advances in medical knowledge about pregnancy and fetal development should alter attitudes toward abortion have consistently been highly exaggerated.[101]

---

[98] Id. at 239-40.

[99] See Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 132-50 (1973).

[100] Quoted in K. Luker, supra note 74, at 23.

[101] See K. Luker, supra note 74, at 23-25. Other parties before this Court are better able than historians to address current claims of technical advances. See brief amicus curiae of the American Medical Association, refuting the claim that it is now possible to maintain fetal life outside the womb at ever earlier stages of gestation. See also brief amicus curiae of American Law Professors in Support of Appellees.

One technological development that has spurred the effect to attach moral value to the fetus is the technology that allows the imaging of the fetus in utero. B. Katz Rothman observes that "the fetus in utero has become a metaphor for 'man' in space, floating free, attached only by the umbilical cord to the spaceship. But where is the mother in that metaphor? She has become empty space." B. Rothman, The Tentative Pregnancy: Prenatal Diagnosis and the Future of Motherhood 114 (1986). Rosalind Petchesky observes, "[I]mages by themselves lack 'objective' meanings; meanings come from the interlocking fields of context, communication, application and reception. . . ." Petchesky, Fetal Images: The Power of Visual Culture in the Politics of Reproduction, 13 Feminist Studies 263, 286 (1987).

VII. A PRESUMED INTEREST IN PROTECTING FETAL LIFE DOES NOT JUSTIFY DENYING WOMEN THEIR HISTORIC LIBERTY TO CHOOSE ABORTION.

A culture can, of course, allow growing humanistic impulses to attach greater moral value to fetuses or to potential human life, even if these moral judgments are not triggered by new scientific understanding. But, for two core reasons, this Court should reject state efforts to invoke the protection of fetal life to justify restrictions upon women's access to abortion.

First, as this brief has demonstrated, the complex historic grounds for restricting access to abortion are now either socially irrelevant or recognized as constitutionally illegitimate. Both culturally and legally, it is today impossible to defend abortion restrictions as a means of enforcing an absolutist religious belief, grounded in natural law, that intimate relations must always remain open to the possibility of procreation.[102] Similarly, abortion restrictions cannot be justified by desires to keep women in traditional roles.[103] Likewise, our social consensus, embodied in principles of legal equality, would not permit the Court to defend restrictions on abortion as a means of encouraging the propagation of white Yankee stock or of punishing racial or religious minorities. But any sophisticated understanding of American history and traditions must recognize that such motivations do not disappear simply because they are no longer culturally or constitutionally legitimate. In this context, we must therefore question whether protection of unborn life has become a surrogate for other social objectives that are no longer tolerated.

---

[102] See Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965); Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972).

[103] See Stanton v. Stanton, 421 U.S. 7 (1975); Orr v. Orr, 440 U.S. 268 (1979).

Second, and decisively, this Court must affirm Roe v. Wade, and reject asserted state interests in protecting prenatal life, because the costs of denying constitutional protection to abortion choice are simply too enormous. Our experience from the 1890s until 1973 amply demonstrates that if women are denied access to legal abortions, many will turn in desperation to self-abortion, folk remedies, or illegal practitioners. Many will die. Others will suffer permanent damage to their reproductive capacity. Still others will bear children for whom they cannot provide adequate care. Apart from these devastating consequences to the lives and health of women, restricting access to abortion will again deny the fundamental legitimacy of women as moral decision-makers.

CONCLUSION

The judgment of the Court of Appeals and this Court's decision in Roe v. Wade should be affirmed.

Respectfully submitted,

CLYDE SPILLENGER
JANE E. LARSON
POWELL, GOLDSTEIN, FRAZER & MURPHY
1001 Pennsylvania Ave., N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20004
(202) 347-0066

SYLVIA A. LAW *
40 Washington Sq. So.
New York, N.Y. 10012
(212) 998-6265

* Counsel of Record

APPENDIX

APPENDIX

LIST OF AMICI

Elaine Abelson, Lecturer in History, Princeton University

Ervand Abrahamian, Professor of History, Baruch College

Susan Amussen, Assistant Professor of History, Connecticut College

Bonnie Anderson, Associate Professor, Administrative Deputy, History Department, Brooklyn College

M. Cristine Anderson, Coordinator, Women's Studies, Research and Resources Institute, University of Cincinnati

Toby Appel, Adjunct Associate Professor of History, University of Maryland, Baltimore County; President, Washington Society of the History of Medicine

Rima D. Apple, Assistant Editor, Isis, Journal of the History of Science

Rudolph Bell, Professor of History, Rutgers University

Thomas Bender, Professor of History, New York University

Judith Bennett, Associate Professor of History, University of North Carolina

Robert Berkhofer, Jr., Professor of American History, University of Michigan

Frederick Binder, Professor of History, College of Staten Island

Elizabeth Blackmar, Assistant Professor of History, Columbia University

Janet Bogdan, Assistant Professor of History, Sociology, LeMoyne College

Allan Brandt, Associate Professor of the History of Medicine and Science, Harvard University; Council, American Association for the History of Medicine

Barbara Brenzel, Associate Professor, Department Chair, Wellesley College

Renate Bridenthal, Professor of History, Brooklyn College

Gregory Britton, Lecturer, American Institutions Department, University of Wisconsin

Joshua Brown, Professor, American Social History Program, Graduate Center, City University of New York

Joan Brumberg, Associate Professor of History, Cornell University

Vern Bullough, Professor and Dean, Natural and Social Sciences; Former President, Society for Scientific Study of Sex, State University of New York at Buffalo

Jane Burbank, Professor of Hisitory, University of Michigan

Edwin Burrows, Professor of History, Brooklyn College

Caroline Bynum, Professor of History, Columbia University; MacArthur Fellow

John Cammett, Professor and Chair, History Department, John Jay College

Kathleen Canning, Assistant Professor of European History, University of Michigan

Jack Cargill, Associate Professor of History, Rutgers University

Mark Carnes, Associate Professor of History, Barnard College; Co-Editor, Dictionary of American Biography

JoAnn Carrigan, Professor of History, University of Nebraska at Omaha; Former President, Southern Association for Women Historians

James Cassedy, Historian, National Library of Medicine; Former President, Association for the History of Medi-

Jack Censer, Associate Professor of History, George Mason University

Herrick Chapman, Assistant Professor of History, Carnegie Mellon University

Ellen Chesler, Instructor, Department of History, Barnard College

Eric Christianson, Associate Professor of History, University of Kentucky

Adele E. Clarke, Adjunct Assistant Professor of History, University of California, San Francisco

Jill Claster, Professor of History, New York University

Paul Clemens, Associate Professor and Vice Chair for Graduate Education, Rutgers University

Nina Cobb, Executive Associate, American Council of Learned Societies

Lizabeth Cohen, Assistant Professor of History, Carnegie Mellon University; Member, National Council, American Studies Association

Paul Cohen, Professor of History, Wellesley College; Member, Board of Directors, Association for Asian Studies

Blanche Cook, Professor of History, John Jay College; Member, Committee on History, U.S. Department of State

Frederick Cooper, Professor of History, University of Michigan

Sandi Cooper, Professor of History, College of Staten Island; Former President, Berkshire Conference of Women's Historians; Co-ordinating Committee on Women in the Historical Profession

Dina Copelman, Assistant Professor of History, George Mason University

Joseph Cory, Senior Lecturer in History, Stanford University

Nancy Cott, Professor of History and American Studies, Yale University; Member, National Council, American Studies Association

Margaret Darrow, Associate Professof History, Dartmouth College

George Cullom Davis, Professor of History, Sangamon State University; Former President, Oral History Association

Natalie Zemon Davis, Henry Charles Lea Professor of History, Princeton University; Former President, American Historical Association

Marc Dawson, Assistant Professor of History, Western New England College

Philip Dawson, Professor of History, Brooklyn College

Cornelia Dayton, Assistant Professor of History, University of Californa, Irvine

Carl Degler, Margaret Byrne Professor of History, Stanford University; Former President, American Historical Association. At Odds: Women and the Family in America from the Revolution to the Present (1980).

Victoria de Grazia, Assistant Professor of History, Rutgers University

John Demos, Professor of History, Yale University

Marion Deshmukh, Professor of History, George Mason University

Phyllis Deutsch, Instructor in History, New York University

Jonathan DeWald, Chair and Professor of History, University of Californa, Irvine

Laurence Dickey, Assistant Professor of History, Columbia University

Nicholas Dirks, Professor of History, University of Michigan

Laura Downs, Assistant Professor of History, University of Michigan

Prasenjit Duara, Assistant Professor of History, George Mason University

Richard Dunn, Nichols Professor of American History, University of Pennsylvania; Former Chair, History Department; Director, Philadelphia Center for Early American Studies; Editor, William Penn papers.

Ellen Dwyer, Associate Professor of History, Indiana University; Associate Editor, American Historical Review

Barbara Ehrenreich, Fellow, New York Institute for the Humanities. For Her Own Good: 150 Years of the Experts' Advice to Women (1979)

A. S. Eisenstadt, Professor of History, Brooklyn College

Hester Eisenstein, Visiting Associate Professor, American Studies Department, State University of New York at Buffalo

Geoffrey Eley, Professor of History, University of Michigan

Todd Endelman, Professor of History, University of Michigan

Laura Engelstein, Assistant Professor of History, Princeton University

Sara Evans, Professor of History, University of Minnesota

Leslie Falk, Professor Emeritus, Family & Preventive Medicine, Meharry Medical College; Former Chairman, Community, Family & Occupational Health

Steven Feresman, Professor of History, University of Wisconsin-Madison

Arthur Field, Lecturer, Department of History, Princeton University

John Fine, Professor of History, University of Michigan

Sidney Fine, Professor of American History, University of Michigan

Joyce Follet, Lecturer in History, University of Wisconsin

Thomas Frazier, Professor of History, Baruch College

Estelle Freedman, Associate Professor, Department of History, Stanford University. Intimate Matters: A History of Sexuality in America (1988)

Joshua Freeman, Assistant Professor of History, Columbia University

Sheldon Garon, Associate Professor of History, Princeton University

G.R. Garthwaite, Professor of History, Dartmouth College; Board, Middle East Studies Association

Gerald Geison, Professor of History and History of Science, Princeton University

Timothy Gilfoyle, Visiting Assistant Professor of History, Barnard College; Assistant Professor of History, Loyola University of Chicago

Judith Ginsburg, Associate Professor of Classics, Cornell University; Former Chair, American Philological Association Committee on the Status of Women and Minorities

Carol Gluck, George Sansom Professor of History, Columbia University

Janet Golden, Visiting Assistant Professor of History, Temple University

Leonard Gordan, Professor of History, Brooklyn College

Linda Gordon, Professor of History, University of Wisconsin. Woman's Body, Woman's Right: A Social History of Birth Control in America (1976)

Monica Green, Assistant Professor of History, Duke University

Thomas Green, Professor of History and Law, University of Michigan; Vice President, American Society for Legal History; Editor, Studies in Legal History

Douglas Greenberg, Vice President, American Council of Learned Societies

Michael Greenberg, Associate Professor of History. College of Staten Island; Chair, Program Committee, Organization of American Historians

Ronald Grele, Director, Oral History Research Office, Columbia University; President, Oral History Association

Gerald Grob, Professor of History, Rutgers University; Former Co-Chair, Program Committee, Organization of American Historians; Editorial Boards: Bulletin of the History of Medicine, Journal of the History of Medicine, Business History Review; Council, American Association of History of Medicine; Institute for Health Care Policy

Michael Grossberg, Associate Professor of History and Law, Case Western University. Governing The Hearth (1985)

Atina Grossmann, Assistant Professor of History, Columbia University

Joan Gundersen, Professor of History, St. Olaf College, President, Women Historians of Mid-West

Melanie Gustafson, Coordinator, Women's History Program, Sarah Lawrence College; Committee of Women Historians, American Historical Association

Marilyn Halter, Assistant Professor of History, Wellesley College

Michael Hanagan, Associate Professor of History, Columbia University

Sarah Hanley, Professor of History and Dean for Faculty, University of Iowa; Chair, Women's Studies Program; Assistant Chair, History Department

Bert Hansen, Adjunct Assistant Professor of History, New York University

Barbara Harris, Professor of History, University of North Carolina

Hendrik Hartog, Professor of Law and History, University of Wisconsin; Member, Board of Directors, American Society for Legal History, Law and Society Association

Dorothy Helly, Professor of History, Hunter College; Co-chair Program Committee, Fourth International Interdisciplinary Congress on Women; Former Co-chair Program Committee Seventh Berkshire Conference on the History of Women

Jurgen Herbst, Professor of Educational Policy Studies and History, University of Wisconsin-Madison; Former President, History of Education; Current Chair, International Standing Conference for the History of Education

Cynthia Herrup, Associate Professor of History, Duke University

Carla Hesse, Assistant Professor of History, Rutgers University

Darlene Hine, John A. Hannah Professor of History, Michigan State University; Former Vice President Association for the Study of Afro-American Life and History

Joan Hoff-Wilson, Professor of History, Indiana University; Executive Secretary, Organization of American Historians

David Hollinger, Professor of American History, University of Michigan

Emily Honig, Assistant Professor of History and Women's Studies, Yale University

Helen Lefkowitz Horowitz, Professor of History, Smith College

Martha Howell, Associate Professor of History, Rutgers University; Chair, AHA Committee on Quant History; Editor, Radical History Review and Feminist Review

Karl Hufbauer, Associate Professor of History, University of California, Irvine; Member of the Council of the West Coast History of Science Society; Former President, West Coast Society

Isabel Hull, Associate Professor of History, Cornell University

Lynn Hunt, Professor of History, University of Pennsylvania

Harold M. Hyman, William P. Hobby Professor of American Constitutional and Legal History, Rice University; Member, Boards of Organization of American Historians and American Historical Association

Jonathan Jacobson, Associate Professor of History, University of California, Irvine

Robin Jacoby, Lecturer, American Women's History, University of Michigan

Penelope Johnson, Associate Professor of History, New York University

Tony Judt, Professor of History, New York University

Carl Kaestle, Professor of History, University of Wisconsin-Madison

Natalie Kampen, Professor Women's Studies (Chair), Barnard College, Columbia University

Marion Kaplan, Associate Professor of History, Queens College

Temma Kaplan, Director, The Barnard Center for Research on Women; Former Co-Chair Program Committee American Historical Association, Co-Founder Association of Spanish and Portuguese Historical Studies, Herbert Baxter Adams Prize Comm. of American Historical Association

Carol Karlsen, Professor of American/Women's History, University of Michigan

Ruth Karras, Assistant Professor of History, University of Pennsylvania

Stanley Katz, President, American Council of Learned Societies; Senior Fellow of the Woodrow Wilson School of Princeton, Former President of the Organization of American Historians and the American Society for Legal History

Frances Richardson Keller, Professor of History, San Francisco State University

Mary Kelley, Professor of History, Dartsmouth College; Former Chair, Women's Committee, American Studies Association; National Council, ASA; Executive Committee, ASA; Editorial Board, Journal of American History; Editorial Board, American Quarterly

Linda Kerber, May Brodbeck Professor in the Liberal Arts and Professor of History, University of Iowa; Former President, American Studies Association; Executive Board, Organization of American Historians

Alice Kessler-Harris, Professor of History, Temple University; Chair, Committee of Women Historians, American Historial Association

Rachel Klein, Associate Professor of History, University of California, San Diego

Claudia Koonz, Associate Professor of History, Duke University

Alan Charles Kors, Associate Professor of History, University of Pennsylvania

Alan Kraut, Professor of History, American University; Treasurer, Immigration History Society; Former book editor, Social Science History

Richard Kremer, Assistant Professor of History, Dartmouth College

Catherine Kudlick, Visiting Associate Professor of History, Barnard College

Thomas Laqueur, Professor of History, University of California, Berkeley

T.J. Jackson Lears, Professor of History, Rutgers University

Judith Leavitt, Professor of the History of Medicine, University of Wisconsin. Brought to Bed: Child-Bearing in America, 1750-1950 (1986)

Susanne Lebsock, Professor of History, Rutgers University; Former Member, American Historical Association Committee on Women Historians; American Historical Association Nominating Committee; Organization of American Historians Committee on the Status of Women; Winner of the Bancroft Prize, 1985

Susan Lederer, Assistant Professor, Penn State University College of Medicine; Department of Humanities, Hershey Medical Center

Lynn Lees, Professor of History, University of Pennsylvania

Gerda Lerner, Robinson-Edwards Professor of History and Senior Distinguished Research Professor, University of Wisconsin-Madison; Former President, Organization of American Historians

Jeffrey Lerner, Lecturer in History, University of Wisconsin

Darline Levy, Associate Professor of History, New York University

Charlton Lewis, Professor and Chair, History Department, Brooklyn College

Victor Lieberman, Professor of History, University of Michigan

Alison Lingo, Research Associate in History, University of California, Berkeley

Cynthia Little, Director of Education and Public Programs, Historical Society of Pennsylvania

Leon Litwack, Professor of History, University of California, Berkeley; former President of the Organization of American Historians

Kenneth Lockridge, Professor of American History, University of Michigan

Diana Long, Director, Francis C. Wood Institute for the History of Medicine, College of Physicians of Philadelphia; Committee on the Independent Scholars, History of Science Society, AAAS

David Ludden, Associate Professor of History, University of Pennsylvania

Kristin Luker, Professor of Sociology, Boalt Hall School of Law and Department of Sociology, University of California, Berkeley. Abortion and the Politics of Motherhood (1984).

Michael MacDonald, Professor of History, University of Michigan

Nancy McLean, Assistant Professor of History, Northwestern University

Florencia Mallon, Professor of History, University of Wisconsin-Madison

Lynn Mally, Assistant Professor of History, University of California, Irvine

Sherrin Marshall, Associate Professor of History and Associate Dean for Academic Affairs, Plymouth State College

Donald Mathews, Professor of History, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

Paul Mattingly, Professor of History, New York University

Elaine Tyler May, Associate Professor of History, University of Minnesota

Carol Mazor, Professor of History, University of Pennsylvania

Terry McDonald, Professor of American History, University of Michigan

Sally McMillen, Associate Professor of History, Davidson University

JoAnn McNamara, Professor of History, Hunter College

William McNeil, Associate Professor and Acting Department Chair, Barnard College, Columbia University

Barbara Melosh, Associate Professor of English and American Studies, George Mason University; American Historical Association, Committee on Women Historians

Michael Meranse, Professor of History, Institute of Early American History and Culture, Williamsburg, Virginia

Jeffrey Merrick, Assistant Professor of History, Barnard College, Columbia University

Walter Metzger, Professor of History, Columbia University

Robert Moeller, Associate Professor of History, University of California, Irvine: Member, Committee of Women Historians, American Historical Association

Susan Moeller, Lecturer in History, Princeton University

James Mohr, Professor of History, University of Maryland. Abortion in America: The Origins and Evolution of National Policy (1978)

W. Scott Morton, Professor of History, Emeritus

Claire Moses, Associate Professor of History, University of Maryland; President, Conference Group on Women's History

Susan Naquin, Professor of History, University of Pennsylvania

David Noble, Professor of History, American Studies, University of Minnesota

Mary Nolan, Associate Professor of History, New York University

Philip Nord, Associate Professor of History, Princeton University

Mary Beth Norton, Mary Donlon Algar Professor of American History, Cornell University

Ronald Numbers, Professor of the History of Medicine, University of Wisconsin; Editor, Isis

Patricia O'Brian, Associate Professor of History, University of California, Irvine

Mary Odem, Assistant Professor of History, Emory University

Michael O'Malley, Assistant Professor of History, New York University

Spencer Olin, Professor of History, University of California, Irvine

Peter Onuf, Professor of History, South Methodist University

Annelise Orleck, Instructor in History, New York University

Katherine Park, Associate Professor of History, Wellesley College

K. David Patterson, Professor of History, University of North Carolina at Charlotte

Bradford Perkins, Professor of American History, University of Michigan

Martin Pernick, Professor of History, University of Michigan

Mary Elizabeth Perry, Research Associate, University of California at Los Angeles, Center for Medieval and Renaissance Studies; President-elect, Western Association of Women Historians

Rosalind Petchesky, Professor of Political Science and Director of Women's Studies, Hunter College of the City University of New York. Abortion and Woman's Choice (1984)

Kenneth Pomeranz, Assistant Professor of History, University of California, Irvine

Kathryn Preyer, Professor of History, Wellesley College

William Provine, Professor of History of Biology, Cornell University

Amira Prowller, University of Wisconsin-Madison

Thomas Quierstead, Assistant Professor of History, University of California, Irvine

David L. Ransel, Professor of History, Indiana University; Editor, American Historical Review

Leslie Reagan, Post-doctoral Fellow, University of Wisconsin; American Bar Foundation

Jack E. Reece, Associate Professor of History, University of Pennsylvania

James Reed, Dean of Rutgers College and Professor of History, Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey

David Reimers, Professor of History, New York University

Susan Reverby, Associate Professor of History and Director, Women's Studies Program, Wellesley College; Former Chair, Berkshire Conference on Women's History

Daniel T. Rodgers, Professor of History and Chair of Department, Princeton University

Charles Rosenberg, Janice & Julian Bers Professor of the History & Sociology of Science, University of Pennsylvania; Member, Executive Board Organization of American Historians; President, Society for the Social History of Medicine (UK); member of council, History of Science Society and American Association for the History of Medicine

Emily Rosenberg, Professor of History, Macalester College; Former Member of Chair, History of Discipline Screening Committee, Fulbright Scholars; Peltzer Award Committee, Organization of American Historians; Vice President, Women Historians of the Midwest; Editorial Board, Diplomatic History

Norman Rosenberg, Professor of History, Macalester College

William Rosenberg, Professor of History, University of Michigan

Roy Rosenzweig, Associate Professor of History, George Mason University

David Rosner, Professor of History, Baruch College

Dorothy Ross, Professor of History, University of Virginia; Executive Board, Organization of American Historians

Ellen Ross, Associate Professor of Women's Studies, Ramapo College

Guenther Roth, Professor of Historical Sociology, Columbia University

David Rothman, Bernard Schrenlevy Professor of Social Medicine & History, Columbia College of Physicians & Surgeons

Sheila Rothman, Columbia College of Physicians & Surgeons

Teofilo Ruiz, Professor of History, Brooklyn College

Mary Ryan, Professor of History, Director of Women's Studies, University of California at Berkeley

Margaret Schabas, Assistant Professor, History of Science, University of Wisconsin

Carl E. Schorske, Dayton-Stockton Professor of History, Emeritus, Prînceton University; Member, American Academy of Arts and Sciences; Pulitzer Prize Winner

Anne Firor Scott, W. K. Boyd Professor of History, Duke University

Joan Scott, Professor of Social Science, Institute for Advanced Study; Former Chair, American Historical Association, Committee on the Status of Women

Rebecca Scott, Professor of History, University of Michigan

Jerrold Seigel, Professor of History, New York University

William Sewell, Professor of History, University of Michigan

Robert Shell, Assistant Professor of History, Princeton University

John Shy, Professor of American History, University of Michigan

Sara Lee Silberman, Associate Professor of History, Connecticut College

Herbert Sloan, Professor of History, Barnard College

Carroll Smith-Rosenberg, Professor of History, University of Pennsylvania. Disorderly Conduct: Visions of Gender in Victorian America (1985)

Robert W. Snyder, Lecturer in History, Princeton University

Rayman Solomon, Associate Dean, Northwestern University School of Law; Director, American Society for Legal History

Glenn Sonnedecker, Professor Emeritus, History of Pharmacy, School of Pharmacy and Department of the History of Science, University of Wisconsin

Hobart Spalding, Professor of History, Brooklyn College

Christine Stansell, Associate Professor of History, Director of Women's Studies, Princeton University

Paul Starr, Professor of Sociology, Princeton University. The Social Transformation of American Medicine: The Rise of a Sovereign Profession and the Making of a Vast Industry (1982)

S.J. Stearns, Associate Professor of History, College of Staten Island, City University of New York

Stanley Stein, Professor of History, Princeton University

Nancy Stephan, Associate Professor of History, Columbia University

Phyllis Stock, Professor of History; National President, Conference Group for Women's History

Steven Stowe, Assistant Professor of History, Indiana University

Barbara Tischler, Assistant Professor of History and Director of American Studies, Department of History, Barnard College

Nancy Jane Tomes, Associate Professor of History, State University of New York at Stony Brook

Christopher Tomlins, Visiting Research Fellow, American Bar Foundation; Chair, Department of Legal Studies, LaTrobe University

Steven Topik, Associate Professor of History, University of California, Irvine

David Traboulay, Professor of History, College of Staten Island

Thomas Trautmann, Professor of History, University of Michigan

Arleen Tuchman, Assistant Professor of History, Vanderbilt University

James Turner, Professor of American History, University of Michigan

Jane Turner Censer, American University

Irwin Unger, Professor of History, New York University

Richard Vann, Professor of History and Letters, Wesleyan University; Vice President, Research Division, American Historical Association; Executive Eidtor, History and Theory; Director, Center for the Humanities

Marcha Vicinus, Professor of British History and Literature, University of Michigan

Morris Vogel, Professor of History, Temple University; Editor, Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography

Mark von Hagen, Assistant Professor of History, Columbia University

Sam Walker, Professor, Department of Criminal Justice, University of Nebraska at Omaha

Daniel Walkowitz, Professor of History and Co-Director, Public History Program, New York University; Board of Directors, National Council for Public History

Judith Walkowitz, Professor of History, Rutgers University; President, Berkshire Conference of Women Historians, Forber Chair, Committee on Women Historians, American Historical Association

Patricia Spain Ward, Campus Historian, University of Illinois at Chicago

Susan Ware, Assistant Professor of History, New York University

Sydney Weinberg, Professor of History, Ramapo College of New Jersey

Jonathan Weiner, Professor of History, University of California, Irvine

Lynn Weiner, Lecturer in History, Roosevelt University

Suzanne Wemple, Professor of History, and Chair of Medieval & Renaissance Program, Barnard College, Columbia University

Robert Westman, Professor of History, University of California, San Diego

James Whorton, Professor of History, University of Washington; Member of Council, American Association for History of Medicine

Sean Wilentz, Professor of History, Princeton University

Barbara Winslow, Adjunct Professor of History, Baruch College

Gwendolyn Wright, Professor of History and Professor of Architecture, Columbia University

James Wright, Professor of History, Dartmouth College

Susan M. Yohn, Lecturer in History, Princeton University

Ernest Young, Professor of History, University of Michigan

James Young, Charles Howard Candler Professor of American Social History Emeritus, Emory University; Former President, Southern Historical Association

Marilyn Young, Professor of History, New York University

Reginald Zelnik, Professor of History, University of California, Berkeley

Judith Zinsser, Curriculum Coordinator, United Nations International School; Board of Trustees, Byrn Mawr College; American Historical Association, Committee on Women Historians

AMICUS CURIAE

BRIEF

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
MAR 30 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

(82)

No. 88-605

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,
Appellants,
v.
REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,
Appellees.

On Appeal From The United States Court Of Appeals For The Eighth Circuit

BRIEF OF AMERICANS UNITED FOR SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE AS AMICUS CURIAE IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEES

Of Counsel:
ROBERT J. LIPSHUTZ
2300 Harris Tower
233 Peachtree Street
Atlanta, Georgia 30043
(404) 688-2300

LEE BOOTHBY
(Counsel of Record)
BOOTHBY, ZIPRICK & YINGST
208 West Mars Street
Berrien Springs, MI 49103
(616) 471-7787

STEVEN GREEN
Vermont Law School
P.O. Box 96, Chelsea Street
South Royalton, Vermont 05068
(802) 763-8303

ROBERT W. NIXON
6930 Carroll Avenue
Takoma Park, Maryland 20912
(202) 722-6320

Attorneys for Amicus Curiae

PRESS OF RAM PRINTING, HYATTSVILLE, MD 20781 (301) 864-6662

77pp

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Page
STATEMENT OF INTEREST	1
SUMMARY OF ARGUMENTS	2
ARGUMENTS	5
I. THE LEGISLATIVE FINDINGS AND THE STATED PURPOSE OF THIS STATUTE TAKEN TOGETHER WITH ITS AUTHORSHIP CLEARLY DEMONSTRATE THE INHERENTLY RELIGIOUS BASIS OF THE STATUTE IN QUESTION.	5
II. RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATIONS HAVE THE RIGHT TO SPEAK OUT ON MATTERS OF MORAL AND ETHICAL CONCERN.	13
III. GOVERNMENT MAY PROPERLY TAKE ACTION AGAINST CONDUCT OR ACTIVITIES EVEN WHEN IT MAY PARALLEL SECTARIAN TEACHINGS AND BELIEFS WITHOUT VIOLATING THE PROSCRIPTION OF THE ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE	15
IV. THE MISSOURI LEGISLATURE, IN ADOPTING ITS ANTI-ABORTION STATUTE, DEMONSTRATED A RELIGIOUS PURPOSE AND ENTERED THE THEOLOGICAL THICKET FROM WHICH IT IS BARRED BY THE ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE.	16
V. THE MISSOURI STATUTE HAS THE PERCEIVED EFFECT OF ENDORSING A CONTESTED THEOLOGICAL POSITION CONTRARY TO THE PROHIBITION OF THE ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE.	21
VI. IF THIS COURT SHOULD VALIDATE A LEGISLATIVE ACT PREDICATED ON A THEOLOGICALLY-DERIVED LEGISLATIVE FINDING INTENDED TO BE USED IN THE INTERPRETATION OF ALL EXISTING AND PROSPECTIVE LEGISLATION TOUCHING ON THE STATUS OF "THE UNBORN CHILD AT EVERY STAGE OF DEVELOPMENT," SUCH LEGISLATION CREATES THE POTENTIAL FOR EXCESSIVE ENTANGLEMENT BETWEEN CHURCH AND STATE.	25
VII. THERE IS NO LOGICAL BASIS FOR IMPLANTING ONE THEOLOGICAL VIEW OF PERSONHOOD INTO THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT	26
CONCLUSION	28

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

CASES: PAGE

Bemis Pentecostal Church v. State of Tennessee, 731 S.W.2d 897 (Tenn. 1987), appeal denied, 108 S.Ct. 1102 (1988) 14
Bowen v. Kendrick, 108 S.Ct. 2562 (1988) 21
Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Nyquist, 413 U.S. 756 (1973) 25, 26
Edwards v. Aguillard, 107 S.Ct. 2573 (1987) ... 4, 17, 20, 21
Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968) 20
Estate of Thornton v. Caldor, Inc., 472 U.S. 703 (1985) . 19
Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980) 5, 15, 16
Jay v. Boyd, 351 U.S. 345 (1956) 21
Larson v. Valente, 456 U.S. 228 (1982) 21
Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971) 18
Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984) 18, 19, 23, 26
McDaniel v. Paty, 435 U.S. 618 (1978) 13, 14
McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420 (1961) 16
McRae v. Califano, 491 F.Supp. 630 (E.D. N.Y. 1980) .. 17
Presiding Bishop v. Amos, 107 S.Ct. 2862 (1987) 23
Richards v. United States, 369 U.S. 1 (1962) 21
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973) 26
Stone v. Graham, 449 U.S. 39 (1980) 20
Texas Monthly, Inc. v. Bullock, 57 U.S.L.W. 4168 (U.S. Feb. 21, 1989) 24
Thomas v. Review Board, 450 U.S. 707 (1981) 24
Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985) ..... passim

CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY AUTHORITIES:
U.S. Const. amend. I ..... passim
U.S. Const. amend. V 4, 28
U.S. Const. amend. XIV 4, 26, 27, 28
Mo. Rev. Stat. § 1.205(1) (1986) 5, 16
Mo. Rev. Stat. § 1.205.1(2) 5, 17, 25
Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.010 ..... 5, 17

OTHER AUTHORITIES:
Cong. Globe, 37th Cong., 2d Sess. 1449 (1862) 27

Table of Authorities Continued

Page

Human Life Bill: Hearing Before the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers of the Committee on the Judiciary, 97th Cong., 1st Session 48-49 (1981) 9
MCC Messenger, May 30, 1986, at 1 ..... 7, 23
Sentell, Abortion Law Was Work of Ghostwriter, The Kansas City Times, Jan. 23, 1989 23
P. Simmons, Birth and Death: Bioethical Decision Making (1985) 9, 10
C. Whittier, Catholic Teaching on Abortion: Its Origin and Later Development (1981) 11, 12, 13
R. Zwerin and R. Shapiro, Judaism & Abortion 1-2 (1987) 9

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

No. 88-605

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,
Appellants,

v.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, ET AL.,
APPELLEES.

On Appeal From The Unites States Court Of Appeals For The Eighth Circuit

---

BRIEF OF AMERICANS UNITED FOR SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE AS AMICUS CURIAE IN SUPPORT OF APPELLES

STATEMENT OF INTEREST

Americans United for Separation of Church and State is a nonprofit corporation formed to maintain and advance civil and religious liberties through enforcement of the rights and privileges granted by the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution.

Americans United has some 50,000 individual members of various religious beliefs and some of no religious belief, plus 4,000 cooperating religious organizations, in all states of the United States, including the State of Missouri. Both the governing board of Americans United and its National Advisory Council (which elects the organization's Board of Trustees) include clergy and laypersons who have varying views on the question of abortion with many of them personally opposed to abortion on philosophical, moral, or religious grounds.

In this brief, Americans United takes no position on the questions of whether public funds or facilities should be utilized to provide abortions or the regulation of abortions. Our concern, rather, is directed to what we believe to be theologically-derived legislative findings by the Missouri legislature that personhood begins at the moment of conception. Such an inherently theological, but controversial, determination violates a core purpose of the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment—that is, the absolute prohibition against government preference of one religious sect or denomination over another and the placing of the state's imprimatur on a particular religious dogma.

The membership and governing board of Americans United believe that this specific legislation does not present the appropriate vehicle to resolve the other non-Establishment Clause concerns which this Court will at some later date address. Americans United further believes that any judicial determination ignoring the Establishment Clause question which is unique to this legislation will only generate additional political divisiveness along religious lines.

This amicus brief will only address the specific question of whether the Missouri statute here in question violates the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment to the United States Constitution. Americans United understands that no other amicus brief will specifically address Establishment Clause concerns of the law's stated legislative findings and its impact.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENTS

This brief narrowly focuses on the question of whether the Missouri anti-abortion statute violates the Establishment

Clause of the First Amendment. The statute, co-authored by the Missouri Catholic Conference, is based upon inherently theologically-derived legislative findings over which there has been a long and continuing history of deep division within the Judeo-Christian community.

Although civil government is not a competent arbiter of Scripture, the Missouri legislature, in the written text of the statute, determined that human life or personhood is conferred at the time of conception. Such an idea is not subject to scientific or medical confirmation and always has been viewed as theological in character.

Although Americans United readily acknowledges that religious organizations have the constitutional right to speak to moral and ethical issues and to influence public policy, that does not exempt legislation from the proscriptions of the Establishment Clause. It has also become a part of our Establishment Clause jurisprudence that legislation may parallel sectarian teachings and belief without resulting in a violation of the Establishment Clause. Americans United, however, contends that the text of the Missouri statute reveals a legislative purpose of endorsing a sectarian belief. The program has a perceived and actual effect of advancing the religious aims of certain religions. The message conveyed, therefore, is one of endorsement of a particular religious belief to the detriment of those who do not share it. As such, the statute cannot withstand the Establishment Clause. Appellants contend that the legislative finding that personhood is conferred at the moment of conception is neither a necessary nor operative provision. If appellants are correct, there can be no valid claim that the legislative declaration merely parallels a religious belief. Rather, it must be concluded that the legislature has adopted, endorsed, and encouraged a specific and divisive sectarian belief as the stated purpose for the remainder of the statute.

In fact, the theologically-derived finding as to personhood is operative since the statute itself requires all laws in Missouri, presumably both existing and future, to be interpreted and construed so as to acknowledge on behalf of the unborn fetus at every stage of development all the rights, privileges, and immunities available to all other persons. The endorsement of a sectarian belief with the requirement that the theological view embraced by the legislation will be used to interpret all other related laws in the state clearly creates the potential for political divisiveness. As such, it provides a warning signal suggesting that the legislative act is perceived as an endorsement of religion. Legislation enacted under the guise of securing secular values cannot be promoted in theological terms by religious figures without those values taking on an inherently sectarian character.

This Court has recognized that the common law and, until the mid-nineteenth century, a large majority of jurisdictions in this nation recognized that an abortion performed before quickening was not an indictable offense. Arguments have been raised suggesting that somehow the theological concept that personhood is conferred at the time of conception has been engrafted as part of the Fourteenth Amendment's reference to persons. Those arguments focus on what is perceived to have been the prevailing mood of the nation and the existing laws relative to abortion at the time of its adoption. This contention, however, ignores the fact that the language of the Fourteenth Amendment tracks with the language of the Fifth Amendment. It is only logical that the authors of the Fourteenth Amendment, in using the word "persons," had in mind the same definition of persons as used by the drafters of the Bill of Rights.

This legislation, suffused with the use of theological terms and concepts, should be disposed of on Establishment Clause grounds for the same reasons considered by this Court in reviewing the Alabama moment of silence legislation in Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985), and the Louisiana creation-science legislation reviewed by this Court in Edwards v. Aguillard, 107 S.Ct. 2573 (1987). The motivating and perceived legislative purpose for the enactment of this statute was sectarian in nature and thus unlike Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980), it does not set forth a legislative will that merely corresponds with certain sectarian beliefs. Here, the imprimatur of the State of Missouri has been placed on sectarian views that have historically generated, and are currently the subject of, divisive theological debate which by its very nature can never be resolved by legislative findings derived from a consensus of the scientific and medical communities.

ARGUMENTS

I. THE LEGISLATIVE FINDINGS AND THE STATED PURPOSE OF THIS STATUTE TAKEN TOGETHER WITH ITS AUTHORSHIP CLEARLY DEMONSTRATE THE INHERENTLY RELIGIOUS BASIS OF THE STATUTE IN QUESTION.

The specific language of the Missouri statute here under review, which we believe raises serious Establishment Clause problems and demonstrates that the statute is predicated upon theologically-derived legislative findings, includes the statement that "[t]he life of each human being begins at conception" (Mo. Rev. Stat. § 1.205.1(1) (1986)) and a requirement that "laws of . . . [the State of Missouri] shall be interpreted and construed to acknowledge on behalf of the unborn child at every stage of development, all the rights, privileges, and immunities available to all other persns . . ." (Mo. Rev. Stat. § 1.205.1(2) (1986)) (emphasis supplied).

In enacting the statute, the legislature stated its purpose as follows: "It is the intention of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri to grant the right of life to all humans, born and unborn . . ." (Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.010 (1986)) (emphasis supplied).

Thus the Missouri statute is based upon what Americans United believes to be theologically-derived legislative findings and purpose which, read collectively, have the effect of declaring that personhood is conferred at the moment of conception and that all existing and future legislation of the state must be interpreted from that sectarian viewpoint.

Such an interpretation of the legislative findings does not appear to be the product of a crabbed interpretation of the statutory language. In fact, key parts of the statute are quoted by major organizations in their amicus briefs to this Court demonstrating that those organizations had the same understanding from the reading of the text as did Americans United. The "Brief for 127 Members of the Missouri General Assembly as Amicus Curiae Supporting Appellants," at 10, states: "In the 1986 Act, the Missouri General Assembly expressed its continuing concern with the protection of human life by finding that '[t]he life of each human being begins at conception' and that '[u]nborn children have protectable interests in life, health, and well-being.'"

That same brief, id. at 12, later states: "The Missouri legislature has defined personhood to include all human beings—and not to exclude any."

The "Brief of Amicus Curiae Missouri Catholic Conference in Support of Appellants," at 1-2, explains in its Statement of Interest:

> The interest of the Missouri Catholic Conference in this case arises from the position of the Catholic Church as expressed by the National Council of Catholic Bishops, which includes all of the Catholic Bishops of Missouri, that "human life is a precious gift from God; that each person who receives this gift has responsibilities toward God, toward self, and toward others and that society through its laws and social institutions, must protect and sustain human life at every stage of existence. These convictions grow out of [the] Church's constant witness that life must be protected with the utmost care from the moment of conception." Pastoral Plan for Pro-Life Activities: A Reaffirmation, Nov. 14, 1985. Based on these principles, the Missouri Catholic Conference supported, through testimony before committees of the Missouri General Assembly, the legislation which is the subject of this lawsuit.

> The Missouri Catholic Conference believes that the Missouri legislature should be permitted to express the wishes of the majority of the residents of the State, including the Catholics of Missouri, regarding when an unborn child is deemed to be a human being, and regarding the use of public facilities or public employees to perform or assist in an abortion as provided in the challenged statute. [Emphasis supplied.]

The Missouri Catholic Conference was one of two organizations that prepared the language of the statute in question, according to its publication, the MCC Messenger, May 30, 1986, at 1, under the headline "State Paid Abortions—Not Here" (a copy of which appears as Appendix B to this brief at 42a):

> The most significant package of pro-life legislation since 1979 was enacted into law by the General Assembly this year. H. B. 1596 was approved by a vote of 119-36 in the House of Representatives and 23-5 in the Senate.
>
> The final bill is a combination of a bill prepared by the Missouri Catholic Conference, prohibiting the use of public funds, facilities and employees for the performance or promotion of abortions, in an omnibus pro-life bill prepared by Missouri Citizens for Life. [Emphasis supplied.]

The "Brief of the Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod, the Christian Life Commission of the Southern Baptist Convention, and the National Association of Evangelicals as Amici Curiae in Support of Appellants," at 4, states:

> This case squarely presents this Court with the question of whether, under the United States Constitution, a state legislatively may determine when its protectable interest in human life begins, and, predicated upon that interest in human life, thereafter regulate abortion. Missouri, in prefacing its abortion law with a statement of the will of its people that human life begins at conception, reveals its intent to enact a statute . . . to protect the interest of the state in human life before birth, as distinguished from a statute predicated principally upon protection of the health and welfare of the mother. [Emphasis supplied.]

The Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod, Christian Life Commission of the Southern Baptist Convention, and National Association of Evangelicals apparently recognized that the legislative finding was not, and could not, be based upon scientific evidence because their brief, id. at 6-7, further states:

> The Missouri legislature acted within the scope of its police power in enacting a statute stating that life begins at conception. Nothing in the Constitution prohibits the state from reaching the factual conclusion that life begins at conception and codifying it. The Supreme Court generally does not require legislatures to prove their assumptions or that the means which the legislature chooses will achieve only the ends which the legislature hopes to obtain. Reviewing courts "do not demand of legislatures 'scientifically certain criteria of legislation.'" Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629, 642-43 (1968) (citing Noble State Bank v. Haskel, 219 U.S. 104, 110 (1911)). Legislatures properly may rely on scientifically unprovable assumptions when protecting the broad social interest in order and morality. Paris Adult Theater I v. Slaton, 413 U.S. at 60. [Emphasis supplied.]

In the same amicus brief, id. at 20, arguing that state laws prohibiting abortions are not unconstitutional establishments of religion, the organizations commented:

> The sanctity of human life from conception and opposition to abortion are, in fact, sincere and deeply held religious beliefs of The Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod, The Southern Baptist Convention, and of the other forty-seven church denominations represented in this brief. The Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod has, throughout its history, opposed abortion and has adopted official positions in its convention since 1971 condemning willful abortion as contrary to the will of God. Its convention resolution "To State Position on Abortion" adopted in 1979, states that based upon Scripture, "the living but unborn are persons in the sight of God from the time of conception;" that "as persons, the unborn stand under the full protection of God's own prohibition against murder;" and that abortion is not a moral option, except as tragically necessitated by medical procedures applied to prevent the death of the mother.

Likewise, the briefs Statement of Interest, id. at 2, states the beliefs of the National Association of Evangelicals: "The National Association of Evangelicals' profound interest in this case stems from its position that, based upon Scripture, human life begins at conception and deserves protection against destruction from its earliest stage."

Although the Roman Catholics, Missouri Synod Lutherans, Southern Baptists, and Evangelicals in Missouri may have a uniform theological view about when human life or personhood commences, other denominations and religious traditions reject the theological concept that human life or personhood begins at the time of conception.

For example, Rabbis Raymond Zwerin and Richard I. Shapiro write that "according to Jewish law, a fetus is not considered a full human being and has no juridical personality of its own . . . . The Talmud contains the expression Ubar yereah imo—the fetus is as the thigh of its mother, i.e., the fetus is deemed to be part and parcel of the pregnant's woman's body." Zwerin and Shapiro, Judaism & Abortion 1-2 (1987). Another prominent Jewish leader, Rabbi Henry Siegman, Executive Director of the American Jewish Congress, testified before Congress that "the fetus is not a person, in Jewish tradition, until the moment of birth. . . ." Human Life Bill: Hearing Before the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers of the Committee on the Judiciary, 97th Cong., 1st Session 48-49 (1981).

Professor Paul D. Simmons, Professor of Christian Ethics at the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, notes:

> Perhaps the major issue in the abortion debate centers on the question of the personhood of the fetus. Those who are working for a constitutional "human life" amendment to ban abortion in America argue that the Bible teaches (1) that the fetus is a human being and (2) that abortion is murder and thus should be legally prohibited.

Simmons, Birth and Death: Bioethical Decision Making 78 (1985). Adding that some traditional religious communities do not agree with the proposition that human life or personhood begins at the moment of conception, Professor Simmons explains:

> Not all scholars are convinced the Bible teaches that abortion is murder or that the fetus is a person. John Stott, for instance, rejects the notion that a fetus is a human being; he believes that, at best, it may be regarded as potentially a person.
>
> Several things might be noted about these statements. First, many writers use the terms "human," "human life," "life," "person," and "human being" as if they were synonymous and thus interchangeable. Second, each statement reveals certain assumptions about what it means to be a human being or person. Third, each writer brings the teaching of the Bible as that writer understands it to buttress the argument. Finally, there is apparently no single teaching or definition in the Bible regarding personhood, or there would presumably be universal agreement among biblical scholars on this question. To understand the question of the personhood of the fetus and relate the teaching of the Bible more clearly to the question, it may prove helpful to deal with some of the assumptions involved.

Id. at 79. After reviewing the Biblical view of personhood, id. at 87-88, Simmons concludes:

> The biblical portrait of person, therefore, is that of a complex, many-sided creature with the godlike ability and responsibility of making choices. The fetus—certainly in the early stages of gestation—hardly meets those characteristics. At best, it begins to attain those biological basics which are necessary to show such capacities no earlier than the latter part of gestation. The "burden of proof" argument used by those who would equate fetus with person needs to be turned around. Brown argued, for instance, that the burden of proof is on those who say that the fetus is not a human person. "We must be able to say we are sure it is not human . . . . How can we be sure it is not a human being?" No one can disagree with him that the fetus is human. That is a simple statement that acknowledges the species to which the fetus belongs. Human is an adjective. The fetus is not bovine (cow), or feline (cat), but > a human conceptus. The problem is asserting that the fetus is a person or human being. The terms are not synonymous. "Human being" is a noun and designates or names a living entity with the qualities of personality and life that distinguish Homo sapiens from all other creatures. Plainly the presence of life or animation is not a sufficient distinction, since all animals have life in that sense. The uniqueness of being person is reflecting the qualities of the image of God.

Annexed as Appendix A at 1a to 39a to this brief is a research paper of the Congressional Research Service of the Library of Congress entitled "Catholic Teaching on Abortion: Its Origin and Later Development," which traces the teaching of the Roman Catholic Church on the question of abortion including the theological question of personhood. This research shows that until relatively recent times there were conflicting but acceptable theological views within the Roman Catholic Church as to the beginning of human life or personhood.

Reviewing historic Roman Catholic writings on the subject, the research paper states (Appendix at 17a):

> For St. Thomas, "seed and what is not seed is determined by sensation of movement." What is destroyed in abortion of the unformed fetus is seed, not man. This distinction received its most careful analysis in St. Thomas. It was the general belief of Christendom, reflected, for example, in the Council of Trent (1545-1563), which restricted penalties for homicide to abortion of animated fetus only.

C. Whittier, Catholic Teaching on Abortion: Its Origin and Later Development 18 (1981).

The research paper, id. at 20 (Appendix at 18a-19a), further notes:

> In 1869 in his Apostolic Constitution Apostolicae Sedis, Pope Pius IX broke with the older tradition by omitting all distinctions in canonical penalties between the unformed and the formed fetus. The effect was implicitly to accept the theory of immediate ensoulment or, at least, to provide for it as a likely possibility. In 1917, with the promulgation of the new Code of Canon Law by Benedict XV (1854-1922), the 40 to 80 day animation determination, still in effect for dealing with irregularities, was completely eliminated. The definition of abortion as the ejection of an immature or non-viable fetus by deliberate intent and efficacious means derives from Sixtus V. By fetus is meant the human organization in the womb after conception and before birth. In effect, the teaching of Effraenatam and the Council of Elvira has become the officially sanctioned position of the Church.

The research paper, id. at 34-35 (Appendix at 29a-30a), concluded:

> The official teaching of the Catholic Church at present was stated in 1970 by the United States Catholic Bishops: "from the moment of conception the child is a complex and rapidly-growing being endowed with the characteristics of human life"; in brief, "the child in the womb is human." This simply reasserts the judgment of Vatican Council II: "From the moment of its conception, life must be guarded with the greatest of care." Thus, in 1964, Pope Paul VI cited the words of Pius XII thirteen years before: "Innocent human life, in whatever condition it is found, is to be secure from the very first moment of its existence from any direct deliberate attacks . . . . Whatever foundation there may be for the distinction between these various phases of the development of life that is born or still unborn, in profane or ecclesiastical law, and as regards certain civil and penal consequences, all these cases involve a grave and unlawful attack upon the inviolability of human life."
>
> In conclusion, the pastoral and penitential practice of the Catholic Church regarding abortion today is to act as if the soul were present from conception, assuming the possibility, if not the probability, of fully human life or at least its unique potentiality in the conceptus. This represents a significant change from the dominant tradition in the past, which distinguished the unformed from the formed fetus in terms of canonical definition of abortion and of appropriate penalties.

In a similar vein, ecumenical dialogue sponsored by the Catholic Bishops' Committee for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops and the Caribbean and North American Area Council of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches (Presbyterian and Congregational) issued a statement on Ethics and Christian Unity, A Statement on Abortion that noted substantial agreement on certain basic principles concerning abortion but indicated substantial differences on "the moment and meaning of personhood," "the rights of the unborn in situations where rights are in conflict," "the role of civil law in matters pertaining to abortion," and "the interrelation of individual versus communal factors in decision making." C. Whittier, Catholic Teaching on Abortion, id. at 39 (Appendix at 34a-35a).

II. RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATIONS HAVE THE RIGHT TO SPEAK OUT ON MATTERS OF MORAL AND ETHICAL CONCERN.

Nothing stated in this amicus brief should be construed as criticizing the right of religious organizations to speak out on important issues of moral and ethical concern. As Justice Brennan wrote in McDaniel v. Paty:

> That public debate of religious ideas, like any other, may arouse emotion, may incite, may foment religious divisiveness and strife does not rob it of constitutional protection. . . . The mere fact that a purpose of the Establishment Clause is to reduce or eliminate religious divisiveness or strife, does not place religious discussion, association, or political participation in a status less preferred than rights of discussion, association and political participation generally. "Adherents of particular faiths and individual churches frequently take strong positions on public issues including . . . vigorous advocacy of legal or constitutional positions. Of course, churches as much as secular bodies and private citizens have that right." Walz v. Tax Comm'n, 397 U.S. 664, 670 (1970).

435 U.S. 618, 640-41 (1978) (Brennan, J., concurring).

Justice Brennan in his same concurrence added that "[t]he Establishment Clause, properly understood, is a shield against any attempt by government to inhibit religion . . . . It may not be used as a sword to justify repression of religion or its adherents from any aspect of public life." Id. at 641. However, the fact that religious organizations and their clergy have First Amendment rights to speak out on public issues and to seek to influence the political process in no way detracts from the Establishment Clause proscription against government adopting a sectarian belief on issues that are essentially religious. As Justice Brennan concluded in McDaniel v. Paty:

> Our decisions under the Establishment Clause prevent government from supporting or involving itself in religion or from becoming drawn into ecclesiastical disputes. These prohibitions naturally tend, as they were designed to, to avoid channeling political activity along religious lines and to reduce any tendency toward religious divisiveness in society. Beyond enforcing these prohibitions, however, government may not go. The antidote which the Constitution provides against zealots who would inject sectarianism into the political process is to subject their ideas to refutation in the marketplace of ideas and their platforms to rejection at the polls. With these safeguards, it is unlikely that they will succeed in inducing government to act along religiously divisive lines, and, with judicial enforcement of the Establishment Clause, any measure of success they achieve must be short-lived, at best. (Emphasis supplied)

Id. at 642.

In fact, Americans United firmly believes that religious organizations, like secular bodies and private citizens, have a constitutional right to speak to public questions. Members of the clergy and their religious organizations certainly have the right to speak out on matters of moral and ethical concern and have done so throughout this nation's history. This is why Americans United committed its resources to assisting the church plaintiffs in Bemis Pentecostal Church v. State of Tennessee, 731 S.W.2d 897 (Tenn. 1987), appeal denied, 108 S.Ct. 1102 (1988), in which thirteen churches in Jackson, Tennessee, publicly opposed a liquor-by-the-drink referendum, and challenged the constitutionality of Tennessee's Campaign Disclosure Act.

Thus, although religious organizations have the constitutional right to speak out on public questions, the ultimate protection remains within the political process and with the courts to enforce the guarantee against establishment of religion.

III. GOVERNMENT MAY PROPERLY TAKE ACTION AGAINST CONDUCT OR ACTIVITIES EVEN WHEN IT MAY PARALLEL SECTARIAN TEACHINGS AND BELIEFS WITHOUT VIOLATING THE PROSCRIPTION OF THE ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE.

The developing Establishment Clause jurisprudence clearly accepts the proposition that mere parallelism between religious dogma and legislative action does not in and of itself result in an Establishment Clause violation. In fact, Judeo-Christian religious teachings may properly be the fountainhead from which community morals may spring. Americans United, however, believes that disputed sectarian dogma may not receive the imprimatur of the state as the stated purpose or predicate for governmental legislative action.

In Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297, 319-320 (1980), this Court stated:

> It is well settled that "a legislative enactment does not contravene the Establishment Clause if it has a secular legislative purpose, if its principal or primary effect neither advances nor inhibits religion, and if it does not foster an excessive governmental entanglement with religion." Committee for Public Education v. Regan, 444 U.S. 646, 653. Applying this standard, the District Court properly concluded that the Hyde Amendment does not run afoul of the Establishment Clause. Although neither a State nor the Federal Government can constitutionally "pass laws which aid one religion, aid all religions, or prefer one religion over another," Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1, 15, it does not follow that a statute violates the Establishment Clause because it "happens to coincide or harmonize with the tenets of some or all religions." McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420, 442. . . . The Hyde Amendment, as the District Court noted, is as much a > reflection of "traditionalist" values towards abortion, as it is an embodiment of the views of any particular religion. . . . In sum, we are convinced that the fact that the funding restrictions in the Hyde Amendment may coincide with the religious tenets of the Roman Catholic Church does not, without more, contravene the Establishment Clause. [Emphasis supplied.]

Justice Stewart based part of his Harris v. McRae analysis on this Court's decision in McGowan v. Maryland. In that case, this Court specifically stated that a law may violate the Establishment Clause "if it can be demonstrated that its purpose—evidenced either on the face of the legislation, in conjunction with its legislative history, or in its operative effect—is to use the State's coercive power to aid religion." McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420, 453 (1961).

IV. THE MISSOURI LEGISLATURE, IN ADOPTING ITS ANTI-ABORTION STATUTE, DEMONSTRATED A RELIGIOUS PURPOSE AND ENTERED THE THEOLOGICAL THICKET FROM WHICH IT IS BARRED BY THE ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE.

In Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. at 319-20, this Court, although finding that a secular legislative purpose may properly parallel a sectarian interest, implied that a legislative body may nevertheless transgress the Establishment Clause when enacting anti-abortion legislation. In Harris the Court merely acknowledged that the funding restrictions in the Hyde Amendment may coincide with the religious tenets of the Roman Catholic Church and would not, "without more," violate the Establishment Clause.

Americans United, however, believes that in the Missouri case the legislation does not merely coincide with a sectarian teaching. Rather, the text of the statute itself results in a breach of the wall between church and state erected by the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment because the statute is predicated upon a theologically-derived legislative finding that "[t]he life of each human being begins at conception" (Mo. Rev. Stat. § 1.205.1(1) (1986)) and a requirement that "laws of . . . [the State of Missouri] shall be interpreted and construed to acknowledge on behalf of the unborn child at every stage of development, all the rights, privileges, and immunities available to all other persons . . . ." (Mo. Rev. Stat. § 1.205.1(2) (1986)) (emphasis supplied).

The legislature, in enacting the statute, said its legislative purpose was "to grant the right of life to all humans, born and unborn . . . ." (Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.010 (1986)) (emphasis supplied).

This legislative findings and statement of purpose go beyond a statement of "traditionalist values" represented by the Hyde Amendment and embrace theological dogma and are an attempt to place the imprimatur of the state on one side of the theological argument as to the "personhood" of a fetus.

In McRae the district court carefully observed that the consensus of the legislative opinion that gave rise to the passage of the Hyde Amendment prohibiting the use of federal funds for abortion "did not in truth turn on whether an embryo or fetus or, indeed, a zygote or blastocyst is a 'human being.'" McRae v. Califano, 491 F.Supp. 630, 715 (E.D. N.Y. 1980). The Missouri legislature, however, clearly predicated its legislation on a purely theological finding—a finding which has not been validated by a consensus within the medical or scientific communities.

Appellants and their supporting amici argue that the legislative finding is not an operative portion of the statute but merely contributes to a general understanding of the statute. We do not agree, but, whatever merit that argument may have, the legislative declaration nevertheless does clearly demonstrate that the legislative purpose was religiously based. Even though the purpose prong of the Lemon test usually looks to the subjective intent of the legislature, intent may be deduced from the face of the statute. Edwards v. Aguillard, 107 S.Ct. 2573, 2585 (1987). Therefore, if the legislative finding concerning when life begins is unnecessary to further the state's legitimate interests, as claimed by appellants, amicus believes an improper intent may be inferred. It may be concluded that if the legislative declaration is unnecessary for the regulation of abortion, then Missouri is not "paralleling" a religious belief, but adopting and encouraging one.

Appellants argue that the state has a legitimate secular interest in regulating all trimesters of a pregnancy. If this is so, there is no reason for a legislative body to take the extra step and declare that life has in fact begun at the moment of conception, particularly when this issue has not been decided by the medical or scientific communities and is the subject of continuing theological debate. Such a legislative finding, therefore, serves no secular purpose but does demonstrate that the legislative purpose is religiously based.

This Court, over the years, has used a three-part test to analyze Establishment Clause challenges: "First, the statute must have a secular legislative purpose; second, its principal or primary effect must be one that neither advances nor inhibits religion . . .; finally, the statute must not foster an excessive entanglement with religion.'" Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 612-13 (1971).

More recently Justice O'Connor has suggested additional refinements to the traditional Lemon test which we believe are helpful in the analysis of the Establishment Clause issue present in this case. In Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668, 690 (1984), Justice O'Connor, concurring, suggested that the purpose prong goes to the issue of what government intended to communicate by its action (the "objective" meaning of the statement in the community), while the effects prong relates to what message governmental action actually conveyed whether intended or not (the "subjective" meaning of the statement). Justice O'Connor analyzed the issue as follows:

> The meaning of a statement to its audience depends both on the intention of the speaker and on the "objective" meaning of the statement in the community. Some listeners need not rely solely on the words themselves in discerning the speaker's intent: they can judge the intent > by, for example, examining the context of the statement or asking questions of the speaker. Other listeners do not have or will not seek access to such evidence of intent. They will rely instead on the words themselves; for them the message actually conveyed may be something not actually intended. If the audience is large, as it always is when government "speaks" by word or deed, some portion of the audience will inevitably receive a message determined by the "objective" content of the statement, and some portion will inevitably receive the intended message. Examination of both the subjective and the objective components of the message communicated by a government action is thereby necessary to determine whether the action carries a forbidden meaning.

>
> The purpose prong of the Lemon test asks whether government's actual purpose is to endorse or disapprove of religion. The effect prong asks whether, irrespective of government's actual purpose, the practice under review in fact conveys a message of endorsement or disapproval. An affirmative answer to either question should render the challenged practice invalid.

Id. See also Estate of Thornton v. Caldor, Inc., 472 U.S. 703, 711 (1985) (O'Connor, J., concurring).

Justice O'Connor further suggested in Lynch v. Donnelly that in reviewing the question of whether the action of government "was understood to place its imprimatur on the religious content" and thereby "communicates endorsement of religion is not a question of simple historical fact." Rather, the question, "like the question whether racial or sex-based classifications communicate an invidious message," is "in large part a legal question to be answered on the basis of judicial interpretation of social facts." Id. at 693-94. Further, Justice O'Connor suggested that, in making such an analysis, "[e]very government practice must be judged in its unique circumstances to determine whether it constitutes an endorsement or disapproval of religion. In making that determination, courts must keep in mind both the fundamental place held by the Establishment Clause in our constitutional scheme and the myriad, subtle ways in which Establishment Clause values can be eroded.

Government practices that purport to celebrate or acknowledge events with religious significance must be subjected to careful judicial scrutiny." Id. at 694.

In Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 73-74 (1985), Justice O'Connor, in applying her modified Lemon test analysis to an issue substantially the same as the question addressed here—that is, whether the purpose of the so-called moment of silence legislation enacted by the Alabama legislature had the purpose of advancing religion—stated:

> The crucial question is whether the State has conveyed or attempted to convey the message that children should use the moment of silence for prayer. This question cannot be answered in the abstract, but instead requires courts to examine the history, language, and administration of a particular statute to determine whether it operates as an endorsement of religion.

In Wallace Justice O'Connor also suggested that any inquiry into the legislative purpose to determine Establishment Clause violations "should be deferential and limited" without attempting "to psychoanalyze the legislators." Id. at 74. In this case, however, Americans United believes that that portion of the text of the statute setting forth the aforementioned legislative findings and purpose of the legislation is inherently religious in character. This, coupled with the acknowledgement that the legislation actually was co-drafted by the Missouri Catholic Conference, should relieve this Court of any need for an intensive investigation of legislative motive.

The Establishment Clause is violated by the advancement of a particular religious belief. Stone v. Graham, 449 U.S. 39, 41 (1980); Edwards v. Aguillard, 107 S.Ct. at 2578. Also, this Court in Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97, 106 (1968), stated that a law should not "be tailored to the principles or prohibitions of any religious sect or dogma." Nevertheless, this is exactly what the Missouri legislature has done.

In Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 75 (1985), Justice O'Connor in her concurrence stated:

> It is not a trivial matter, however, to require that the legislature manifest a secular purpose and omit all sectarian endorsements from its laws. That requirement is precisely tailored to the Establishment Clause's purpose of assuring that government not intentionally endorse religion or religious practice.

It seems clear, as demonstrated earlier in this brief, that a historic and contemporaneous link exists between the teachings of certain religious groups and the human "life begins at the time of conception" finding of the Missouri legislature. In Edwards v. Aguillard, 107 S.Ct. at 2582, this Court stated: "Because the primary purpose of the Creationism Act is to advance a particular religious belief, the Act endorses religion in violation of the First Amendment."

This Court also stated in Edwards v. Aguillard, 107 S.Ct. at 2583, that "[t]he plain meaning of the statute's words, enlightened by their context and the contemporaneous legislative history, can control the determination of legislative purpose." See also Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. at 74 (O'Connor, J., concurring); Richards v. United States, 369 U.S. 1, 9 (1962); Jay v. Boyd, 351 U.S. 345, 357 (1956).

Justice Blackmun concluded in his dissent in Bowen v. Kendrick, 108 S.Ct. 2562, 2590 (1988), that secular values may be properly promoted by legislation: "Whereas there may be secular values promoted by the AFLA, including the encouragement of adoption and premarital chastity and the discouragement of abortion, it can hardly be doubted that when promoted in theological terms by religious figures, those values take on a religious nature." (Emphasis supplied.)

V. THE MISSOURI STATUTE HAS THE PERCEIVED EFFECT OF ENDORSING A CONTESTED THEOLOGICAL POSITION CONTRARY TO THE PROHIBITION OF THE ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE.

In Larson v. Valente, 456 U.S. 228, 244 (1982), this Court stated that "[t]he clearest command of the Establishment Clause is that one religious denomination cannot be officially preferred over another."

In Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 69-70, Justice O'Connor reviewed her suggested modifications of the Lemon test and stated:

> Direct government action endorsing religion or a particular religious practice is invalid under this approach because it "sends a message to nonadherents that they are outsiders, not full members of the political community, and an accompanying message to adherents that they are insiders, favored members of the political community." . . . Under this view, Lemon's inquiry as to the purpose and effect of a statute requires courts to examine whether government's purpose is to endorse religion and whether the statute actually conveys a message of endorsement.

Justice O'Connor continued:

> A statute that ostensibly promotes a secular interest often has an incidental or even a primary effect of helping or hindering a sectarian belief. Chaos would ensue if every such statute were invalid under the Establishment Clause. For example, the state could not criminalize murder for fear that it would thereby promote the Biblical command against killing. The task for the Court is to sort out those statutes and government practices whose purpose and effect go against the grain of religious liberty protected by the First Amendment.

Id. at 69-70. Justice O'Connor further stated:

> The endorsement test does not preclude government from acknowledging religion or from taking religion into account in making law and policy. It does preclude government from conveying or attempting to convey a message that religion or a particular religious belief is favored or preferred. Such an endorsement infringes religious liberty of the non-adherents for "[w]hen the power, prestige and financial support of government is placed behind a particular religious belief, the indirect coercive pressure upon religious minorities to conform to the prevailing officially approved religion is plain."

Id. at 70. Here the power and direct coercive pressure of the state are exercised on behalf of a sectarian teaching about "personhood."

Under Justice O'Connor's endorsement test, courts must examine whether a statute under review "in fact conveys a message of endorsement," irrespective of the state's actual intent. Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668, 690 (1984). As Justice O'Connor added in her concurrence in Presiding Bishop v. Amos, 107 S.Ct. 2862, 2874 (1987), "To ascertain whether the statute conveys a message of endorsement, the relevant issue is how it would be perceived by an objective observer acquainted with the text, legislative history, and implementation of the statute."

Not only were Missouri Catholics informed through their own church newspaper, the MCC Messenger (Appendix B herein at 40a), that the Missouri Catholic Conference had co-authored, not merely promoted, the anti-abortion bill enacted into law, but also the general public was informed by the secular press that the executive director of the Missouri Catholic Conference and the state legislative chairman of Missouri Citizens for Life had "ghost written" the legislation. The Kansas City Times noted that the role played by the Missouri Catholic Conference was no secret and quoted the executive director to the effect that "some critics of the proposal at the time noted his involvement and charged that religious beliefs were being advanced in the form of state legislation." Sentell, Abortion Law was Work of Ghostwriters, The Kansas City Times, Jan. 23, 1989. A copy of this article is annexed hereto as Appendix C at 43 a.

Also, if an objective observer reading the text of the Missouri statute considers the declaration of personhood contained in the legislative findings as being unnecessary to achieve a valid state interest, then the effect of the statement would be to convey a message that the particular theological theory of life is "favored or preferred." Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. at 70. In essence, if the legislative finding does not further the state's interest, and is in fact an encroachment into a religious area, then both the actual purpose and effect must be to endorse a particular religious viewpoint.

At the very least, the legislative finding made by the Missouri legislature sets forth a legislative preference for a specific theological idea. As Justice Blackmun stated recently, "A statutory preference for the dissemination of religious ideas offends our most basic understanding of what the Establishment Clause is all about and hence is constitutionally intolerable. Texas Monthly, Inc. v. Bullock, 57 U.S.L.W. 4168, 4175 (U.S. Feb. 21, 1989) (Blackmun, J., concurring).

In Thomas v. Review Board, 450 U.S. 707, 716 (1981), this Court reasserted the principle that "[c]ourts are not arbiters of scriptural interpretation." If this is beyond the competence of the Judicial Branch, it is equally outside the domain of the Legislative Branch.

Although noting in Wallace v. Jaffree that it is possible that a legislature will enunciate a sham secular purpose for a statute, nevertheless Justice O'Connor had "little doubt that our courts are capable of distinguishing a sham secular purpose from a sincere one, or that the Lemon inquiry into the effect of an enactment would help decide those close cases where the validity of an express secular purpose is in doubt." 105 S.Ct. at 75. Arguments that the legislative purpose was based upon secular concerns are belied by the sectarian foundation of the legislative action. According to Justice O'Connor, "While the secular purpose requirement alone may rarely be determinative in striking down a statute, it nevertheless serves an important function. It reminds government that when it acts it should do so without endorsing a particular religious belief or practice that all citizens do not share." Id. at 75-76.

VI. IF THIS COURT SHOULD VALIDATE A LEGISLATIVE ACT PREDICATED ON A THEOLOGICALLY-DERIVED LEGISLATIVE FINDING INTENDED TO BE USED IN THE INTERPRETATION OF ALL EXISTING AND PROSPECTIVE LEGISLATION TOUCHING ON THE STATUS OF "THE UNBORN CHILD AT EVERY STAGE OF DEVELOPMENT," SUCH LEGISLATION CREATES THE POTENTIAL FOR EXCESSIVE ENTANGLEMENT BETWEEN CHURCH AND STATE.

The Missouri legislature specifically stated that its findings that "the life of each human being begins at conception" are to be utilized in interpreting and construing the laws of the state. Thus, the suggestion that the findings and purpose portion of the statute is not operative is pure fiction. Apparently such a mandated interpretation would apply to both existing and prospective legislation. The legislature specifically stated that "the laws of this state shall be interpreted and construed to acknowledge on behalf of the unborn child at every stage of development, all the rights, privileges, and immunities available to other persons, citizens, and residents of this state, subject only to the Constitution of the United States, and decisional interpretations thereof by the United States Supreme Court and specific provisions to the contrary in the statutes and construction of this state." (Mo. Rev. Stat. § 1.205.1(2) (1986)).

It is clear that the legislature in this case went beyond restricting the use of public funds or facilities in abortions. It attempted to place a theological interpretation on all existing and future legislation touching on "the unborn child at every stage of development." Such a statutory requirement portends a myriad of unpredictable ways for wreaking havoc in the future.

In Committee for Public Education & Religious Liberty v. Nyquist, 413 U.S. 756 (1973), this Court indicated that the "potential for political divisiveness" was relevant in determining whether legislation created excessive entanglement between church and state. In Nyquist this Court noted that "while the prospects for such divisiveness may not alone warrant the invalidation of state laws . . ., it is certainly a 'warning signal' not to be ignored." 413 U.S. at 797-98.

In Lynch v. Donnelly, Justice O'Connor in her concurring opinion stated that "[p]olitical divisiveness is admittedly an evil addressed by the Establishment Clause. Its existence may be evidence that institutional entanglement is excessive or that a government practice is perceived as an endorsement of religion." 465 U.S. at 689.

VII. THERE IS NO LOGICAL BASIS FOR IMPLANTING ONE THEOLOGICAL VIEW OF PERSONHOOD INTO THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

In Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 132-133 (1973), this Court recognized that "abortion performed before quickening' was not an indictable offense at common law and that "[t]he absence of a common-law crime for pre-quickening abortion appears to have developed from a confluence of earlier philosophical, theological, and civil and canon law concepts of when life begins."

This Court in Roe v. Wade also acknowledged that "the law in effect until mid-nineteenth century was the pre-existing English common law" and that by the end of the 1950's a large majority of jurisdictions banned abortion "unless done to save or preserve the life of the mother." Id. at 138, 139. This Court also noted that "at the time of the adoption of our Constitution, and throughout the major portion of the nineteenth century, abortion was viewed with less disfavor than under most American statutes" in effect at the time of the Roe v. Wade decision. Id. at 140.

A number of amicus briefs filed in this case in support of appellants have argued that the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution somehow changed the common law and somehow included a fetus as a "person" who could neither be deprived of "life, liberty, or property without due process of law" nor be denied the "equal protection of the law." For instance, the brief of a number of religious pro-life groups addresses "the personhood, under the Fourteenth Amendment, of human beings conceived but not yet born." Amicus Brief of Catholics United for Life at 4. That brief argues that the "absence or dearth of case support for unborn personhood is irrelevant" and takes a gigantic leap in logic by citing Cong. Globe, 37th Cong., 2d Sess. 1449 (1862) (Sen. Sumner) tying such a concept to the proposition that the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment intended that "in the eyes of the Constitution, every human being within its sphere . . . from the President to the slave, is a person." Id. at 7, 14.

Similarly, the amicus brief of the Knights of Columbus argues that "viability is an invalid benchmark for construing the meaning of 'person' in the Fourteenth Amendment because it has nothing to do with attributes of personhood, or a particularized state of being, but only the state of medical technology." Brief of the Knights of Columbus at 2. In effect, the Knights of Columbus would have this Court substitute Roman Catholic theology for "medical technology," the sectarian for the secular.

Even the Knights of Columbus brief admits, however, that "the legislative history of the [Fourteenth] Amendment makes no explicit reference to the unborn or to abortion." Id. at 18. Whether the term "human being" includes all unborn children to the time of their conception also is not demonstrated in any Fourteenth Amendment generated case law, and, therefore, would rest solely on church dogma or teaching.

The amicus briefs of Catholics United for Life and Knights of Columbus focus on what they perceive to have been the prevailing mood of the nation and the existing abortion laws at the time the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted. Then, ipse dixit, they engraft on the Fourteenth Amendment the concept that its protection of "persons" includes a fetus. This argument ignores the fact that the common law and the prevailing view at the time of the adoption of our Constitution and the Bill of Rights fails to support any such notion.

The Fifth Amendment contains the same type of language and restraint as does the Fourteenth Amendment. Both provide that a "person" shall not be deprived of "life, liberty, or property, without the due process of law." The only difference is that the Fifth Amendment proscribes actions by the federal government, and the Fourteenth prevents similar action by state governments. How ironic it would be if the same language within the Constitution could produce distinctly different results according to whether the action is federal or state. It is more logical to believe that the authors of the Fourteenth Amendment, in using the word "persons," had in mind the same definition of persons as used by the drafters of the Bill of Rights.

CONCLUSION

The legislative findings and stated legislative purpose establishing the Missouri statute in question on a theological teaching about which there are deep divisions within the religious community require a constitutional determination by this Court that both the purpose and effect of the statute violate the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment because they place the imprimatur of the state upon a particular sectarian belief. For this reason, this Court should affirm the decision of the Court of Appeals.

Dated: March 30, 1989

Respectfully submitted,

Of Counsel:
ROBERT J. LIPSHUTZ
2300 Harris Tower
233 Peachtree Street
Atlanta, Georgia 30043
(404) 688-2300

LEE BOOTHBY
(Counsel of Record)
BOOTHBY, ZIPRICK & YINGST
208 West Mars Street
Berrien Springs, MI 49103
(616) 471-7787
STEVEN GREEN
Vermont Law School
P.O. Box 96, Chelsea Street
South Royalton, Vermont 05068
(802) 763-8303

ROBERT W. NIXON
6930 Carroll Avenue
Takoma Park, Maryland 20912
(202) 722-6320
Attorneys for Amicus Curiae

APPENDIX

APPENDIX A

CONGRESSIONAL RESEARCH SERVICE
THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

CATHOLIC TEACHING ON ABORTION: ITS ORIGIN AND LATER DEVELOPMENT

Charles H. Whittier
Analyst in American National Government
(Religion and Humanities)
Government Division
May 15, 1981

HQ 780

ABSTRACT

This report examines the origins and later development of Catholic teaching regarding abortion. It seeks to present that teaching in relation to changing beliefs on the nature of fetal life and the infusion of the human soul. It provides a context for clarifying continuities and discontinuities in the development of a complex tradition and notes areas for possible dialogue in the search for understanding and consensus.

CONTENTS

ABSTRACT 2a
I. INTRODUCTION 4a
II. SCRIPTURE AND APOSTOLIC TEACHING: THE EARLIEST TRADITION 6a
III. THE FATHERS OF THE CHURCH, AND THE HOMINIZATION OF THE FETUS 8a
IV. ENSOULMENT 13a
V. THE CANONISTS IN THE MIDDLE AGES 15a
VI. ST. THOMAS AQUINAS ON MEDIATE ANIMATION 16a
VII. LATER LEGISLATION: CHANGING TEACHING ON ENSOULMENT 17a
VIII. THE THERAPEUTIC EXCEPTION 21a
IX. PRESENT TEACHING AND ITS STATUS 25a
X. SUMMARY 32a
XI. APPENDIX A—ANIMATION AND THE DECLARATION ON ABORTION (1974) 36a
APPENDIX B—ALBERT THE GREAT AND IMMEDIATE ENSOULMENT 37a

CATHOLIC TEACHING ON ABORTION: ITS ORIGIN AND LATER DEVELOPMENT

INTRODUCTION

Few issues have proved to be more controversial and difficult of resolution than the status of abortion. Whatever the law may permit or forbid at any given period of history, it is evident that widely divergent convictions are held today regarding the moral and ethical principles involved. A carefully nuanced awareness of tradition, its sources and development through history, can strengthen better understanding of differences among men and women of good will, an important condition for the rational dialogue essential to a free and increasingly pluralist society.

Historically, the Judaeo-Christian tradition has been the single most important factor shaping the moral consensus of Western civilization toward the status and character of abortion in religion, medicine, and law. Within that mainstream tradition, Catholic, Orthodox, and traditional Protestant have shared fundamental presuppositions regarding the nature of life in the womb in contradistinction to the culture and law of the pagan world, particularly the Roman Empire.[1]

Within that Judaeo-Christian context, the fetus has been accorded what John Noonan has called an "almost absolute" value[2]—that is to say, an intrinsic (because God-given) worth

[1] See Nardi, Enzo. Procurato Aborto Nel Mondo Graeco Romano. Milan, Dott. A. Giuffre Editore, 1971. Though not yet translated, it is reviewed by Prof. John Scarborough in the American Historical Review, vol. 78, February 1973, p. 77. The practice of abortion (like infanticide), though often condemned, appears to have been widespread in the Graeco-Roman world, reflecting popular indifference to fetal life. No distinction was made between abortion and contraception.

[2] Noonan, John T., ed. The Morality of Abortion. Harvard University Press, 1970. p. 1.

and rightful claim upon life.

While there has been general agreement on the presence of human life or its unique potentiality in the fetus from its conception, certain crucial distinctions have been made by moral theologians at various times in history regarding the so-called "therapeutic exception" (direct or indirect abortion in order to save the life of the mother) and the criteria for its sanction. Further distinctions were recognized from the earliest period—distinctions explicitly considered by the 5th century—regarding the infusion of the soul into the fetus in relation to the understanding of embryonic development prevalent in the early centuries of the Christian era and into modern times. As a result of these distinctions in the hominization[3] and ensoulment of the fetus, there was some variation in the analysis of abortion as a sin and as a delict[4] and, consequently, in the canonical penalties prescribed.

The most fully developed theology of abortion occurred within the Roman Catholic Church, which, adhering to the common Christian consensus in respect to abortion, gave rise to a long tradition of casuistry—that is, the application of moral principles to the exigencies of particular situations, with distinctions in penalty (the private penance or poena, punishment) appropriate to the case. During the great formative period of Western canon law in the Middle Ages, the apostolic and patristic tradition was incorporated into the law of the Latin Church and the distinctions of embryonic ensoulment

[3] The process of becoming fully human.

[4] That is, a crime, a morally imputable violation involving objective, subjective, and juridic elements. The delict of abortion (which requires both malicious intent and use of deliberate means) always presupposes a mortal sin, but not every sin of abortion is a delict. Abortion is punished by excommunication. It constitutes an irregularity for those (males) seeking Orders, and clerics are liable to deposition. The canons on abortion are analyzed in detail in Huser, Roger J., O.F.M. The Crime of Abortion in Canon Law. Washington, Catholic University Press, 1942. p. 79-121.

further refined in a process which may be said to have continued to the present day, as "an ever-growing appreciation of insights possessed from the beginning."[5]

This development in the history of theology and casuistry, which has profoundly affected beliefs, attitudes, and feelings in the moral and ethical consciousness of Western civilization, and which is significant not only to religious believers but to the larger community, can further understanding of the complex process by which moral judgment is shaped in history through the conflict of values. In addition, widely-popularized misunderstandings associated with the ensoulment controversy,[6] supposed changes in the Church's teaching, and related matters, are clarified and corrected by careful examination of the historical context.

SCRIPTURE AND APOSTOLIC TEACHING: THE EARLIEST TRADITION

Abortion—that is, deliberate detachment and expulsion of a previable fetus, incapable of extra-uterine existence—was

---

[5] Kerns, Joseph. Relevant Currents in the History of Sexuality. The Problem of Population—Moral and Theological Considerations. Edited by Donald Barrett. Notre Dame, Indiana, University of Notre Dame Press, 1964. p. 39.

[6] Thus, the Supreme Court in 1973 (Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, p. 45) declared "mediate animation" to have been "official Roman Catholic dogma until the 19th century," though it never was, before or since the 19th century. Further, the Court spoke of the "existence of life from the moment of conception" as "now, of course, the official belief of the Catholic Church," whereas the Church has always taught that human life is present incipiently, even if the soul is not infused at conception, and has therefore always condemned abortion at every stage. (See the text of the 1974 Declaration on Abortion by the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Appendix A, p. 35). The Court also refers to "agreement" among canonists and theologians that destruction of the pre-formed fetus was "not a homicide"; no mention is made of traditional teaching regarding feticide or destruction of the embryo as anticipatory homicide.

associated with infanticide by early Christians and condemned as a grave sin, a form of homicide. The Bible does not deal specifically with abortion, though some argue that the sanctity of fetal life is clearly implied by passages which speak of the pregnancies of Mary and Elizabeth: Matthew 1:18, and Luke 1:41 and 42, especially the former where the "babe" (brephos) is said to have "leaped in [Elizabeth's] womb," for joy at the greeting of Mary. The Pauline condemnation of the "desires of the flesh" in Galatians 5:17-21 includes pharmakeia, usually translated as "sorcery" or "witchcraft" but actually meaning medicine in the sense of drugs with magical or occult power, used as abortifacients. Similarly, the practitioners of such magic, the pharmakai, are condemned in Revelation 21:8 and 22:15, where they are associated with homicides, fornicators, and the like. Deliberate abortion was linked in the Christian view with lust and violence. This association is made in the authoritative Didache,[7] the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, a first century treatise on morals and discipline emanating from the Syrian Christian community: "You shall not practice medicine (pharmakeia). You shall not slay the child by abortions. You shall not kill what is generated" (Didache 2:2). They are said to be "killers of the child who abort the mold (plasma) of God," which may be a reference to the distinction between "unformed" and "formed" fetuses. If so, it is a thoroughgoing prohibition of abortion at any stage of fetal life.

Other writings of the Apostolic Church repeat this condemnation: the Epistle of Barnabas, composed between 70-100 AD at Alexandria, which associates abortion with sinning against one's neighbor; the second century Apocalypse of Peter, the most important and popular of the apocryphal apocalypses[8]; and the Apocalypse of Paul (fourth century).

Much controversy has surrounded the seemingly explicit reference in Scripture to abortion—if, indeed, it is a reference

---

[7] The Didache was discovered in 1875 and first published in 1883.

[8] Books, outside the official cannon of Scripture, claiming to reveal "hidden" truths concerning the Last Days.

to abortion: Exodus 21:22-25, which prescribes penalties for injuries to a pregnant woman resulting in the premature birth of a dead child. Rabbinic law generally did not regard the fetus as a human being until birth, though some scholars have held that the ancient law prescribed the death penalty for abortion of a "completed" or "formed" fetus. In any event, the Greek Septuagint[9] translation of the Hebrew Bible, popular among Christians, expanded the Hebrew text in Exodus 21:22 so that "life shall pay for life" (the lex talionis or law of retaliation) for the accidental killing of a "formed" fetus. Thus, the Septuagint reading, reflecting the understanding of fetal development in the Graeco-Roman world, influenced Christian thinking as we shall see, regarding the difference between the "formed" and "unformed" fetus.

THE FATHERS OF THE CHURCH, AND THE HOMINIZATION OF THE FETUS

The Fathers of the Church, both before and after the 4th century, reflected and continued earlier teaching on abortion.[10] Clement of Alexandria (d. c. 215 AD) in his Paedagogus, the "Schoolmaster,"[11] dealing with Christian life and manners, condemns destruction of the embryo with abortifacient drugs. Similarly, Athenagoras of Athens, a 2nd century apologist, in his letter to the Emperor Marcus Aurelius and his son Commodus, denounces abortion: "the fetus in the womb is not an animal, and it is God's providence that he exist" (the Apology or Supplication, the "Embassy for the Christians," dated c. 177

[9] From the tradition of its having been translated by 72 scholars in Alexandria for Greek-speaking Jews. It became the early Christians' Bible. The great Hellenistic Jewish philosopher and Scriptural exegete, Philo (d., c. 50 AD) of Alexandria, interpreted Exodus 2:22-25 in the Septuagint reading as condemning both accidental and intentional killing of the formed fetus.

[10] Patristic writings and early Conciliar legislation are discussed in: Huser, The Crime of Abortion, p. 1229.

[11] Paedagogus 2.10.86.1.

AD).[12] Minucius Felix, an African Christian lawyer (d. c. 200 AD), in his Octavius, writes of the pagans: "By drinks of drugs they extinguish in their viscera the beginning of a man-to-be and before they bear, they commit parricide," an interesting use of a term drawn from Roman law, parricidium, the killing of a near relation, to include abortion.[13]

Tertullian (d. c. 220 AD), also an African and a lawyer, perhaps the greatest theologian of the African Church before Augustine, angrily repudiates the accusation of infanticide and replies: "For us, indeed . . . it is not lawful to destroy what is conceived in the womb while the blood is still being formed into a man . . . . He who is man-to-be is man, as all fruit is now in the seed."[14] It is sometimes argued that Tertullian, in the De Anima, "On the soul" (25.4), accepts the possibility of therapeutic abortion of the "unformed" or pre-formed fetus—that is, embryotomy to prevent matricide. It seems clear that he did hold to the belief that a full human being (homo) is present in the womb only after a certain stage of development and formation. The evidence that he allowed for therapeutic abortion is still debated.[15]

[12] Embassy for the Christians, c. 35, given in Patrologiae Cursus Completus, . . . Series Graeca, 6.191 (the Greek Fathers).

[13] Octavius 2.43 in the Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum (the Latin Fathers).

[14] Apologeticum ad nationes 1.15. Tertullian is not always consistent as to the character of the soul which some believed present at conception: see Section IV, p. 13. His belief in some form of mediate animation from the moment of conception is said to have influenced Albert the Great.

[15] The passage in question is translated by Noonan in his Morality of Abortion, p. 13 (based on the Latin edition of H.J. Waszink, Amsterdam, 1947). He argues that it would be inconsistent with Tertullian's general position regarding abortion. George Williams, however, believes that Tertullian "was constrained to make one sad exception" in his condemnation of abortion, i.e., the "therapeutic exception" to save the mother's life. Williams, George. Religious Gradually a "consensus Patrum" or authoritative patristic tradition emerged on abortion, finding its legislative expression in the acts of the Council of Ancyra in 314 and the Council of Elvira around 306. The former, representing Bishops in Syria and Asia Minor, reduced the penance for abortion from excommunication for life to ten years. Since the Council retained the life penance for all other forms of voluntary homicide, its action may be viewed as a recognition of mitigating circumstances, at least in the Eastern Church. By contrast, in the West, the Council of Elvira in Spain extended lifetime excommunication to women whose abortion was the result of adultery and, in an extraordinarily severe ruling, precluded even death-bed reconciliation. The differing approaches by Ancyra and Elvira indicate that already by the 4th century, though abortion was universally condemned, distinctions in gravity and thus in penalty were evident, probably in response to the special pastoral problems of various regions.[16] The canons of Ancyra later acquired immense authority in both East and West by their ratification at the Fourth Ecumenical Council held at Chalcedon in 451. Eventually the milder penalty for abortion received the force of the law in the West under Charlemagne in the 8th century.

Though neither Ancyra nor Elvira touch upon the formed-unformed distinction, the 4th century is also the period in which that problem is first dealt with explicitly and, in terms of future policy, authoritatively by several of the greatest and most influential among the Church Fathers—Augustine and Jerome. Following the hylomorphism of Aristotle—the belief that the actuality of every entity is determined by its material form—both Augustine and Jerome distinguish the "unformed"

Residues and Presuppositions in the American Debate on Abortion. Theological Studies, Vol. 31, No. 1, March 1970. p. 25-26.

[16] The canons of Elvira and Ancyra, canon 53 and canon 21 respectively, are given in Mansi, J.D., Sacrorum Conciliorum Nova et Amplissima Collectio 2.5-19 and 2.16.

from the "formed" fetus, influenced again by the Aristotelian teaching, generally accepted in the ancient world (as well as by the Septuagint reading of Exodus 21:22), that there are developmental stages in the emergence of uterine life. For Aristotle, full hominization does not occur until approximately 40 days after conception in the case of males and 90 days in the case of females.[17] Some scholars hold that this belief is probably reflected in Leviticus 12:1-5, where the ritual purification for women after childbirth is prescribed at 40 days for a male and 80 days for a female.[18] In any event, it was widely believed that the fetus became a human being at the moment of "formation," prior to which Aristotle distinguished stages of "unformed" fetal development. This teaching of gradual hominization, inevitably bound up with Christian doctrine regarding the infusion of the soul by God (dealt with in greater detail in Section IV on ensoulment), is evident in the fact that both Augustine and Jerome, sharing a cautious agnosticism on (the time of) ensoulment, accepted the unformed-formed distinction.

---

[17] Aristotle, History of Animals 7.3.583. The belief in progressive ensoulment from vegetable to animal to rational or human stages in fetal life appears in many other writers—for example, the Stoic philosopher, Poseidonius of Apamaea (fl. Syria, c. 51 BC), who held that the rational soul, infused at birth, was distinct from the corporeal spirit that conferred sentient and appetitive life.

[18] See Connery, John R., S.J. Abortion: The Development of the Roman Catholic Perspective. Chicago, Loyola University Press, 1977. p. 18, 108, 326-327. The eighty-day Levitical computation was generally accepted by later writers for female formation, including St. Albert the Great (d. 1280), who attributed the difference between male and female formation to the greater heat believed to be generated by the male. The Levitical computation appears as late as the 15th century in the Summa of St. Antoninus of Florence (d. 1459). It may derive from the De natura puerorum of Hippocrates in the 4th century B.C., which is probably reflected in Aristotle and in Leviticus alike. Hippocrates is cited for the time of animation as late as the 17th century—by de Lugo (d. 1660), one of the greatest theologians of his age.

In his commentary on Exodus,[19] Augustine notes that abortion before formation, for him equivalent to "animation" or ensoulment, does not constitute homicide "for there cannot yet be said to be a live soul in a body that lacks sensation when it is not formed in flesh and so not yet endowed with sense." Similarly, Jerome writes that "seeds are gradually formed in the uterus, and it [abortion] is not reputed homicide until the scattered elements receive their appearance and members."[20] Whether the non-formed or unformed fetus has life, is "vivified," is left unresolved—Augustine, for example, is uncertain in the matter.

However, the abortion of the unformed conceptus, though not classified as murder, is still severely condemned.[21] Indeed, Augustine in his Marriage and Concupiscence provided what would become a classic text against abortion of the *un*formed fetus, a text later incorporated into the authoritative collections of canon law by Gratian and Peter Lombard in the 12th century. In the famous section beginning Aliquando ("sometimes") Augustine describes abortion of the "pre-vivified" fetus as "lustful cruelty or cruel lust" in which "the wife (becomes) the harlot of her husband, or he is [as] an adulterer with his own wife."[22]

Alongside this Augustinian view of fetal development, a more rigorist position continued to exist, which ignored (if it did not reject) the unformed-formed argument. Thus, St. Basil the Great (d. c. 379), Bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, in his letter to Amphilocius, writes: "the hair-splitting difference between formed and unformed makes no difference to us . . .

---

[19] On Exodus 21:80.

[20] Epistola ad Algasiam, 121.4.

[21] Epistola ad Eustochium 22.13. Philo, similarly, condemns intercourse for any purpose other than procreation (Joseph 9:43), reflecting Rabbinic, Stoic, and later Christian views.

[22] De nuptiis et concupiscentia 1.15.17. The text is discussed in: Noonan, John T. Contraception. Cambridge, Mass., Harvard University Press, 1954. p. 171-173.

Whoever deliberately commit abortion are subject to the penalty for homicide."[23] Nevertheless, he retains the more lenient penance imposed by Ancyra—ten years rather than life. These views acquired canonical status in the East and may be said to have influenced those in the West who favored a stricter position regarding early abortion.

ENSOULMENT

The disagreement over the status of the unformed as against the formed fetus was crucial for Christian teaching on the soul. It was widely held that the soul was not present until the formation of the fetus 40 or 80 days after conception, for males and females respectively. Thus, abortion of the "unformed" or "inanimate" fetus (from anima, soul) was something less than true homicide, rather a form of anticipatory or quasi-homicide. This view received its definitive treatment in St. Thomas Aquinas and became for a time the dominant interpretation in the Latin Church.[24]

However, the contrary view—that the human soul is infused at the moment of conception—has always been maintained within the Church, both East and West. It is found in Gregory of Nyssa (d. c. 395),[25] the younger brother of Basil the Great, where, however, it is associated with what is called traducionism, the belief that the soul is transmitted by parents to their offspring.[26] In a spiritualized form traducionism has been

---

[23] Epistola ad Amphilochium 188. There is a translation into English of the "Basilian canon," in part, in: Huser, The Crime of Abortion, p. 22.

[24] See Reany, William. The Creation of the Human Soul. New York, Benziger Brothers, 1932. p. 173-180.

[25] Ibid., p. 182 (citing St. Gregory's De anima et resurrectione, "On the soul and the resurrection").

[26] For an extended discussion of traducionism, see The New Catholic Encyclopedia. Vol. 14. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1967. p. 230. It was condemned in 498 by Pope Anastasius II in a letter to the Gallican bishops, noting that the soul is said to be infused four weeks after conception.

taught by many, and was revived in the last century by Rosmini-Serbati (d. 1855) and others. The teaching of Tertullian—"he is a human being [in essence] who will be one"—influenced Augustine and, later, Luther and the Reformers generally toward what is often said to be traducionism or "generationism," signifying the creative power of the soul given by God to generate and transmit another soul. In fact, however, the Church Fathers are often difficult to interpret when dealing with the origin of the soul. Traducionism, though formally condemned, has survived in differing forms as the attempt to explain and reconcile the spiritual and biological aspects of human life in its inception.

There is then no unanimous and authoritative teaching in Catholic tradition regarding every aspect of the nature of the soul in relation to the body[27] (except for the character of the soul as simple, immaterial, created, immortal, and infused), and the Church has never defined the manner of the origin of the soul or the time of its infusion—"immediate" (at conception) and "mediate" (delayed) animation alike have been held at various times both in the past and today.

---

[27] Ibid., Vol. 13, p. 462 and 470-471. See also Connery, Abortion, p. 212: "Distinctions the Church makes, or does not make, in regard to penalties do not constitute church teaching. So while it is true that the Church today penalizes abortion at any stage, it would be wrong to conclude from this that it teaches immediate animation or infusion of a rational soul in the fetus. This it has never done." Fr. Connery further notes (p. 308), "The only opinion the Church has ever condemned was that which identified animation with the time of birth. It has never taught immediate animation. Even the fathers of Vatican II resisted efforts to elicit such a teaching statement in connection with its condemnation of abortion. And the most recent declaration (1974) on abortion from the Scared Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith made a similar bypass of the question." See Appendix A, p. 41, the Declaration on Abortion by the Sacred Congregation.

THE CANONISTS IN THE MIDDLE AGES: "SI ALIQUIS . . . AND "SICUT EX. . ."

The decretals Si Aliquis and Sicut Ex are the two most important rulings affecting the treatment of abortion by the canonists in the Middle Ages.

In contradistinction to the Augustinian view of mediate animation, based upon the unformed-formed distinction, the more rigorist view, treating abortion at any stage as homicide, found classic expression in the famous anonymous 10th century decretal Si Aliquis ("If anyone . . ."),[28]. Significantly, Si Aliquis was omitted in 1096 from the Panormia of Ivo of Chartres (d. 1116), the most influential canonical collection before Gratian in the 12th century. The Panormia included three canons citing patristic authority (Augustine and Jerome) in support of the distinctions between the unformed and formed fetus and differentiated penalties. This, the less rigorous view, was given definitive status in Gratian's Decretum of c. 1140: "he is not a murderer who brings about abortion before the soul is in the body."[29] He cites Ivo of Chartres, Augustine, Jerome, and a spurious text attributed to Augustine (Pseudo-Augustine) which states explicitly that there is "no soul before the form." The distinction in penalty between homicide and quasi-homicide is made by the commentators on Gratian, notably Rufinus (1157-59) and the Glossa Ordinaria (1215-1245).

In his famous letter of 1211 to the Carthusians (concerning a monk who has accidentally caused his mistress to abort), Pope Innocent III (1160-1216) held that homicide could occur only after the fetus was "vivified" or ensouled (i.e., formed, animated). As the canon Sicut ex,[30] this letter was included in the [28] There is a discussion of Si aliquis in John T. Noonan's Contraception, p. 208-210. The decretal, erroneously attributed by Burchard of Worms (d. 1012) to a Council held at Worms in 830, is associated with Regino of Prum (c. 900-915).

---

[29] Gratian, Decretum 2.32.2.8-10.

[30] The full text of Sicut ex (Inasmuch as . . .) is given in Huser's The Crime of Abortion in Canon Law, p. 50.

definitive Decretales[31] of Gregory IX (1148-1241) by the compiler, Raymond of Pennafort (d. 1275), and promulgated in 1234 in the Bull "Rex Pacificus." This was the last authentic collection of canon law for the Roman Church until 1917 and the first legislation applicable to the whole Church which incorporated the theory of delayed or mediate animation. Si Aliquis was also included in the Decretales, and was reconciled with Sicut ex by use of the "quasi-homicide" category for abortion of the unformed fetus, an act subject to lesser penalties than abortion as homicide (i.e., of the formed fetus). No official judgment was rendered then—or at any later time—as to the moment of animation, though most canonists accepted some variant of the Aristotelian theory reflected in the Septuagint Exodus and in Leviticus. The distinction in penalties on this basis was taught by the greatest canonists of the Middle Ages, including Bernard of Parma or de Bottone (d. 1264), Hostiensis[32] (Henry of Suso or Segusio, d. 1271), Joannes Andreae (d. 1348), and Panormitanus (Nicolaus de Tudeschis, d. 1445). The last two explicitly cite the 40-80 day norm for formation and animation or ensoulment.

ST. THOMAS AQUINAS ON MEDIATE ANIMATION

The theory of mediate animation, incorporated in canon law, was taught by the most authoritative theologians of the Middle Ages. It appears in the Sentences of Peter Lombard (d. 1160),[33] and in the commentary of Albert the Great (d. 1280)[34] upon the Sentences. Abortion of the unformed fetus is treated not as homicide but as a sin against marriage, the natural law, and the

---

[31] Gregory IX, Decretales 5.12.20.

[32] Hostiensis is perhaps the first to speak of aborting the unformed fetus as "interpretative" homicide or homicidium conditionaliter: Summa aurea 5.1 (written c. 1253).

[33] Libri IV Sententiarum 4.31. (See, however, the Appendix B for Albert on the soul's infusion.)

[34] In libros IV sententiarum in Opera, vol. 30, 4.31.18.

rightful use of the reproductive organs. The teaching of Albert was further developed in his greatest pupil, St. Thomas (d. 1274).

For St. Thomas, as for mediaeval Christendom generally, there is a lapse of time—approximately 40 to 80 days—after conception and before the soul's infusion. Until that action by God, there is a primitive embryonic organization associated with a vegetative and later a sensitive "soul" or vital principle, related potentially to but distinct from the fully human or rational soul and deriving from the "formative virtue" in the semen—an attempt to reconcile the materialist metaphysics of Aristotle's hylomorphism[35] with the supernatural understanding of the origin of life and of the soul in Christian teaching. The vegetative and sensitive souls are by definition corruptible, unlike the rational or intellectual soul, which is incorruptible, simple, immaterial, yet all three constitute the unity of the soul as the form of the body, a union destined by God. St. Thomas ascribed this successive or delayed animation, in part, to the principle of proportionality in terms of the rudimentary character, as was generally supposed, of embryonic activity and organization in the period after conception.

For St. Thomas, "seed and what is not seed is determined by sensation and movement."[36] What is destroyed in abortion of the unformed fetus is seed, not man. This distinction received its most careful analysis in St. Thomas. It was the general belief of Christendom, reflected, for example, in the Council of Trent (1545-1563), which restricted penalties for homicide to abortion of an animated fetus only.

LATER LEGISLATION: CHANGING TEACHING ON ENSOULMENT

The rigorist tradition reappeared, however, in the Counter-Reformation. In 1588 Pope Sixtus V (1521-1590), in the course

---

[35] The belief that the soul is the form of the body.

[36] St. Thomas, In octo libros politicorum 7.12.

of a vigorous campaign against prostitution in Rome, issued the Bull Effraenatam, imposing severe penalties for abortion at any stage. In effect, the Bull abolished the formed-unformed distinction, reverting to the position of the Council of Elvira. Abortion at any stage was defined as homicide, entailing the full penalties of secular and canon law alike. Since this position was in conflict with canonists and theologians as well as with the Sacred Penitentiary, the body charged with administering penances, it encountered considerable opposition.[37]

In 1591, Sixtus' successor, Gregory XIV (1590-91), acted to repeal all the penalties of Effraenatam except those applying to an ensouled fetus. His Apostolic Constitution Sedes Apostolica of 1591 represented a return to the mainstream of mediaeval tradition, reserving absolution and penance for abortion of the unformed fetus to the local Bishop. This, the so-called Sixtine-Gregorian law, remained in effect until the mid-19th century—indeed, until the revision of canon law in 1917.

In 1869 in his Apostolic Constitution Apostolicae Sedis, Pope Pius IX broke with the older tradition by omitting all distinctions in canonical penalties between the unformed and the formed fetus. The effect was implicitly to accept the theory of immediate ensoulment or, at least, to provide for it as a likely possibility.[38] In 1917, with the promulgation of the new Code of Canon Law by Benedict XV (1854-1922), the 40 to 80 day animation determination, still in effect for dealing with irregularities, was completely eliminated. The definition of abortion as the ejection of an immature or non-viable fetus by deliberate intent and efficacious means derives from Sixtus V. By fetus is meant the human organization in the womb after conception and before birth. In effect, the teaching of Effraenatam and the Council of Elvira has become the officially sanctioned position of the Church. This shift was, in large measure, the result of changing opinion regarding ensoulment at conception and growing knowledge of fetal development.[39] It also reflected the increased moral authority of the Holy See and the consequent tendency of canonists and theologians to follow papal leadership in contrast with earlier periods.

---

[37] The contrasting policies of Sixtus and his successor, Gregory, are discussed in: Grisez, Germain G. Abortion. New York, Corpus Books, 1966. p. 167-168. Pertinent texts from the Sixtine-Gregorian law are cited in Huser, The Crime of Abortion in Canon Law, p. 62-80.

[38] See Callahan, Daniel. Abortion: Law, Choice, and Morality. London, Collier-Macmillan, 1970. p. 413. See also Granfield, David. The Abortion Decision. Garden City, New York, Doubleday Image Books, 1970. p. 62-63.

Other factors helped shape Catholic thought in this area, including the fact that belief in the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception had become general in the course of the 16th century, though it would not be defined as dogma until 1854 by Pius IX. However, as early as 1701 it was declared a feast of universal obligation by Clement XI, and its liturgical observance heightened popular consciousness concerning the sanctity of fetal life from its conception.

In 1620 Thomas Fienus, a physician at Louvain, argued that the rational soul was infused three days after conception. In 1621 a more influential work appeared, a treatise on medical-legal questions by Paolo Zacchia, a physician of Rome. Wholly rejecting the Aristotelian—Thomistic theories, he argued that the rational soul "must be infused in the first moment of conception." H views were to be widely debated, but in 1644 he received a signal mark of Papal approbation, being named [39] Increasing scrutiny of aborted embryos and the discovery of spermatozoa by Leeuwenhoek in 1677 seemed to s pport a preformationist theory of life as fully present in seminal fo m and unfolding in gestation, popularly understood as the homuculus in the ovum, ensouled at or three days after conception. A similar view appears to have been held by the philosopher Leibniz (d. 1716). The older view of epigenesis, life manifest in successive stages, the "metamorphosis of souls" in the embryo, was increasingly challenged as lacking substantiation.

---

"General Proto-Physician of the Whole Roman Ecclesiastical State" by Innocent X.

The changing climate of opinion[40] in the Holy See was evident when in 1679 the Holy Office under Innocent XI condemned sixty-five propositions as "at least scandalous and in practice dangerous." The censure concerned itself with their prudence rather than their truth; nevertheless it marks the influence of conservative theologians at Louvain and Rome against "laxism," the tendency to relax the obligations of natural and positive law in difficult cases of conscience.[41] Specifically, it rejected the views of Tomas Sanchez (d. 1610) and Caramuel y Lobkowicz (d. 1682). Caramuel was associated with the belief that the rational soul is infused at birth, and Sanchez with the argument that "a girl, detected as pregnant" could licitly abort (before ensoulment) to save herself from harm at the hands of relatives.[42]

It should be noted that the official position in canon law and in moral theology still held to the unformed-formed, inanimate-animate distinction. Thus, the greatest and most influential Catholic moral theologian of the 18th century, Alphonsus Liguori (1696-1787), in his Theologia (1753-1755), held it to be "certain" that there is no immediate ensoulment, though (he noted) "some say badly"[43] to the contrary. Already, however, as [40] Fuller background for this change is given in: Grisez, Abortion, p. 170-177.

[41] For laxism, see Cross, F. L., ed. Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church. London, Oxford University Press, 1958. p. 791-792.[3]

[42] De matrimonia 9, disp. 20, N. 11. Sanchez' arguments are examined in Noonan's Contraception, p. 442-444. See also Connery, John. Grisez on Abortion in Theological Studies, Vol. 31, No. 1, March, 1970. p. 173-74. Sanchez provides other instances in which he justifies therapeutic abortion (before ensoulment): the endangered survival of the mother, and rape. In both cases the fetus is an innocent aggressor against whom the mother may act in self defense.

[43] Liguori, Theologia Moralis 6.394.

early as 1736, there had been a theological analysis of abortion by Constantino Roncaglia arguing the "most probable" view for ensoulment at conception or "at least from the third or seventh day." Roncaglia's Universale Moralis Theologia was published at Lucca in 1834. Even Liguori, who did not accept this position, acknowledged that "there flourishes the opinion, received not without approbation from experts, that the fetus from the beginning of conception, or at least after several days, is informed by a soul."[44] Since at least 1658 and the Baptisms of Doubtful Men of Geronimo Florentinio, significantly enough a member of the same order as Roncaglia (the Congregation of the Mother of God),[45] it had been held that a fetus should be baptized even if taken from its mother's womb before 40 days after conception, given the possibility (which eventually came to be seen as the probability) of the soul's having been already infused.

Thus, within about two or three centuries—from the mid or latter 17th to the mid-19th—the Church's official teaching "developed to an almost absolute prohibition"[46] of abortion at any stage, a "substantial return" to the earliest tradition associated with the Church Fathers.

THE THERAPEUTIC EXCEPTION

The so-called "therapeutic exception," abortion to save the life of the mother, has never been officially sanctioned by the [44] Ibid., 6.121.

[45] Founded at Lucca in 1573 by St. John Leonardi—hence the popular name Leonardini—the Clerks Regular or Religious of the Mother of God, conceived in the spirit of Counter-Reformation piety, were instrumental in fostering devotion to the Immaculate Conception.

[46] Noonan, The Morality of Abortion, p. 36. It should be noted that the human ovum was not discovered until 1827 by Karl Ernest Baer (1792-1876), and not till nearly half a century later was the union of ovum and sperm at conception determined.

Church. Nevertheless, some form of therapeutic abortion has been defended as licit by a number of eminent theologians since the 14th century.[47] The Dominican John of Naples (fl. 1310-36) argued that a physician "ought to give (such) medicine [abortifacient]" in order "to preserve a pregnant woman" if the fetus were not ensouled. Antoninus of Florence (1389-1459) cites this opinion as probable, though he himself rejected it as dangerous if there is any doubt. The same view is cited with caution by Sylvester da Prieras (d. 1523). The leading canonists of the 16th century, Azpilcueta (d. 1586), held that if the physician "believed with probability" that the fetus was not ensouled,[48] he was not guilty of homicide in prescribing abortifacients. He cites this as the common opinion.[49] These opinions coincided with and may be seen as the reflection of the rise of probabilism, the teaching that in any doubtfully licit action; a solidly probable opinion favoring liberty or leniency is permitted even though the opposing opinion, favoring the law, may be more probable.[50] (Eventually, under the influence of Liguori, a more nuanced form of probabilism became generally accepted throughout the Church.)

---

[47] The theological history of the "therapeutic exception" is considered in Noonan, The Morality of Abortion, p. 26-32; in Grisez, Abortion, p. 166-184; and in Connery, Abortion, p. 173-313.

[48] For Azpilcueta, as for most canonists in his day, this meant 50 days after conception.

[49] The argument of the Franciscan Antonius de Corduba (d. 1578) in support of acceleratio partus (hastening the delivery) by means directed to saving the mother's life was widely accepted by many authorities, including the noted Jesuit theologians Theophile Raynaud (d. 1663), Edmund Voit (d. 1780), de Lugo, and Antonius Diana (d. 1663), all of whom permit indirect and "accidental" abortion of an unanimated fetus where the mother's life is endangered. Such views were rejected by Cardenas (d. 1684) and others because of the possibility that the fetus might be animated by a rational soul.

[50] For Probabilism, Probabiliorism, and Equiprobabilism see: The New Catholic Encyclopedia, vol. 11, p. 814-815, and vol. 5, p. 502-503.

It remained for Sanchez (1550-1610), generally regarded as the greatest Catholic moral theologian of his time, to provide a fuller theoretical defense of therapeutic abortion.[51] He noted exceptions to the prohibition on abortion: when the mother's life is endangered and the fetus not ensouled, abortion "more probably" is lawful. Sanchez invokes the "double-effect" argument from St. Thomas on self-defense (as well as "just war" theory, calling to mind the rabbinic tradition which regarded the fetus in such cases as an "innocent pursuer" or "unjust aggressor" against whom the mother may act in self-defense). That is, he argues that while direct abortion is, of course, always illicit, the mother is not bound to sacrifice her life for an unensouled embryo. Hence, "indirect" means are licit to induce abortion. The Jesuit theologian, Leonard Lessius (1554-1623), himself a pupil of Suarez, carried this argument further, justifying therapeutic abortion broadly, provided there be no "direct intention" to kill the fetus.[52]

Liguori himself followed this line of reasoning, holding Sanchez' opinion to be probable. He cites Bernard Busenbaum (d. 1668) for the view that for the mother whose life is threatened by an unensouled fetus, "it is lawful to take (an abortifacient), and according to some she is bound to take it, intending

---

[51] For a different perspective from that of Noonan see Means, Cyril. A Historian's View. In Hall, Robert, ed. Abortion in a Changing World. New York, Columbia University Press, 1970. p. 16-24. Citing ten authorities from John of Naples to Paul Laymann (d. 1635) in favor of therapeutic abortion, Means holds further that St. Thomas "seems to have condoned "Tertullian's alleged approval of embryotomy sub silentio, an argument "from silence" and hence subject to widely varying interpretations. The argument "from silence" also appears in articles by Pietro Avanzini (d. 1874), sometime editor of the official journal of The Holy See, in favor of craniotomy.

[52] Lessius, De justitia et jure (1635) 2.9.2.58. Many who defended the "therapeutic exception" cited St. Thomas in the Summa Theologiea II-II, p. 64, a.7.

directly only hēr own health, although indirectly and consequently the fetus is destroyed."[53]

In 1872 the Sacred Penitentiary, consulted regarding embryotomy (craniotomy), replied: "Consult approved authors, old and new, and act prudently."[54] Such counsel reflected the prevailing practice. However, from 1884 to 1902 a series of Holy Office responses, reflecting doubtless the changing sentiment on ensoulment, ruled against embryotomy regardless of intention.[55] In 1902 even the ectopic (extra-uterine) exception was eliminated in a ruling that permitted the operation only if both lives—mother and fetus—would be protected "by ordinary results." This position was reaffirmed by Pius XII in 1951 and by Paul VI in 1968.

Many theologians now hold that fetal death not due to purpose or intent by mother or physician, but rather as the side-effect of seriously needed therapy or surgery, may be justified according to "double effect"—that is, if a threatened abortion is so acute as to appear medically "inevitable," the physician may act to save the mother's life so long as he neither seeks nor intends the death of the fetus and so long as his procedures do not materially accelerate that death. Only two instances have been cited by theologians as licit, using these criteria: removal of a pathological tube in the case of an ectopic pregnancy,

---

[53] Liguori, Theologia Moralis 3.394.

[54] Response of November 28, 1872 to a question directed to the Penitentiary on September 2, 1869, cited by: Bouscaren, T. Lincoln. Ethics of Ectopic Operations. 2nd ed. Milwaukee, Bruce Publishing Co., 1944. p. 13. Means notes that a number of authorities taught the licitness of therapeutic abortion: he cites Guiseppe Pennacchi and Augustin Lemkuhl (d. 1917) among them; Pennacchi in his De abortu et embryotomia, published in 1884, appears to have accepted Tertullian's alleged precedent. Lemkuhl is the author of the 1872 ruling, given in his Theologia Moralis, 10th edition, vol. I, p. 505, no. 804 (1902).

[55] The questions and responses are given in full in Bouscaren's Ethics of Ectopic Operations, p. 183-186.

defended by Huser as "in most cases . . . justifiable," and removal of a cancerous uterus.[56]

PRESENT TEACHING AND ITS STATUS

The spread of abortion in modern times and the gradual erosion of the Aristotelian-Thomistic analysis of gestation have led to condemnation of abortion at every stage, "erasing the distinction between a formed (ensouled) and unformed fetus." Thus, the 1911 edition of Slater's Manual of Moral Theology notes that "following the common opinion, we may put aside as antiquated the hypothesis of a living fetus not yet informed by a human soul. The human soul is infused into the fetus at the moment of conception, according to the common opinion." In Volume I of the 1918 edition, it is said that the soul is infused at conception "as is commonly held by theologians."[57] In fact, however, this does not appear to have been the "common opinion" until a later time. Thus, McHugh and Callan's Moral Theology (Volume II, 1930) speak more cautiously of abortion as always homicidal "if done after animation, which according to many today is simultaneous with conception."[58] In his A Manual of Neo-Scholastic Philosophy, published in 1923, Charles Barschab, writing of St. Thomas and the infusion of the soul, observes that "today this opinion is not shared gener-

---

[56] See: Huser, The Crime of Abortion, p. 137; and Noonan, Contraception, p. 46-50, on the debate between Agostino Gemelli (d. 1959) and Arthur Vermeersch (d. 1936) in 1933. See also: Connery, Abortion, p. 295-303: "Theologians generally accepted the conclusion of Bouscaren . . . that the tube might be removed as a pathological organ when necessary to save the life of the mother."

[57] Slater, Thomas. Manual of Moral Theology. Vol. II. New York, Benziger Brothers, 1918. p. 312.

[58] McHugh, John A. and Charles Callan. Moral Theology. Vol. II, Sect. 1848. New York, Joseph F. Wagner, 1930, p. 115. The authors emphasize that "the mother is not obliged to prefer the temporal life of the child to her own life" (i.e., if the latter is endangered by pregnancy).

ally (i.e., delayed animation). However, to us its ground appears solid and we have nothing better to put in its place."[59] Similarly and with far greater authority, Cardinal Mercier (1851-1926), in his A Manual of Modern Scholastic Philosophy, describes the traditional teaching of St. Thomas (that "the soul is created during embryonic life") as "much more probable" than immediate ensoulment at conception. He adds: "As to what precise moment the embryo reaches the degree of organization required for its being informed by the rational soul, it is, of course, quite impossible to determine."[60] The evidence of history would seem to support Fr. William Reany's careful conclusion in his The Creation of the Human Soul that "although there is no decision in the Catholic Church in this matter, it may be said without exaggeration that there is no doubt ecclesiastical authority has always favored the opinion that there is a lapse of time between conception and the infusion of the human soul into the body." He cites the opinion of St. Thomas and "several enactments emanating from the highest authority" presupposing that opinion (Innocent III, Gregory XIV, and Clement VIII), the Catechism of the Council of Trent, and the 15th Thomistic thesis as approved by the Scared Congregation of Studies and confirmed by Benedict XV in 1911. Abortion before the infusion of the soul he calls "an anticipated homicide," the killing of that intrauterine life which is a preparatio for rational ensoulment. When done with malicious intent, it constitutes abortion but not homicide.[61]

"Anticipatory homicide" is the term used by Cardinal Lepicier (d. 1936) in 1910:[62] "abortion is always homicide, although the fetus is supposed not yet to have a rational soul: for it (the fetus) is ordered to men's formation; therefore, every case of

---

[59] Barshab, Charles. A Manual of Neo-Scholastic Philosophy. New York, Herder, 1923. p. 199.

[60] Reany, The Creation of the Human Soul, p. 189.

[61] Ibid., p. 195-197.

[62] Ibid., p. 196.

abortion should be called an anticipatory homicide; accordingly, the withdrawal of the clause post animatum foetum (in the revision of canon law) does not prove that the mind of the Church is that the fetus is always a man in the strict sense of the word, but rather indicates that no one is now excused from the censure (of abortion) on the pretext that the fetus has no soul. . ."

Opinions differ as to whether the direction of the present trend among theologians is toward delayed or immediate animation. Fr. Hyacinthe Hering in 1951 is cited by Fr. Joseph Donceel[63] as a representative advocate of the older view of successive or mediate animation. Medical research in the area of human reproduction does not appear to have undermined the possibility of some form of the traditional belief regarding ensoulment. Any one of four crucial "moments" in the development of the fetus may be plausibly defended as the moment when human life begins and, hence, of full ensoulment: 1, the moment of conception, when the ovum is fertilized; 2, after the moment of possible segmentation (at which the ferilized ovum could subdivide or recombine); 3, implantation of the embryo in the womb (blastocyst); 4, the beginning of the development of the cerebral cortex (between the 15th and 40th days of pregnancy). Nothing that recent embryology has discovered has affected the Church's teaching on abortion. "At most," writes Fr. Arthur McNally, "it may somewhat diminish the malice of early abortion."[64] There would appear to be room for the

---

[63] Donceel, Joseph. Why is Abortion Wrong? Commonweal, August 16, 1975. p. 65-67; and Abortion: Mediate vs. Immediate Animation. Continuum 5, Spring 1967. p. 167-171. See also: Wassmer, Thomas. Questions About Questions. Commonweal, June 30, 1967. p. 418. Donceel himself argues vigorously for a revival of the "delayed animation" theory, holding that the soul can exist only in a highly organized human body: see Immediate Animation and Delayed Hominization. Theological Studies, Vol. 3, No. 3, September 1970. p. 76-105.

[64] McNally, Arthur, Life in the Womb. The Sign. April 1975. p. 35-36. See also: Hellegers, Andre. Fetal Development. Theological Studies, Vol. 31, No. 1, March 1970. p. 3-9.

"intermediate" opinion mentioned by Fr. Reany that the infusion of the fully human or rational soul is preceded by only one (sensitive or vegetative or nutritive) "soul." The moment of that infusion is left open.[65]

The present view is authoritatively stated by Fr. Bernard Haring, described by Noonan as "the most persuasive of [Catholic] moral theologians in postwar Europe." In his magisterial Das Gesetz Christi, Fr. Haring writes: "At best, however, one can grant only a slight probability to the ancient view of Aristotle . . . to me, it seems wholly untenable . . .; assuming this (to be so), every abortion is to be regarded as morally equivalent to murder."[66] On the other hand, he recognizes that "the theory of successive animation . . . is gaining ground once more." He adds that "at least after the twentieth day there is an individuum; and there is an inborn dynamism, a principle of life in this individuum . . . The uncertainty about the status of person does not at all justify an arbitrary destruction of such a living being on the way to ever greater development of humanity."[67]

Since 1869 the Catholic Church no longer distinguishes between a fetus with a soul and a living embryo or even a zygote, though neither forbidding free scientific and theological discussion nor precluding responsible investigation of the [65] See, for example: Nogar, Raymond J. Evolution, Human Philosophical Aspects. New Catholic Encyclopedia. Vol. 5. p. 684. Nogar believes that animation occurs "probably not before the end of the third month."

---

[66] Haring, Bernard. Das Gesetz Christi. Vol. 3. Munich, Wewel, 1966. p. 220. The translation given in Noonan, The Morality of Abortion, p. 39, as "every abortion is murder" is taken from Edward Kaiser's rendering from the German and does not accurately convey Haring's carefully nuanced statement—"ist bei jeder Abtreibung sittlich der Tatbestand des Mordes zu statuiren."

[67] Haring, A Theological Evaluation in The Morality of Abortion, p. 131.

whole question. Should it be determined that ensoulment occurs sometime after conception (successive animation), as was taught from Augustine to Liguori—approximately 1300 years—the deliberate, voluntary destruction of an unanimated embryo and of a fetus animated with a soul would be sins specifically distinct. However, even where there is today a probable opinion that the soul is infused several weeks after conception, the abortion of a live fetus at any stage is presently regarded as homicide since this is a case in which probabilism is not permitted. Rather, the weight of probability rests with the possibility of life being present from conception. Only if it were conclusively proven that the rational soul is not yet present in the early stages of fetal life would abortion be a sin less grave than homicide. Therefore, while the criteria for identifying human life in utero are still medically unclear, the position of the Catholic Church regarding abortion of that life is clearly defined. "After a certain stage of intrauterine development it is perfectly evident that fetal life is fully human. Although some might speculate as to when that stage is reached, there is no way of arriving at this knowledge by any human criterion, and as long as it is probable that embryonic life is human from the first moment of its existence, the purposeful termination of any pregnancy (involves) moral malice."[68]

The official teaching of the Catholic Church at present was stated in 1970 by the Untied States Catholic Bishops: "from the moment of conception the child is a complex and rapidly-growing being endowed with the characteristics of human life"; in brief, "the child in the womb is human."[69] This simply reasserts the judgment of Vatican Council II: "From the moment of its conception, life must be guarded with the greatest of care."[70]

---

[68] Abortion II—Moral Aspect. New Catholic Encyclopedia. p. 29.

[69] Statement by National Conference of Catholic Bishops, November 18, 1970.

[70] Pastoral Constitution "De ecclesia in mundu huius temporis," Section 51.

Thus, in 1964, Pope Paul VI cited the words of Pius XII thirteen years before: "Innocent human life, in whatever condition it is found, is to be secure from the very first moment of its existence from any direct deliberate attacks . . . Whatever foundation there may be for the distinction between these various phases of the development of life that is born or still unborn, in profane or ecclesiastical law, and as regards certain civil and penal consequences, all these cases involve a grave and unlawful attack upon the inviolability of human life."[71]

In conclusion, the pastoral and penitential practice of the Catholic Church regarding abortion today is to act as if the soul were present from conception, assuming the possibility, if not the probability, of fully human life or at least its unique potentiality in the conceptus. This represents a significant change from the dominant tradition in the past, which distinguished the unformed from the formed fetus in terms of canonical definition of abortion and of appropriate penalties. The present teaching, like that in the past, is authoritative rather than strictly infallible. Hence, there is the possibility of some modification, particularly if theologians and scientists should agree on developmental criteria for the humanization of the fetus, perhaps by returning to the distinction between unformed and formed, translated into contemporary language, or by distinguishing in some carefully defined way the stages of previable fetal development in utero so as to delineate the presence of human life in the fetus from the zygote, thus defining the point of ensoulment. The permissible norms for therapeutic abortion may possibly be somewhat broadened in accord with the "double effect" tradition.[72]

---

[71] Cited in the first statement condemning abortion to be promulgated by a general council (on December 5, 1965). The words of Pius XII, first spoken in 1951 to the Catholic Society of Midwives, were quoted by Paul VI in an address to the new England Obstetrical and Gynecological Society on October 3, 1964.

[72] The history and development of the "double effect" tradition in Catholic moral theology, with particular reference to "indirect" therapeutic abortion, is traced in Granfield's The Abortion Decision. Garden City, New York, 1971. p. 126-138. Deriving originally from St. Thomas (Summa I-II, 64, 7), it was further refined by Cajetan (d. 1534) in his commentary, and made a general theological principle by Domingo de Santa Teresa (d. 1654) of the Salamancan school in 1647, Spanish Carmelites of the Discalced Reform (introduced by St. Teresa of Avila, d. 1582), who between 1600 and 1725 produced a gigantic commentary on St. Thomas. The modern formulation dates from Jean Gury (d. 1866) and his 1850 compendium of moral theology, heavily influenced by Liguori. Gury's argument was annotated and upheld by Antonio Ballerini (d. 1881) in the 17th edition of the Compendium (published in 1866).

However, it is inconceivable, given the moral unanimity or consensus of the Catholic Church regarding abortion throughout its history, that direct, deliberate abortion will ever be less than a very grave sin.[73] The change in the Church's present teaching does not represent something new, but rather the fruit of reflection upon the significance of scripture, tradi-[73] Susan T. Nicholson, in Abortion and the Roman Catholic Church (University of Tennessee, Knoxville, Tennessee, 1978) argues that Catholic teaching has not always condemned abortion as a form of homicide but only as a "sin of sex" (i.e., lust); she cites the ensoulment controversy as evidence that it is a "recent development . . . to consider the fetus a human being from conception" (p. 14). She contends that Augustine's equation of abortion with contraception is reflected in later history, citing the 1930 Encyclical of Pius XI, "Casti Connubi" (sic). Christian moralists, however, were greatly influenced in these matters by the 2nd century Greek physician Soranus, whose Gynecology, in treating abortifacients and contraceptives together, cites potions which "not only impede conception but also destroy what is already conceived" (Gynecology 1.19.60.63). Noonan in Contraception emphasizes the esteem in which Tertullian and Augustine, for example, held Soranus. Christian use of terms such as homicide and parricide for users of abortifacients reflects "neither biological nor legal but moral" norms in which "protection of life at the fetal stage" was later extended to the "life-giving process," in opposition to the teaching and practice of the Manichaeans, for whom procreative sex was intrinsically evil.

---

tion, doctrine, and scientific discoveries regarding embryonic life. It is not so much an innovation, despite an element of departure from long-established practice, as it is a considered return to the earliest tradition of the Church, a tradition never wholly lost.[74]

At the same time, that patristic tradition, in its utilization of scripture, Greek philosophy, and embryology, presents "no clear and unified view of fetal life."[75] There is support in the Catholic tradition for various theories of delayed hominization, and there is some theological precedent for certain limited forms of the "therapeutic exception" where the mother's life is endangered—if the latter has received no explicit endorsement by the Church, neither has it been explicitly condemned.[76] In the matter of delayed hominization, "the Catholic community enfolds a philosophic-theological pluralism,"[77] whose exploration may stimulate renewed dialogue and mutual understanding among persons who, differing greatly in belief, yet share a concern for the common good.

SUMMARY

Throughout its history from the earliest days, the Catholic Church has consistently condemned abortion. For much of that history, a distinction was recognized in the development of fetal life and in its ensoulment or hominization. The Fathers themselves were divided as to when the soul and therefore specifically human life appears. The dominant tradition favored mediate or delayed animation; a minority view upheld immediate animation at conception. Penalties for abortion were dis-

---

[74] See Appendix B on the soul's infusion according to Albert the Great.

[75] Springer, Robert H. Abortion in Current Theology. Theological Studies, Vol. 31, No. 3, September 1970. p. 492-507.

[76] Connery, John R. Grisez on Abortion. Theological Studies, Vol. 31, No. 1, March 1970. p. 173.

[77] Springer, Abortion in Current Theology, p. 501.

tinguished accordingly. Similarly, while the dominant tradition opposed abortion for any reason, a minority tradition, arguing from the double-effect theory, defended the "therapeutic exception" where the mother's life was endangered.

Conflict cases involving the distinction between direct and indirect abortion would appear to be the only possible area for further development consonant with the reaffirmation of traditional Catholic teaching. Of the three areas of exception to that teaching proposed for consideration among theologians by George H. Williams, two—abortion to save the life of the mother, and abortion in instances of felonious intercourse (rape and incest)—can claim some precedent in the history of Catholic tradition. This might provide a basis for renewed theological exploration of "the doctrine of indirect effect,"[78] the double-effect principle, taking into account the rights of both fetus and mother as well as the interests of the larger community—the state and the medical, legal, socio-psychiatric, and religio-ethical professions. Such a co-sovereignty of progenitors and the state over fetal life might facilitate some ethical accommodation among diverse traditions in a pluralistic democracy.

Rethinking of the "double-effect" principle among Catholic theologians is discussed by Fr. Richard McCormick[79], who cites the German theologian Franz Scholz on conflicting goods. Fr. McCormick notes that "the ontological status of human life at this stage [i.e., before blastocyst] may be different than after this period," given the biological events which converge "during the earliest days," of conception.[80] Such a position would permit interception to prevent implantation in the 7-day period after conception in such extreme situations as rape. He advances this argument "with extreme caution," noting the

---

[78] Williams, George H. The Sacred Condominium. In Noonan, The Morality of Abortion, p. 146-171.

[79] McCormick, Richard. Notes on Moral Theology. Theological Studies. Vol. 39, No. 1, March 1978. p. 104-116 and 122-128.

[80] Ibid., p. 127-128.

concern of those who emphasize the presence in the fertilized ovum of that genetic code present from the beginning and uniquely human.

Ecumenical dialogue has also begun.[81] Perhaps the most constructive statement to date is that on Ethics and Christian Unity, A Statement on Abortion, adopted by the Roman Catholic—Presbyterian and Reformed Consultation, sponsored by the Catholic Bishops' Committee for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops and the Caribbean and North American Area Council of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches (Presbyterian and Congregational), conducted in 1976-79 at Washington and Princeton. The Report seeks to define basic principles held in common as well as areas of "substantial difference."[82]

---

[81] Ibid., p. 104-116.

[82] Ethics and the Search for Christian Unity, Two Statements by the Roman Catholic-Presbyterian Reformed Consultation, I. A Statement on Abortion. Washington-Princeton, 1980 (not published). Seeking to define basic principles held in common as well as areas of "substantial difference," the Report declares:

> Some of the basic principles on which the Consultation was able to reach agreement include the following:
>
> 1. the transcendent basis for respect for human life is the image and likeness of God in which human beings are created;
> 2. the ultimate responsibility for moral decision—making rests with the individual conscience guided by reason and grace;
> 3. authentic moral decisions can never be exclusively subjective or individualistic but must take account of the insights and concerns of the broader religious, social, and familial community;
> 4. judicial and legislative standards are not always coterminous with moral demands, and therefore the legalization of abortion does not of itself absolve the Christian conscience from moral responsibility;
> 5. religious groups have the right to use licit means to influence civil policy regarding abortion.

Some of the areas in which substantial differences were discovered and which call for further dialogue between our two traditions

It remains an open question as to whether and to what extent traditional teaching on the nature and time of fetal animation, revised and restated in the light of modern embryology, may prove to be relevant for present-day consideration of abortion.

---

include the following:

1. the moment and meaning of personhood;
2. the rights of the unborn in situations where rights are in conflict;
3. the role of civil law in matters pertaining to abortion;
4. the interrelation of individual versus communal factors in decision making.

In light of our common Christian heritage and in recognition of our real differences, our ministry, with regard to abortion, will be characterized by the following: We will attempt to clarify the basic principles pertinent to decision making in this area. We will always respect the personal dignity of those involved in making decisions about abortion. Regardless of the ultimate decision reached, we will offer pastoral support insofar as our personal conscience and moral convictions allow. We will not resort to stereotypes and abusive language. We will work to transform societal arrangements which press people into untenable moral dilemmas.

The Report concludes:

> In spite of these differences there is one important agreement among the members that offered hope, namely, that our Churches must continue the dialogue on these painful questions with mutual respect, total honesty, fidelity to our respective traditions and the kind of charity and perseverance that will ultimately provide the resolution of these differences and create the desired societal ethos that is abortion-free.

APPENDIX A

ANIMATION AND THE DECLARATION ON ABORTION (1974)

In a footnote to the Declaration, the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith observes:

> The present Declaration deliberately leaves untouched the question of the moment when the spiritual soul is infused. The tradition is not unanimous in its answer and authors hold different views: some think animation occurs in the first moment of life, others that it occurs only after the implantation. But science really cannot decide the question, since the very existence of an immortal soul is not a subject for scientific inquiry; the question is a philosophical one. For two reasons the moral position taken here on abortion does not depend on the answer to that question: 1) even if it is assumed that animation comes at a later point, the life of the fetus is nonetheless incipiently human (as the biological sciences make clear); it prepares the way for and requires the infusion of the soul, which will complete the nature received from the parents; 2) if the infusion of the soul at the very first moment is at least probable (and the contrary will in fact never be established with certainty), then to take the life of the fetus is at least to run the risk of killing a human being who is not merely awaiting but is already in possession of a human soul.

The Declaration thus reiterates the position enunciated by the drafting committee in preparing Vatican Council II's statement in 1965: "the time of animation is not touched on." (The full text of the Declaration is given in translation in The Pope speaks, vol. 19, no. 13, 1975; p. 150-262.) The Congregation cites numerous authorities against abortion, including canonical enactments by the first Council of Mainz (847) and by Popes Gregory III (d. 741) and Stephen V (d. 891).

APPENDIX B

ALBERT THE GREAT AND IMMEDIATE ENSOULMENT

Recently, many writers on abortion, associating St. Albert the Great with belief in ensoulment at conception, contrary to the theory of successive animation taught by St. Thomas, have asserted that theologians since that time have tended to agree with Albert. This is stated authoritatively by Fr. Bernard Haring who speaks of successive or delayed ensoulment as "the more common opinion before St. Albert the Great."[84]

While these authorities do note the differing theories of the soul held by St. Thomas and Albert, it is far from accurate to say that after Albert's time theologians tended toward his opinion as against Thomas. The historical reality has been far more complex. Nor can belief in immediate animation be ascribed unconditionally to Albert.

Mitterer does emphasize that St. Thomas' belief in successive animation—"the spiritual soul replaces all preceding souls"—was rejected by Albert as "unreasonable," "wholly contrary to Albert's opinion." Albert's supposition, influenced by Tertullian's view of ensoulment at conception, is said by Ruff to have replaced the Thomistic distinctions (between unensouled embryo and ensouled fetus) in the 19th century.

A careful scrutiny of Albert's teaching renders this assertion doubtful, whereas what Ruff calls the "Aristotelian-Thomist" position clearly dominated in both theology and canon law during the succeeding centuries.

The teachings of Albert on the soul illustrate the judgment of Dom David Knowles that "he was neither a consistent Aristotelian nor a perfectly consistent thinker."[85] As Albert himself wrote: "if we consider the soul in itself, we follow Plato; if we consider it as the animating principle of the body, we agree with Aristotle." Moreover, it should be noted that he retained the traditional distinction in canonical penalties for abortion of the unformed and the formed fetus. While he could write that "the body is prior to the soul, which is not infused into it till it is organized," he held to the unity of that rational or intellectual soul, regarding the vegetative and sensitive souls as immanently present potentialities (though in some sense extrinsic); hence, his opinion in favor of ensoulment at conception. For Albert, the soul is essentially a substance using a body, the neo-Platonic view held by Avicenna (Ibn Sina, d. 1037), an actus or activity (rather than a forma or form) which informs the body but is distinct from it. The contradictory aspects of his teaching were unresolved.

---

[84] He cites studies by Fr. Wilfried Ruff in Stimmen der Zeit and by Rudolph J. Gerber in Laval Theologique et Philosophique, which appear, in turn, to be influenced by Albert Mitterer's Die Zeugung der Organismen, Inbesondere des Menschen (Vienna, Herder, 1947) ("The Generation of Organisms, Especially of Mankind").

For St. Thomas, in contrast, the soul is essentially the form of the body (Aristotle). A new forma substantialis or soul replaces the preceding forms (vegetative, sensitive) as each substantial stage of development, the body regarded as the appropriate materia disposita[86] for the unfolding ensoulment through a process of generation and corruption in which imperfect forms are discarded for the more perfect. As with Albert, the spiritual soul has within it the powers of the vegetal and sentient souls, but for St. Thomas it is not in itself present from the beginning of conception. For Albert, it is not reasonable to hold that the soul as spiritual substance can undergo this process of generation, corruption, and change. The vegetive and sentient powers immanent in the intellectual soul may be explained by Albert's teaching of seminal reasons (derived from Gregory of Nyssa and Augustine) or invisible principles, potential and causal, in all creation and perhaps inherent in the soul. Whether this be so or not, it has been argued that the Church itself in the Council of Vienne (1311-12) implicitly supported St. Thomas (and delayed animation) by condemning the teaching of the Spiritual Franciscan Petrus Olivi (d. 1298) on the manner of the soul's union with the body. The decrees of Vienne, the so-called Clementine decretals or Liber Septimus of Pope Clement V, were promulgated as canonical by John XXII in 1317. The opinions of Olivi (who was not condemned by name) clearly suggest the influence of Albert in the view of the soul as active and dynamic, essentially consubstantial with (rather than the form of) the body, and containing vegetive, sensitive, and intellective powers. In Albert these powers, also called "qualities," are said to emanate from the soul's constitutent substance, thus associating a neo-Platonic manner of thinking with Aristotelian teaching on the soul's powers.

---

[85] Knowles, David. The Evolution of Mediaeval Thought. Baltimore, Helicon Press, 1962. p. 253.

[86] Matter suitably prepared and naturally disposed to receive each stage of ensoulment.

It is clear that the opinion of immediate ensoulment as taught by Albert did not commend itself to Catholic thought after his time nor can it be shown to have affected mainstream theology in any later period. To the extend that theologians have returned to an earlier belief in animation at conception, that belief is based upon other grounds than those held by Albert or, for that matter, by Gregory of Nyssa.

APPENDIX B

MCC MESSENGER, MAY 30, 1986

"STATE-PAID ABORTIONS NOT HERE"

The most significant package of pro-life legislation since 1979 was enacted by the General Assembly this year. HB 1596 was approved by a vote of 119-6 in the House of Representatives and 23-5 in the Senate.

The final bill is a combination of a bill prepared by the Missouri Catholic Conference, prohibiting the use of public funds, facilities and employees for the performance or promotion of abortion and an omnibus pro-life bill prepared by Missouri Citizens for Life.

The bills were sponsored in the Senate by Senators John Schneider (D-Florissant) and Fred Dyer (R-St. Charles) and in the House by Rep. James Barnes (D-Baytown). The Governor is expected to sign the bill.

The bill gives our state a clear public policy favoring birth over abortion, a policy which, although it cannot outlaw abortion, clearly states that Missouri will not use public funds, facilities or employees to perform or promote the killing of unborn children.

Although, like any major controversial issue, a court challenge is expected, the basic provisions of this bill are supported by the United States Supreme Court decision in Poelker v. Doe, 97 S.Ct. 2391 (1977) and other cases.

In the attempt to defeat the bill, opponents and newspapers with pro-abortion editorial policies have made a number of false and exaggerated statements as to the contents of the bill. In the following summary the contents of HB 1596 are listed. If you would like to read the full bill as enacted by the Legislature, write MCC or the House Bill Room, State Capitol Building, Jefferson City, MO 65101, and request a copy of HB 1596.

1. HB 1596 recognizes legal rights of unborn at all stages of development except as taken away by the United States Supreme Court's abortion decision.

Although that Court ruled an unborn child has no protection against its own mother's desire to have an abortion, the court did not declare an "open hunting season" on the unborn by persons other than the mother. For example, a criminal has no right to assault or kill an unborn child or to embezzle a trust fund for the unborn's education or support. HB 1596 gives express recognition to the rights of the unborn against others. This section will not be effective until 1988 in case adjustments need to be made in the Probate Code or other statutes.

2. Abortions at 16 weeks or later must be performed in a hospital. Abortions after 16 weeks are 24 times more dangerous to the mother's life than earlier abortions, according statistics.

3. After 20 weeks of gestation a physician must determine if an unborn child is viable. If the child is viable, existing law requires that the abortion be necessary to preserve the life or health of the mother, that the physician utilize the available techniques of abortion most likely to preserve the life of the child, and that there be a second attending physician to provide immediate medical care to the child.

4. Employers, public and private, cannot compel employers to "participate in abortion" or discriminate against them for their refusal to do so. "Participate in abortion" is defined to mean, "to perform, assist in, refer for, promote, procure, or counsel a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save the life of the mother or to undergo an abortion."

Also medical, nursing school and other students are protected if they refuse to participate in abortions. Students may also refuse to pay any part of student fees that are used to pay for abortions.

5. So-called "wrongful life" suits are prohibited. For example, a handicapped child or his parent cannot sue a doctor for failing to have the child aborted.

6. HB 1596 clearly states that tax money and other public resources shall not be used to subsidize abortions (not necessary to save the life of the mother). No public funds or facilities may be used to perform or assist an abortion or to encourage a woman to have an abortion.

No public employee, acting within the scope of his employment may perform or assist an abortion. Public doctors, nurses, social workers and counselors, etc. may not encourage a woman to have an abortion. The bill does not prohibit providing full medical information to patients.

Public funds and employees include not only the state but local counties, cities, school district, etc.

Although a state may not prohibit abortion, due to rulings of the U.S. Supreme Court, that court has also said that the state does not have to pay for them and may prefer childbirth over abortion in the allocation of public funds.

Taxpayes have the right under HB 1596 to stop unlawful actions by going to court.

7. The bill also makes corrective changes in Missouri's existing abortion regulation laws required by past court decision.

APPENDIX C

THE KANSAS CITY TIMES, JAN. 23, 1989

"ABORTION LAW WAS WORK OF GHOSTWRITERS"

Two little-known Missouri legislative advocates could become footnotes in history.

The U.S. Supreme Court has decided to review a 1986 Missouri abortion law. Some predict that the case could make large changes or even reverse the high court's historic 1973 decision that legalized abortions.

What's hardly known outside the Capitol in Jefferson City is that the law under review was written primarily by two abortion critics, neither of whom is a legislator.

They are Samuel Lee, state legislative chairman of Missouri Citizens for Life, and Louis DeFeo, general counsel and executive director of the Missouri Catholic Conference.

Three years ago DeFeo was pushing a bill that, among other things, would ban the use of public facilities for abortions. Lee was trying to win support for a second bill that included a highly controversial provision that said life began at conception.

During the legislative process the two bills were combined, won approval by the General Assembly and started off on a course that has reached the U.S. Supreme Court.

DeFeo's role in helping write the legislation was no secret. Indeed, DeFeo said some critics of the proposal at the time noted his involvement and charged that religious beliefs were being advanced in the form of state legislation.

Lee said anti-abortion forces hoped in 1986 that the issue would reach the country's high court. What they did not know was that the law would reach the court after changes in the membership that could make the ruling on the Missouri law a historic one.

—Will Sentell

AMICUS CURIAE

BRIEF

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
MAR 30 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

No. 88-605

In the Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,
APPELLANTS,

v.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,
APPELLEES.

On Appeal From the United States Court of Appeals For the Eighth Circuit

BRIEF AMICI CURIAE IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEES BY Center for Population Options, The Society For Adolescent Medicine, The Juvenile Law Center, and The Judicial Consent For Minors Referral Panel

JOHN H. HENN
Counsel of Record
NINA JOAN KIMBALL
FOLEY, HOAG & ELIOT
One Post Office Square
Boston, Massachusetts 02109
(617) 482-1390
Attorneys for Amici Curiae

Of Counsel:
THOMAS ASHER
ASHER & ASSOCIATES
1819 H Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20006

Blanchard Press, Inc., Boston, Mass. — Law Printers [617] 426-6690

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Page
Table of Authorities	ii
Interest of Amici	1
Summary of Argument	2
Argument	4
I. A DECISION BY THIS COURT TO TAKE AWAY OR CONSTRAIN THE FUNDAMENTAL RIGHT TO CHOOSE WOULD DEVASTATE TEENAGE GIRLS	4
A. Teenage Pregnancy Is Almost Always Unintended	5
B. Teenage Pregnancy and Childbearing Is Highly Risky Physically and Psychologically for Teenage Girls and the Children They Bear	6
C. Pregnant Teenagers, Teenage Mothers and Their Families Are More Likely to Lose Educational and Economic Opportunities and To Be Dependent Upon Public Support	9
D. Restricted Access to Abortion Would Harm Pregnant Teenage Girls By Delaying Their Abortion Choice	12
II. FOR TEENAGE GIRLS, THE RIGHT TO CHOOSE IS A "DEEPLY ROOTED" FUNDAMENTAL RIGHT, AND IS "ESSENTIAL TO THE ORDERLY PURSUIT OF HAPPINESS"	13
A. The Compelling Need of Teenage Girls to Maintain the Option of Abortion Dramatically Illustrates Why That Option Rests on Well-developed Constitutional Notions of Privacy	14

Page

B. For Teenage Girls, The Right to Choose Abortion Is a Fundamental Liberty That Is "Deeply Rooted" In Our Nation and "Essential to the Orderly Pursuit of Happiness" 16
C. The Compelling Need of Teenage Girls to Maintain the Option of Abortion Confirms That Roe v. Wade Should Continue To Be Upheld 18
D. For Teenage Girls, Their Fundamental Right to Decide Whether to Bear a Child Cannot Be Limited to Contraception But Must Include Abortion 20
E. The Missouri Statute's Mandatory Viability Tests and Counseling Prohibitions Unduly Burden Teenage Girls' Fundamental Right to Choose Abortion 21
1. Statutory Requirements that Impose Added Delay or Added Costs For Abortion Fall Heaviest on Teenage Girls 21
2. The Restrictions on "Encouraging or Counseling" Not Only Violate Teenagers' and Their Physicians' First Amendment Rights, But Also Fall Heaviest on Teenage Girls 23

Conclusion 24

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

Cases:

Belloti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622 ..... 4, 15
Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954) . 16, 17, 19

Page

Carey v. Population Servs. Int'l, 431 U.S. 678 (1977) 14, 20
City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416 (1983) 19, 20, 23
Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972) 20, 21
Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965) 14, 20
Hodgson v. Minnesota, 648 F. Supp. 756 (D. Minn. (1986), rev'd on legal grounds, 853 F.2d 1452 (8th Cir. 1988) (en banc), petitions for cert. filed, 57 U.S.L.W. 3488 (U.S. Jan. 4, 1989) (No. 88-1125) and 57 U.S.L.W. 3522 (U.S. Feb. 3, 1989) (No. 88-1309) 13, 22
Kent v. Dulles, 357 U.S. 116 (1958) 15
Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967) 4, 14, 16, 18
Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783 (1983) 17
Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923) 14, 18
Moore v. City of East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494 (1977) 4, 16
Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928) 15
Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925) 14
Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896) 19
Reproductive Health Servs. v. Webster, 662 F.Supp. 407 (W.D. Mo. 1987), aff'd in part and rev'd in part, 851 F.2d 1071 (8th Cir. 1988) 22
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973) ..... passim
Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. 393 (1857) 20
Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942) 14, 18, 21
Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians & Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986) 19, 23
United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144 (1938) 20
United States v. Maine, 420 U.S. 515 (1975) 19

Page

Watson v. City of Memphis, 373 U.S. 526 (1963) 16
Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972) 14

Statutes:

Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.029 (1986) 21, 22
Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.205 ..... 21, 23
Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.210 ..... 21, 23
Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.215 ..... 21, 23

Other Authorities

Adler & Dolcini, Psychological Issues in Abortion for Adolescents, in Adolescent Abortion: Psychological and Legal Issues 84 (Melton ed. 1986) 9
Adolescent Pregnancy and Childbearing—Rates, Trends and Research Findings From the CPR, NICHD (1988) 10, 11
Alan Guttmacher Institute, Data on Teenage Pregnancies, Births and Abortions for the Years 1972-1983 (revised Mar. 1987) 2, 3, 6, 12
Alan Guttmacher Institute, Teenage Pregnancy: The Problem that Hasn't Gone Away (1981) .. 2, 3, 5, 6, 8, 12
American Psychological Association, Interdivisional Comm. on Adolescent Abortion, Adolescent Abortion: Psychological and Legal Issues, 42 Am. Psychologist 73 (1987) 9, 22
Baldwin & Cain, The Children of Teenage Parents, 12 Fam. Plan. Persp. 34 (1980) 10
Binkin, Gold & Cates, Illegal Abortion Deaths in the United States: Why Are They Still Occurring? 14 Fam. Plan. Persp. 163 (1982) 15
Bracken & Kasal, Delay in Seeking Induced Abortion: A Review & Theoretical Analysis, 121 Am. J. of Obstetrics & Gynecology 1008 (1975) 11

Page

Burt, Estimates of Public Costs for Teenage Childbearing (1986) 11
Cartoff & Klerman, Parental Consent for Abortion: Impact of the Massachusetts Law, 76 Am. J. Pub. Health 397 (1986) 5, 6
Cates, Adolescent Abortions in the United States, 1 J. Adolescent Health Care 18 (1980) 7, 9, 12
Cates & Grimes, Morbidity and Mortality of Abortion in the United States, in Abortion and Sterilization: Medical and Social Aspects 155 (Hodgson ed. 1981) 7
Cates, Schultz & Grimes, The Risks Associated With Teenage Abortion, 309 New England J. of Medicine 621 (1983) 7
CPO, The Facts: Teenage Childbearing, Education, and Employment (1987) 3, 10, 11
CPO, 1988 Report: Estimates of Public Cost for Teenage Childbearing in 1987 (1988) 3, 11
CPO, The Facts: Teenage Sexuality, Pregnancy, and Parenthood (1987) 4
David, Abortion Obtained and Denied: Psychosocial Risks, Statement prepared for presentation to the Subcommittee on Human Resources and Intergovernmental Relations of the Committee on Government Operations of the U.S. House of Representatives (Mar. 1989) 11
Henshaw, Characteristics of U.S. Women Having Abortions, 1982-1983, 19 Fam. Plan. Persp. 5 (1987) 3, 17
Hofferth, Contraceptive Decisionmaking Among Adolescents, in Risking the Future: Adolescent Sexuality, Pregnancy, and Childbearing, Vol. II. (Hofferth & Hayes eds. 1988) 6
Hunter, Time Limits on Abortion, in Reproductive Laws for the 1990's (Cohen & Taub eds. 1989) 7, 8, 22

Page

Institute of Medicine, Prenatal Care: Reaching Mothers, Reaching Infants (Brown ed. 1988) 8, 15

Institute of Medicine, Preventing Low Birth Weight (1985) 8, 9

Jones, Forrest, Goldman, Henshaw, Lincoln, Rosoff, Westoff & Wulf, Teenage Pregnancy in Industrialized Countries (1986) 2, 5

Lewis, Minors' Competence to Consent to Abortion, 42 Am. Psychologist 84 (1987) 9

Mackinson, The Health Consequences of Teenage Fertility, 17 Fam. Plan. Persp. 132 (1985) 7, 8

Marecek, Consequences of Adolescent Childbearing and Abortion, in Adolescent Abortion: Psychological & Legal Issues 96 (Melton ed. 1986) 9, 10

Marsiglio, Adolescent Fathers in the United States: Their Initial Living Arrangements, Marital Experience and Educational Outcomes, 19 Fam. Plan. Persp. 240 (1987) 10

Melton, Legal Regulation of Adolescent Abortion: Unintended Effects, 42 Amer. Psychologist 79 (1987) 13

National Commission to Prevent Infant Mortality, Death Before Life: The Tragedy of Infant Mortality (1988) .. 7

National Center for Health Statistics, Advance Report of Final Natality Statistics, Monthly Vital Statistics Report 37:3 (1988) 8

Ory, Mortality Associated with Fertility and Fertility Control, 15 Fam. Plan. Persp. 59 (1983) 3, 7, 17

Risking The Future: Adolescent Sexuality, Pregnancy and Childbearing, Vol. I (Hayes ed. (1986)) 7, 10, 11, 12

Russo, Adolescent Abortion: The Epidemiological Context, in Adolescent Abortion: Psychological and Legal Issues 40 (Melton ed. 1986) 12, 13

Page

Sacker & Neuhoff, Medical and Psychosocial Risk Factors in the Pregnant Adolescent, in Pregnancy in Adolescence: Needs, Problems, and Management 107 (Stuart & Wells, eds. 1982) 7

Social Factors, Not Age, Are Found to Affect Risk of Low Birth Weight, 15 Fam. Plan. Persp. 142 (1984) ... 8

Substantially Higher Morbidity and Mortality Rates Found Among Infants Born to Adolescent Mothers, 16 Fam. Plan. Persp. 91 (1984) 8

Teicher, A Solution to the Chronic Problem of Living: Adolescent Attempted Suicide, in Current Issues of Adolescent Psychiatry 129 (Schoolar ed. 1973) 9

Tietze & Henshaw, Induced Abortion: A World Review 1986 (1986) 7

Ventura, Taffel & Mosher, Estimates of Pregnancies and Pregnancy Rates for the United States, 1976-85, 78 Am. J. Pub. Health 506 (1988) 2, 3, 17

Zabin and Clark, Institutional Factors Affecting Teenagers' Choice and Reasons for Delay in Attending a Family Planning Clinic, 15 Fam. Plan. Persp. 25 (1983) 5

Zelnick & Kantner, Sexual Activity, Contraceptive Use and Pregnancy Among Metropolitan-Area Teenagers: 1971-1979, 12 Fam. Plan. Persp. 230 (1980) 5, 20

Interest of Amici

The Center for Population Options (CPO) is a national, nonprofit organization dedicated to the prevention of unintended adolescent pregnancy and too-early childbearing. CPO develops programs to increase opportunities for young people through education, comprehensive health care, and access to family planning services. The Society for Adolescent Medicine is a national, non-profit, multi-disciplinary organization dedicated to promoting the development, synthesis, and dissemination of scientific and scholarly knowledge unique to the development and health care needs of adolescents. The Juvenile Law Center is a public interest law firm that has provided free legal services to children in Pennsylvania since 1975, represented hundreds of abused and neglected children in Philadelphia Family Court, and been involved in numerous federal and state cases aimed at vindicating the rights of children who are served by government. Many JLC clients have been teenage parents. The Judicial Consent for Minors Referral Panel is a volunteer association of over two hundred Massachusetts lawyers who for the last eight years have represented more than 6,000 pregnant minors seeking judicial consent for an abortion (in lieu of parental consent) under Mass. Gen. Laws, chap. 112, §12S.

Based on their experience and expertise with teenage girls, amici wish to bring to the Court's attention facts concerning the medical risks and societal cost of teenage pregnancy and childbearing, and to urge that the Court uphold the fundamental right to choose abortion recognized in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973).[1]

---

[1] This brief is filed with the consent of the parties.

Summary of Argument

This brief focuses on pregnant teenage girls, on the individual and societal importance of preserving their right to choose between abortion and childbirth, and on the devastating harm that removing or restricting that right would cause to teenage girls in particular.

Whatever we might wish, sexual activity and unintended pregnancies have become a difficult reality of teenage girls' lives. Because most teenage pregnancies are unintended, and because unwanted childbirth and motherhood are so exceptionally burdensome for a teenage girl, a pregnant teenager's right to determine her future must include the right to choose abortion instead of childbirth. Teenage girls depend on this right more than women of any other age.

The life-shaping importance to teenage girls of their existing right to choose abortion is illustrated in these striking facts:

- Over 1 million teenagers become pregnant each year.[2]
- 84% of all teenage pregnancies (married and unmarried) are unintended.[3]
- 92% of premarital teenage pregnancies are unintended.[4]

---

[2] Ventura, Taffel & Mosher, Estimates of Pregnancies and Pregnancy Rates for the United States, 1976-85, 78 Am. J. Pub. Health 506, 508, Table 2 (1988) (data for 1976, 1980, 1982, and 1983; 1983 is latest year for which detailed statistics on abortion are available); Alan Guttmacher Institute [AGI], Data on Teenage Pregnancies, Births and Abortions for the Years 1972-1983 (revised Mar. 1987) [AGI, Data on Teenage Pregnancies]; AGI, Teenage Pregnancy: The Problem that Hasn't Gone Away, at 17 (1981) [AGI, Teenage Pregnancy].

[3] Jones, Forrest, Goldman, Henshaw, Lincoln, Rosoff, Westoff & Wulf, Teenage Pregnancy in Industrialized Countries 40 (1986) [Jones, et al.]. Calculations by CPO from cited data.

[4] Id.

- 42% of pregnant teenage girls choose abortion each year.[5]
- 29,000 girls become pregnant each year at age 14 or younger (an age when childbearing poses especially grave risks).[6]
- Pregnancy rates continue to rise for girls age 14 and younger.[7]
- Teenage girls are more than twenty-four times more likely to die from childbirth than from first-trimester legal abortion.[8]
- One in four teenage mothers drops out of high school, and only one in fifty finishes college.[9]
- In 1987, families begun with a teenage birth cost the federal government $19.27 billion in welfare payments.[10]
- Only 4% of unmarried teenage mothers surrender their infants for adoption.[11]

As this Court (including Chief Justice Rehnquist) observed in its leading case concerning minors and abortion:

> [T]he potentially severe detriment facing a pregnant woman is not mitigated by her minority. Indeed, considering her probable education, employment skills, financial resources, and emotional maturity, unwanted motherhood may be exceptionally burdensome for a minor. In addition,

---

[5] Henshaw, Characteristics of U.S. Women Having Abortions, 1982-83, 19 Fam. Plan. Persp. 5 (1987).

[6] Ventura, Taffel & Mosher, supra n. 2, at 508, Table 2; AGI, Teenage Pregnancy, supra n. 2, at 20.

[7] Ventura, Taffel & Mosher, supra n. 2, at 508, Table 2; AGI, Data on Teenage Pregnancies, supra n. 2.

[8] Ory, Mortality Associated with Fertility and Fertility Control, 15 Fam. Plan. Persp. 59 (1983). Calculations by CPO from cited data.

[9] CPO, The Facts: Teenage Childbearing, Education, and Employment, (1987).

[10] CPO, 1988 Report: Estimates of Public Cost for Teenage Childbearing in 1987 at 2 (1988) [CPO, 1988 Report] (calculating payments under Food Stamps, Medicaid and Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) programs). The $19.27 billion represents more than half of all payments under these three programs.

[11] AGI, Teenage Pregnancy, supra, n. 2, at 27.

the fact of having a child brings with it adult legal responsibility, for parenthood, like attainment of the age of majority, is one of the traditional criteria for the termination of the legal disabilities of minority. In sum, there are few situations in which denying a minor the right to make an important decision will have consequences so grave and indelible.[12]

Part I of this brief, thus, will describe the unintended and unanticipated nature of most teenage pregnancy; the heightened physical and psychological risks to teenage girls of pregnancy and childbearing, which greatly exceed the risks of abortion at any stage of pregnancy; the overwhelming costs to teenage girls and to society of teenage pregnancy and too-early childbearing; and the harm that even delayed access to abortion would cause to teenage girls. Part II will describe how the right for a teenage girl to choose abortion is properly seen as both "deeply rooted" in constitutional notions of liberty and "essential to [her] orderly pursuit of happiness."[13]

Argument

I. A Decision by This Court To Take Away or Constrain the Fundamental Right To Choose Would Devastate Teenage Girls

This Court would devastate the lives of teenage girls by taking away or constraining their right to choose between abortion and childbirth. Teenage sexual activity and unintended pregnancies are concrete realities of American life today.[14]

[12] Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622, 642 (1979) [Bellotti II] (plurality opinion). The statement quoted in text surely commanded the support of eight members of the Court. See id. at 652 (concurring opinion of Justices Stevens, Brennan, Marshall, and Blackmun).

[13] Moore v. City of East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494, 503 (1977) (opinion of Powell, J.); Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1, 12 (1967) ("orderly pursuit of happiness").

[14] In the United States today, seven out of ten teenage girls and eight out of ten teenage boys have sexual intercourse by the time they reach age twenty. CPO, The Facts: Teenage Sexuality, Pregnancy, and Parenthood (1987). As to unintended pregnancies, see notes 2-7 and statistics in the accompanying text.

Removing or impairing the right to choose abortion will not reduce teenage sexual activity or unintended teenage pregnancy.[15] What it will do, however, is dramatically increase unwanted teenage childbearing, with profoundly adverse costs to teenage girls' lives and futures.

A. Teenage Pregnancy Is Almost Always Unintended

Teenage girls do not get pregnant by design. Eight out of ten of the 1.1 million teenage pregnancies in the United States each year are unintended.[16] Most teenagers do not use contraceptives or use them inconsistently, especially in the early months of sexual activity, whether due to ignorance or ambivalence about contraception, or ambivalence about sexuality, or both.[17] Thus, among unmarried teenagers who become pregnant, fifty percent of pregnancies occur within [15] Studies show that the restrictions on the availability of abortion caused by parental notification and consent laws did not reduce teen pregnancy. Cartoof & Klerman, Parental Consent for Abortion: Impact of the Massachusetts Law, 76 Am. J. Pub. Health 397, 400 (1986). The most effective way to reduce teen pregnancy is not to restrict or deny access to abortion but to increase sex education and the availability of contraception. A study comparing teenage pregnancy in the United States with that of other industrialized countries found sexual activity in the United States was comparable to that in other countries, but that teenage pregnancy and childbirth rates were lower in other countries because of greater availability of sex education, contraceptives and abortion services. Jones, et al., supra, n. 3, at 234-35.

[16] Jones, et al., supra n. 3. 92% of pregnancies to unwed teenage girls are unintended and 51% of pregnancies to married teens are unintended. Altogether, approximately 84% of all teenage pregnancies are unintended, since the vast majority of teen pregnancies (almost 80%) occur out-of-wedlock. Id.

[17] AGI, Teenage Pregnancy, supra n. 2, at 14-16; Zelnick & Kantner, Sexual Activity, Contraceptive Use and Pregnancy Among Metropolitan-Area Teenagers: 1971-1979, 12 Fam. Plan. Persp. 230, 236, Table 8 (1980); Zabin and Clark, Institutional Factors Affecting Teenagers' Choice and Reasons for Delay in Attending a Family Planning Clinic, 15 Fam. Plan. Persp. 25 (1983). Zabin's study reports that teens tend to delay almost a year (median of 11.5 months) after becoming sexually active before going to a family planning clinic. Moreover, nearly two thirds of unmarried teenage the first six months of becoming sexually active; twenty percent occur within the first month.[18] Forty-two percent of all teenage girls (married or unmarried) choose to resolve their unwanted pregnancies through abortion.[19] These statistics, which reflect the relatively low impact of current contraceptive availability and education on the teenage pregnancy rate, demonstrate that the vast majority of teenage girls do not focus on the issue of whether to bear a child and how childbearing will affect their future until an unintended pregnancy forces them to do so.

At this critical juncture in teenage girls' lives, abortion becomes an especially important—and in many cases life-saving—reality. Common sense, as well as the results of abortion restrictions directed specifically at minors,[20] teaches that removing the right to choose abortion will not reduce teenage sexual activity and pregnancy; it will simply increase unwanted childbearing.

B. Teenage Pregnancy and Childbearing Is Highly Risky Physically and Psychologically for Teenage Girls and the Children They Bear

Adolescent pregnancies carried to term, and resulting childbearing, are usually very detrimental physically and psychologically for teenage girls, as well as for the infants they bear. During pregnancy, teenagers are at a much higher risk girls reported that they never used contraceptives or did so inconsistently. AGI, Teenage Pregnancy, supra n. 2, at 14. The reasons for failure to use contraceptives vary, including those who thought they could not become pregnant, those who did not expect to have sexual intercourse, those who "couldn't [use them] under the circumstances," and those who did not know how to get contraceptives. Id.

[18] Hofferth, Contraceptive Decisionmaking Among Adolescents, in Risking the Future: Adolescent Sexuality, Pregnancy, and Childbearing, Vol. II, at 64 (Hofferth & Hayes eds. 1988) [Risking Vol. II] AGI, Teenage Pregnancy, supra n. 2, at 16, 19.

[19] AGI, Data on Teenage Pregnancies, supra n. 2.

[20] Cartoof & Klerman, supra n. 15, at 400.

of suffering from serious medical complications, including iron-deficiency anemia, pregnancy-induced hypertension ("toxemia", which is a leading cause of mortality), complications from small pelvises, and cervical immaturity resulting in premature births.[21] Mortality rates from continued pregnancy and childbearing are much higher for teenage girls than for women aged 20-24.[22] Teenage girls aged 15-19 are twenty-four times more likely to die from childbirth than from first-trimester abortion,[23] and the dangers are considerably higher for girls under age 15.[24] By contrast, for all women, but especially for teenage girls, abortion is one of the safest surgical procedures doctors perform.[25] At no time during pregnancy do the risks of abortion surpass the risks of continuing the pregnancy to delivery.[26] The same is true for rates of morbidity—serious illness or injury with lasting effects—related to childbirth when compared to abortion.[27]

[21] Hunter, Time Limits on Abortion, in Reproductive Laws for the 1990s, at 134 & n. 15 (Cohen & Taub eds. 1989); National Commission to Prevent Infant Mortality, Death Before Life: The Tragedy of Infant Mortality, Appendix at 103 (1988). Inadequate prenatal care, a problem especially common for teenage girls, is associated with excessive weight gain, premature labor, prolonged labor, vaginal infections and vaginal lacerations. Mackinson, The Health Consequences of Teenage Fertility, 17 Fam. Plan. Persp. 132, 134 (1985).

[22] Ory, supra n. 8, at 59. Calculations by CPO from cited data.

[23] Id.

[24] Sacker & Neuhoff, Medical and Psychosocial Risk Factors in the Pregnant Adolescent, in Pregnancy in Adolescence: Needs, Problems, and Management 107, 127 (Stuart & Wells, eds. 1982).

[25] Cates & Grimes, Morbidity and Mortality of Abortion in the United States, in Abortion and Sterilization: Medical and Social Aspects 155, 177 (Hodgson, ed. 1981). "Complications following induced abortion are generally lower among adolescents than among older women, regardless of the gestation at which the abortion is performed or the method used." Risking The Future: Adolescent Sexuality, Pregnancy and Childbearing, Vol. I, at 125 (Hayes ed. 1986) [Risking Vol. I]; see also, Cates, Adolescent Abortions in the United States 1 J. Adolescent Health Care 18, 19-22 (1980) [Cates]; Cates, Schultz & Grimes, The Risks Associated With Teenage Abortion, 309 New England J. of Medicine 621 (1983).

[26] Tietze & Henshaw, Induced Abortion: A World Review 1986, at 110, 111 (1986).

[27] Cates, supra n. 25, at 20; Cates and Grimes, supra n. 25.

A major reason why the health risks of pregnancy and childbearing are greater for teenage girls than for adult women is that teenagers delay seeking prenatal care if they seek it at all.[28] In New York City, more than one third of pregnant teenage girls received no prenatal care or only last-trimester care, compared to eighteen percent for women as a whole.[29]

Teenage pregnancy, exacerbated by inadequate prenatal care, also leads to premature births and low birth weight,[30] which in turn are leading causes of infant morbidity and mortality. Low birth-weight infants are at increased risk of neurodevelopmental problems, especially cerebral palsy, seizure disorders and mental retardation.[31] Children of teenage mothers are twice as likely to die in infancy than those born to women in their 20s, and are also more likely to die than children of women in their 40s, whose children are also a high-risk group.[32] Low birth weight is also associated with [28] Mackinson, supra n. 21, at 134. Teens tend to seek prenatal care later than adult women because of its cost, ambivalence or denial concerning their pregnancy, a desire for secrecy and confidentiality, difficulty in scheduling appointments, and/or lack of knowledge about the health care system. Institute of Medicine, Prenatal Care: Reaching Mothers, Reaching Infants 78, 101 (Brown ed. 1988) [Inst. of Medicine, Prenatal Care].

[29] Hunter, supra n.21, at 134, citing to New York City Dep't of Public Health, Summary of Vital Statistics 16, 17 (1986). Nationally, 13 percent of teens receive late or no prenatal care whereas only 5 percent of women as a whole receive late or no prenatal care. National Center for Health Statistics, Advance Report of Final Natality Statistics, Monthly Vital Statistics Report 37:3 Table 30 (1988) [NCHS].

[30] AGI, Teenage Pregnancy, supra n. 2, at 29; NCHS, supra n. 29, Table 15.

[31] Institute of Medicine, Preventing Low Birthweight 26-29, 32-33, 37 (1985); Substantially Higher Morbidity and Mortality Rates Found Among Infants Born to Adolescent Mothers, 16 Fam. Plan. Persp. 91-92 (1984).

[32] AGI, Teenage Pregnancy, supra n. 2, at 29. Studies show that other factors such as the mother's socioeconomic status, health care and nutritional habits and education also contribute to health and developmental problems of low birth-weight babies. Teenage mothers are at a high risk of experiencing these characteristics. Mackinson, supra n. 21, at 137-38; Death Before Life, supra n. 21, at 103; Social Factors, Not Age, Are Found to Affect Risk of Low Birth Weight, 15 Fam. Plan. Persp. 142-43 (1984).

longer-term problems, including a greater frequency of illness, and developmental problems such as lack of success in school.[33]

An unwanted pregnancy is a serious and emotionally traumatic event in a teenager's life. Before abortions were legal and accessible to minors in a confidential manner, a large proportion of teenage girls who attempted or succeeded in suicide thought they were, or actually were, pregnant.[34] Few teenagers have adverse psychological reactions to abortion, and most are relieved to have terminated an unwanted pregnancy:[35] "[t]here is no research evidence to support" the assumption that "adolescents are especially vulnerable to serious psychological harm as a result of having an abortion."[36] To the contrary, pregnancy continuation poses "far greater psychological, physical, and economic risks to the adolescent than does abortion."[37]

C. Pregnant Teenagers, Teenage Mothers and Their Families Are More Likely To Lose Educational and Economic Opportunities and To Be Dependent Upon Public Support

Childbearing irrevocably alters the life of a teenage girl. When a woman or a teen is ready to bear a child, motherhood is one of the most rewarding and fulfilling of life's experiences.

[33] Inst. of Medicine, supra n. 31, at 32-33.

[34] Teicher, A Solution to the Chronic Problem of Living: Adolescent Attempted Suicide, in Current Issues of Adolescent Psychiatry 129, 136 (Schoolar ed. 1973).

[35] Adler & Dolcini, Psychological Issues in Abortion for Adolescents, in Adolescent Abortion: Psychological and Legal Issues 84 (Melton ed. 1986).

[36] American Psychological Association, Interdivisional Committee on Adolescent Abortion, Adolescent Abortion: Psychological and Legal Issues, 42 Am. Psychologist 73, 74 (1987) [APA].

[37] Lewis, Minors' Competence to Consent to Abortion, 42 Am. Psychologist 84, 87 (1987); see also Marecek, Consequences of Adolescent Childbearing and Abortion, in Adolescent Abortion: Psychological and Legal Issues 96-115 (Melton ed. 1986); Adler & Dolcini, supra n. 35, at 90; Cates, supra n. 25, at 22.

But unwanted motherhood is devastating, especially for a teenage girl. The cost of too-early childbearing is borne not just by the teenage girl, whose future is suddenly restricted, but by the child she bears and by society as a whole. These costs exist today—in a world in which teenager girls have a right of abortion choice. The elimination or constriction of that choice could only make these costs vastly higher.

Pregnancy is the leading reason teenage girls drop out of school. One in four teenage mothers drops out of high school and only one in fifty graduates from college. By comparison, one in five women who put off childbearing until their mid-20s graduates from college.[38] Teenage mothers' family responsibilities and lack of education lead them into lower-paying, lower-status jobs, where they accumulate less work experience and earn lower annual wages than women who postpone childbearing.[39]

Children born to teenagers from an unwanted pregnancy will be disadvantaged educationally, socially, and psychologically.[40] They tend to have lower I.Q. and achievement scores, and less success in school.[41] According to expert testimony before Congress on behalf of the American Public Health Association, children born of unwanted pregnancies experienced lower scholastic achievement, had less job satisfaction, fewer and less satisfying relations with friends, lovers and spouses, and began sexual activity earlier than [38] CPO, Teenage Childbearing, supra n. 9; Risking, Vol. II, supra n. 18, at 125-28. Teenage fathers are also more likely to drop out of high school than their counterparts who remained childless throughout their teens. The lower high school completion rate for teenage fathers restricts their financial ability to support their partner and child. Marsiglio, Adolescent Fathers in the United States: Their Initial Living Arrangements, Marital Experience and Educational Outcomes, 19 Fam. Plan. Persp. 241, 247, 249 (1987).

[39] CPO, Teenage Childbearing, supra n. 9; Risking, Vol. I, supra n. 25, at 130-32.

[40] See generally, Marecek, supra n. 37.

[41] Baldwin & Cain, The Children of Teenage Parents, 12 Fam. Plan. Persp. 34, 37 (1980); Adolescent Pregnancy and Childbearing—Rates, Trends and Research Findings From the CPR, NICHD 10-11 (1988) [Adolescent Pregnancy and Childbearing].

children born of accepted pregnancies.[42] "In the aggregate, unwantedness in early pregnancy and involuntary childbearing have a detrimental effect on the subsequent psychosocial development of the child with socially undesirable longer term implications."[43] That these children could be both unwanted, and forced upon a teenage girl by the state, is doubly tragic.

Teenage motherhood also imposes enormous costs on society. Teenage mothers, whose educational and economic achievement is severely restricted, are more likely to become dependent on public support. In 1985, fifty-three percent of the $15.69 billion in AFDC payments went to families that began when the mother was a teenager.[44] In 1987 alone, the federal government spent $19.27 billion in AFDC, Medicaid and Food Stamp benefits on families in which the mother first gave birth as a teenager.[45] It is estimated that over the next twenty years, the federal government will spend $5.7 billion in welfare payments to all babies born in 1987 to teenage girls.[46] Moreover, children of teenage parents are more likely to become teenage parents themselves, thus perpetuating the cycle of poverty begun by a teenage birth.[47]

[42] David, Abortion Obtained and Denied: Psychosocial Risks, Statement prepared for presentation to the Subcommittee on Human Resources and Intergovernmental Relations of the Committee on Government Operations of the U.S. House of Representatives, at 6 (Mar. 1989).

[43] Id.

[44] Burt, Estimates of Public Costs for Teenage Childbearing 28 (CPO Sept. 1986).

[45] CPO, 1988 Report, supra n. 10, at 2. In 1975, 64 percent of AFDC mothers under age 30 had been teenage mothers compared to 24 percent of American women as a whole between age 20 and 30. Adolescent Pregnancy and Childbearing, supra n. 41, at 12.

[46] CPO, 1988 Report, supra n. 10, at 3.

[47] CPO, Teenage Childbearing, supra n. 9; Risking, Vol. I, supra n. 25, at 134; Adolescent Pregnancy and Childbearing, supra n. 41, at 11.

Teenage pregnancy is already a serious public health problem. Taking away the right to choose abortion will reverse the recent success in reducing the teenage birth rate,[48] and will only make a tragic situation worse.

D. Restricted Access to Abortion Would Harm Pregnant Teenage Girls By Delaying Their Abortion Choice.

Assuming Roe v. Wade is not overruled, amici note that constricting the right to choose abortion would also harm teenage girls disproportionately by delaying their abortion choice. Delay is always harmful. For various reasons, "[t]eenagers are less likely than women in their twenties to obtain abortions during the safer, earlier weeks of gestation."[49] One reason for delay is limited access to abortion services, particularly in rural areas, due to difficulties in travel (especially in states with great distances between clinics) and expense. In addition, many teenagers, particularly the very young, fail to recognize the early signs of pregnancy. This may be due to ignorance or because many adolescent girls ordinarily experience menstrual irregularities and therefore do not distinguish them from early signs of pregnancy.[50] Thus, despite efforts that can be made to assist young girls to make decisions earlier in their pregnancies (for either pre-natal care or abortion), they will always experience higher rates of delay than older women.

---

[48] AGI, Data on Teenage Pregnancies, supra n. 2.

[49] Risking, Vol. I, supra note 25, at 114. A national survey found that only 34% of abortions obtained by girls ages 15 and younger are performed during the first eight weeks of gestation, compared with 41% of abortions obtained by girls ages 15-19, and 51% of those obtained by women ages 20-24. AGI, Teenage Pregnancy, supra n. 2, at 55. Adolescents (19 and under) are twice as likely as older women to obtain abortions after twelve weeks. Cates, supra n. 22, at 20.

[50] See, e.g., AGI, Teenage Pregnancy, supra n. 2, at 55; Risking, Vol. I, supra note 25, at 114; Russo, Adolescent Abortion: The Epidemiological Context, in Adolescent Abortion: Psychological and Legal Issues 40, 57 (Melton ed. 1986); Bracken & Kasl, Delay in Seeking Induced Abortion: A Review and Theoretical Analysis, 121 Am. J. of Obstetrics and Gynecology 1008-1019 (1975).

While abortion at any stage of pregnancy is safer for teenage girls than childbirth, delay in seeking and obtaining an abortion already has the largest single effect on the risk to teenage girls of complications and death from abortion.[51] Because teenagers, as noted above, already tend to seek abortions later in pregnancies than do adults,[52] further delays due to abortion restrictions necessarily increase the medical risks associated with the abortion procedure to a significant degree. Even short delays could heighten a patient's emotional tension, increase the costs of the procedure, and push a teenage girl into the second trimester of a pregnancy, when the abortion procedure entails significantly greater costs and medical risk.[53] To the extent restrictions on abortion, such as elaborate and expensive testing requirements, were upheld by this Court, the one certain result would be delayed abortion and greater harm to teenage girls.

II. For Teenage Girls, The Right To Choose Is A "Deeply Rooted" Fundamental Right, And Is "Essential To The Orderly Pursuit Of Happiness"

Part I of this brief demonstrated the central role that the right to choose abortion plays in the "liberty" of teenage girls to shape virtually the entirety of their adult lives and, cor-

---

[51] See detailed facts concerning teenage minors found in Hodgson v. Minnesota, 648 F.Supp. 756, 765 (D. Minn. 1986), reversed on legal grounds, 853 F.2d 1452 (8th Cir. 1988)(en banc), petitions for cert. filed, 57 U.S.L.W. 3488 (U.S. Jan. 4, 1989) (No. 88-1125) and 57 U.S.L.W. 3522 (U.S. Feb. 3, 1989) (No. 88-1309).

[52] Melton, Legal Regulation of Adolescent Abortion: Unintended Effects, 42 Am. Psychologist 79, 80 (1987); see also, Russo, supra n. 50, at 56-57.

[53] Hodgson, 648 F. Supp. at 762-763.

relatively, the terrible human and social cost that would be triggered by the obstruction or curtailment of that right. Part II will show that the right of abortion choice, grounded in long-established constitutional notions of privacy, has become deeply rooted in our nation and in the lives of teenage girls in particular, and is properly viewed as essential to their orderly pursuit of happiness. It should continue to be upheld; it must exist alongside a right to contraception; and it should not be restricted.

A. The Compelling Need of Teenage Girls to Maintain the Option of Abortion Dramatically Illustrates Why That Option Rests on Well-Developed Constitutional Notions of Privacy

In a long line of cases preceding Roe v. Wade, this Court had recognized a constitutionally protected zone of privacy in matters affecting family life.[54] The liberty interests protected within this zone of private, family life all facilitate the liberty of the individual to shape his or her own destiny: the freedom to choose whom to marry, whether to bring children into the world, and how to rear them. Among the most personal, intimate and far-reaching of those privacy interests is the decision whether and when to bear a child.[55] As shown in Part I of this brief, this decision for a teenage girl profoundly influences [54] The privacy right recognized in Roe has its antecedents in constitutionally protected liberty to decide whether and whom to marry, Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967), how to raise and educate one's children, Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972); Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925); Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923), and whether to conceive or bear a child, Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965); Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942). Appellees and other amici will demonstrate in detail the historical bases of the privacy right. Amici here simply note such bases and then emphasize the profound importance of the privacy right for teenage girls.

[55] See Carey v. Population Servs. Int'l, 431 U.S. 678, 685 (1977) ("The decision whether or not to beget or bear a child is at the very heart of this cluster of constitutionally protected choices.").

her destiny and her opportunities for self-determination over her entire adult life. "[T]here are few situations in which denying a minor the right to make an important decision will have consequences so grave and indelible."[56] A teenage girl, whose desire and need for confidentiality exceeds that of an adult woman,[57] requires the protection that the Constitution affords to begin her adult life as she, and not the government, chooses.[58]

This Court has expressed great solicitude for protecting the ability of teenage girls to make choices, especially younger minors.[59] And in the abortion context, this Court translated that solicitude into a preference for "a family rather than a judicial [or governmental] resolution of a minor's abortion decision." Bellotti II, at 648. State-mandated childbearing and motherhood, overriding such a "family . . . resolution", reflects not solicitude but complete disregard for a minor's decision making with respect to abortion; it denies her the power to make any decision at all, even one her parents fully support. Yet this Court has claimed for itself in the abortion and [56] Bellotti II, 443 U.S. 622, 642 (1979).

[57] Unmarried teenage girls are especially concerned to keep confidential the existence of a pregnancy and their decision as to whether to terminate it. For example, one study found that a desire to keep the pregnancy secret and a need for confidentiality in obtaining prenatal health care services led many teens to seek late prenatal care and influenced their choice in health care providers. Institute of Medicine, Prenatal Care, supra n. 28, at 78. A study of 17 deaths following post-Roe illegal abortions concluded that a desire for secrecy was the primary reason two teenagers who died had self aborted. Binkin, Gold & Cates, Illegal Abortion Deaths in the United States: Why Are They Still Occurring? 14 Fam. Plan. Persp. 163, 165 (1982); see also, Bellotti II, 443 U.S. at 644 (requiring "anonymity" for minors' judicial consent for abortion proceedings).

[58] See Kent v. Dulles, 357 U.S. 116, 126 (1958) (recognizing that "'[o]ur nation . . . has thrived on the principle that, outside of plainly harmful conduct, every American is left to shape his own life as he thinks best, do what he pleases, go where he pleases.'"). As long ago as 1928, Justice Brandeis characterized the right of privacy as the right "to be let alone—the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men." Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438, 478 (1928) (dissenting opinion).

[59] See Bellotti II, 443 U.S. at 634-636.

other contexts a long-standing "concern for the vulnerability of children."[60] None is more vulnerable than the unmarried, very young teenage or pre-teenage girl who unexpectedly finds herself pregnant and who, supported by her parents, wants an abortion. State-enforced childbearing and motherhood bespeak a savage, indeed, punitive disregard for her health, safety and future.[61]

B. For Teenage Girls, The Right to Choose Abortion Is a Fundamental Liberty That Is "Deeply Rooted" In Our Nation, and "Essential to the Orderly Pursuit of Happiness"

For a teenage girl especially, the right to choose abortion is properly seen as "deeply rooted in this Nation's history and tradition,"[62] and "essential to the orderly pursuit of [her] happiness."[63]

The right to choose is, by definition, rooted in the institution of the family, from which the concept of "deeply rooted" derives.[64] To become "deeply rooted" in our history and tradition, a right need not have existed for generations or centuries. Just nine years after this Court decided Brown v. Board of Education,[65] the Court characterized the rights recognized in Brown as "long-declared and well-established individual rights."[66] Within a short period of time, through desegrega-

[60] Id. at 634.

[61] Ironically, state-mandated childbearing would undoubtedly fall hardest of all on the "immature minor", for whom this Court has expressed special concern. Id. at 648. No intelligible principle could dictate forcing childbirth on the girl who is so young as to be immature, but who does not want a child and who is supported in her decision by her parents.

[62] Moore v. City of East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494, 503 (1977).

[63] Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1, 12 (1967).

[64] Moore, 431 U.S. at 503.

[65] 347 U.S. 483 (1954).

[66] Watson v. City of Memphis, 373 U.S. 526, 533 (1963) (ordering city to proceed without further delay to desegregate its public recreational facilities).

tion efforts all over our country, the rights recognized in Brown became "deeply rooted" in our nation's history and tradition.

So, too, the abortion right has become "deeply rooted" in this nation through its exercise by women, and through its acculturation and assimilation into their lives and our society. The right has been exercised by approximately 20 million women, including five million teenage girls. Every year, 42 percent of the 1.1 million teenagers who become pregnant choose to end their pregnancies through abortion.[67]

Millions of girls and women today—those aged approximately 13 to 29—have never known childbearing life without this fundamental right. By definition, this includes all teenage girls today, and all women who became teenagers since 1973. To overrule Roe v. Wade would radically alter the lives of a generation of women and girls who have grown up with the liberty to shape their own future by choosing whether and when to bear children.

That the abortion right now has deep roots is not refuted by statutory restrictions once placed upon abortion commencing in the late nineteenth century. Current advances in medical procedures for abortion have vitiated the primary purpose of the nineteenth century laws—the protection of the woman's life and health.[68] As amici have shown, abortion at any stage of gestation is safer today than childbearing, particularly for teenage girls, who are more than twenty-four times more likely to die from childbearing than from first-trimester abortion.[69] The one-time prevalence of now out-dated statutes cannot justify contemporary denial of constitutional rights.[70]

[67] Henshaw, supra n. 5, at 5; Ventura, Taffel & Mosher, supra n. 2, at 508, Table 3.

[68] See Roe, 410 U.S. at 148-49.

[69] Ory, supra n. 8.

[70] Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783, 790 (1983) ("Standing alone, historical patterns cannot justify contemporary violations of constitutional guarantees.").

Moreover, the right to choose abortion also properly falls within the class of rights "essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness."[71] This class of rights consists of those liberty interests which concern intimate, familial matters. For example, the long-standing existence in parts of this country of laws prohibiting inter-racial marriage in 1967 did not prevent this Court from recognizing that "the freedom of choice to marry" had "long been recognized as one of the vital personal rights essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men."[72] The right to bear a child, recognized long ago as a "basic civil right[,]"[73] cannot be exercised under conditions favorable to the "orderly pursuit of happiness," unless the individual has the liberty to determine whether and when to bear a child. Forcing upon a woman, particularly a teenage girl, continuation of an unwanted pregnancy and unwanted childbearing, together with its grave consequences, is contrary to any concept of the orderly pursuit of happiness.

A right exercised so much, and whose exercise demonstrates its importance, its liberating force, and its empowering role for women, has become "deeply rooted" in our tradition. It is self-evidently "essential to the orderly pursuit of [women's] happiness."

C. The Compelling Need of Teenage Girls to Maintain the Option of Abortion Confirms That Roe v. Wade Should Continue to Be Upheld

For sound reasons, the right to choose abortion has been constitutionally protected for over sixteen years, and this Court has previously reviewed at length those reasons in continuing to apply the rule of stare decisis in the abortion area.[74] Appellee and other amicus briefs will discuss at length the reasons why this rule should continue to apply. It suffices here to say, by way of summary, that stare decisis requires upholding a settled principle of constitutional interpretation absent compelling reasons to depart from it. The facts amici have put before the Court concerning teenage girls dramatically illustrate that there are compelling, indeed, overwhelming reasons not to depart from the rule of stare decisis in this case, but to continue to protect the right to choose abortion.

[71] See, e.g., Loving, 388 U.S. at 12; Meyer, 262 U.S. at 399.

[72] Loving, 388 U.S. at 12.

[73] Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535, 541 (1942).

It is illogical to compare Roe v. Wade, which established a constitutional protection on which teenage girls have particularly relied, with other decisions of this Court, long since overruled, which limited constitutional protections. Roe v. Wade, while controversial, is hardly a case like Plessy v. Ferguson,[75] which was patently repugnant to the principles of equality guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment, and which the overwhelming majority of legal and political scholars and the clear majority of the American public had long repudiated. It was overruled by a decision that sought to extend civil rights to all Americans.[76] In contrast, this case threatens to take away a life-shaping civil right from more [74] City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416, 419-420 (1983) [Akron]; see also, Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians & Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747, 780-81 (1986) (Stevens, J., concurring) ("There is a strong public interest in stability, and in the orderly conduct of our affairs, that is served by a consistent course of constitutional adjudication."); United States v. Maine, 420 U.S. 515, 527 (1975) ("the doctrine of stare decisis is still a powerful force in our jurisprudence"). In United States v. Maine, the Court refused to overturn a case decided 30 years before concerning the ownership of the lands underlying the marginal sea, which had resulted in a great deal of public and private business activity. The Court explained, "We are quite sure that it would be inappropriate to disturb our prior cases, major legislation, and many years of commercial activity by calling into question at this date, the constitutional premise of prior decisions." 420 U.S. at 528. Overruling Roe v. Wade would disturb rights of far greater value than those commercial rights that stayed the Court's hand in Maine.

[75] 163 U.S. 537 (1896).

[76] Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954).

than half of all Americans: women.[77] And within that class, none is more at risk from losing the option of abortion, yet none has less political influence in federal and state legislatures than a teenage girl. To leave her to the mercies of state legislatures, as has been suggested (Akron, 462 U.S. at 465 [O'Connor, J.], is to abandon her. A teenage girl, more than anyone else, requires the Constitution's continued protection of abortion, lest her rights, life, and future be irreparably damaged.[78]

D. For Teenage Girls, Their Fundamental Right to Decide Whether to Bear a Child Cannot Be Limited to Contraception But Must Include Abortion

For teenage girls in particular, whose knowledge and successful use of contraception is lower than that of other women,[79] their well-established constitutional right to decide whether to bear a child[80] necessarily requires a right to choose abortion. To concede to these girls a right to contracept but not to abort is, in effect, substantially to deny them the right to decide whether to bear a child.

[77] This Court should not wish to be remembered as the first to take away a fundamental constitutional right from anyone, much less women. Whatever were Chief Justice Taney's achievements in solidifying the work of the Marshall court, he is judged by history for having written that black Americans had long been regarded as "beings of an inferior order; and altogether unfit to associate with the white race". Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. 393, 407 (1857). Justices of this Court will not write their own historical verdict, as this very case could demonstrate.

[78] If ever there were a "discrete and insular minorit[y]" whom the "political processes" cannot and should not be relied upon to protect, United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144, 152 n. 4 (1938), it is the pregnant teenage girl.

[79] Zelnick & Kantner, supra n. 17. Fifty percent of teenagers who had a premarital first pregnancy never used contraceptives. Id. at 236 and Table 9.

[80] Carey v. Population Servs. Int'l, 431 U.S. 678, 687 (1977) (Part III of plurality opinion by J. Brennan, joined in by JJ. White, Marshall, Blackmun, Stevens) ("the underlying premise of [Griswold and Eisenstadt is] that the Constitution protects 'the right of the individual . . . to be free from unwarranted governmental intrusion into . . . the decision whether to bear or beget a child") (quoting Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438, 453 (1972)).

In our society, the plain facts are that teenage girls—eighty percent of whose pregnancies are unintended, and half of whose pregnancies occur within six months of becoming sexually active—generally focus on the decision whether to bear a child only after conception and an unintended pregnancy force them to do so. To take away the abortion right effectively would eliminate for many teens the element of choice in childbearing.[81] By eliminating the right to choose abortion, the state would force unwanted childbearing and motherhood on those thousands of teenage girls who simply do not consider in a mature way the potentially grave and life-altering consequences of their sexual activity. Wishing them more mature will not make them so. And this Court has long since rejected the notion of using unwanted childbearing as a punishment to deter sexual activity.[82]

E. The Missouri Statute's Mandatory Viability Tests and Counseling Prohibitions Unduly Burden Teenage Girls' Fundamental Right to Choose Abortion

Amici wish to draw to the Court's attention that the Missouri statute's viability tests and counseling prohibitions, Mo. Rev. Stat. §§188.029, 188.205, 188.210, 188.215 (1986), would have a disproportionately adverse impact on teenage girls' exercise of their fundamental right to choose abortion.

1. Statutory Requirements That Impose Added Delay or Added Costs for Abortion Fall Heaviest on Teenage Girls

The Missouri statute requires a physician who has "reason to believe" that a patient requesting an abortion is twenty or [81] Choice is essential to the exercise of constitutionally protected rights. The forced sterilization found unconstitutional in Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942), would have been no less repugnant had Skinner declared an intention of having no more children; it is the State's denial of his choice to conceive children that is repugnant.

[82] Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. at 448.

more weeks pregnant to conduct such "tests as are necessary to make a finding of the gestational age, weight, and lung maturity" of the fetus.[83] These tests, which appellee and other amici will show to be medically inappropriate or irrational, inevitably would increase the cost and delay the performance of the abortion.[84] The burden from delay imposed by these tests will fall heaviest on teenage girls who, though they obtain approximately one quarter of all abortions, obtain forty-three percent of abortions performed after twenty weeks.[85] Moreover, the increased expense associated with the tests, the delay in performance of the abortion, which requires increased skill on the part of the physician, and the need to travel to facilities that perform later abortions can push the cost of obtaining a post-twenty week abortion into the thousands of dollars.[86] For many teenage girls, who are more likely to seek abortions after twenty weeks, such prohibitive costs will effectively foreclose their ability to obtain an abortion, thus denying them their fundamental right to choose.

[83] Mo. Rev. Stat. 188.029 (1986).

[84] Evidence at trial showed that tests to determine fetal weight cost approximately $125 to $250, and amniocentesis, the only test to determine lung maturity costs approximately $200 to $250 and will delay the abortion due to a usual two-week delay in scheduling the amniocentesis. See Reproductive Health Servs. v. Webster, 662 F. Supp. 407, 422 & nn. 40-41 (W.D. Mo. 1987), aff'd in part and rev'd in part, 851 F.2d 1071 (8th Cir. 1988).

[85] Hunter, supra n. 21, at 133. Teens tend to delay seeking an abortion for the same reasons they delay seeking prenatal care: low income, failure to recognize the symptoms of pregnancy, self-denial of the pregnancy, irregular menses, ambivalence about abortion, and impeded access. Id.; APA, supra n. 36, at 73-74.

[86] In Hodgson v. Minnesota, 648 F. Supp. 756 (D. Minn. 1986), the District Court found that "[t]he cost of an abortion increases with gestational age because the procedure becomes more difficult and requires more skill on the part of the doctor." Id. at 761. The fee schedule of one clinic cited by the Court showed that abortions performed at the clinic at 19-21 weeks cost $650, but after 21 weeks patients are referred either to a hospital in St. Paul where abortions at 22 weeks cost $1600-1800, or to a hospital in Kansas where abortions up to 24 weeks cost $2000 in cash. None of these figures includes the costs of travel. Id.

2. The Restrictions on "Encouraging or Counseling" Not Only Violate Teenagers' and Their Physicians' First Amendment Rights, But Also Fall Heaviest on Teenage Girls

The Missouri statute prohibits speech by public employees in public facilities and the use of public funds for the purpose of "encouraging or counseling a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life."[87] As appellee and other amici will demonstrate at length, any prohibition on the content of speech between a physician and his or her patient violates First Amendment rights of the physician and First and Fourteenth Amendment rights of the patient, which this Court has held protect the right of the pregnant woman to receive unimpeded advice and counsel from her physician in order to make an informed, independent choice.[88] The "encouraging or counseling" prohibition will fall especially heavily on teenage girls, whose lack of experience and knowledge of their own health requirements places them in greater need of independent professional guidance in making an informed, reasoned decision whether to continue a pregnancy. To exercise their established right to reproductive choice, teenagers need access to unbiased information about childbearing and abortion from trained counselors and physicians so that they may ultimately make the decision that is best for themselves. If this Court is truly concerned with the quality of abortion decision making by teenagers, especially the very young,[89] the last thing it should uphold is incomplete and inaccurate counseling to a pregnant teenager concerning her options.

[87] Mo. Rev. Stat. §§ 188.205, 188.210, 188.215 (1986).

[88] Thornburgh, 476 U.S. at 762-763; Akron, 462 U.S. at 443-445, 447; Roe, 410 U.S. at 163.

[89] Bellotti II, 443 U.S. at 635-36, 640-41.

Conclusion

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment below should be affirmed.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN H. HENN
Counsel of Record
NINA JOAN KIMBALL
FOLEY, HOAG & ELIOT
One Post Office Square
Boston, Massachusetts 02109
(617) 482-1390
*Attorneys for Amici Curiae

Dated: March 30, 1989

Of Counsel:

THOMAS ASHER
ASHER & ASSOCIATES
1819 H Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20006

* Attorneys for Amici gratefully acknowledge the assistance of Gwendolyn Thomas and Laurie Woog, law clerks at Foley, Hoag & Eliot (through Northeastern University School of Law cooperative education program).

AMICUS CURIAE

BRIEF

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
MAR 30 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

No. 88-605

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,
Appellants,

v.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,
Appellees.

On Appeal from the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit

---

BRIEF FOR THE NATIONAL COALITION AGAINST DOMESTIC VIOLENCE AS AMICUS CURIAE SUPPORTING APPELLEES

DAVID A. STRAUSS*
CASS R. SUNSTEIN
University of Chicago Law School
1111 East 60th Street
Chicago, Illinois 60637
(312) 702-9494

*Counsel of Record

WILSON - EPES PRINTING CO., INC. - 789-0096 - WASHINGTON, D.C. 20001

QUESTION PRESENTED

The National Coalition Against Domestic Violence will address the following question:

Whether Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), should be reconsidered and, upon reconsideration, overruled.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Page
QUESTION PRESENTED	i
TABLE OF AUTHORITIES	iv
INTEREST OF THE AMICUS CURIAE	1
SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT	2
ARGUMENT:
ROE v. WADE SHOULD NOT BE OVERRULED BECAUSE MEASURES FORBIDDING ABORTION ARE INCONSISTENT WITH THE EQUAL PROTECTION CLAUSE	5
A. Measures Restricting Abortion Constitute Gender-Based Classifications	6
B. A Prohibition Against Abortion Is Not Supported By A Sufficiently Persuasive Justification	13
1. Introduction	13
2. Laws prohibiting abortion are ineffective in preventing abortion	17
3. Restrictions on abortion increase the mortality and morbidity rates of pregnant women	19
4. A prohibition against abortion would create intolerable difficulties in the case of pregnancies resulting from coercion and abuse	20
5. Restrictions on abortion often rest on stereotyped and outmoded notions of women's proper role	23
CONCLUSION	25

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

CASES: Page

Berea College v. Kentucky, 211 U.S. 45 (1908) 8
Bradwell v. Illinois, 16 Wall. 130 (1873) 23, 24
Califano v. Goldfarb, 430 U.S. 199 (1977) 10, 13
Califano v. Webster, 430 U.S. 313 (1977) 4, 16, 23, 25
Carey v. Population Services International, 431 U.S. 678 (1978) 16, 18
Cleveland Bd. of Education v. LaFleur, 414 U.S. 632 (1974) 12
Craig v. Boren, 429 U.S. 190 (1976) 12, 13, 16, 18
Geduldig v. Aiello, 417 U.S. 484 (1974) 11-12
General Electric Co. v. Gilbert, 429 U.S. 125 (1976) 11
Goesart v. Cleary, 335 U.S. 464 (1948) 8
Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965) 16, 19
Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980) 11
Hoyt v. Florida, 368 U.S. 57 (1961) 5
Kirschberg v. Feenstra, 450 U.S. 455 (1981) 5, 13
Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977) 11
Michael M. v. Sonoma County Superior Court, 450 U.S. 464 (1981).....7, 8, 9, 10
Mississippi University for Women v. Hogan, 458 U.S. 718 (1982) .....passim
Moore v. City of East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494 (1977) 16
Muller v. Oregon, 208 U.S. 412 (1908) 7
Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Co. v. EEOC, 462 U.S. 669 (1983) 11
Personnel Administrator v. Feeney, 422 U.S. 256 (1979) 6, 10
Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497 (1961) 14
Reed v. Reed, 404 U.S. 71 (1971) 5
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973) .....passim
Schlesinger v. Ballard, 419 U.S. 498 (1975) 13
Schweiker v. Wilson, 450 U.S. 221 (1981) 12
Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942) 14
Stanton v. Stanton, 423 U.S. 7 (1975) 4, 13, 23
Washington v. Seattle School District No. 1, 458 U.S. 457 (1982) 10

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES—Continued

Page

Weinberger v. Salfi, 422 U.S. 749 (1975) 12
Zablocki v. Redhail, 434 U.S. 374 (1978) 14

ARTICLES:

Cates, Legalized Abortion: Effect on National Trends of Maternal and Abortion-Related Mortality, American Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology 213 (1976) 19-20
Cates & Rochat, Illegal Abortions in the United States: 1972-1974, 8 Family Planning Perspectives 2 (1976) 20
Center for Disease Control, Abortion Surveillance: Preliminary Analysis—United States, 1982-1983, 35 Morbidity & Mortality Weekly Report (1986).. 18
Farber, The Facts on Abortion, 5 Const. Commentary 285 (1988) 18
Fox, Abortion-Related Deaths, American Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology 652 (1967) 17
Gelles, Violence and Pregnancy, The Family Coordinator 81 (Jan. 1975) 22
Ginsburg, Some Thoughts on Autonomy and Equality in Relation to Roe v. Wade, 63 N.C.L. Rev. 375 (1985) 2, 5, 6
Henshaw, Forrest, & VanVort, Abortion Services in the United States, 1984 and 1985, 19 Family Planning Services 63 (1987) 18
Kaplan, Abortion as a Vice Crime, 51 Law & Contemp. Problems, 151 (1988) 18, 20
Karst, Foreword: Equal Citizenship Under the Fourteenth Amendment, 91 Harv. L. Rev. 1 (1977) 6
Law, Rethinking Sex and the Constitution, 132 U. Pa. L. Rev. 955 (1984) 6, 11
Luker, Abortion and the Meaning of Life, in Abortion: Understanding Differences 25 (S. Callahan & D. Callahan eds. 1984) 24
Schauer, Easy Cases, 58 S. Cal. L. Rev. 399 (1985) 6

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES—Continued

	Page
Tietze, Abortion as Cause of Death, in Fertility Regulation and the Public Health 274 (S. Tietze ed. 1987)	19
Tietze & Lewit, Epidemiology of Induced Abortion, in Abortion and Sterilization 56 (J. Hodgson ed. 1981)	20
Torres & Forrest, Why Do Women Have Abortions?, 20 Family Planning Perspectives 169 (1988)	18, 21
Whittemore, The Availability of Non-Hospital Abortions, in Abortion in a Changing World (P. Hall ed. 1970)	17
CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS:
U.S. Const. Amend. XIV:
Due Process Clause	2, 5-6
Equal Protection Clause	passim
Pregnancy Discrimination Act of 1978, 92 Stat. 2076, amending 42 U.S.C. 2000e	11
Cal. Penal Code Ann. 261.5 (West Supp. 1981)	9
BOOKS:
S. Estrich, Real Rape (1987)	21
R. Goldstein, Mother-Love and Abortion (1988)	5
L. Gordon, Women's Body, Women's Right: A Social History of Birth Control in America (1976)	24
L. Lader, Abortion (1966)	17, 19, 21
N. Lee, The Search for An Abortionist (1969)	17
K. Luker, Abortion and the Politics of Motherhood (1984)	15, 24
C. MacKinnon, Feminism Unmodified (1987)	6
E. Messer & K. May, Back Rooms (1988)	19, 21
J. Mohr, Abortion in America: The Origins and Evolution of National Policy, 1800-1900 (1978)	23-24
H. Morgentaler, Abortion and Contraception (1982)	19

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES—Continued

	Page
H. Rodman, B. Sarvis, & J. Bonar, The Abortion Question (1987)	17, 18
R. Schwarz, Septic Abortion (1968)	17, 19
E. Schur, Crimes Without Victims, Deviant Behavior, and Public Policy 25 (1965)	17
L. Tribe, American Constitutional Law (2d ed. 1988)	5
J. van der Tak, Abortion, Fertility, and Changing Legislation: An International Review (1974)	17

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

No. 88-605

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,
Appellants,

v.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,
Appellees.

On Appeal from the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit

---

BRIEF FOR THE NATIONAL COALITION AGAINST DOMESTIC VIOLENCE AS AMICUS CURIAE SUPPORTING APPELLEES

INTEREST OF THE AMICUS CURIAE

The National Coalition Against Domestic Violence (NCADV) is an organization dedicated to sheltering battered women and their children and to eliminating family violence against women and children. NCADV represents a network of more than 1,200 domestic violence shelters and counseling programs. It is the only nationwide organization of shelters and support services for battered women and their children.

It is not uncommon for battered women to become pregnant as the result of sexual assault and coercion in domestic situations. For a number of reasons—marital exemptions in rape laws; difficulties of proof; and, most important, the fear of further violence—it is often impossible to show that these pregnancies are the result of rape or abuse. At the same time, a battered woman who is required to bear a child is forced into a position of greater economic dependence on the perpetrator of violence, and the child is brought into an abusive situation where he or she is also likely to become a victim of violence. For many battered women, the right to an abortion means the difference between being trapped permanently in a violent and abusive situation that victimizes herself and her children, and having a chance to begin a new life.

In this case appellants and the federal government have asked the Court to overrule Roe v. Wade. Because the National Coalition Against Domestic Violence believes that such an action would seriously harm the interests of battered women, we offer this brief to assist the Court in its deliberations.*

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Roe v. Wade was decided on the basis of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Since Roe was decided, however, a substantial body of scholarly opinion has developed suggesting that the Equal Protection Clause would also support the holding of Roe. See, e.g., Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Some Thoughts on Autonomy and Equality in Relation to Roe v. Wade, 63 N.C.L. Rev. 375 (1985). The Court should not overrule a precedent of the significance of Roe without considering all the substantial arguments that can be made on its behalf.

* Letters from the parties consenting to the filing of this brief have been lodged with the Clerk.

The existence of an Equal Protection Clause argument, which is more than substantial, at the very least counsels against reconsidering Roe in this case.

A. Restrictions on abortion constitute gender-based classifications. The direct impact of such restrictions falls exclusively on women. A law disabling "all women" from obtaining abortions would unquestionably be based on gender; a measure that simply forbids abortions is exactly equivalent, and should be treated no differently. Indeed, the capacity to become pregnant, and therefore to undergo an abortion, is a biological correlate of being female. The fact that men cannot become pregnant does not mean that restrictions on abortion are gender-neutral: when a statute is targeted at women alone, the fact that men and women are not similarly situated is relevant to the question of justification, not to the question whether the statute classifies on the basis of gender.

It is true that many laws forbidding abortion outlaw only the performance of an abortion and do not apply to the woman who undergoes the abortion. But this does not alter the conclusion that such measures are based on gender. A statute that forbade women from working in certain occupations would be a clear gender-based classification even if it imposed criminal sanctions only on the employer.

B. Because a prohibition against abortion is a gender-based classification and burdens the fundamental interest in reproductive freedom, it may be sustained against Equal Protection attack only if it can survive the most searching form of judicial review, closely linking the particular means to a compelling governmental objective. Even a cursory examination of the data shows that there is only an attenuated connection between the means of prohibiting abortion and the ends that such prohibitions are alleged to secure.

Before Roe, between 20% and 30% of all pregnancies in the United States ended in abortions. Since Roe, the rate has been between 27% and 30%. Prohibitions against abortion have therefore been essentially ineffective in achieving the interest advanced in their support—the protection of fetal life.

The principal effect of prohibitions against abortion is to cause women who seek abortions to obtain them illegally. The evidence is clear that illegal abortions are vastly more dangerous to women. Before Roe, as many as 5,000 to 10,000 women died each year as a result of illegal abortions. A significant percentage—perhaps one-third—of illegal abortions produced injuries severe enough to require hospitalization. Since Roe, abortion-related deaths have dropped by 90%.

Finally, there is substantial reason to believe that the impetus behind restrictions on abortion is the same as that behind other gender-based restrictions that the Court has invalidated—" 'the role-typing society has long imposed' on women" (Califano v. Webster, 430 U.S. 313, 317 (1977), quoting Stanton v. Stanton, 421 U.S. 7, 15 (1975)). Antiabortion laws were principally the product of a period in the late nineteenth century when gender stereotyping was at its height. There is evidence that support for restrictions on abortion is rooted in a desire to prevent women from adopting roles different from the traditional ones centered on the bearing and rearing of children.

ARGUMENT

ROE v. WADE SHOULD NOT BE OVERRULED BECAUSE MEASURES FORBIDDING ABORTION ARE INCONSISTENT WITH THE EQUAL PROTECTION CLAUSE

A series of decisions beginning with Reed v. Reed, 404 U.S. 71 (1971), has established that measures classifying on the basis of gender are unconstitutional unless the party supporting the measure can "carry the burden of showing an 'exceedingly persuasive justification' for the classification." Mississippi University for Women v. Hogan, 458 U.S. 718, 724 (1982), quoting Kirchberg v. Feenstra, 450 U.S. 455, 461 (1981). But in 1973, when Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, was decided, this body of law was in its earliest stages. At that time, Reed v. Reed was the only decision suggesting that gender-based classifications might be subject to something other than the most highly deferential review (see, e.g., Hoyt v. Florida, 368 U.S. 57 (1961)). Moreover, Reed was not decided until six months after the Court noted probable jurisdiction in Roe v. Wade (see 402 U.S. 941 (May 3, 1971)). And Reed did not clearly adumbrate the heightened scrutiny approach that the Court subsequently adopted: Reed used the language of "rational relationship" review. See 404 U.S. at 76.

It is therefore not surprising that the Court has never considered whether laws forbidding abortion constitute impermissible discrimination on the basis of gender in violation of the Equal Protection Clause. But in the years since Roe was decided, a substantial body of scholarly opinion has developed in support of the position that measures forbidding abortion are unconstitutional for this reason. See, e.g., Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Some Thoughts on Autonomy and Equality in Relation to Roe v. Wade, 63 N.C.L. Rev. 375 (1985); Laurence Tribe, American Constitutional Law 1353-56 (2d ed. 1988); Robert Goldstein, Mother-Love and Abortion (1988);

Frederick Schauer, Easy Cases, 58 S. Cal. L. Rev. 399, 431-32 n.83 (1985); Kenneth Karst, Foreword: Equal Citizenship Under the Fourteenth Amendment, 91 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 53-59 (1977); Catharine MacKinnon, Feminism Unmodified ch. 8 (1987); Sylvia Law, Rethinking Sex and The Constitution, 132 U. Pa. L. Rev. 955 (1984).

Indeed, some have suggested that the holding in Roe could be more satisfactorily supported on Equal Protection grounds. Judge Ginsburg, for example, concluded that Roe "is weakened . . . by the opinion's concentration on a medically approved autonomy idea, to the exclusion of a constitutionally based sex-equality perspective." R.B. Ginsburg, supra, at 386.

We recognize that no Equal Protection Clause argument was passed upon in the lower courts in this case. For that reason, we do not urge it as the basis for the Court's decision on the specific Missouri statutory provisions at issue here. But appellant and the government have asked the Court to overrule Roe. It would be improvident for the Court to overrule a precedent of such significance before considering all of the substantial arguments that can be advanced in its support. As we demonstrate below, the Equal Protection Clause argument advanced by Judge Ginsburg and many others is more than substantial.

A. Measures Restricting Abortion Constitute Gender-Based Classifications

When a measure is challenged on the ground that it constitutes impermissible gender discrimination, the Court undertakes a two-step process. First, the Court determines whether the measure in fact classifies on the basis of gender or should otherwise be treated as a gender-based classification. See, e.g., Personnel Administrator v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256, 274-75 (1979). If the measure is to be treated as a gender-based classification, the second step is to determine whether it can survive under the applicable standard of review. See Mississippi University for Women v. Hogan, 458 U.S. 718, 724 (1982).

In our view, there is no question that measures restricting abortion must be treated as gender-based classifications. Whether such measures can be sufficiently justified is a question of greater complexity. But that question, which we address below, should not be confused with the straightforward issue of whether such measures must be treated as gender-based classifications. See Mississippi University for Women, 458 U.S. at 724 n.9 ("[T]he analysis and level of scrutiny applied to determine the validity of [a] classification do not vary simply because the objective [sought by the classification] appears acceptable").

1. The direct impact of a measure restricting abortion falls on a class of people that consists exclusively of women. See Michael M. v. Sonoma County Superior Court, 450 U.S. 464, 473 (1981) (plurality opinion) ("[V]irtually all of the significant harmful and inescapably identifiable consequences of teenage pregnancy fall on the young female"). Only women can undergo abortions. Only women will bear children if abortions are prohibited. A statute that provided that "no woman" may obtain an abortion (or that no abortion may be provided to "any woman") would obviously be based on gender; a statute that prohibits abortion without using the words "woman" or "female" is exactly equivalent to such a measure and should be treated no differently.

The fact that some statutes outlawing abortion forbade only the performance of an abortion, and did not make it a crime to undergo an abortion, does not affect this conclusion. Laws prohibiting women from working more than a certain number of hours each day in certain business establishments (see, e.g., Muller v. Oregon, 208 U.S. 412 (1908))—or barring women from certain forms of employment entirely (see, e.g., Goesart v. Cleary, 335 U.S. 464 (1948))—are classic examples of gender-based classifications, even if only the employer, and not the female employee, could be prosecuted for a violation.[1] See Mississippi University for Women, 458 U.S. at 725 n.10. Indeed, Muller was a prosecution brought against a male employer, not against a woman. Such laws are gender-based because they necessarily disable women alone from performing certain work. Similarly, a prohibition against abortion, however phrased, necessarily and indeed as a matter of biology disables women alone from obtaining abortions.

For similar reasons, the fact that men will often be indirectly affected by the availability of abortions does not alter the gender-based character of measures restricting abortion. Gender-based classifications often have an indirect effect on men. The restrictions on employment at issue in Muller and Goesart affected men who were members of the same family as women who sought that form of employment, or who were otherwise economically dependent on such women. See also Michael M. v. Sonoma County, supra (treating a statutory rape law as a gender-based classification disadvantaging men even though women could be prosecuted for aiding and abetting (see 450 U.S. at 477 & n.5 (Stewart, J., concurring)).

2. Measures restricting abortion differ from the usual form of gender-based classification because they do not always contain such words as "female" or "woman." But the phrasing of a prohibition cannot be the decisive factor in determining whether it is to be treated as gender-based. As a matter of biology, only women possess the capacity to undergo an abortion. Indeed, the capacity to become pregnant is a defining characteristic of being a woman. If a measure classifies on the basis of a trait that, as a matter of biology, only one gender possesses, that measure must be treated as gender-based.

[1] Similarly, a measure requiring racial segregation would not escape strict scrutiny even if it were enforced only against whites who sought to bring about integration. Cf. Berea College v. Kentucky, 211 U.S. 45 (1908).

Michael M. v. Sonoma County Superior Court, supra, establishes this proposition. In Michael M., the Court unhesitatingly treated a statutory rape law as a "gender-based classification[]" (450 U.S. at 468 (plurality opinion); see id. at 483 (Blackmun, J., concurring)) that affected "men alone" (id. at 466 (plurality opinion)). But the statute at issue in Michael M. did not literally refer to "men" or "males." It prohibited "sexual intercourse accomplished with a female not the wife of the perpetrator, where the female is under the age of 18 years." Cal. Penal Code Ann. S 261.5 (West Supp. 1981), quoted at 450 U.S. at 466. Because only men can "accomplish" "sexual intercourse . . . with a female," the Court treated the statute as a gender-based measure. Similarly, because only women can undergo an abortion, a restriction on abortion is gender-based, even if the statute imposing such a restriction does not explicitly refer to "women."

Indeed, it would be mischievous to permit a measure to evade searching scrutiny simply by avoiding any mention of the words "women" or "men" and classifying instead on the basis of a defining characteristic of one or the other sex. Such an approach would create troubling possibilities of abuse and pretext in the context of both sex and race, since it would not be difficult for a state that wished covertly to classify on the basis of sex or race to identfy biological correlates of either of those traits. A measure based on the defining characteristics of gender should receive the same treatment as a measure based on gender itself; for constitutional purposes, the two measures are one and the same thing.

3. It would be erroneous to suggest that because men and women are not "similarly situated" with respect to the objectives of abortion laws—that is, because men cannot become pregnant—restrictions on abortion are not gender-based. As the Court has made clear, the claim that men and women are not "similarly situated" in some respect (biological or otherwise) may provide a possible justification for a measure that classifies men and women differently. See, e.g., Michael M., supra, 450 U.S. at 469 (citing cases). But such a claim is not relevant to the question whether a measure targeted at women alone should be treated as gender-based, and therefore subject to heightened scrutiny, in the first place.

Similarly, the fact that some women are not burdened by measures outlawing abortion is immaterial. A law that burdens some but not all women—for example, all women over the age of thirty—is gender-based even though many women are unaffected. See, e.g., Califano v. Goldfarb, 430 U.S. 199 (1977).

Finally, because restrictions on abortion classify on the basis of a biological correlate and a defining characteristic of gender, they are not comparable to facially neutral laws like the veterans' preference upheld in Personnel Administrator v. Feeney, supra. The measure at issue in Feeney disadvantaged a class that was not defined by gender (or any biological correlate) and that, while consisting disproportionately of women, contained a large number of men as well (see 442 U.S. at 275; id. at 281 (Stevens, J., concurring)). A measure restricting abortion not only directly affects a class consisting exclusively of women but also classifies on the basis of a characteristic that is biologically linked to one gender alone. Feeney upheld the veterans' preference because it was not discriminatory on its face and had not been shown to be impermissibly motivated. But where, as here, a measure is gender-based, the Court's decisions make clear that there is no requirement of "a particularized inquiry into motivation." Washington v. Seattle School District No. 1, 458 U.S. 457, 485 (1982); see also Feeney, 442 U.S. at 271-74.

4. This reasoning is not inconsistent with the holding of Geduldig v. Aiello, 417 U.S. 484 (1974). Geduldig sustained the constitutionality of a state disability insurance program that excluded from coverage certain disabilities resulting from pregnancy. Most of the opinion in Geduldig is devoted to the justification for excluding pregnancy from insurance coverage, not to the question whether the classification should be viewed as based on gender. The discussion of the latter issue is confined to a cursory footnote (417 U.S. at 496 n.20), presumably because Geduldig, too, was decided at a time when the current Equal Protection law governing gender discrimination was in its early stages. Because the Court in Geduldig found ample justification for the classification at issue in that case, the holding of Geduldig is not inconsistent with the conclusion that a restriction on abortion constitutes gender-based legislation.[2]

---

[2] The view that measures classifying on the basis of pregnancy are not gender-based was specifically rejected by Congress in connection with Title VII. Pregnancy Discrimination Act of 1978, Pub. L. No. 95-555, 92 Stat. 2076, amending 42 U.S.C. 2000e. See Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Co. v. EEOC, 462 U.S. 669, 678 (1983) (Pregnancy Discrimination Act "unambiguously expressed [Congress's] disapproval of both the holding and the reasoning of the Court in . . . [General Electric Co. v.] Gilbert", 429 U.S. 125 (1976), which followed the logic of Geduldig). Both Gilbert and Geduldig were widely criticized by commentators. See the collection of several dozen citations in Law, Rethinking Sex and the Constitution, 132 U. Pa. L. Rev. 955, 984 nn. 107-09 (1984).

In Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980), and Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977), the Court did not confront the question whether a prohibition of abortion amounted to discrimination on the basis of gender. Instead the Court concluded that "financial need alone [does not] identif[y] a suspect class" (Maher, 432 U.S. at 471) and that the Constitution does not require a governmental subsidy for abortions (Harris, 448 U.S. at 316-17), noting in the process that "teenage women desiring medically necessary abortions" should not be considered a suspect class in light of the fact that the statute under attack was "facially neutral as to age." Harris, 448 U.S. at 323-24 n.26.

In addition, the Court in Geduldig emphasized that it was reviewing a "social welfare program[]" (417 U.S. at 495) that is subject to only the most lenient scrutiny (ibid.). By contrast, a prohibition against abortion is a direct coercive measure; such measures have not historically received the degree of deference given to complex social welfare schemes. See Schweiker v. Wilson, 450 U.S. 221, 238-39 (1981). For that reason, the appropriate precedent for restrictions on abortion may be not Geduldig but Cleveland Bd. of Education v. LaFleur, 414 U.S. 632 (1974). LaFleur invalidated a school board regulation that required pregnant school teachers to take unpaid maternity leave five months before childbirth. LaFleur relied on the Due Process Clause, holding that the regulations rested on "unwarranted conclusive presumptions" (id. at 651). But Justice Powell noted in a concurring opinion that the decision could more soundly be rested on the Equal Protection Clause. See id. at 652. And in Craig v. Boren, 429 U.S. 190 (1976), the Court analogized LaFleur to the cases establishing that gender-based classifications receive heightened scrutiny. See 429 U.S. at 199. Moreover, Geduldig, unlike LaFleur, involved a "noncontractual claim to receive funds from the public treasury." See Weinberger v. Salfi, 422 U.S. 749, 772 (1975).

A restriction on abortion resembles the measure invalidated in LaFleur far more closely than it resembles the insurance scheme of Geduldig. A restriction on abortion, like the regulations invalidated in LaFleur, subjects pregnant women to a direct disadvantage that men do not suffer. By contrast, the Court in Geduldig emphasized that the "aggregate risk protection" received by women was not less than that received by men. 417 U.S. at 496-97. It is inconceivable, for example, that the Court would apply deferential review to a law that forbade "pregnant persons" from holding gainful employment, or, to give a more extreme example, from appearing in public, whether or not such measures might survive deferential review.

B. A Prohibition Against Abortion Is Not Supported By A Sufficiently Persuasive Justification

1. Introduction

a. In the ordinary case, a gender-based classification is unconstitutional unless its proponents "carry the burden of showing an 'exceedingly persuasive justification'" (Mississippi University for Women, 458 U.S. at 724, quoting Kirchberg, 450 U.S. at 461). In assessing the justifications offered for gender-based measures, the Court undertakes a "searching analysis" (Mississippi University for Women, 458 U.S. at 728) of whether the restriction is, in fact, "substantially related to the statutory objective" (Craig v. Boren, 429 U.S. 190, 204 (1976)).

As the Court has explained, a "searching analysis" is required because gender-based measures are often the product not of "reasoned analysis" (Mississippi University for Women, 458 U.S. at 726) and careful investigation of the relevant facts and considerations. Rather, measures that single out one gender for special disadvantages often reflect the "mechanical application" (ibid.) of "'old notions' and 'archaic and overbroad' generalizations." Califano v. Goldfarb, 430 U.S. 199, 211 (1977) (plurality opinion), quoting Stanton v. Stanton, 421 U.S. 7, 14 (1975), and Schlesinger v. Ballard, 419 U.S. 498, 508 (1975).

For a statute prohibiting abortion, the appropriate standard of review under the Equal Protection Clause is the careful scrutiny adopted in Roe itself. Legislation prohibiting abortion represents a form of gender discrimination that intrudes on basic interests in bodily integrity; self-management and self-direction during and after pregnancy; health; and sometimes life itself. When challenged on Equal Protection grounds, gender-based legislation classifying in the area of such interests may be upheld only if it survives the most searching kind of review. See Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942) (applying strict scrutiny under Equal Protection Clause to compulsory sterilization law); Zablocki v. Redhail, 434 U.S. 374 (1978) (applying strict scrutiny under Equal Protection Clause to law forbidding marriage).

b. Appellant and the government seek to have Roe v. Wade overruled on the ground that it does not give the states sufficient latitude to "reach an accommodation" between "a woman's interest in procreative choice" and "the State's interest in protecting the life of an unborn child and promoting respect for life generally." U.S. Am. Br. 16; see, e.g., Appellant's Br. 18.

The state's asserted interest in protecting fetal life is itself problematic in many ways. There is deep disagreement in society about the moral status of fetal life; the claim (enacted into law by Missouri in this case) that life begins at conception has highly theological overtones; and as we explain below, there is an inextricable connection between that claim and constitutionally illegitimate stereotypes about women's appropriate role. In light of these considerations, a decision to accord substantial weight to that interest risks running afoul of Justice Harlan's admonition: "[T]he mere assertion that the action of the State finds justification in the controversial realm of morals cannot justify alone any and every restriction it imposes." Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497, 545 (1961) (dissenting opinion).

Even more important, however, the notion that a state law prohibiting abortions would constitute a reasonable accommodation of these interests rests not "reasoned analysis" but on precisely the kind of "simplistic, outdated assumption[s]" (Mississippi University for Women, 458 U.S. at 726) that the Court has consistently disapproved in this area. Specifically, as we explain below, the principal fallacy of appellants' argument for overruling Roe lies in the proposition that the constitutional controversy presents a stark choice—to be resolved in the abstract—between the state's interest in fetal life and the reproductive freedom of pregnant women. In this case, it is unnecessary to decide any such question.[3] Even a cursory review of the relevant data reveals that a prohibition against abortion, far from "promoting respect for life generally," would in all likelihood fail to promote the state's interest in protecting fetal life. Instead of significantly reducing the number of abortions, such legislation would cause women to undergo abortions in circumstances that are far more threatening to their lives and well-being. Moreover, overruling Roe v. Wade would produce intolerable intrusions into the lives of women who become pregnant as the result of rape, incest, and other forms of abuse.

---

[3] Several aspects of laws forbidding abortion combine to undermine the claim that abortion laws are based on the concern for fetal life. Cf. Mississippi University for Women, 458 U.S. at 730. Often prohibitions against abortion were enacted to protect women, not the fetus; and in any case they did not make criminal the conduct of the women who obtained the abortion. See Roe, 410 U.S. at 151. Prohibitions against abortion often contain exceptions for medical need—a highly discretionary standard that places the physician in a crucial position (see K. Luker, Abortion and the Politics of Motherhood 32-35 (1984))—and for pregnancies that result from, for example, rape or incest.

While such exemptions may be desirable, they are inconsistent with the claim that the state places fetal life on a par with human life. They thus undermine the most dramatic interest asserted by appellant as a basis for prohibiting abortion. The pattern of half-hearted, inconsistent, or ineffectual enforcement revealed by the pre-Roe abortion statistics further suggests that the interests that in fact prompt restrictions on abortion are different from the interests that states assert, and that such restrictions are in fact the product of a desire to maintain traditional or stereotyped roles.

c. There is no indication in the briefs of appellant and the government that either has attempted to come to grips with these difficulties. Although we have not undertaken a systematic search, we are not aware that any legislature that has enacted a statute attempting to restrict aborions has addressed these concerns. Rather, the effort to overrule Roe, like many other measures uniquely disadvantaging women that the Court has invalidated, rests on "casual assumptions" (Califano v. Webster, 430 U.S. 313, 317 (1977))—in this case, the casual and simplistic assumption that a restriction on abortion reflects a simple choice in favor of fetal life. A gender-based measure that rests on such mechanical and reflexive thinking, and that shows so fragile a connection between statutory means and ends, should not be upheld.

When fundamental rights or classifications requiring exacting scrutiny are involved, there is no requirement that the Court accept at face value a state's assertion that a measure will have the deterrent effect that the state intends. The state must show that statutory means will in fact promote statutory ends. See, e.g., Moore v. City of East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494, 499-500 (1977) (plurality opinion of Powell, J.); Carey v. Population Services International, 431 U.S. 678, 695-96 (1977) (plurality opinion); Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 505-06 (1965); cf. Craig v. Boren, 429 U.S. 190, 199-204 (1977). Unless the Court undertakes a "searching analysis" (Mississippi University for Women, 458 U.S. at 728) of the actual evidence, a state will be free to invoke worthy objectives to justify a measure that actually reflects outmoded or impermissible conceptions. This danger is particularly acute in the case of a prohibition against abortion—a gender-based measure that may reflect not a genuine, informed concern with the interests of both pregnant women and potential life but rather a reflexive or symbolic effort to confirm the status of women as people whose primary role is to bear children.

2. Laws Prohibiting Abortion Are Ineffective In Preventing Abortion.

The effect of Roe v. Wade on the number of abortions in the United States is far less than might casually be thought. There is good reason to believe that in the early 1960s, there were between 1.0 and 1.5 million abortions in the United States each year. That is, at least 20% and perhaps as many as 30% of all pregnancies ended in abortion. See, e.g., L. Lader, Abortion 2 (1966) (referring to the "recent" estimate of 1.5 million); J. van der Tak, Abortion, Fertility, and Changing Legislation: An International Review 72-73 (1974) (referring to "the wide acceptance of a round figure of 1 million induced abortions per year (for which only an estimated 8,000 were legal), corresponding to . . . an abortion ratio of almost 30 per 100 live births"); Whittemore, The Availability of Non-Hospital Abortions, in Abortion in a Changing World 217 (P. Hall ed. 1970) ("the oft-quoted figure of one million criminal abortions in the United States is a fairly reasonable estimate"); R. Schwarz, Septic Abortion 7 (1968) (in the late 1960s, over 20% of pregnancies terminated in illegal abortions, resulting in approximately 1.2 million unlawful abortions per year); see also H. Rodman, B. Sarvis, & J. Bonar, The Abortion Question (1987); Fox, Abortion Related Deaths, in American Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology 652 (1967) (approximately 100,000 women annually had unlawful abortions in California alone during this period). Police reports reveal that in 1960, illegal abortion was the third largest illegal enterprise in the United States, after gambling and narcotics. See E. Schur, Crimes Without Victims, Deviant Behavior and Public Policy 25 (1965); see also N. Lee, The Search for An Abortionist (1969).

Currently, between 27% and 30% of all pregnancies in the United States end in abortion, producing a total of between 1.5 and 1.6 million. This rate has remained about the same since the late 1970s. See H. Rodman, B. Sarvis, & J. Bonar, The Abortion Question 1 (1987) ("[m]ore than one pregnancy out of four is being terminated by induced abortion"); S. Henshaw, J. Forrest, & J. VanVort, Abortion Services in the United States, 1984 and 1985, 19 Family Planning Perspectives 63 (1987); Torres & Forrest, Why Do Women Have Abortions?, 20 Family Planning Perspectives 169, 169 (1988). See also Center for Disease Control, Abortion Surveillance: Preliminary Analysis—United States, 1982-1983, 35 Morbidity & Mortality Weekly Report (1986).

This difference—before Roe, the abortion rate was at least 20% and perhaps as high as 30%; since Roe, it is 27-30%—is strikingly small. The Court has said that even "a disparity [that] is not trivial in a statistical sense . . . hardly can form the basis for the employment of a gender line" (Craig v. Boren, 429 U.S. at 201). Cf. Carey v. Population Services Int'l, 431 U.S. 678, 702 (1977) (White, J.) ("the State has not demonstrated that the prohibition . . . measurably contributes to the deterrent purposes which the State advances as justifications for the restriction"). In view of the various factors that complicate the comparison between the pre- and post-Roe statistics—changing demographics; new medical technology making it easier to perform an abortion; altered social mores;[4] and the ease of underestimating the frequency of illegal conduct—the difference between the abortion rates in the two periods may approach insignificance.[5]

[4] See Kaplan, Abortion as a Vice Crime, 51 Law & Contemp. Probs. 151 (1988).

[5] "The reality is that overruling Roe would have only a marginal effect on the number of abortions." Farber, The Facts on Abortion, 5 Constitutional Commentary 285, 286 (1988).

For this reason, the claim that restricting abortion promotes the asserted state interest in protecting fetal life has not been made out. "At most the broad ban is of marginal utility to the declared objective." Griswold, 381 U.S. at 507 (White, J., concurring).

3. Restrictions on Abortion Increase the Mortality and Morbidity Rates of Pregnant Women.

There is evidence suggesting that before 1973, as many as 5,000 to 10,000 women per year died as a result of unlawful abortions. See L. Lader, Abortion 3 (1967); R. Schwarz, Septic Abortion 7 (1968); see also H. Morgentaler, Abortion and Contraception 110 (1982).[6]

The available evidence indicates that morbidity (disease) rates from illegal abortions were also very high. For example, in 1960 about 33% of illegal abortions required women to stay in a hospital; according to one study, no fewer than 42% of all emergency admissions into hospitals during that year consisted of women attempting to recover from illegal abortions. See H. Morgentaler, Abortion and Contraception 111 (1982). Among the conditions caused by illegal abortions were permanent infertility, severe bleeding, gangrene, infection, and cervical wounds. See generally E. Messer & K. May, Back Rooms: Voices from the Illegal Abortion Era (1988).

Since Roe, abortion-related deaths have dropped by no less 90%; in the year after Roe alone, abortion-related deaths dropped by over 40%. See 7 Family Planning Perspectives 54 (1975). See also Cates, Legalized Abortion: Effect on National Trends of Maternal and Abortion-

[6] Almost 80% of the deceased were women from minority groups. See L. Lader at 66. See also C. Tietze, Abortion as Cause of Death, in Fertility Regulation and the Public Health 274 (S. Tietze ed. 1987).

Related Mortality, American Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology 213 (1976) (describing the "increasing availability of legal abortion" as one of the "most likely explanations for th[e] decline in abortion mortality ratio."); C. Tietze & S. Lewit, Epidemiology of Induced Abortion, in Abortion and Sterilization 56 (J. Hodgson ed. 1981) (principally because of the "replacement of illegal by legal abortions," abortion "is no longer an important cause of death" in the United States); Cates & Rochat, Illegal Abortions in the United States: 1972-1974, 8 Family Planning Perspectives 2 (1976) (illegal abortion death-to-case rate "is approximately eight times greater than the death-to-case rate for legal abortion").

In sum, available evidence indicates that prohibiting abortion is likely not to have a substantial effect on the number of abortions but may well endanger the lives and health of pregnant women. The probable effect of overruling Roe would be not to protect fetal life but to bring about a dramatic increase in illegal and dangerous abortions.[7] The contention that a prohibition against abortion protects fetal life or represents a reasonable accommodation of the interests of fetal life and the pregnant woman rests not on an evaluation of the facts but on simplistic and uninformed assumptions.

4. A prohibition against abortion would create intolerable difficulties in the case of pregnancies resulting from coercion and abuse.

As we have shown, a prohibition against abortion is a gender-based measure. When a state enacts such a measure, it must do so on the basis of a careful assessment of the relevant facts and considerations, not on the basis of "simplistic" and "inaccurate[] assumptions." Mississippi University for Women, 458 U.S. at 726. The reason for this requirement is the concern that a gender-based measure will not reflect a sufficiently well-informed and reflective assessment of the interests of the disfavored group.

[7] Indeed, in view of technological changes since the 1960s, making abortions easier to perform, modern legislation might well be even less effective than legislation in the days preceding Roe. See Kaplan, Abortion as a Vice Crime, 51 Law & Contemp. Probs. 151, 168-170 (1988).

Prohibitions against abortion not only fail to come to grips with the available data on the rate of pre-Roe abortions and the effects of illegal abortions on women. They also do not recognize the frequency with which abortions are sought to terminate pregnancies that resulted from coercion or abuse, and the difficulty of administering a system of restrictions on abortion that would take account of this problem.

Existing data suggest that at least 15,000 women per year have abortions after a pregnancy resulting from rape or incest. See Torres & Forrest, Why Do Women Have Abortions?, 20 Family Planning Perspectives 169 (1988). There is no doubt that this figure substantially understates the problem. Disclosure of victimization produces social stigma; various forms of "non-stranger" rape are often considered, by prosecutors and victims alike, not to be rape at all; rape and incest are notoriously underreported crimes. See S. Estrich, Real Rape 8-26 (1987). Before Roe, the use of illegal abortion after pregnancies produced by acts of violence has been well-documented. See L. Lader, Abortion (1966); E. Messer & K. May, Back Rooms (1988).

If Roe were overruled, women who became pregnant as a result of rape or incest would frequently be required to bring the child to term, even in states that provided exceptions to a prohibition on abortion in such circumstances. For victims, rape and incest are difficult enough to allege and prove in a criminal prosecution. A requirement of particularized proof, by pregnant women, of rape or incest in abortion proceedings would lead to enormous difficulties—often, as a practical matter, making abortion impossible to obtain. The legal determination whether pregnancy is a result of rape or incest is an extraordinarily intrusive procedure.

Moreover, provable rape or incest is not the heart of the problem. Even an exemption for rape or incest does not recognize the coercive nature of the environment in which, for example, battered women live. A woman may submit to sexual intercourse because of fear of violence and then be threatened with further violence if she alleges that the resulting pregnancy is the result of coercion. A battered woman who becomes pregnant is less able, economically and otherwise, to leave the batterer, and her economic dependence on the batterer will only increase if she is forced to bear the child. The incidence of battery increases during and as a result of pregnancy. See R. Gelles, Violence and Pregnancy, The Family Coordinator 81 (January, 1975). The incidence of sexual assault and rape by formerly intimate partners also increases as women leave those partners. Violence of this sort serves as a means of continuing the power and control inherent in battering situations, and it often leads to pregnancy. Prohibitions on abortion simply do not recognize the extraordinary difficulty of these situations; instead, in this area as well, they rest on simplistic and ill-informed assumptions.

In many cases, the Court has invalidated gender-based laws because they reflected factual assumptions about men and women that were inaccurate and overly broad in light of the actual differences between the sexes. In this case, by contrast, the factual assumptions are inaccurate not because men and women are in fact substantially the same—with respect to the capacity to become pregnant, they are not—but instead because laws prohibiting abortion are largely ineffective and will produce serious adverse effects on the lives and health of many women. But this distinction does not warrant a different outcome here. The reason for heightened scrutiny of gender-based measures is not the concern that governments will act maliciously toward women but rather that the interests of women will be overridden too cavalierly, without adequate reflection or investigation, on the basis of "simplistic" and "inaccurate[] assumptions." Mississippi University for Women, 458 U.S. at 726. That danger arises whenever a legislature acts against one sex alone and on the basis of superficial investigation rather than careful consideration of the relevant concerns.

5. Restrictions on abortion often rest on stereotyped and outmoded notions of women's proper role.

There is considerable reason to believe that prohibitions against abortion have reflected, and continue to reflect, "'the role-typing society has long imposed' on women." Califano v. Webster, 430 U.S. 313, 317 (1977), quoting Stanton v. Stanton, 421 U.S. 7, 15 (1975). As the government acknowledges (U.S. Am. Br. 13 n.10), legislation prohibiting abortion is for the most part a product of the period from 1860 to 1880. This was precisely the period when gender stereotyping was at its height. To cite only the most notorious example, in Bradwell v. Illinois, 16 Wall. 130, 142 (1873), Justice Bradley, joined by Justices Swayne and Field, concurring in a decision upholding a law that prohibited women from practicing law, reasoned as follows:

> [T]he natural and proper timidity and delicacy which belongs to the female sex evidently unfits it for many of the occupations of civil life. . . . The paramount destiny and mission of woman are to fulfill the noble and benign offices of wife and mother.

Historical work has revealed that the abortion restrictions of this period grew in large part out of precisely these ideas. See, e.g., J. Mohr, Abortion in America:

The Origins and Evolution of National Policy, 1800-1900 at 168-172 (1978).[8]

Modern studies also suggest that support for laws banning abortion is often an outgrowth of stereotypical notions about women's proper role, and indeed a reaction to the increasing number of women who have assumed responsibility for work outside of the home. See generally K. Luker, Abortion and the Politics of Motherhood 192-215 (1984); Luker, Abortion and the Meaning of Life, in Abortion: Understanding Differences 25 (S. Callahan & D. Callahan eds. 1984).[9]

Thus the impetus for prohibiting abortion does not only rest on inaccurate and simplistic assumptions about [8] This study explains that the physicians largely responsible for bringing about abortion restrictions "were among the most defensive groups in the country on the subject of changing traditional sex roles. . . . To many doctors the chief purpose of women was to produce children; anything that interfered with that purpose, or allowed women to 'indulge' themselves in less important activities, threatened . . . the future of society itself. Abortion was a supreme example of such an interference for these physicians." Mohr at 168-69. See also id. at 105 (quoting a nineteenth century doctor complaining that "the tendency to force women into men's places" was creating insidious "new ideas of women's duties" and including among such ideas the notion "that her ministrations . . . as a mother should be abandoned for the sterner rights of voting and law making"); see also L. Gordon, Women's Body, Women's Right: A Social History of Birth Control in America (1976); K. Luker, supra, at 11-39.

[9] See, e.g., Luker, Abortion and the Meaning of Life at 31: Those involved in anti-abortion activities "concur that men and women, as a result of . . . intrinsic differences, have different roles to play: Men are best suited to the public world of work, whereas women are best suited to rearing children, managing homes, and loving and caring for husbands. . . . Mothering, in their view, is itself a full-time job, and any woman who cannot commit herself fully to mothering should eschew it entirely. In short, working and mothering are either-or choices; one can do one or the other, but not both." These sentiments closely resemble the now-unacceptable views expressed by Justice Bradley in Bradwell.

the connection between statutory means and ends; it may reflect outmoded and archaic role-typing of women. Indeed, the casual acceptance of inaccurate and simplistic assumptions about the real-world effects of restricting abortion—which is in itself sufficient ground for invalidating a prohibition against abortion—may be a " 'by-product of a traditional way of thinking about females' " (Califano v. Webster, 430 U.S. at 320 (citation omitted)). The Court has time and again invoked the Equal Protection Clause in order to disapprove such an approach.

CONCLUSION

Insofar as reversal of the judgment of the court of appeals would require reconsideration of Roe v. Wade, the judgment of the court of appeals should be affirmed.

Respectfully submitted.

DAVID A. STRAUSS*
CASS R. SUNSTEIN
University of Chicago Law School
1111 East 60th Street
Chicago, Illinois 60637
(312) 702-9494

MARCH 1989

*Counsel of Record

AMICUS CURIAE

BRIEF

No. 88-605.

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
MAR 30 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

In the
Supreme Court of the United States.

OCTOBER TERM, 1988.

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, ET AL.,
APPELLANTS,

v.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, ET AL.,
APPELLEES.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS
FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

Brief Amicus Curiae for American Jewish Congress, Board of Homeland Ministries — United Church of Christ, National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council, The Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) by James E. Andrews as Stated Clerk of General Assembly, The Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights, St. Louis Catholics for Choice, and thirty other religious groups.

MARTHA L. MINOW,
Counsel of Record,
Harvard Law School,
Griswold Hall 305,
Cambridge, Massachusetts 02138.
(617) 495-4276

AVIAM SOIFER,
Boston University School of Law,
765 Commonwealth Avenue,
Boston, Massachusetts 02215.
(617) 353-3117

BATEMAN & SLADE, INC. BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS

Question Presented.

Did the Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit properly apply this Court's decision in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973) in protecting the privacy and freedom of conscience and religion of pregnant women?

Table of Contents.

Question presented i

Table of authorities iv

Interest of amici curiae 2

Statement of the case 4

Summary of argument 4

Argument 6

I. The Missouri statute impermissibly intrudes upon individual decisions protected by the right to privacy and by the free exercise clause of the First Amendment 6

A. Private decisions over family life are doubly protected by the Constitution's respect for individual privacy and the Constitution's commitment to religious liberty 7

B. By restricting abortion, the Missouri statute unconstitutionally invades private religious freedoms assured protection for individuals by the free exercise clause and demanded by the variety of religious views about abortion 10

II. The free exercise clause withdraws subjects of religious conscience from the vicissitudes of political controversy and is never more important than when heated and hostile political debate endangers religious freedom 20

Conclusion 22

Appendix follows page 22

Table of Authorities Cited.

CASES.

Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983) 7, 10
Boddie v. Connecticut, 401 U.S. 371 (1971) 9
Bowen v. Roy, 476 U.S. 693 (1986) 19
Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940) 19
Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379 (1979) 7
Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972) 8
Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965) 8, 9
Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980) 17n
Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Comm'n, 480 U.S. 136 (1987) 19
Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971) 17n
Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967) 8
Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977) 11n
McRae v. Califano, 491 F. Supp. 630 (E.D.N.Y. 1980) 11n, 12, 14, 15
Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923) 8n
Moore v. East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494 (1977) 9
Paul v. Davis, 424 U.S. 693 (1976) 8n
Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925) 9
Planned Parenthood v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976) 8, 10
Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158 (1944) 9, 18n
Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609 (1984) 8n
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973) i, 3, 7, 10, 16 et seq
Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963) 19

Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516 (1945) 18n
Thomas v. Review Board of the Indiana Employment Sec. Division, 450 U.S. 707 (1981) 19
Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986) 7, 10
United States v. Ballard, 322 U.S. 78 (1944) 17, 18
United States v. Seeger, 380 U.S. 163 (1965) 19
Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985) 22
West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943) 18, 20, 21, 22
Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972) 8, 9, 19
Wooley v. Maynard, 430 U.S. 705 (1977) 18
Zablocki v. Redhail, 434 U.S. 374 (1978) 9

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

United States Constitution
First Amendment 4, 5, 6, 7, 8 et seq.
Fourteenth Amendment 5, 7, 8n

STATUTE.

Missouri Law
Sections 1.205.1(1), 188.025, 188.029, 188.039, 188.205, 188.210 and 188.215 7n

MISCELLANEOUS.

Baum, Abortion: An Ecumenical Dilemma, Commonweal 231 (Nov. 30, 1973) 11n

Bial, M., Liberal Judaism at Home: The Practices of Modern Reform Judaism 12-13 (Rev. ed. 1971) 16

Bleich, J.D., Abortion in Halachic Literature, in F. Rosner and J.D. Bleich, Jewish Bioethics 134 (1979) 16

Covenant and Creation: Theological Reflections on Contraception and Abortion, adopted by the 195th General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church (1983) 13, 14

Donin, Rabbi Hayim Halevy, To Be a Jew: A Guide to Jewish Observance in Contemporary Life Selected and Compiled from the Shulhan Arukh and Responsa Literature and Providing a Rationale for the Laws and Traditions 140-141 (1972) 15

Feldman, D., Marital Relations, Birth Control, and Abortion in Jewish Law 271-284 (1974) 15

Jacobovits, I., Jewish Views of Abortion in F. Rosner and J.D. Bleich, Jewish Bioethics 118 (1979) 15, 16

Jacquet, Constant (ed.), Yearbook of American and Canadian Churches 238 (1984) 11n

Pfeffer, L., Religion, State, and the Burger Court 240-241 (1984) 11n

Rosner, F., Modern Medicine and Jewish Ethics (1986) 16

Rotmem & Folsom, Recent Restraints on Religious Liberty, 36 Am. Pol. Sci. Rev. 1053 (1942) 21n

Segers, Abortion and the Culture, in Abortion 229 (S. Callahan & D. Callahan, eds., 1984) 11n

Testimony of Rabbi Balfour Brickner, Statement of the Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights Before the Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights of the Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. House of Representatives (March 24, 1976) 16

The Declaration on Abortion of the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of Faith (1974) 11n

United Church of Christ, Abortion: A Resolution of the 12th General Synod of the United Church of Christ 1979 (Public Policy Pamphet 12GS-12) 13

Zwerin, R. and R. Shapiro, Judaism & Abortion 1-4 (1987) 15

No. 88-605.

In the
Supreme Court of the United States.

OCTOBER TERM, 1988.

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, ET AL.,
APPELLANTS,

v.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, ET AL.,
APPELLEES.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS
FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

Brief Amicus Curiae for Albuquerque Monthly Meeting of Religious Society of Friends, American Friends Service Committee, American Humanist Association, American Jewish Committee, American Jewish Congress, Americans for Religious Liberty, Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, B'nai B'rith Women, Board of Homeland Ministries — United Church of Christ, Commission on Social Action of Reformed Judaism, The Episcopal Diocese of Massachusetts — Women in Crisis Committee, The Episcopal Diocese of New York, Episcopal Women's Caucus, Federation of Reconstructionist Congregations and Havurot, General Board of Church and Society — The United Methodist Church, Institute of Women Today, Jewish Labor Committee, NA'MAT, National Assembly of Religious Women, National Council of Jewish Women, National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods, National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council, North American Federation of Temple Youth, The Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) by James E. Andrews as Stated Clerk of General Assembly, The Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights, St. Louis Catholics for Choice, Union of American Hebrew Congregations, Unitarian Universalist Association, Unitarian Universalist Women's Federation, United Church of Christ Coordinating Center for Women, United Church of Christ Office of Church in Society, Washington Ethical Action Center of the America Ethical Union, Women in Ministry — Garrett Evangelical Seminary, Women in Mission and Ministry — Episcopal Church U.S.A., Women's League for Conservative Judaism, The Right Reverend Bill Burrill, Bishop of the Episcopal Church of Rochester; The Right Reverend Barbara C. Harris, Suffragan Bishop of the Episcopal Church of Massachusetts; The Right Reverend Edward W. Jones, Bishop of the Episcopal Church of Indianapolis; The Right Reverend David E. Johnson, Bishop of the Episcopal Church of Massachusetts; The Right Reverend Coleman McGehee, Bishop of the Episcopal Church of Michigan; The Right Reverend John S. Spong, Bishop of the Episcopal Church of Newark; The Right Reverend John T. Walker, Bishop of the Episcopal Church of Washington, D.C., and The Right Reverend O'Kelley Whitaker, Bishop of the Episcopal Church of Central New York, as Amicus Curiae Supporting Appellees.

Interest of Amici Curiae.

Amici are religious organizations and representatives of religious groups dedicated to preserving religious freedom for all persons, and to protecting a woman's right to terminate her pregnancy in consultation with her religious conscience. Associated with a variety of religions, amici are organizations including the American Friends Service Committee, the American Jewish Committee, the American Jewish Congress, the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, the Episcopal Diocese of New York, the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) by James E. Andrews as Stated Clerk of General Assembly, the Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights, and the St. Louis Catholics for Choice. The thoughtful statements of interests provided by individual organizations, included here as Appendix A at 1a, demonstrate their unique and contrasting perspectives on the issues of religious conscience and abortion, and their shared commitment to the Constitution's removal of these issues from gov ernmental control. A full listing of the amici curiae signing this brief in support of respondents appears as Appendix B at 14a. Amici received leave to file this brief from the parties in this action.

As organizations representing a variety of sincere religious perspectives, the amici object to any governmental attempts to interfere in the exercise of individual religious conscience with regard to procreative choice. Because the amici recognize the many divergent theological answers to the questions raised by abortion, the amici agree that each woman should be free to consult with her religious convictions, as well as her best medical advice, without governmental coercion or constraint when exercising religious and personal conscience in making a decision whether to terminate her pregnancy. The amici therefore object to Missouri's attempts to regulate a woman's decision whether to obtain an abortion, and support the reaffirmation of Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), as a necessary means of protecting each person's ability to exercise freedom of religion and conscience.

Statement of the Case.

Amici adopt the Statement of the Case set forth by the appellees.

Summary of Argument.

Abortion is undoubtedly one of the most hotly debated issues in this country. The debate reveals profound religious disagreement. Views range from the belief that abortion is a sin forbidden by divine authority to the view that abortion may be a religious obligation if needed to preserve the life or well-being of the pregnant woman. Even a brief examination of the religious beliefs of the Roman Catholic Church, the Baptist Churches, the Episcopal Church (USA), the United Church of Christ, the Presbyterian Church, the United Methodist Church, and the Orthodox, Conservative, Reform, and Reconstructionist traditions of Judaism reveals the immensely varied and intensely sincere religious differences about this important issue of procreative judgment.

Given the dramatically contrasting religious views about whether and when abortion is permitted or required, state statutes drastically curtailing access to abortion unacceptably interfere with constitutionally protected religious and private conscience. Missouri's ban against abortion in public facilities, its ban against counseling about abortion by public employees, and its pronouncement that life begins at conception impermissibly invade religious liberty and freedom of conscience. Even though the Missouri law makes no mention of religion, it violates the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment. Especially in this sensitive area of great religious concern, public orthodoxy must be restrained and private conscience must be protected.

The Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit properly concluded that the Missouri statutes restricting abortion violated the constitutional injunction to place certain kinds of governmental activities out of bounds. This constitutional injunction relies on the First Amendment's guarantees of religious freedom as well as the right to privacy founded in the Fourteenth Amendment. The Missouri statutes thus are doubly defective: they abridge the right to privacy and also the doctrines preserving freedom of conscience and religion.

Both the right of individual privacy and the right of religious liberty protect critical decisions about whether to marry or divorce, and whether to conceive and bear a child. The Constitution has long provided, and must continue to assure, protection against governmental arrogation of crucial decisions which require the guidance of religious teachings and individual conscience.

If this Court were now to overturn its consistent position and to invite state legislation constraining or prohibiting abortion, the result would be extensive and disturbing government embroilment with matters of private religious conscience. Religiously-inspired proponents on all sides of this issue would besiege state legislators. State law-makers would be consumed by the enormous divisions between and even within religious groups on the issue of abortion. Public spaces would be occupied by religious controversies likely to erupt in acts of intolerance and violence. It is just these dangers that the Free Exercise Clause meant to avoid.

This Court's vigilant protection of the privacy of pregnant women is not a decision to favor or even approve abortion, but instead a commitment to preserve individual autonomy. That, of course, must be the lodestar in a country as diverse and as committed to freedom as ours. The Court's role in preserving the space for the free exercise of personal and religious conscience is never more crucial than where there is massive public turmoil surrounding the subject. Otherwise, majorities, and even effectively mobilized minorities, can invoke the power of the state to curb the religious freedoms of those they do not like. The amici joining in this brief attest to the profound, prayerful commitments of extraordinarily diverse religious groups to this vision of tolerance enacted in our Constitution. It is this nation's strength that our Constitution can elicit the trust of peoples across diverse and clashing faiths. In the face of so complex and inescapably private a matter as the decision to terminate or continue a pregnancy, this Court should not now betray the people's trust by allowing a state to undermine the mandated respect for religious liberty and personal conscience.

Argument.

I. The Missouri Statute Impermissibly Intrudes upon Individual Decisions Protected by the Right to Privacy and by the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment.

Decisions about family life are of such pre-eminent, foundational importance in our nation that this Court has afforded the double protection of precedents under the rights of both personal privacy and religious liberty. Both lines of precedent assure not only a limited government, but also a sphere of private pursuits informed by each individual's religious traditions and personal conscience. Missouri's regulation of abortion impermissibly constrains private decision-making over basic family choices accorded protection by this Court. This Court therefore should affirm the decision by the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals.[1]

A. Private Decisions over Family Life Are Doubly Protected by the Constitution's Respect for Individual Privacy and the Constitution's Commitment to Religious Liberty.

The constitutional commitment to protect personal privacy is part of the larger constitutional scheme that places certain kinds of governmental activities out of bounds. That larger scheme significantly relies on the First Amendment's guarantees of religious freedom as well as the right to privacy founded in the Fourteenth Amendment. The subjects of procreation, contraception, and abortion are private in two major respects: they involve the fundamental privacy of each individual and the importantly private enclaves of religious and community groups. The constitutional challenges to the Missouri law carry the double force of doctrines developed under the right of privacy and doctrines preserving freedom of conscience and religion.

Thus, the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals reached a conclusion compelled not only by this Court's decisions in Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986); Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983); Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379 (1979); Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973).

[1] The Court of Appeals rejected sections of the Missouri law that banned the use of public funds for encouraging or counseling a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life, requiring doctors to perform viability tests, forbidding any public employee from encouraging or counseling a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life, forbidding the use of any public facilities for that purpose, and declaring that life begins at conception. Sections 1.205.1(1), 188.025, 188.029, 188.039, 188.205, 188.210, and 188.215 of the Missouri law, which appear in the Jurisdictional Statement Appendix at A87-A91, will hereinafter be described in this brief as "the Missouri law."

In addition, the constitutional right to privacy enforced in these decisions is underscored and bolstered by the command of the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment. Together, the right of privacy and the right to religious liberty exclude the state from personal decisions about the critical issues of family life, reproduction, and child-rearing. See Planned Parenthood v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976) (privacy); Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972) (privacy); Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967) (privacy and equality); Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965) (privacy); and Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972) (free exercise). Missouri's law impermissibly secularizes these choices. The state law constrains critical, private choices about child-bearing and thereby burdens the free exercise of religion and its crucial component, protection of individual conscience.

It is not by accident that this Court's historic protections for families draw on both notions of individual privacy and notions of religious liberty.[2] Deciding whether to marry or divorce, and whether to conceive and bear a child are simultaneously matters of individual choice and religious significance. The Constitution has provided, and must continue to assure, protection against governmental arrogation of crucial decisions which require the guidance of religious teachings and individual conscience.

[2] Whatever its specific sources in the Constitution, the privacy right accords with a conception that family decisions should be free from state control. "'[M]arriage, procreation, contraception, family relationships, and child rearing and education' . . . 'while defying categorical description,' identify certain zones of privacy in which personal relationships or decisions are protected from government interference." Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609, 631 (1984) (O'Connor, J., concurring) (citing Paul v. Davis, 424 U.S. 693, 713 (1976)); Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 399 (1923) ("Without doubt, [liberty guaranteed in the Fourteenth Amendment] denotes not merely freedom from bodily restraint but also the right of the individual to contract, to engage in any of the common occupations of life, to acquire useful knowledge, to marry, establish a home and bring up children, to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and generally to enjoy those privileges long recognized at common law as essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men.")

Under the Constitution, this Court consistently has guarded family decisions from invasive state regulations. The Court has guaranteed parents the right to select private, religious schools for instructing their children, Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925) and the right to an exemption from compulsory schooling laws where those laws contradicted a particular religious way of life, Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972). Similarly, the Court has rejected state efforts to burden access to divorce, Boddie v. Connecticut, 401 U.S. 371 (1971), and also rejected state burdens on access to marriage even when pursued to enforce previously incurred child support obligations, Zablocki v. Redhail, 434 U.S. 374 (1978). Deference to the special, even sacred, realm of the family guides the Court's guarantees of private choice about marriage, procreation and contraception. Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965): "We deal with a right of privacy older than the Bill of Rights — older than our political parties, older than our school system. Marriage is a coming together for better or for worse, hopefully enduring, and intimate to the degree of being sacred." Id. at 486. Similarly, this Court has long "'respected the private realm of family life which the state cannot enter,'" see id. at 495 (Goldberg, J.) (quoting Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158, 166 (1944)). See also Moore v. East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494 (1977) (city's zoning restrictions cannot prevent family members' choice to live together). The Court's vigilant protection of family privacy properly and necessarily allocates to private individuals the decision to proceed with or to terminate a pregnancy before the state's interest in potential life develops sufficient strength to overcome the state's interest in preserving the health, welfare, and choice of the woman. This Court has properly respected the demand for particularized decisions made in the context of any individual woman's life, personal autonomy, religion, and medical advice. No generalized legislative decision, removed from the particular family context, could protect the private realm nor acknowledge the critical role for individual religious belief and conscience in what may be a most difficult moment.

The Court's position on this issue is not a decision to favor or even approve abortion, but instead a commitment to preserve the privacy and autonomy of a pregnant woman. Her decision, made in the context of her unique family and community situation, is a matter of her own conscience. This explains Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986); Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983); Planned Parenthood v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976); Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973). Any contrary course would permit — indeed, elicit — state encroachment into this constitutionally protected subject. It would inject secular authority where only religious and private conscience belong. That is precisely what both the right to privacy and the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment prohibit. State regulations of abortion like the Missouri statute not only violate the sanctity of individual decisions about family life, but also intrude upon intense religious controversies over matters reserved by the Constitution to private individuals.

B. By Restricting Abortion, the Missouri Statute Unconstitutionally Invades Private Religious Freedoms Assured Protection for Individuals by the Free Exercise Clause and Demanded by the Variety of Religious Views About Abortion.

Abortion is undoubtedly one of the most hotly debated issues in this country; the debate reveals profound religious disagreement. Views range from the belief that abortion is a sin forbidden by divine authority to the view that abortion may be a religious obligation if needed to preserve the life or well-being of the pregnant woman. Still another view maintains that promotion of responsible parenthood and preservation of the health and well-being of existing, living persons rank among the highest, religiously commanded obligations. The issue of abortion obviously raises fundamental questions of sincere religious belief and intense religious differences.

Over 200 diverse religious groups in the United States[3] espouse starkly different and mutually inconsistent views about abortion.[4] For example, the official doctrine of the Roman Catholic church declares abortion to be immoral and asserts that life must be safeguarded from conception.[5] Some Roman Catholics, however, have explored and advocated religious views that tolerate abortion under some circumstances.[6]

Among the Baptist Churches, denominational pronouncements reflect the views and guidance of elected representatives, but are non-binding in matters of conscience. Historically, abortion has been treated generally as a matter for individual conscience in keeping with the religion's foundation in indi-

---

[3] See Constant Jacquet, ed., Yearbook of American and Canadian Churches 238 (1984) (describing 219 religious bodies in the United States).

[4] This summary draws in part on testimony relied on by the district court in McRae v. Califano, 491 F. Supp. 630, 697-698 (E.D.N.Y. 1980). Although this Court reversed the decision in that case, and upheld the Hyde Amendment forbidding the use of federal Medicaid funds for abortion except where the woman's life would be endangered, the Court relied on a defect in party standing and did not pass on the free exercise claim for which the district court's opinion is cited here. This Court has also indicated that a special concern for burdens on free exercise of religion are raised where government funds are conditioned upon restrictions on abortion. Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464, 474 n.8 (1977).

[5] The Declaration on Abortion of the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of Faith (1974), cited in McRae v. Califano, 491 F. Supp. 630, 693 (E.D.N.Y. 1980).

[6] See, e.g., Baum, Abortion: An Ecumenical Dilemma, Commonweal 231 (Nov. 30, 1973); Segers, Abortion and the Culture, in Abortion 229 (S. Callahan & D. Callahan, eds., 1984). See also L. Pfeffer, Religion, State, and the Burger Court 240-241 (1984) (describing Catholic groups for private choice over abortion).

vidual voluntary baptism and commitment to responsible families and parenthood. See McRae v. Califano, 491 F. Supp. 630, 697-698 (E.D.N.Y. 1980) (citing testimony of Dr. James Wood, Executive Director of the Baptist Joint Committee on Public Affairs). In 1967, the American Baptist Churches, USA, adopted a resolution to support legalization of abortion to protect the physical and mental health of the mother, to provide choices for women whose pregnancies resulted from rape, incest, or failed contraception or other unwanted circumstances. Id. at 699. The General Board of American Baptist Churches, USA, opposed the efforts of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops to use secular law to prohibit abortion, and resolved that ". . . we believe that the present effort of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops in the U.S.A. to coerce the conscience and personal freedom of our citizens through the power of public law in matters of human reproduction constitutes a serious threat to that moral and religious liberty so highly prized by Baptists." Id. at 699. Some Baptists have dissented from this view and organized religious groups against abortion. The denomination's stand was changed in 1988 to reflect the diversity of theological beliefs about abortion present within its membership.

The Episcopal Church USA reaffirmed in its 1988 General Convention its support for women's rights over their own bodies through a resolution first passed in 1967. That resolution states: "Resolved: The position of this Church, stated at the 62nd General Convention of the Church in Seattle in 1967, which declared support for the 'termination of pregnancy' particularly in those cases where 'the physical and mental health of the mother is threatened seriously, or where there is substantial reason to believe that the child would be badly deformed in mind or body, or where the pregnancy has resulted from rape or incest' is reaffirmed. Termination of pregnancy for these reasons is permissible." Letter from Ann Smith, Office of the Presiding Bishop and the Executive Council of the General Convention, The Episcopal Church Center (March 6, 1989). Authorities for the Church note that this position has been consistent and unchanging, and that the Church stands firm in its resolve both to be pastorally supportive of women in their choices and to work to maintain a society where they do indeed have constitutionally guaranteed choices.

Similarly, the General Synod of the United Church of Christ resolved in 1979 to reaffirm full freedom of choice for the persons concerned in making decisions regarding pregnancy, to affirm "the fact that, since life is less than perfect and the choices that people have to make are difficult, abortion may sometimes be considered," and to affirm that "God calls us when making choices, especially as these relate to abortion, to act faithfully." United Church of Christ, Abortion: A Resolution of the 12th General Synod of the United Church of Christ, 1979 (Public Policy Pamphlet 12GS-12).

Some organized religious groups adhere to basic respect for individual conscience about abortion precisely because of the variety of views held by members of those groups. Thus, the policy statement contained in Covenant and Creation: Theological Reflections on Contraception and Abortion, adopted by the 195th General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church (1983), states that "The Presbyterian Church exists within a very pluralistic environment. Its own members hold a variety of views. It is exactly this plurality of beliefs that leads us to the conviction that the decision regarding abortion must remain with the individual, to be made on the basis of conscience and personal religious principles, free from governmental interference." Just as the decision to become a parent requires a responsible exercise of stewardship, reflecting moral and religious concerns, so does the decision to not become a parent. Moreover, this Presbyterian approach emphasizes that God alone is Lord of the conscience, and that God gives each individual faced with a moral choice arising from sexual activity the power and the freedom to make moral choices regarding even the most serious questions. Id. at 49.

In addition, through its General Assembly, the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) by James E. Andrews as Stated Clerk of General Assembly has stated that any decision concerning an abortion should be made as early as possible, generally within the first trimester of pregnancy, for reasons of a woman's health and safety. It affirms, however, that abortions should not be used as a method of birth control; it also maintains that abortions later in pregnancy should be an option, particularly in the case of women of menopausal age who do not discover they are pregnant until the second trimester, women who discover through fetal diagnosis that they are carrying a fetus with a grave genetic disorder, or women who did not seek or have access to medical care during the first trimester. This Presbyterian statement adds that at the point of fetal viability, abortions should be available only in the rarest of instances involving, for example, the late diagnosis of grievous genetic disorders.

Other Protestant Churches have declared their support for a woman's choice regarding abortion because of potential risks to the life or physical or mental health of the mother, because of concerns about the social situation in which the infant might be born, and because of instances of severe deformity of the fetus. McRae v. Califano, 491 F. Supp. 630, 700 (E.D.N.Y. 1980) (citing testimony of Reverend John Wogaman, United Methodist minister). As a matter of religious belief, many Protestant theologians maintain that "human personhood . . . does not exist in the earlier phases of pregnancy." Id. at 701 (testimony of Reverend John Wogaman). The United Methodist Church, for example, resolved in 1976 to affirm the " 'principle of responsible parenthood' and the right and duty of married persons prayerfully and responsibly to control conception according to their circumstances." Id. at 701. In contrast, representatives of the Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod testified before a Senate subcommittee that in their religion, human life begins with fertilization, but any threat to the life of the pregnant woman must be resolved in her favor. Id. at 695. That Church also supports private decisions to terminate pregnancies under some other circumstances. Id. at 696.

Within the Jewish tradition, there is considerable agreement that the fetus is not a person before birth and that abortion therefore is not murder, and may be permitted, and indeed required in situations where the life of the mother is threatened. D. Feldman, Marital Relations, Birth Control, and Abortion in Jewish Law 271-284 (1974); R. Zwerin and R. Shapiro, Judaism & Abortion 1-4 (1987). See also Rabbi Hayim Halevy Donin, To Be a Jew: A Guide to Jewish Observance in Contemporary Life Selected and Compiled from the Shulhan Arukh and Responsa Literature and Providing a Rationale for the Laws and Traditions 140-141 (1972) ("All halakhic scholars agree that therapeutic abortions — namely, abortions performed in order to preserve the life of the mother — are not only permissible but mandatory.") Beyond these points of virtual consensus, however, different branches of Judaism, and different groups within each branch, hold divergent views about the legal and moral status of abortion and about the circumstances under which it is permitted.

Within the different strands of Orthodox Judaism, for example, there is vehement disagreement as to whether a non-therapeutic abortion is akin to homicide, whether avoiding severe mental anguish of the mother is an adequate basis for permitting an abortion of a fetus with severe defects, and whether it is permissible to include in the choice of an abortion consideration of the potential suffering of a severely disabled fetus carried to term. See D. Feldman, Marital Relations, Birth Control, and Abortion in Jewish Law 284-294 (1974); I. Jacobovits, Jewish Views of Abortion in F. Rosner and J.D.

Bleich, Jewish Bioethics 118 (1979); J.D. Bleich, Abortion in Halachic Literature, in F. Rosner and J.D. Bleich, Jewish Bioethics 134 (1979). See generally F. Rosner, Modern Medicine and Jewish Ethics (1986). It is hardly surprising that there is vigorous disagreement among contemporary Orthodox rabbis, since the great sages such as Maimonides and Rashi expressed contrasting fundamental assumptions concerning abortion.

Conservative, Reform, and Reconstructionist branches of Judaism — and some orthodox groups — share a more liberal approach to abortion in contrast to most Orthodox views, and have endorsed the existing rules set forth in Roe v. Wade in order to assure that individual women may treat an abortion decision in light of their own religious and moral views. See Statement of Interest of National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council (Appendix A). Even in these branches, however, authorities differ considerably about the circumstances under which abortion is permitted or required. Many consider abortion to be a religious duty, a duty resembling obligations to observe religious rituals, when a pregnancy threatens a woman's life or health. Some would protect a woman's choice to abort simply as a matter of her entitlement to control her own destiny. M. Bial, Liberal Judaism at Home: The Practices of Modern Reform Judaism 12-13 (Rev. ed. 1971). See also Testimony of Rabbi Balfour Brickner, Statement of the Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights Before the Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights of the Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. House of Representatives (March 24, 1976). Others emphasize the risks to a woman's physical, psychological, and emotional well-being that may be presented by a pregnancy as critical reasons for permitting abortion. The different positions taken in the debates about the Jewish position on abortion reflect not personal preferences, but instead the divergent religious sources, for rabbinic responsa — the answers written by leading rabbis to disputes about observance since the tenth century — permit multiple, conflicting interpretations of the Jewish position on abortion.

Given the contrasting views about abortion within and across religious groups, it is obvious that many strongly held religious beliefs directly clash with the Missouri law.[7] That law interferes with the religious lives of those who are adherents to these beliefs, just as interference with religious beliefs would arise if a state were to adopt a law mandating abortion under specified circumstances. Adjudicating among diverse religious beliefs is precisely what the government must not do under the constitution. Political contests animated by the contrasting views of religious groups over religious practices are precisely what the Free Exercise Clause sought to seal off from governmental purview. The government must not intervene to try to settle the critically important, vociferous, multi-sided religious argument. As this Court announced in United States v. Ballard, 322 U.S. 78, 87 (1944): "The Fathers of the Constitution were not unaware of the varied and extreme views of religious sects, of the violence of disagreement among them and of the lack any one religious creed on which all men would agree. They [7] This is not a claim, under the Establishment Clause, that the government may not adopt one religious view over others if, as this Court decided Harris v. McRae, that the law happens to coincide with the religious views of some. 448 U.S. 297, 319-320 (1980). Instead, the objection here is that certain topics require protection against state regulation if the free exercise of religion is to mean anything. Basic decisions about procreation and termination of pregnancies epitomize such topics, in light of the massive and deep disagreement among religions over these issues. We do not argue here for religious exemptions to Missouri's law not only because that would be impracticable, given the large numbers of people whose religious beliefs are burdened by the law. Even more importantly, any process providing for exemptions would be insufficient protection of religious freedom, given the intrusion any process for considering exemption would itself place on the individuals facing intimate decisions involving procreation and termination of pregnancy. This Court's rulings on the dangers of government entanglement with religion would apply in any case-by-case evaluation of religious beliefs about abortion. See Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971).

fashioned a charter of government which envisaged the widest possible toleration of conflicting views."[8]

For vast numbers of people, abortion raises issues of religious belief and individual conscience. Regulation of abortion by the states — regulations like Missouri's ban against abortion in public facilities, and its ban against counseling about abortion by public employees, invade religious liberty and freedom of conscience.[9] That people disagree intensely over abortion is no reason for this Court to fail to protect religious liberty here. As this Court announced in West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 642 (1943), the Free Exercise Clause most importantly protects views over which people vehemently disagree: "freedom to differ is not limited to things that do not matter much. That would be a mere shadow of freedom. The test of its substance is the right to differ as to things that touch the heart of the existing order." See also Wooley v. Maynard, 430 U.S. 705 (1977).

Nor can the Missouri statute avoid challenge because it makes no mention of religion or because organized religious groups themselves disagree about abortion. This Court has held, time and time again, that a facially neutral statute may [8] The opinion continued, "Man's relation to God was made no concern of the state. He was granted the right to worship as he pleased and to answer to no man for the verity of his religious views," id., and, given the presence of Edna Ballard as one of the respondents in that case, "man" here was obviously meant to include women whose religious views and private decisions are of prime significance in this case.

[9] For some people, decisions about procreation and abortion are fundamentally matters of personal conscience. For them, no less than for those who cite religious belief, the First Amendment guarantees protection. Religious freedom belongs with freedom of speech together in the First Amendment because "[t]he First Amendment gives freedom of mind the same security as freedom of conscience." Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516, 531 (1945). See also Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158, 164-165 (1944). Both for pregnant women contemplating abortion and for governmental health care professionals who deal with pregnant patients, Missouri's statute presents untenable restrictions on the mere discussion of the possibility of terminating a pregnancy.

offend the Free Exercise Clause, Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Comm'n, 480 U.S. 136 (1987); Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 220 (1972). See also Bowen v. Roy, 476 U.S. 693, 728-732 (1986) (O'Connor, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (rejecting argument that any facially neutral and uniformly applied governmental requirement can withstand challenge under the Free Exercise Clause if it is a reasonable means of promoting a legitimate public interest). A person's religious beliefs that diverge from views held by others within a given faith have long been, and must be protected by the Free Exercise Clause, for it to be a guarantee of individual religious liberty. See Thomas v. Review Board of the Indiana Employment Sec. Division, 450 U.S. 707, 715 (1981). Cf. United States v. Seeger, 380 U.S. 163, 176 (1965) (interpreting statutory exemption from military draft to encompass not only religious belief in a Higher Being but also "A sincere and meaningful belief which occupies in the life of its possessor a place parallel to that filled by the God of those admittedly qualifying for the exemption").

The Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment should control this case. Missouri cannot claim that the Free Exercise Clause guarantees only people's freedom to hold pro-choice views, but not their freedom to obtain an abortion in any public facility, to discuss the matter with any public employee, or to act contrary to a state law declaring that human life begins at conception. The Free Exercise Clause guards much religiously inspired conduct, not just religious views. Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 219-220 (1972); Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 303-304 (1940). In the context of religious freedoms, this constitutional protection applies where the government withholds a benefit as much as when it imposes a penalty. Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 404 (1963); Bowen v. Roy, 476 U.S. 693, 726-733 (1986) (O'Connor, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). Finally, Missouri cannot justify the burdens on religious belief imposed by its law by referring to its preamble, deeming the fertilized egg a human life, as the kind of compelling state interest required by this Court to overcome the demands of the Free Exercise clause. This Court rejected the idea that "when life begins" can be treated as a factual question, Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973). As a matter of faith, the question thus falls within the sphere guarded from public orthodoxy by the Free Exercise Clause.[10]

II. The Free Exercise Clause Withdraws Subjects of Religious Conscience from the Vicissitudes of Political Controversy and Is Never More Important than when Heated and Hostile Political Debate Endangers Religious Freedom.

If this Court were now to overturn its consistent position and to invite state legislation like Missouri's statute, or even more punitive prohibitions of abortion, the result would be extensive and disturbing governmental entanglement with matters of private religious conscience. Religiously-inspired proponents on all sides of this issue would besiege state legislators. State legislatures, in turn, will unavoidably become embroiled in the enormous divisions between and even within religious groups on the issue of abortion. It is just these dangers that the Free Exercise Clause was meant to avoid.

This Court's vital statement is especially apt at this time: "The very purpose of a Bill of Rights was to withdraw certain subjects from the vicissitudes of political controversy, to place them beyond the reach of majorities and officials and to establish them as legal principles to be applied by the courts. One's right to life, liberty, and property, to free speech, a free press, freedom of worship and assembly, and other fundamental rights may not be submitted to vote; they depend on the outcome of no election." West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 638 (1943).

This Court's role in preserving space for the free exercise of religion is never more crucial than when there is massive public turmoil surrounding the subject. Otherwise, majorities, or even effectively mobilized minorities, can invoke the power of the state to curb the religious freedoms of those they do not like; otherwise, we risk escalating intolerance not only toward isolated groups on specific issues, but toward anyone who does not abide by the religiously inspired views pursuing the instruments of state power. History tells us that such intolerance often simmers just beneath the surface; the destruction of the churches of Jehovah's Witnesses who declined to salute the flag[11] and contemporary public violence at abortion clinics provide vivid examples. Vehement public ferment on the subject of abortion is bound to emerge if this Court allows the interference with free exercise represented by the Missouri statute.[12]

The Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment makes explicit a courageous and unparalleled American vision of tolerance for differences which includes, by necessity, gov-

[10] The Missouri law's preamble bears no resemblance to a plausible recognition that changing technology and medical science may alter the timing of viability. Instead, the definition of human life at conception raises the spectre of state regulation of contraception as an alleged interference with human life.

[11] Rotmem & Folsom, Recent Restraints on Religious Liberty, 36 Am. Pol. Sci. Rev. 1053, 1061-62 (1942).

[12] Withdrawing abortion from the hot lights of politics would not prevent anyone from working for political solutions to the desperate need many women find for a solution to a pregnancy they cannot manage. Efforts to promote contraception, and adoption, to control rape and incest, to enable women to say no to unwanted sexual encounters, and to provide economic security to permit women to bear and raise children would all remain available and potentially effective measures. Giving women choices not to become pregnant before they already are or means to protect the child after birth would reduce, if not eliminate, the place of abortion in private decision-making.

ernmental restraint. " 'If there is any fixed star in our constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty, can prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein.' " Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 55 (1985) (quoting West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. at 642). This Court has long been the eloquent defender and enforcer of this vision, and adherence to that role has never been more important than at this time.

Conclusion.

For the foregoing reasons, the decision for the Court of Appeals should be affirmed.

Respectfully submitted,

MARTHA L. MINOW,
Counsel of Record,
Harvard Law School,
Griswold Hall 305,
Cambridge, Massachusetts 02138.
(617) 495-4276
AVIAM SOIFER,
Boston University School of Law,
765 Commonwealth Avenue,
Boston, Massachusetts 02215.
(617) 353-3117
*Counsel for Amici Curiae

*This brief was written with the assistance of Laurel Fletcher, Suzanne Goldberg, and Lenora Lapidas, Harvard Law School class of 1990, and Karen Engle and David Fernandez, Harvard Law School class of 1989.

APPENDIX A

Many of the amici specifically wanted to include in this brief their own individual statements of interests. These statements are printed here in demonstration of the diversity of groups, expressing varied religious positions on abortion, who joined together in this brief to express a shared commitment to the Constitution's guarantee of free exercise of conscience and religion.

Statement of Interest of The American Friends Service Committee

The American Friends Service Committee (AFSC) has a vital interest in this litigation because of Friends' belief in the infinite worth of each human being and the equality of all human beings in the sight of God. Because of this testimony the AFSC has worked since 1917 as a social justice arm of the Religious Society of Friends to root out the causes of violence in our society which lie in poverty, exclusion and denial of equal opportunity and rights and to support rights of conscience. For two decades the AFSC has taken a consistent position supporting a woman's right to follow her own conscience concerning child-bearing, abortion and sterilization, free of coercion, including the coercion of poverty, racial discrimination and unavailability of services to those who cannot pay.

Statement of Interest of The American Jewish Committee

The American Jewish Committee (AJC) is a national organization founded in 1906 for the purpose of protecting the civil and religious rights of Jews. The AJC believes that this goal can best be accomplished by helping to preserve the constitutional rights of all Americans. The AJC supports access to abortion on a voluntary basis as an important component of comprehensive and effective health care and as part of its traditional concern for individual liberty, privacy and free choice.

Statement of Interest of
The American Jewish Congress

The American Jewish Congress, an organization of American Jews founded in 1918 is dedicated to the protection of the civil liberties and civil rights of Jews and of all Americans and the promotion of the principles of constitutional democracy.

Among the many activities directed to these ends, the American Jewish Congress has in the past filed amicus curiae briefs in many of the reproductive freedom cases before this Court.

The American Jewish Congress believes that, in the face of the great moral and religious diversity in American society over abortion and in the light of Jewish traditions which in some cases command abortion, and in many others, permit it, the existing constitutional rules, set down in Roe v. Wade, should be maintained so that the different traditions may advocate their respective views and the decision left to the individual woman, answering to God and to her conscience.

Statement of Interest of
The Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith

The Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith was organized in 1913 to advance good will and mutual understanding among Americans of all creeds and races, and to combat racial and religious prejudice in the United States. The Anti-Defamation League believes these principles are best served through the protection of the right to individual conscience and the free exercise of religion. In support of its position, ADL has previously filed as a friend-of-the-court in numerous cases dealing with issues of privacy and religious conscience, see, e.g., Frazee v. Department of Employment Security, appeal pending, No. 87-1945 (U.S. S.Ct. 1989); Bowen v. Kendrick, 108 S.Ct. 2562 (1988); New York State Club Ass'n v. New York, 108 S.Ct. 2225 (1988); and Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985).

The League is able to bring to this appeal the perspective of a national organization dedicated to safeguarding all persons' rights of individual conscience.

Statement of Interest of B'nai B'rith Women

B'nai B'rith Women is an organization of 120,000 Jewish women dedicated to promoting social advancement through education, service and action. Since 1968 the organization has held that women should have the right to choose for themselves on matters of reproduction. The organization has reaffirmed that right many times by reiterating its opposition to any legislation that restricts a woman's freedom to choose whether, when or if to bear children.

Statement of Interest of General Board of Church and Society of the United Methodist Church

The United Methodist Church's General Board of Church and Society, a program agency of The United Methodist Church, which has 9.5 million members, has a strong commitment to women and to the right of women to make decisions such as abortion decisions involved in Webster v. Reproductive Health Services. The Church's position affirms that Supreme Court decision in Roe v. Wade, believing that abortion should be a safe and legal procedure, and that a decision about abortion should be made by a woman after prayerful consideration with the assistance of persons she may choose. We believe that abortion should not be used for birth control nor gender selection, but recognize "tragic conflicts of life with life that may justify abortion, and in such cases support the legal option of abortion under proper medical procedures."

Statement of Interest of
National Assembly of Religious Women

The National Assembly of Religious Women (NARW) is a 20-year-old national organization of Catholic feminist women committed to working and acting collectively to build a world of peace with justice. NARW's agenda emphasizes the "participation of people in the decisions which affect their lives" and calls upon its members to use their organized power to effect a just society. NARW affirms the equal access of all women to the law, and opposes efforts to make abortion a crime. NARW believes that its position is based on gospel values of respect for life, respect for persons' self-determination, fidelity to conscience, and the right to due process of law.

Statement of Interest of
National Council of Jewish Women

Founded in 1893, the National Council of Jewish Women (NCJW) is the oldest Jewish women's volunteer organization in America. NCJW's 100,000 members in more than 200 Sections across the United States keep the organization's promise to dedicate themselves, in the spirit of Judaism, to advancing human welfare and the democratic way of life through a combination of social action, education and community service. Based on NCJW's concern for individual rights and our National Resolutions which include working for "the protection of every female's right to choose abortion, and the elimination of obstacles that limit reproductive freedom," we join this brief.

Statement of Interest of
The National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods

The National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods represents the women of Reform Judaism. It is the women's affiliate of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, and comprises more than 100,000 members among its affiliate Sisterhoods. We believe that the right of choice on the question of abortion is a personal decision based on religious, ethical or cultural beliefs and values. This right should not be determined for women based on the convictions of any special interest group. For government to legislate in the matter of abortion violates a woman's fundamental rights to privacy and choice, and is an impermissible derogation from the separation of Church and State. We therefore reaffirm our support of the Supreme Court decision of 1973 relating to abortions.

Statement of Interest of
National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council

The National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council (NJCRAC) is the umbrella planning and coordinating body for the field of Jewish community relations in the United States. It is composed of 113 community member agencies representing all major Jewish communities in the United States and the following national agencies: The American Jewish Committee, American Jewish Congress, B'nai B'rith, Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, Hadassah, Jewish Labor Committee, Jewish War Veterans of the U.S.A., National Council of Jewish Women, Inc., Union of American Hebrew Congregations, Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America, United Synagogue of America, Women's League for Conservative Judaism and Women's American ORT, Inc. The 106 community member agencies can be found in the appendix to the brief in County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union, Nos. 87-2050, 88-90 and 88-96 filed December 1988. The Jewish community, through the actions of NJCRAC's member agencies, have long sought to insure the protections afforded by the Constitution and the Bill of Rights.

The Jewish community shares with others the reverence for life, on the one hand, and the pluralistic society's concern for individual rights and religious liberty. Within the Jewish community itself there is a spectrum of positions on the matter of abortion. For this reason, NJCRAC believes that the Supreme Court should retain the existing rules set forth in Roe v. Wade so that the abortion decision can be made by individual women in accordance with their own religious and moral views consulting with their physicians and their spiritual advisors.

Statement of Interest of The Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) by James E. Andrews as Stated Clerk of General Assembly

The Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) is a national, Christian denomination with churches in all 50 states. Through its antecedent religious bodies, it has existed as an organized religious denomination within the current boundaries of the United States since 1706. It has approximately 3.1 million active members and approximately 11,600 congregations organized into 172 presbyteries and 16 synods. From a theological perspective, biblical faith depicts individuals as stewards of life, heirs who are responsible for the care of God's world. Through its General Assembly, as its highest governing body, the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) has stated that the morality of abortion is a question of stewardship of life and abortion can, therefore, be considered a responsible choice within a Christian ethical framework when, for example, serious genetic problems arise or when resources are inadequate to care for a child appropriately.

The Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) exists within a very pluralistic environment. Its own members hold a variety of views regarding abortion. Because of this pluralism of beliefs, the General Assembly has repeatedly affirmed that, although abortion should not be used as a method of birth control, the abortion decision must remain with the individual, must be made on the basis of conscience and personal religious principles, and must remain free from governmental interference. Thus, the legal right to have an abortion is a necessary prerequisite to the exercise of conscience in abortion decision. Further, the General Assembly has repeatedly urged Presbyterian congregations and their individual members to provide a supportive community in which a decision concerning the termination of pregnancy can be made in a setting of care and concern, to affirm a woman's ability to make responsible decisions, whether the choice be to abort or to carry the pregnancy to term, to protect the privacy of individuals involved in the abortion decision and to oppose attempts to limit access to abortion through legislation which has the effect of harassing women who are contemplating abortion.

Statement of Interest of Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights And Statements of Its State And Regional Members

The Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights is composed of 30 national religious organizations — Protestant, Jewish and other faith groups. We hold in high respect the value of potential human life; we do not take the question of choice lightly.

Because each denomination and faith group represented among us approaches the issue of choice from the unique perspective of its own theology, members hold widely varying viewpoints as to when abortion is morally justified. It is exactly this plurality of beliefs which leads us to the convictions that the abortion decision must remain with the individual, to be made on the basis of conscience and personal religious principles, and free from governmental interference.

Therefore we reaffirm the Supreme Court ruling of 1973, Roe v. Wade, which permits a woman to make a decision regarding abortion based on her own conscience and religious beliefs. We oppose efforts to enact into secular law one particular religious doctrine on abortion or the beginning of human life.

Statement of Interest of Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights-Maryland

The Maryland Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights is a statewide organization representing nineteen religious groups in Maryland that support and work to protect religious freedom.

In a pluralistic society each denomination's beliefs must be respected, protected, and free from government intervention.

Because personhood of the fetus from the moment of conception is a religious teaching of some particular religious denominations, the government must not be for or against abortion.

Statement of Interest of Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights--Missouri

The Missouri Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights favors the reaffirmation of Roe v. Wade as that decision has been viewed by the Supreme Court in the past. As people of faith we hold in high respect the value of potential human life and do not take the question of abortion lightly. At the same time, we see the moral dimension of human life, which unborn human life lacks, as qualifying women for constitutional protection whenever a choice must be made between a woman's "life, liberty and pursuit of happiness" and the continued existence of any unborn life she might be carrying. Abortion is ultimately a religious issue. We believe that every woman must have the freedom to make decisions concerning abortion based on her own conscience and religious beliefs.

Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights of New York State

Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights of New York State (RCAR/NYS), affiliated with RCAR/USA, is an alliance of diverse religious groups. RCAR/NYS works to educate religious groups and the public about the diversity of religious views on human sexuality, reproduction and abortion. RCAR/NYS provides education concerning threats to religious freedom posed by legislation and activities designed to restrict sexual and reproductive choices. RCAR/NYS supports the right of individual women and families to make the choice of whether and when to bear children, based on individual conscience and personal faith. RCAR/NYS opposes any legislation or action that would make services inaccessible to any group of women.

Statement of Interest of Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights of Northern California

We believe in the sanctity of human life but also that there are situations in which abortion may be a moral alternative for the woman who faces a problem pregnancy. In defending a woman's right to choose, over the rights of a developing fetus, society allows her choice to be in accord with her own conscience and religious beliefs.

Statement of Interest, St. Louis Catholics for Choice

We, St. Louis Catholics for Choice, request the Supreme Court to reject the petition of Webster v. Reproductive Health Services. We see decisions about reproduction as a very important aspect of our moral lives and separate from our decisions about our sexual lives. We see the availability of safe legal abortions as necessary for practical and humanitarian reasons. We value motherhood too highly to view it merely as a biological process which must not be interrupted once started.

We affirm women as fully human, competent moral agents capable of making responsible choices in matters of reproduction.

Statement of Interest of The Union of American Hebrew Congregations

The Union of American Hebrew Congregations is the national congregational body of Reform Judaism comprising approximately 1.3 million members from over 830 Reform synagogues throughout the United States and Canada. To deal with issues of public policy, the UAHC maintains a Commission on Social Action in cooperation with the Central Conference of American Rabbis, the National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods, and all other arms of Reform Judaism. The highest policy-making body of the UAHC is the General Assembly. At its 1975 biennial convention, delegates voted overwhelmingly to support the constitutional right of a woman to obtain a legal abortion if she freely chooses to do so, as determined by the Supreme Court in the 1973 landmark decisions of Roe v. Wade and Doe v. Bolton. In 1981, at the 56th General Assembly of the UAHC the delegates reaffirmed this position declaring that women must be free to exercise their moral and religious conscience regarding abortion.

Statement of Interest of Unitarian Universalist Association

The Unitarian Universalist Association is a voluntary religious association of 1,000 congregations in the United States and abroad dedicated to the principles of a free faith, the right to an individual conscience and to the promotion of the inherent worth and dignity of every person.

The Unitarian Universalist Association has long advocated the right of every woman to decide whether she should bear a child. We believe that the issue of abortion is morally complex and thus must be decided by each individual and must remain a legal option.

The Unitarian Universalist Association firmly believes that circumscription or prohibition of the right to terminate a pregnancy by qualified medical practitioners is an affront to human life and dignity.

In the last two decades, the Unitarian Universalist Association has repeatedly affirmed its belief that women of any age or marital or economic status have the right to have an abortion upon medical/social consultation of her own choosing.

Statement of Interest of Women in Mission and Ministry, Episcopal Church USA

The Episcopal Church USA is the United States branch of the Anglican Communion and we represent two million Americans. At our last triennially held General Convention in 1988 we reaffirmed our support for women's rights over their own bodies which was first passed in 1967. The resolution states:

"Resolved:

The position of this Church, stated at the 62nd General Convention of the Church in Seattle in 1967, which declared support for the 'termination of pregnancy' particularly in those cases where 'the physical and mental health of the mother is threatened seriously, or where there is substantial reason to believe that the child would be badly deformed in mind or body, or where the pregnancy has resulted from rape or incest' is reaffirmed. Termination of pregnancy for these reasons is permissible."

The Episcopal Church's position has been consistent and unchanging. We stand firm in our resolve to be pastorally supportive of women in their choices and will work to maintain a society where they do indeed have constitutionally guaranteed choices.

Statement of Interest of Women's League for Conservative Judaism

The Women's League for Conservative Judaism founded in 1918 is an international organization of Jewish women which is associated with the Jewish Theological Seminary and works closely with the United Synagogue of America and the World Council of Synagogues.

It is dedicated to the perpetuation of traditional Judaism in our modern society and the translation of its high ideals into practice through living Judaism in the home, the Synagogue and the community. Because reverence for life is the cornerstone of the Jewish heritage, it believes that abortion should be "legally available, but ethically restricted."

Statement of Interests of The Right Reverend O'Kelley Whitaker, Episcopal Bishop of Central New York; The Right Reverend Coleman McGehee, Episcopal Bishop of Michigan; The Right Reverend Bill Burrill, Episcopal Bishop of Rochester; The Right Reverend John S. Sprong, Episcopal Bishop of Newark; The Right Reverend David E. Johnson, Episcopal Bishop of Massachusetts; and The Right Reverend Barbara C. Harris, Episcopal Suffragan Bishop of Massachusetts.

As bishops of the Episcopal Church we have several concerns about the Missouri statute. We know that scientists, ethicists, theologians, and other faithful persons differ about the time that life begins, and we worry when states attempt to answer existential questions by statute. Similarly, we recognize the decision to have or not to have an abortion is a profound and personal decision to be made by the moral agent involved (that is to say, by the pregnant woman). We must object to any statute which would deny an individual the information necessary to make an informed decision about her reproductive health or the ability to act upon that decision.

APPENDIX B

Here is a full listing of the organizations joining this brief as amici curiae supporting appellees:

Albuquerque Monthly Meeting of Reiigious Society of Friends

American Friends Service Committee

American Humanist Association

American Jewish Committee

American Jewish Congress

Americans for Religious Liberty

Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith

B'nai B'rith Women

Board of Homeland Ministries — United Church of Christ

Commission on Social Action of Reformed Judaism

The Episcopal Diocese of Massachusetts — Women in Crisis Committee

Episcopal Diocese of New York

Episcopal Women's Caucus

Federation of Reconstructionist Congregations and Havurot

General Board of Church and Society — The United Methodist Church

Institute of Women Today

Jewish Labor Committee

NA'MAT

North American Federation of Temple Youth

National Assembly of Religious Women

National Council of Jewish Women

National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods

National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council

The Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.)

The Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights (including: Buffalo and Western New York Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights; The Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights in Kansas; Maryland Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights; Missouri Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights; New Jersey Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights; New Mexico Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights The Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights of New York State; and The Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights of Northern California)

St. Louis Catholics for Choice

Union of American Hebrew Congregations

Unitarian Universalist Association

Unitarian Universalist Women's Federation

United Church of Christ Coordinating Center for Women

United Church of Christ Office of Church in Society

Washington Ethical Action Center of the American Ethical Union

Women in Ministry — Garrett Evangelical Seminary

Women in Mission and Ministry — Episcopal Church U.S.A.

Women's League for Conservative Judaism

The Right Reverend Bill Burrill, Bishop of the Episcopal Church of Rochester, The Right Reverend Barbara C. Harris, Suffragan Bishop of the Episcopal Church of Massachusetts, The Right Reverend David E. Johnson, Bishop of the Episcopal Church of Massachusetts, The Right Reverend Edward W. Jones, Bishop of the Episcopal Church of Indianapolis, The Right Reverend Coleman McGehee, Bishop of the Episcopal Church of Michigan, The Right Reverend John S. Spong, Bishop of the Episcopal Church of Newark, The Right Reverend John T. Walker, Bishop of the Episcopal Church of Washington, D.C., and The Right Reverend O'Kelley Whitaker, Bishop of the Episcopal Church of Central New York.

AMICUS CURIAE

BRIEF

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
MAR 30 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

No. 88-605

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,
Appellants,

v.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,
Appellees.

On Appeal from the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit

---

BRIEF FOR AMERICANS FOR DEMOCRATIC ACTION; COALITION OF LABOR UNION WOMEN; COMMITTEE OF INTERNS AND RESIDENTS; FEDERALLY EMPLOYED WOMEN; PUBLIC EMPLOYEE DEPARTMENT, AFL-CIO AS AMICI CURIAE

MARSHA S. BERZON
(Counsel of Record)
KAREN GETMAN
177 Post Street
San Francisco, CA 94108
(415) 421-7151

WILSON - EPES PRINTING CO., INC. - 789-0096 - WASHINGTON, D.C. 20001

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Page
INTEREST OF THE AMICI CURIAE	1
SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT	2
ARGUMENT	6
CONCLUSION	28

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

CASES

	Page
Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, 431 U.S. 209 (1977)	22
Anspach v. Norwick, 441 U.S. 68 (1979)	25
Board of Education v. Pico, 457 U.S. 853 (1982)	24, 25
Boos v. Barry, —— U.S. ——, 108 S. Ct. 1157 (1988)	18, 19
Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601 (1973)	17
City of Houston v. Hill, 482 U.S. 451, 107 S. Ct. 2502 (1987)	18
Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Defense & Ed. Fund, 473 U.S. 788 (1985)	24
DeBartolo Corp. v. Florida Gulf Coast Building and Const. Trades Council, —— U.S. ——-, 108 S.Ct. 1392 (1988)	17
DuBois v. Decker, 130 N.Y. 325, 29 N.E. 313 (1891)	21
Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968)	25
Erznoznik v. City of Jacksonville, 422 U.S. 205 (1975)	17
Frisby v. Schultz, —— U.S. ——, 108 S. Ct. 2495 (1988)	4, 17, 18, 24
Hague v. C.I.O., 307 U.S. 496 (1939)	24
Hall v. Beals, 396 U.S. 45 (1969)	16
Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980)	22
Hoover v. Williamson, 236 Md. 250, 203 A.2d 861 (1964)	28
Keyishian v. Board of Regents, 385 U.S. 589 (1967)	26
Kremens v. Bertley, 431 U.S. 119 (1977)	16
Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977)	22
Martin v. City of Struthers, 319 U.S. 141 (1943)	23
Minnesota State Board for Community Colleges v. Knight, 465 U.S. 271 (1984)	26
Minnick v. California Department of Corrections, 452 U.S. 105 (1981)	16
National Savings Bank v. Ward, 100 U.S. 195 (1880)	21
Perry Education Association v. Perry Local Educators' Association, 460 U.S. 37 (1980)	24

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES—Continued

	Page
Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497 (1961)	22
Poelker v. Doe, 432 U.S. 519 (1977)	22
Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486 (1969)	16
Regan v. Taxation with Representation, 461 U.S. 540 (1983)	22, 25
Regents of the University of California v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265 (1978)	26
Rescue Army v. Municipal Court of Los Angeles, 331 U.S. 549 (1947)	16, 20
SEC v. Medical Comm. for Human Rights, 404 U.S. 403 (1972)	16
Schneider v. State, 308 U.S. 147 (1939)	23
Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234 (1957)	26
Thomas v. Collins, 322 U.S. 516 (1945)	3, 12, 13, 14
Virginia v. American Booksellers Associate, Inc., —— U.S. ——, 108 S. Ct. 636 (1988)	17, 18
Wainwright v. City of New Orleans, 392 U.S. 598 (1968)	16, 17
Zwickler v. Koota, 389 U.S. 241 (1987)	18

STATUTES

RSMo. § 188.205 (1986)	passim
RSMo. § 188.210 (1986)	passim
RSMo. § 188.215 (1986)	passim

OTHER AUTHORITIES

61 Am Jur. 2d	21
Hirt, Why the Government is Not Required to Subsidize Abortion Counseling and Referral, 101 Harv. L. Rev. 1895 (1988)	23
F. Lane, Medical Litigation Guide	21
Shiffrin, Government Speech, 27 UCLA L. Rev. (1980)	23
M. Yudof, When Government Speaks (1983)	23

BRIEF FOR AMERICANS FOR DEMOCRATIC ACTION;
COALITION OF LABOR UNION WOMEN;
COMMITTEE OF INTERNS AND RESIDENTS;
FEDERALLY EMPLOYED WOMEN;
PUBLIC EMPLOYEE DEPARTMENT, AFL-CIO
AS AMICI CURIAE

INTEREST OF THE AMICI CURIAE

This brief amici curiae is filed with the consent of the parties as provided for in the Rules of this Court.

Amicus Americans for Democratic Action (ADA), a progressive, independent political organization, is a national coalition of civil rights leaders, academicians, business people, trade unionists, elected officials, church leaders, professionals, members of Congress, and Americans from many other walks of life. ADA is dedicated to the achievement of freedom, equality of opportunity, economic security and peace for all people through education and political action.

Amicus Coalition of Labor Union Women (CLUW) is a national organization of women and men who are members of more than sixty-five national and international unions. CLUW has 45 active chapters throughout the United States and a National Executive Board composed of the female leadership of national labor organizations. Many members of CLUW are professional public employees who object to governmental interference in the communication between themselves and their clients or patients.

Amicus Committee of Interns and Residents (CIR), founded in 1957, is the oldest and largest union of salaried doctors in the United States. CIR currently has collective bargaining agreements which cover 5,000 salaried doctors in New York, New Jersey, and Washington, D.C. Many members of CIR are employed by public entities and believe that, as publicly-employed physicians, they have the same obligation to provide their patients with well-considered professional advice and expertise as physicians in the private sector.

Amicus Federally Employed Women (FEW) is a nonprofit, membership organization that represents over 800,000 women employed by the federal government. FEW's purpose is to eliminate sex discrimination and promote the advancement of women in the federal workplace.

Amicus Public Employee Department, AFL-CIO, is an organization of thirty-three national and international labor organizations with a total membership of 4,500,000 men and women working, for the most part, in governmental employment. Many of the public employee members of Public Employee Department unions are health care and other professional employees deeply concerned with providing their patients and clients with professional services of the highest quality. Those members are concerned with the First Amendment issues involved in this case because they do not believe that the government should be able to prevent them from fulfilling their professional responsibility to provide their clients and patients with their best professional information and advice regarding matters within their realm of expertise.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

I. Of the questions presented for review in this case, this brief amici curiae addresses only the First Amendment issue: May health care professionals who are public employees be required, as a condition of employment, to refrain from providing their patients or clients with truthful information and medically appropriate advice that it is their professional duty to communicate? Before addressing this issue, however, we first consider whether the question is fairly presented by this case in its current posture.

1. Of the three different provisions of the Missouri statute here in question that place limits upon "encouraging or counseling a woman to have an abortion", only one—the proscription on the expenditure of public funds for that purpose (hereafter the "public funds provision") —is now contended by the state to be consistent with the First Amendment. Missouri represents to this Court, albeit less than wholeheartedly, that the public funds provision neither restricts the expenditure of funds for providing information about abortion (as opposed to affirmative advice to procure an abortion), nor prevents public employees from providing information and advice to procure an abortion as an incidental part of their broad professional consultation duties.

2. The first limiting construction suggested by Missouri—that the public funds provision reaches advocacy but not nondirective counseling regarding abortions—is one this Court need not address. For, as this Court had reason to explain in Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516 (1945), a statute which purports to permit objective or abstract discussion but not advocacy will necessarily restrain the former as well as the latter, given the inherent difficulties of distinguishing between the two. Consequently, the public funds provision must be considered, for First Amendment purposes, as identical to a statute that in terms restricts nondirective health care counseling.

3. On the other hand, Missouri's second suggestion regarding the limited intent of the public funds provision is one that this Court should in fact entertain. If, as Missouri in its brief at some points (but not others) indicates, the public funds provision will have no adverse effect upon the ability of health care professionals employed by the state to provide abortion counseling as part of their broader professional responsibilities, then there would be no case or controversy in this case concerning any First Amendment issue. And declining to determine the proffered First Amendment issue would be consistent with this Court's general policy of adjudicating constitutional issues, particularly novel and difficult ones, only when strictly necessary.

4. This Court cannot, however, simply accept Missouri's representations as to the limited reach of the public funds provision. For one thing, those representations are so "opaque" that it would be unwise to base a constitutional adjudication on the state's litigating position. Indeed, this Court recognizes that it is unfair to litigants to simply accept the construction of state statutes alleged to chill First Amendment rights proffered by attorneys for the state but not accepted as authoritative by any agency or court, state or federal.

Instead, this Court has developed a variety of mechanisms for determining whether a limiting construction of a state statute under constitutional attack is appropriate. Of those devices, abstention is generally disfavored where First Amendment rights are at issue. Certification to the highest state court, while often proper, is not available here because Missouri law has no provision for certification. The third alternative is for the federal courts to construe the state statute themselves where a limiting construction is reasonably apparent from the statutory scheme.

The importance of the statutory interpretation question here has been altered significantly on appeal to this Court: Because the state now concedes the invalidity of the statutory language that directly limited the counseling activities of professional public employees, a narrowing construction of the public funds provision would avoid the need to decide at all the First Amendment issue the state seeks to adjudicate. For this reason, and because the statutory structure indicates that the public funds provision was not intended to reach abortion counseling provided as part of programs whose larger purpose is to provide health care to pregnant women rather than simply to advocate abortions, this Court should itself determine that the public funds provision is so limited. Frisby v. Schultz, —— U.S. ——, 108 S. Ct. 2495, 2501 (1988).

II. The relationship between a health care professional and patient or client is one that, under the common law, is confidential, creates a fiduciary obligation on the part of the doctor, and requires that the doctor communicate to the patient both relevant information regarding the patient's medical options and the professional's best judgment regarding the appropriate course to follow. The professional's obligation to provide patients with appropriate information and advice applies without regard to whether the patient or some third party is paying for the consultation. The question in this case is therefore whether Missouri can consistently with the First Amendment require that health care professionals employed by the state forego making communications to their patients that they have a professional obligation to make.

While the First Amendment gives wide berth to the government in communicating its views to the populace, there are nonetheless significant limitations upon the government's authority to control the use of public resources so as to suppress some ideas and promote others. This Court's nonpublic forum cases so illustrate: even as to government-controlled modes of communication where the government may make identity and content distinctions between users, viewpoint proscriptions are impermissible. Certain public employment relationships, including those of professors in public universities and those in which the government employs individuals to enter into traditional professional relationships with lay clients, closely resemble the nonpublic forum situations. Consequently, the same viewpoint distinction proscription should apply to such employment situations. Since the professed purpose of the public funds provision is to foster an official viewpoint concerning abortion, and since only advice favoring and not advice disfavoring abortion is proscribed, the public funds provision as applied to health care professionals employed by the state is unconstitutional.

ARGUMENT

I

This brief amici curiae is concerned with whether a state may, consistently with the First Amendment, preclude health care professionals who are employed by the government from providing their patients and clients with confidential information and advice concerning the availability and advisability of perfectly legal medical procedures that similar professionals not employed by the government would be expected to provide as part of their professional services. Although raised here in the emotional abortion context, the question is a generic one, with implications that stretch beyond the health care situation to include other kinds of professional relationships and contexts. Neither the specific First Amendment question raised in this case nor the broader issue of the protection afforded confidential professional communications of public employees generally by the First Amendment is an issue this Court has had occasion previously to address.

Before proceeding to explore briefly the substantive First Amendment issue, however, we consider whether the issue is actually raised in this case as it now stands. The attorneys for Missouri have in the course of this litigation suggested that the state statute, to the extent that it is now contested, may not in fact preclude professional public employees such as the plaintiffs in this case from offering information and advice to their patients concerning the availability of procuring an abortion not necessary to save the mother's life. Instead, appellants indicate, albeit somewhat ambiguously, that the statute as it now stands would permit such employees, without endangering their jobs, to offer their own best professional judgment as to whether an abortion is the appropriate alternative for the particular patient. Because these representations are neither binding upon the officials entrusted with enforcing the Missouri statute here at issue nor sufficiently unambiguous to provide reliable assurance to the affected public employees, however, this Court should directly address, affirm, and clarify the statutory construction suggested by appellant's attorneys, thereby avoiding any need to address the First Amendment issue presented by this case.

1. There are three provisions of the Missouri statutory scheme here at issue that, on their faces, may impact upon the ability of professional public employees to provide their patients with information and advice concerning abortions. The first makes it:

> "unlawful for a doctor, nurse, or other health care professional, a social worker, a counselor, or person of similar occupation who is a public employee within the scope of his public employment to encourage or counsel a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life." [RSMo. § 188.210 (1986).]

The second provides that no "public facility" may be used "for the purpose of . . . encouraging or counseling a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life." RSMo. § 188.215 (1986). And the third states that it is "unlawful for any public funds to be expended for the purpose . . . of encouraging or counseling a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life." RSMo. § 188.205 (1986).

In the district court, the state maintained, first, that none of these provisions "prevent a physician from informing a woman of 'all options' or the 'pros and cons' of an abortion" (J. St. App. A45), and second, that even if the section that directly prohibits public employees from encouraging and counseling abortions is unconstitutional, the "public funds" section, § 188.205, is valid because it is "not directed at any plaintiff, either as a physician or other health care provider, but only at 'state and local officials or legislative bodies responsible for expending public funds.'" J. St. App. A45.

In the course of holding the "encouraging or counseling" provisions of the statute as a whole void for vagueness, the district court, without actually rejecting the proffered interpretations on their merits, refused to rely upon them as affecting the constitutional issues before the court: The first suggestion, said the court, was insufficient, even if accepted as within the legislature's intent, to affect the constitutionality of the statute, given the inherent lack of precision in any line drawn between simply providing information and counseling or encouraging a particular course of action. J. St. App. A44-46.[1] As to the "public funds" provision, the district court did not directly endeavor to determine whether the statute could be readily construed so as to avoid the conclusion that it forbids public employees from providing information and advice regarding abortion in the course of carrying out their ordinary medical consultations. Rather, the court simply stated, in the negative, that it was "unpersuaded that § 188.205, which relates to 'public funds,' could not apply to inhibit the free speech of any health care provider." J. St. App. A46 (emphasis supplied). And in addressing the merits of the First Amendment issue, as opposed to the vagueness contention, the district court did not separately consider the "public funds" provision at all. Instead, the court considered the three "encouraging and counseling" provisions together, and concluded that they were unconstitutional because they could deny access to medical information affecting a woman's decision whether to continue a pregnancy even where the patient paid the full cost of the counseling. J. St. A49-50.

[1] In support of this conclusion, the district court cited specific evidence in the record that, to avoid "encouraging or counseling" abortions, health professionals (in at least one instance on the basis of a directive issued by the employing hospital) either were providing no information at all concerning abortions to their patients, or were attempting to "steer their conduct far wider than the lawful zone." J. St. App. 44-45.

On appeal, the court of appeals affirmatively addressed and rejected the state's suggestion that the "encouraging" and "counseling" language as it appeared in the statute should be read as "banning only 'affirmative advocacy.'" J. St. App. A67. The court of appeals believed that such an interpretation would read the term "counseling" as synonomous with "encouraging," thereby violating the "basic principles of statutory construction . . . that a statute should be interpreted so as not to render one part inoperative." J. St. A68. In addition, the court of appeals agreed with the district court that however construed, the term "counseling" "is fraught with ambiguity" and would have the effect of chilling even that objective speech the state contends is outside the intended legislative reach. J. St. App. A68.

Unlike the district court, however, the court of appeals did not mention at all the possibility that the "public funds" provision should be read so as not to overlap with the "public employees" section. Instead, the court of appeals treated the "encouraging or counseling" language of the public employee, public funds, and public facilities sections together, and held all three, without differentiation, both unconstitutionally vague and an "unconstitutional infringement of the right to choose an abortion protected by the fourteenth amendment." J. St. App. 73.[2]

In this Court, Missouri does not seek review of the court of appeals' holding that the public employees and public facilities provisions are unconstitutional insofar as they proscribe "encouraging" or "counseling" women with respect to abortions. See J. St. i-ii; id., Question 4 ("Is a state civil statute facially unconstitutional that makes it 'unlawful for any public funds to be expended . . . for the purpose of counseling a woman to have an abortion

[2] Thus, the court of appeals did not address any First Amendment issue, as such, on the merits, although it assumed for purposes of the vagueness analysis that "[t]he prohibition on 'encouraging or counseling' implicates [the] first . . . amendment rights of both physicians and their patients." J. St. App. A67.

not necessary to save her life.'" See RSMo. § 188.205 (1986). And the state maintains, once again, that the "encouraging or counseling" phrase of the statute "does not prohibit the use of public funds to provide information regarding abortions or to inform a woman of the options she may have to cope with an unwanted pregnancy." Brief for Appellants ("App. Br.") at 42.

Moreover, the state now expands upon its contention that the public funds section, taken alone (as it now must be, with the unconstitutionality of the public employees section settled), does not impede the ability of health care providers to communicate with their patients concerning abortions:

> Section 188.205 does not forbid speech; it is only concerned with the spending of public money. . . . The language of § 188.205 directs officials not to expend public funds under their control for the purpose of . . . encouraging or counseling a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life. . . . Obviously the language of this statute does not forbid any discussion regarding abortion issues. . . .
>
> Section 188.205 is not directed at the conduct of any physician or health care provider, private or public. Instead, it is directed solely at those persons responsible for expending public funds. . . . The statute does not forbid incidental use of funds for counseling, so long as the expenditure has a legitimate public purpose. [App. Br. 38, 39, 43.]

This language suggests, but does not clearly state, that a health care provider employed by the state could, without fear of losing his or her job, provide information and advice concerning abortion in the course of a session with an individual patient or client whose purpose is to provide an ordinary medical consultation, and not simply to advocate abortion. There is reason to believe, at the same time, that Missouri has carefully chosen the language in its brief to create the impression that public employees may provide abortion information and advice with impunity under the public funds provisions without fully committing the state to that position. Thus, the state's discussion may leave open the possibility that the funding officials could condition the expenditure of funds upon an assurance that employees paid with the funds will not advise a woman to have an abortion; the public hospital or other entity receiving the funds could then make abiding with that funding provision a condition of employment for affected public employees.[3] Under this scenario, the statute itself directly affects only the funding officials, but the consequences for public employees would be that they endanger their jobs if they provide to patients not paying their own fees their best professional judgment on the question of abortion.

2. In our view, the first statutory construction question raised by Missouri's arguments in this Court—whether the "encouraging or counseling" language used in the public funds provision reaches nondirective counseling to woman concerning the abortion option, or only specific advice from a health care professional to a patient that the best medical course for her would be to procure an abortion—is not one pertinent to the resolution of any First Amendment issue before this Court.

---

[3] For example, the state argues that the state may consistently with the First Amendment, "absolutely restrict[]" public employees from encouraging or counseling a woman to have an abortion where the counseling services are paid for with public funds. App. Br. at 39-40. In the first place, including this argument at all is inconsistent with the suggestion that the public fund provision in fact contains no such restriction. And second, read against this argument, the statements that the statute does not forbid discussion of abortion or control the conduct of public health care professionals may simply mean that the statute controls only the counseling services they provide when paid for with public funds, not the services they provide when the patient pays for the counseling services. See J. St. App. A49-50 (district court holding that the public employee and public facility provisions are unconstitutional because they limit the counseling activities of publicly-employed health care professionals even when those activities are fully paid for by the patient).

For the two courts below were surely correct in concluding that any constitutional infirmity in Missouri's regulation of abortion-related speech by professional employees could not be cured by differentiating between providing information about abortions and advocating that a particular patient seek an abortion.

This Court addressed in Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516 (1945), a similar attempt to save a speech-restraining statute[4] by arguing that the statute prohibited only advocacy of a specific, lawful course of action by particular individuals (in Thomas, "solicitation" of particular workers to join a union) and not speech generally discussing the merits and demerits of that course of action (in Thomas, discussing the availability and advantages of labor organizations as a solution to the problems of workers generally). This Court concluded in Thomas that because the distinction between advocacy of a specific course of action and merely discussing unionism was an inherently ephmeral one, the statute in question had to be judged on the assumption that it reached the latter as well as the former. This Court's sensitive discussion of why that was the case in Thomas has application by analogy here:

> A speaker . . . could avoid the words "solicit," "invite," "join." It would be impossible to avoid the idea. . . . General words create different and often particular impressions on different minds. No speaker, however careful, can convey exactly his meaning, or the same meaning, to different [individuals]. How one might "laud unionism" . . . yet . . . not imply an invitation, is hard to conceive.

[4] We are not at this juncture prejudging the question whether any restraint worked by RSMo. § 188.205 upon speech by professional public employees is unconstitutional. Rather, the point made in the text is that the narrowing construction suggested by the state concerning the "encouraging or counseling" abortion language would not, if adopted, make the statute any more valid than it would be without the limiting construction.

> [W]hether words intended and designed to fall short of invitation would miss that mark is a question both of intent and of effect. No speaker, in such circumstances, safely could assume that anything he might say upon the general subject would not be understood by some as an invitation. In short, the supposedly clearcut distinction between discussion, laudation, general advocacy, and solicitation puts the speaker at the mercy of the varied understanding of his hearers, and consequently of whatever inference may be drawn as to his intent and meaning.
>
> Such a distinction offers no security for free discussion. In these conditions it blankets with uncertainty whatever may be said. It compels the speaker to hedge and trim. . . . The vice is not merely that invitation, in the circumstances shown here, is speech. It is also that its prohibition forbids or restrains discussion which is not or may not be invitation. The sharp line cannot be drawn surely or securely. [323 U.S. at 534-35 (emphasis supplied).]

So here: The relationship between a doctor and a patient, for example, is necessarily one in which the patient is dependent upon the doctor's expertise, and is seeking from the doctor not only information but also specific advice as to the best course to follow.[5] Even if the doctor refuses to provide such advice in explicit terms, it is quite likely that the patient will nonetheless, expecting the doctor to prescribe a specific course of action, perceive advice to be implicit in the information provided. Thus, no health care professional consulted by a pregnant woman "safely could assume that anything he might say upon the general subject [of abortion] would not be understood by some as [affirmatively advocating to a particular woman that she have an abortion]." Thomas v. Collins, supra, 323 U.S. at 535.

[5] For example, a patient consulting a doctor for an upper respiratory infection expects more than a list of the various medications available to treat such infections; he or she expects as well an indication of which one, in the doctor's expert judgment, is best suited for the patient's circumstances.

Consequently, the prohibition of affirmative advocacy of abortion necessarily "forbids or restrains discussion which is not or may not be [advocacy]," (323 U.S. at 535), and must be considered for purposes of constitutional analysis as identical to a rule that explicitly reaches nondirective counseling concerning the abortion option.[6] For that reason, this Court need not address the precise reach of the "encouraging or counseling" language of the public funds provision of the Missouri statute.

---

[6] We note that the analysis in the text differs somewhat from the vagueness analysis upon which the district court and the Court of Appeals relied. Both courts held that the "encouraging or counseling abortion" language in the Missouri statute was subject to heightened scrutiny for unconstitutional vagueness because that language would necessarily discourage speech by public employee professionals to their patients simply providing information on the abortion option. See J. St. App. at A45-46, A67. But this vagueness approach, assumes, without purporting to decide, that health care professional public employees have a First Amendment right to provide at least nondirective counseling regarding medical procedures to their patients, regardless of any policy pronouncements to the contrary by their public employers. While we believe that that position is ultimately correct (see Part II, infra), we do not believe that the proposition is so self-evident as to support a ruling that the statute is unconstitutionally vague without considering the merits of the First Amendment issue.

On our analysis, however, the import of the observation that the "encouraging or counseling" abortion language will necessarily discourage both nondirective and advice-oriented consultations by health care professionals paid with public funds is not to hold the statute unconstitutionally vague for that reason. Instead, the ephemeral nature of any distinction between providing abortion-related information and advising a woman to procure an abortion is important because it defines the merits of the First Amendment issue as necessarily encompassing any kind of abortion-related consultation between health care professionals paid with public funds and their patients.

3. In contrast, the second statutory construction issue raised by Missouri in this Court—whether the public funds provision of the statute has any impact upon the right of health professionals who are public employees to counsel their patients regarding abortions as part of their ordinary medical consultations—could be dispositive of any First Amendment issue raised by the "encouraging or counseling" language of the public funds provision. None of the plaintiffs in this case has any controversy with defendants concerning the expenditure of public funds as such. Rather, the organizational plaintiffs are private non-profit organizations that for purposes of this lawsuit are not seeking to use any public funds to support any abortion counseling they may provide. J. St. App. A10. And the individual plaintiffs are health care professional public employees who, while paid with public funds, have no responsibility for dispersing such funds. Rather, for purposes of the "encouraging or counseling abortion" public funds provision, those individuals are concerned only with assuring that they can continue, in the course of their practices, to provide pregnant women patients who consult them as medical professionals with both information and recommendations concerning the advisability of a legal abortion. J. St. App. A10, 48.

The courts below have held that insofar as the Missouri statutes specifically forbid public employees to engage in this conduct, the statutes are invalid. Thus, unless RSMo. § 188.205, the public funds section, overlaps with the now-inoperative public employee provision, the individual plaintiffs are in no danger that their government jobs will in the future be conditioned upon refraining from providing abortion counseling in the course of their professional consultations, and there is no longer any case or controversy between plaintiffs and defendants concerning the constitutionality of the "encouraging or counseling" prohibitions of the public funds aspect of the statute. If that is the case, the appeal, as to that issue should not be entertained. See, e.g., Hall v. Beals, 396 U.S. 45, 48 (1969); Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486, 496 n.7 (1969); SEC v. Medical Comm. for Human Rights, 404 U.S. 403, 407 (1972).

This disposition of the First Amendment issue in this case would have a distinct jurisprudential advantage: As we briefly develop below (see Part II, infra), the First Amendment issues that would be raised by any governmental interference with the substance of confidential communications within a fiduciary professional-client relationship are substantial and sensitive ones, and remain so whether the professional employee in question is a public employee or not. This Court has long adhered to a "policy of strict necessity in disposing of constitutional issues," (Rescue Army v. Municipal Court of Los Angeles, 331 U.S. 549, 568 (1947)), and has applied that policy particularly to cases raising novel and important constitutional questions where, for one of various reasons, those questions are not as sharply presented as they might be. E.g., Rescue Army v. Municipal Court, supra, 331 U.S. at 565-68 (refusing to exercise appellate jurisdiction where, inter alia, the appropriate construction of the statute in question was "ambiguous" and the record presenting the constitutional question in "highly abstract form"); Minnick v. California Department of Corrections, 452 U.S. 105, 127 (1981) (refusing to decide the validity of an affirmative action program "because of significant developments in the law—and perhaps in the facts as well—" since the litigation of the case began); Wainwright v. City of New Orleans, 392 U.S. 598 (1968) (Harlan, J., concurring) (explaining that the reason for dismissing certiorari was that "this record is too opaque to permit any satisfactory adjudication of [the constitutional] issue proffered"); Kremens v. Bartley, 431 U.S. 119, 133-34 (1977). And, in particular, where a constitutional issue can be avoided by interpreting a statute so as to clear up any ambiguities as to the statute's effect upon constitutional rights and at the same time pretermit any constitutional question, this Court has preferred that course. E.g., DeBartolo Corp. v. Florida Gulf Coast Bldg. and Const., Trades Council, —— U.S. ——, 108 S. Ct. 1392, 1397 (1988); see Erznoznik v. City of Jacksonville, 422 U.S. 205, 216 (1975); Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 613 (1973).

4. The question then becomes whether the "encouraging or counseling" aspect of the public funds provision in fact reaches, directly or indirectly, the professional consultation function of public employees engaged in medical practice generally, and not in abortion advocacy alone. While Missouri has indicated that RSMo. § 188.205 may not have that reach, the representations of its attorneys concerning the precise reach of that section are, at least, "opaque." Wainwright v. City of New Orleans, 392 U.S. 598 (1968) (Harlan, J., concurring). See pp. 10-11, supra. And, in any event, this Court does not simply accept the representations of a state's attorneys in this Court as to the appropriate construction of a state statute. Since such representations do not bind state courts or state enforcement authorities, blind acceptance of those representations leave the plaintiffs in the position of fearing sanctions should they engage in the conduct they claim to be protected by the First Amendment. Virginia v. American Booksellers Assoc., Inc., —— U.S. ——, 108 S. Ct. 636, 644 (1988); Frisby v. Schultz, —— U.S. ——, 108 S. Ct. 2495, 2501 (1988) (first adopting a narrowing construction of the statute in question, and then noting that the interpretation "is supported by the representations of counsel for the town at oral argument") (emphasis supplied); id. at 2505 (White, J., concurring) (counsel's representations are not "authoritative statements of the law").

Rather, when faced with the need to determine whether a proffered limiting interpretation of a state statute is valid, this Court has chosen from among several options.

One option is to remand to the district court with directions to abstain from deciding the constitutional question while the parties repair to state court to settle the statutory constriction issue. This Court, however, has been "reluctant to abstain in cases involving facial challenges based on the First Amendment." City of Houston v. Hill, —— U.S. ——, 107 S. Ct. 2502, 2512 (1987). "In such case[s] to force the plaintiff who has commenced a federal action to suffer the delay of state-court proceedings might itself effect the impermissible chilling of the very constitutional right he seeks to protest." Zwickler v. Koota, 389 U.S. 241, 252 (1987), quoted in City of Houston v. Hill, supra, 107 S. Ct. at 2513.

Another alternative available to this Court in securing an adjudication of the meaning of a state statute challenged on First Amendment grounds is to certify the statutory question to a state's highest court, while leaving in effect during the certification process any injunction issued by the lower federal courts preventing application of the statute on constitutional grounds. Virginia v. American Booksellers Assoc. Inc., supra, 108 S. Ct. at 644-45. In this instance, however, no certification process is available in the Missouri Supreme Court.

Finally, where "a narrowing construction of state statute is . . . reasonable and readily apparent," the federal courts may themselves construe a state statute so as to avoid constitutional difficulties. Boos v. Barry, —— U.S. ——, 108 S. Ct. 1157, 1169 (1988); see also Frisby v. Schultz, supra, 108 S. Ct. at 2501. And while this Court ordinarily does not adopt such a limiting construction on its own in the first instance, it may do so where "the lower courts ran afoul of the well-established principle that statutes will be interpreted to avoid constitutional difficulties." Frisby v. Schultz, supra, 108 S. Ct. at 2501.

The latter alternative is appropriate in this case. The court of appeals did not address at all the question whether the RSMo. § 188.205, the public funds provision, should be construed so as not to preclude public employees from counseling women regarding their abortion options as part of their ordinary professional consultation services. And while the district court did briefly allude to this question of statutory interpretation, that court, quite properly as the case stood at that juncture, took no account of the policy favoring interpretation of statutes to avoid constitutional difficulties, since the separate public employee provision nonetheless required that the basic First Amendment issue raised by the plaintiffs be addressed.

Because the state now accepts the constitutional invalidity of the "encouraging or counseling" aspect of the public employee provision, the current situation is quite different from that faced by the courts below: By a narrowing construction of the public funds provision as it pertains to the First Amendment issue, this Court can entirely avoid the necessity to decide a novel First Amendment issue. And, with the constitutional invalidity of the public employee section conceded, the propriety of such a limiting construction is "readily apparent." Boos v. Barry, supra, 108 S. Ct. at 1169: It is reasonable to assume that the legislature addressed the scope of "encouraging and counseling" in which public employees could engage in the statutory section that expressly addressed that issue, and intended the "public funds" section to address the separate question whether public officials could spend money for programs dedicated to the express and narrow purpose of providing abortion counseling. Under that view of the statute, professional public employees could, in the course of providing general health services to pregnant women, proffer both information regarding the availability of abortions and their own best expert judgment concerning whether an abortion is medically indicated. Since that is all that the public employees who are plaintiffs in this case propose to do (see J. St. App. A48), such a construction would pretermit any case or controversy regarding the constitutional issues raised by the public funds provision.[7]

In sum, because Missouri has chosen to accept the constitutional invalidity of the part of the statute that most directly implicates the First Amendment issue the state seeks to adjudicate, this case presents the unusual situation in which a limiting construction by this Court of a state statute in order to avoid constitutional adjudication is appropriate. Such a construction would provide Missouri's professional public employees with the protection they need to pursue their professional responsibility as they see it, and at the same time would adhere to this Court's "policy of strict necessity in disposing of constitutional issues." Rescue Army v. Municipal Court of Los Angeles, 331 U.S. 549, 568 (1947).

II

Because we regard as compelling the argument that the "public funds" provision should be construed so as to avoid any First Amendment controversy between the parties to this case, we address the First Amendment issue originally raised in this case only briefly.

1. In this case, "[t]here was unchallenged testimony at trial that in such situations [when the mother's health may be adversely affected, even if it is not an immediate life-threatening condition] a physician has a professional duty to at least suggest or even to urge the pregnant woman to have an abortion." J. St. App. 48. This finding reflects the basic attributes of the relationship between health care (and other) professionals and their patients or clients that is generally recognized and protected in the common law, and that is at the heart of the First Amendment issue in this case.

---

[7] This is not to say, of course, that the public funds provision as thus construed would necessarily be constitutional.

Those basic characteristics are, in essence (1) that the relationship is confidential; (2) that the professional possesses expertise within a certain area of knowledge, and applies that expertise to the particular client's problems within that area; (3) that in applying that expertise, the professional is expected to exercise a special duty of care akin to that of a fiduciary, giving the client his or her best expert judgment without regard to the professional's own self-interest or other external considerations. See generally F. Lane, Medical Litigation Guide §§ 40.03, 40.06, 40.09, 40.10, 40.17; 61 Am. Jur. 2d ("Physicians, Surgeons, and Other Healers") 290-305, 358-371 (1981).[8] Traditionally, a professional owes that standard of care to any individual whom he or she undertakes to treat or counsel, regardless of whether the fees for the consultation are paid by a third party, or by the government. National Savings Bank v. Ward, 100 U.S. 195 (1880); DuBois v. Decker, 130 N.Y. 325, 29 N.E. 313 (1891). Thus, professionals paid by the government because their patients cannot themselves afford the usual fees are not exempt from the traditional obligations of their profession when they consult with indigent clients. As a general matter, then,

> [t]he right of the doctor to advise his patients according to his best lights seems so obviously within First Amendment rights as to need no extended discussion. . . . Of course a physician can talk freely and fully with his patient without threat of retalia-

---

[8] The professional may decline to provide a particular treatment, or may withdraw altogether from the relationship with the client. In either situation, however, the professional's fiduciary duties persist insofar as he or she has a duty to communicate to the client the need for additional treatment, and to provide necessary medical care until the client secures the services of another professional. See generally, 61 Am. Jur.2d at 361-69.

tion by the State. [Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497, 513-14 (1961) (Douglas, J., dissenting).] [9]

The First Amendment question in this case is whether, as Missouri argues, a health care or other professional loses any of the First Amendment's protection for communication that it is his or her professional duty to provide simply because the fees for his or her professional services are paid by the government rather than by the individual to whom the care is provided.

2. Missouri supports the proposition for which it argues by a simple syllogism: Government need not permit public employees, paid with public funds, to participate in performing abortions (or, presumably, any other medical procedure); instead, government may discourage certain activities by refusing to fund those activities. Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977); Poelker v. Doe, 432 U.S. 519 (1977); Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980). By the same token says the state, government does not have an obligation to "subsidize" or promote speech by private citizens. Regan v. Taxation with Representation, 461 U.S. 540 (1983). Ergo, the government is free, without limitation, to limit speech of any kind, and to forbid the expression of some views but not others, as long as the speech could not occur without use of government resources.[10]

---

[9] In Poe, Justice Douglas filed a dissenting opinion from the court's refusal on prudential grounds to address the constitutional question presented for review and not from an opinion taking an opposite view on the merits. While this Court has not had occasion to revisit the question of the First Amendment protection accorded communication within the professional-patient relationship, Justice Douglas' general proposition that the First Amendment reaches not only public debate and discourse but every manner of communication among citizens has been repeatedly reaffirmed. E.g., Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, 431 U.S. 209, 231 (1977).

[10] Missouri puts the argument in terms of the government's right to expend its funds in support only of speech that it desires to subsidize, presumably because the statutory provision here at issue relates only to funds. But there is nothing inherent in the use of government money, as opposed to the use of other government resources, that should vary the constitutional results. See, making the broad argument that the government can withhold any form of support from communicative activity that would promote abortion, Hirt, Why the Government is Not Required to Subsidize Abortion Counseling and Referral, 101 Harv. L. Rev. 1895 (1988).

But this Court has not sanctioned this glib equation between the government's right to withhold support from disfavored conduct and a government right to censor speech that is in some measure dependent upon government support for its continuation. Rather, while it is true that the First Amendment has a restricted role to play where the government is seeking to communicate its views to the citizenry,[11] implicit in this Court's First Amendment jurisprudence are several principles that limit the government's ability to foster an official point of view by conditioning the use of government resources for communicative activity upon abiding by government-imposed restrictions.

First, the primacy of the First Amendment necessarily means that there are situations in which the government can bar use of its resources for noncommunicative purposes, but not for speech activity. For example, the public forum cases in one sense concern the question whether and to what degree government can refuse to subsidize speech by providing a suitable location for communication among citizens; absent access to government-owned locations, citizens are not forbidden to speak to each other, but they may find it much more difficult and expensive to do so. See, e.g., Schneider v. State, 308 U.S. 147, 161 (1939); Martin v. City of Struthers, 319 U.S. 141, 147 (1943). This Court has nonetheless recognized that because of pervasive governmental ownership and control over many of the facilities most appropriate for communication among citizens, the fundamental First Amendment value of promoting the exchange of ideas among the citizenry would be irretrievably compromised by a rule giving government the same degree of control over communicative activity on public property as over non-communicative activity. E.g., Hague v. C.I.O., 397 U.S. 496 (1939); Frisby v. Schultz, supra. The result is that a city may ban rollerskating from its parks or skateboarding from its streets because it considers the activities dangerous, but may not forbid supporters of abortion from marching on city streets because it considers their ideas dangerous. Cf. Frisby v. Schultz, 108 S. Ct. at 2503.

---

[11] See generally M. Yudof, When Government Speaks (1988); Shiffrin, Government Speech, 27 UCLA L. Rev. 565, 568-69 (1980).

Secondly, the government's ability to foster a particular point of view by manipulating the distribution and use of government resources is more limited than its authority to dedicate certain resources entirely to non-communicative activity, or to limit the subject matter but not the viewpoint of speech supported with public resources. Again, the cases in which this Court has addressed questions of access to government-controlled property or modes of communication demonstrate that this is the case: While the government may restrict in some instances the use of government owned or controlled systems of communication on the basis of the identity of the speaker or the content of the speech, it may not deny the use of such resources on the basis of the viewpoint to be espoused, for the purpose of suppressing an idea with which the government disagrees. Perry Education Assn. v. Perry Local Educators' Assn., 460 U.S. 87, 46 (1980) ("the State may reserve the forum for its intended purposes, communicative or otherwise, as long as the regulation on speech is reasonable and not an effort to suppress expression merely because public officials oppose the speakers' view"); Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Defense & Ed. Fund, 473 U.S. 788, 811 (1985) ("[t]he existence of reasonable grounds for limiting access to a nonpublic forum, however, will not save a regulation that is in reality a facade for viewpoint-based discrimination."); cf. Board of Education v. Pico, 457 U.S. 853

(1982); Regan v. Taxation with Representation, 461 U.S. 540, 548 (the government violates an individual's rights by declining to subsidize their communicative activity if it "discriminate[s] invidiously in such a way as to 'aim at the suppression of dangerous ideas'").

Finally, there is no unitary rule concerning whether this general principle proscribing viewpoint discrimination by the government in the distribution of subsidies for communicative activity applies to individuals employed by the government for the purpose of carrying out some government policy, as opposed to individuals who, although using government resources, are in no sense agents of the government for any purpose. Rather, whether or not public employees may claim the same measure of protection for their job-related communicative activity as other individuals whose speech is aided by the use of public resources, or whether public employees are instead deemed in effect to have contracted to carry out governmental policy at the expense of First Amendment rights, depends in large part upon the nature of their employment.

The Court has suggested that because the function of elementary and high schools is in large part "inculcating fundamental values necessary to the maintenance of a democratic political system" (Anspach v. Norwick, 441 U.S. 68, 76-77 (1979)), the government has relatively broad authority to control the communication that goes on between teacher and student in the public school classroom. Cf. Board of Education v. Pico, supra, 457 U.S. at 864 (plurality opinion).[12] At the same time, where the nature of the public employment is such that the government is in effect paying the salaries of certain individuals so that they may freely communicate with others, the nature of employment relationship is quite analogous to the relationships in the nonpublic forum context, and similar rules protecting against government suppression of speech because of its point of view apply.

[12] One would expect, however, that there are limits even on the right of a school board to control speech by a teacher in the class room (in addition to the express limitation worked by the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment, see Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968)). For example, if a school board dictated that a teacher support in the classroom election of candi-

For example, a government operated university is not a new form of human endeavor but the continuation, in a particular form, of a kind of organization with a noble history in the development of civilization whose mission, it has been long understood, depends upon a basic freedom of communication among scholars and between scholars and their students:

> The essentiality of freedom in the community of American universities is almost self-evident. . . To impose any strait jacket upon the intellectual leaders in our colleges and universities would imperil the future of our Nation. . . . Scholarship cannot flourish in an atmosphere of suspicion and distrust. Teachers and students must always remain free to inquire, to study and evaluate, to gain new maturity and understanding; otherwise our civilization will stagnate and die. [Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234, 250 (1957).]

See also Keyishian v. Board of Regents, 385 U.S. 589, 601-03 (1967); Regents of the University of California v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 312 (1978) (opinion of Powell, J.); Minnesota State Board for Community Colleges v. Knight, 465 U.S. 271, 292 (1984) (Marshall, J., concurring). Thus, a university administration is in effect dates with whom she disagreed, or required that she teach factual information that was indisputably incorrect, the restrictions could not be justified by any legitimate educational purposes of the school board. At that point, we would expect, the basis for concluding that the teacher's free speech rights are subordinate to her obligation to perform the job she had contracted to do would no longer obtain, and the restrictions on speech would be invalid.

---

conducting a nonpublic forum for the exchange of ideas; while the officials may select the participants in that forum, and prescribe the subject matter to be covered, the nature of the governmental endeavor, as established both by tradition and by the transcendent purpose of the institution, is such that interference with free speech on viewpoint grounds would in the long run undermine the government's reason for subsidizing universities in the first place. For that reason, as the cases just cited show, once the government has made the choice to subsidize a university, it must treat the employees of the university not as instruments for communicating government policy, but as independent professionals whose communicative activity the government has chosen to subsidize.

The same should be true regarding the health care professional-patient relationship involved in this lawsuit. The basic relationship is one that the government did not create; rather, the relationship, as developed in the private sector, depends in large part upon confidence, trust, and upon free communication between the doctor or other professional and the patient or client. See p. 21, supra. Where such communication is constrained in order to suppress a particular viewpoint,[13] the fundamental nature of the relationship that the government has chosen to subsidize is distorted, and the overall purpose of subsidizing the relationship is undermined. Consequently, government may not choose to subsidize a professional-patient relationship that replicates generally that relationship as it has developed in the society at large and then compromise the communicative freedom that is basic to the success of the relationship.[14] Under that analysis,

---

[13] That is indubitably the case here. Missouri concedes that the purpose of the statute is to prevent health care professionals from inducing or persuading women to have abortions, because of the government policy that abortions are undesirable.

[14] It is worth noting that at common law, not every professional consultation gives rise to the fiduciary relationship characteristic of such consultations. For example, where an employer, for its own the public funds provision of the Missouri statute is unconstitutional to the extent, if any, that the provision has the effect of precluding professional employees from fulfilling their professional responsibility to communicate with patients fully concerning available and advisable medical options.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated above, the judgment below with respect to the "encouraging" or "counseling" abortion aspects of the public funds provision should be affirmed on the basis that the state statute permits public employees to engage in such "encouraging" or "counseling" as part of a professional consultation with an individual client.

Respectfully submitted,

MARSHA S. BERZON
(Counsel of Record)
KAREN GETMAN
177 Post Street
San Francisco, CA 94108
(415) 421-7151

---

purposes and not to subsidize treatment of the employee, directs that an employee be examined by a physician, no doctor-patient relationship giving rise to a special duty of care is created. E.g. Hoover v. Williamson, 236 Md. 250, 203 A.2d 861 (1964).

AMICUS CURIAE

BRIEF

(88)

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
MAR 30 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

No. 88-605

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,

Appellants,

vs.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.,

Appellees.

On Appeal From The United States Court Of Appeals For The Eighth Circuit

BRIEF AMICI CURIAE OF THE ASSOCIATION OF REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH PROFESSIONALS, ET AL., IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEES

DOROTHY B. ZIMBRAKOS
Rivkin, Radler, Dunne & Bayh
30 N. LaSalle Street
Suite 4300
Chicago, Illinois 60602
(312) 782-5680

COLLEEN K. CONNELL
(Counsel of Record)
The Roger Baldwin Foundation of ACLU, Inc.
20 E. Jackson Boulevard
Suite 1600
Chicago, Illinois 60604
(312) 427-7330

Photex — 444 North Wabash Avenue — Chicago 60611 — 321-0223

84 pp

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Page
TABLE OF CONTENTS	i
TABLE OF CASES AND OTHER AUTHORITIES	iii
INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE	1
BACKGROUND STATEMENT	4
SUMMARY OF ARGUMENTS	14
ARGUMENT	15
I. THE "PREFATORY" PROVISIONS IN THE MISSOURI LAW SUBSTANTIALLY INFRINGE UPON THE CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT OF WOMEN TO RECEIVE, AND OF HEALTH PROFESSIONALS TO PROVIDE, FULL REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH CARE	20
A. By Bestowing Legal Rights On The Fetus, Missouri Unconstitutionally Requires Health Care Providers To Sublimate The Woman's Right To Continued Life And Health . . .	21

Page

B. By Incorrectly Defining The Beginning Of Life, The State Unconstitutionally Restricts The Ability Of Health Professionals To Administer Contraceptives And Other Reproductive Health Services To Women 30

C. The Natural Continuum Of This Court's Privacy Cases From Contraception To Abortion Requires That The Same Constitutional Standard Be Used To Evaluate Proposed Restrictions On Each 40

II. SECTION 188.205 RESTRICTS NECESSARY COMMUNICATIONS BETWEEN PATIENTS AND HEALTH CARE PROVIDERS AND INFRINGES UPON THE RIGHT OF PATIENTS TO MAKE DECISIONS ABOUT MEDICAL CARE AND CHILDBEARING . . . 50

CONCLUSION 64

TABLE OF CASES AND OTHER AUTHORITIES

Page

CASES

Canterbury v. Spence, 464 F.2d 772 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1064 (1972) 52

Carey v. Population Services International, 431 U.S. 678, 687 (1977) 16, 17, 47, 50

City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416 (1983) . . . . . passim

Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379 (1979) 15, 26, 45

Deaconess Hospital v. Ilester McRoberts, No. 8740017 (Cir. Ct. St. Louis Cty., May 21, 1987) 25

Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972) 16, 17

Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965) 16, 17, 42, 50

In re Pescinski, 67 Wis.2d 4, 226 N.W.2d 180 (1975) 27

Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977) 58

	Page
McFall v. Shimp, 10 Pa. D.&C.3d 90 (Allegheny Cty. 1978)	26, 27
Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923)	17
Moore v. East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494 (1977)	17
Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928)	17
Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925)	17
Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976)	25, 52
Reproductive Health Services v. Webster, 851 F.2d 1071 (8th Cir. 1988)	22, 31
Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165 (1952)	28
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)	passim
Safley v. Turner, 482 U.S. 78 (1987)	58
Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757 (1966)	28
Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians & Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986)	passim

	Page
West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)	49
Whalen v. Roe, 429 U.S. 589 (1977)	17
Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. 753 (1985)	28
STATUTORY AND CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS
U.S. Const. amend. I	42
U.S. Const. amend. III	42
U.S. Const. amend. IV	42
U.S. Const. amend. V	42
U.S. Const. amend. IX	42
U.S. Const. amend. XIV	42
Mo. Rev. Stat. § 1.205.1(1) (1986)	passim
Mo. Rev. Stat. § 1.205.1(2) (1986)	passim
Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.205 (1986)	passim
Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.210 (1986)	passim
Mo. Rev. Stat. § 188.215 (1986)	passim

Page

OTHER AUTHORITIES

Adashi, "The Morning After: novel hormonal approaches to postcoital interception," 39 Fertil. & Steril. 267-69 (1983) 33

Alvarez, et al., "New insights on the mode of action of intrauterine contraceptive devices in women," 49 Fertil. & Steril. 768 (1988) 34

American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, Department of Professional Liability, Alert: Professional Liability Implications of AFP Tests (May 1985) 59

Brief Amicus Curiae of American Medical Ass'n, et al. 23, 45

Brief Amicus Curiae of the American Public Health Ass'n et al. 10

Brief Amicus Curiae of Birthright in Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, Inc., No. 88-605 37

Brief Amicus Curiae of Center for Population Options, et al. 8

Page

Brody, "The Meaning of Informed Consent," Michigan Medicine 557 (Nov. 1984) 52

Cates, "Abortion Myths and Realities: Who is Misleading Whom," 142 Am. J. Obstet. & Gynec. 954 (1982) 10

Cates, "Legal Abortion: The Public Health Record," 215 Sci. 1586 (1982) 9

Current Opinions of the Council of Ethical and Judicial Affairs of the American Medical Association par. 807 54

Declaration of Helsinki 54

Dorland's Illustrated Medical Dictionary at 296 (26th ed. 1985) 32

Forrest, "The Delivery of Family Planning Services in the United States," 20 Fam. Plan. Persp. 88 (March/April 1988) 48

Forrest, et al., "U.S. Women's Contraceptive Attitudes and Practices: How Have They Changed in the 1980s?" 20 Fam. Plan. Persp. 112 (May/June 1988) 5

	Page
Gentile and Schwarz, "Elective Abortion: Techniques, Risks, and Complications," in Genetic Disorders and the Fetus: Diagnosis, Prevention and Treatment (Milunsky ed. 1986)	60
Glass, "Egg Transport and Fertilization," in Gynecology and Obstetrics, Sciarra, ed. Vol. 5, Ch. 46 (rev. ed. 1985)	31
Hatcher, et al., Conceptive Technology (1988-89 ed.)	passim
Henshaw, et al., "Abortion Services in the United States, 1984 and 1985," 19 Fam. Plan. Persp. 63 (March/April 1987)	62
Hutchings, et al., "The IUD After 20 years: A Review," 17 Fam. Plan. Persp. 244 (Nov/Dec. 1985)	35
Institute of Medicine, Committee to Study the Prevention of Low Birthweight, Preventing Low Birthweight (National Academy Press 1985)	14

	Page
Jones, et al., "Unintended Pregnancy: Contraceptive Practice and Family Planning Services in Developed Countries," 20 Fam. Plan. Persp. 53, 54 (Mar./Apr. 1988)	12
Koonin, et al., "Pregnancy-Associated Deaths due to AIDS in the United States," 261 JAMA 1306 (Mar. 3, 1988)	12, 61
Maine, Family Planning: Its Impact on the Health of Women and Children (Center for Population and Family Health, College of Physicians and Surgeons, Columbia University 1981)	13
Making Health Care Decisions: The Ethical and Legal Implications of Informed Consent in the Patient Practitioner Relationship (1982)	52, 53
Menken, "The Health and Demographic Consequences of Adolescent Pregnancy and Childbearing," in C. Chilman, ed., Adolescent Pregnancy and Childbearing: Findings From Research, 169 (1980)	8
"Miferistone--Contragestive Agent or Medical Abortifacient?" The Lancet 1308 (1987)	38

Page

Milby, "The New Biology and the Question of Personhood: Implications for Abortion," 9 Amer. J. Law & Med. 31 (1983) 32

Milunsky, "Genetic Counseling -- Prelude to Prenatal Diagnosis," in Genetic Disorders and the Fetus, Diagnosis, Prevention and Treatment 3 (Milunsky, ed. 1986) 11, 59, 60

Mosher, "Fertility and Family Planning in the United States: Insights from the National Survey of Family Growth," 20 Fam. Plan. Persp. 212 (Sept./Oct. 1988) 11

National Academy of Sciences, Risking The Future: Adolescent Sexuality, Pregnancy, and Childbearing, Vol.1, C. Hayes, ed. (1987) 8

Nieman, et al., "The Progesterone Antagonist RU 486: A Potential New Contraceptive Agent," 316 N. Eng. J. Med. 187 (1987) . . . 38

Page

Ory, et al., Making Choices: Evaluating the Health Risks and Benefits of Birth Control Methods (Alan Guttmacher Institute 1983) 4, 5, 36, 57

Potts, "Birth Control Methods in the United States," 20 Family Planning Perspectives 288 (Nov./Dec. 1988) 37

"Post Coital Contraception," The Lancet 856 (Apr. 16, 1983) 32

"Pregnancy Prophylaxis: Parenteral Postcoital Estrogen, 67 Obstet. & Gynecol. 331-33 (1986) 33

Pritchard, MacDonald & Gant, Williams Obstetrics (17th ed. 1985) . . . . . passim

Rochat, et al., "Maternal Mortality in the United States: Report from the Maternal Mortality Collective," 72 Obstet. & Gynec. 91 (1988) 9

Rosenberg & Rosenthal, "Reproductive Mortality in the United: Recent Trends and Methodologic Considerations," 77 Am. J. Pub. Health 833 (1987) 13

Page

Shaw, "Medicolegal Aspects of Prenatal Diagnosis," in Genetic Disorders and the Fetus: Diagnosis, Prevention and Treatment at 799 (Milunsky ed. 1986) 59

U.S. Dept. of HHS, "IUDS: Guidelines For Informed Decision-making And Use" (1987) 35

NO. 88-605

IN THE
SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES
OCTOBER TERM, 1988

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER, et al.,
Appellants,

vs.

REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, et al.
Appellees,

On Appeal from the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit

---

BRIEF AMICI CURIAE OF THE ASSOCIATION OF REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH PROFESSIONALS, et al., IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEES

INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE

Amici[1] are concerned about women's reproductive health care for the following reasons: they provide or supervise reproductive medical care; they teach in medical schools; they provide information and counseling about reproductive health care matters and sexuality; or they provide genetic counseling. Amici submit this brief on behalf of appellees after securing the consent of appellant and appellees.

---

[1] Amici include the Association of Reproductive Health Professionals, the National Association of Nurse Practitioners in Reproductive Health, the Naticnal Society of Genetic Counselors, the Association of Sex Educators and Therapists, the Sex Information and Education Council of the United States, the Ferre Institute, Inc., the Cedar Rapids Clinic for Women, the Fox Valley Reproductive Health Care Center, Inc., six deans of medical schools, 37 chairpersons of medical school departments of obstetrics and gynecology, and 64 other physicians and individuals. A more complete description of amici is set forth in Appendix A, as are the letters from counsel for appellant and appellees consenting to the filing of this brief, set forth in Appendix B.

The sound practice of reproductive health care requires the ready availability of a full range of modern medical services, including contraceptives, genetic screening, counseling, and safe and legal abortion. Amici's professional experience is that obstructing or delaying the availability of abortion will severely impair medical practice and inevitably will result in serious injury or death to many women and their children.

Reproductive health care providers,[2] like their colleagues in other fields of

---

[2] These professionals include physicians, surgeons, researchers, medical school teachers and administrators, nurses, nurse practitioners, and counselors. The term "physicians" is used where only physicians are licensed to perform a particular service, such as an abortion.

medicine, have legal and professional obligations to inform each patient of risks and benefits of all relevant treatment alternatives. Amici's professional obligations are shaped by each woman's right to be fully informed on these issues and to receive professional advice regarding her highly personal decisions about pregnancy and childbearing. Health professionals thus necessarily require the freedom to communicate medically pertinent information about health care options without state restrictions and without unworkable distinctions between "counseling" and "advising."

The Missouri statute imposes unconstitutional burdens upon the provision and receipt of essential health care. Restricting the rights long protected by this Court's privacy decisions, including Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), and its progeny -- as urged by the State and the Solicitor General of the United States -- would eviscerate the essential health gains achieved in all areas of modern reproductive medicine.

BACKGROUND STATEMENT

Amici include the primary health care providers of many of the 55 million women of reproductive age in the United States.[3] Each of these women has unique needs and medical conditions which influence her decisions about whether and when to become pregnant or to use contraception and which contraceptive method to use.

---

[3] Ory, M.D., et al., Making Choices: Evaluating the Health Risks and Benefits of Birth Control Methods 10 (Alan Guttmacher Institute 1983) ("Making Choices").

Legal and medical standards demand that physicians and other professionals offer a wide range of appropriate birth control alternatives to the approximately 36 million women who wish to prevent accidental pregnancy. Although more than 92 per cent of sexually active women use some contraceptive method,[4] even the most efficacious contraceptives are imperfect. Consequently, more than three million women in the United States face an unintended pregnancy every year.[5] [4] Forrest, et al., "U.S. Women's Contraceptive Attitudes and Practice: How Have They Changed in the 1980s?" 20 Fam. Plan. Persp. 112, 116 (May/June 1988).

---

[5] Making Choices at 10. For example, it is estimated that every year several thousand women using oral contraceptives nonetheless become pregnant. Oral contraceptives are the most effective reversible contraceptive method available today, with a typical expected failure rate of 3 per cent. Hatcher, et al., Conceptive Technology 151 (1988-89 ed.). Barrier methods of contraception, such as the diaphragm and

The most effective reversible contraceptive, the "pill," poses potentially serious medical risks for many women,[6] who often choose less reliable, albeit less health threatening, forms of birth control In turn, they have a heightened medical interest in abortion when contraceptives have failed.

The line between contraception and abortion drawn by the Missouri statute is not consistent with modern contraceptive technology and medical practice. Many forms of birth control operate, in whole or in part, to prevent implantation of a fertilized ovum -- which the State defines as protectable life (§§ 1.205.1(1) and 1.205.1(2)) -- into the condom, have typical failure rates of 18 and 12 per cent, respectively. Id. The intrauterine device ("IUD") has a typical failure rate of 6 per cent. Id.

---

6 See Contraceptive Technology at 194, 208-27.

uterine wall. The Missouri statute places under a legal cloud these recognized methods of contraception that are medically preferred for many women, including rape victims. Restricting these methods inevitably will result in higher incidences of morbidity and death.

Health professionals often cannot predict when abortion is absolutely "necessary" to save a pregnant woman's life, as is required by the Missouri statute before the Court (§§ 188.205, 188.210, and 188.215). Nonetheless, they can identify individual women with heightened risks of morbidity or mortality should their pregnancies be continued.

Among those facing the greatest medical risks are the 1.1 million teenagers who become pregnant each year, especially those younger than age 15.

They suffer high incidences of toxemia, anemia, miscarriage, premature labor, and prolonged labor and maternal death. Teenagers also suffer high incidences of premature and low birth weight deliveries, which in turn are leading causes of infant illness and death.[7]

Similarly, women with such medical conditions as coronary artery disease, diabetes, and hypertension -- all of which are common in women of advanced maternal age -- often face substantial risks to their health and lives by

---

[7] See Menken, "The Health and Demographic Consequences of Adolescent Pregnancy and Childbearing," in C. Chilman, ed., Adolescent Pregnancy and Childbearing: Findings From Research, 169, 187 (1980). See also National Academy of Sciences, Risking The Future: Adolescent Sexuality, Pregnancy, and Childbearing, Vol. 1, C. Hayes, ed., 73 (1987). Nearly 40 per cent of teenage pregnancies are terminated by an induced abortion. Id. at 58. See also Brief Amicus Curiae of Center for Population Options, et al., detailing the particular medical hazards posed by teen pregnancy.

continuing a pregnancy.[8] Mentally retarded women unable to understand how they became pregnant also often face elevated health risks. Even for normally healthy women, the risks of morbidity and mortality are elevated if the pregnancy was unintended and the woman is forced to carry the pregnancy to term against her will[9] or to resort in despair to illegal abortion[10] or suicide. In fact, obtaining an abortion always presents lower risks of death and health problems

---

[8] See Rochat, et al., "Maternal Mortality in the United States: Report from the Maternal Mortality Collective," 72 Obstet. & Gynec. 91, 93 (1988).

[9] See Cates, "Legal Abortion: The Public Health Record," 215 Sci. 1586 (1982).

[10] Pritchard, MacDonald & Gant, Williams Obstetrics 484 (17th ed. 1985) ("Williams Obstetrics") (detailing risks of severe hemorrhage, sepsis, bacterial shock, and acute renal failure associated frequently with illegal abortion).

for the woman than does continuing the pregnancy to term.[11]

Conversely, for the millions of women who want to conceive and bear a child, the reproductive health professional must offer genetic counseling, testing, and diagnosis. Even using these advanced techniques, the professional can merely predict risks before conception. Only several weeks after conception has occurred can the professional determine whether the pregnancy is doomed to produce a child suffering from a lethal or painfully disabling genetic condition.[12] Prenatal

---

[11] Cates, "Abortion Myths and Realities: Who is Misleading Whom," 142 Am. J. Obstet. & Gynec. 954-56 (1982). The Brief Amicus Curiae of the American Public Health Association, et al., details the enhanced morbidity and mortality of childbirth over abortion.

[12] Because of educational and career opportunities, many women start having children at a much older age than diagnosis also is essential for women who have been exposed to potentially teratogenic substances that cause fetal defects or mutations, such as women on anti-seizure medications or certain cancer therapies.[13]

Some medical difficulties also arise or may be detected only after conception. These include problems caused by the did their mothers. Mosher, "Fertility and Family Planning in the United States: Insights from the National Survey of Family Growth," 20 Fam. Plan. Persp. 207, 212 (Sept./Oct. 1988). Advanced maternal age is accompanied by a greater risk of certain genetic conditions (i.e., Down's Syndrome). See Milunsky, "Genetic Counseling: Prelude to Prenatal Diagnosis," in Genetic Disorders and the Fetus, Diagnosis, Prevention and Treatment 4 (Milunsky, ed. 1986) ("Genetic Disorders and the Fetus"). Thus, many women are in greater need of genetic counseling, and the alternative of abortion for genetic indications, than ever before.

---

[13] See Milunsky, supra n.12, at 4, 20-21. (Women on anti-convulsant medication have two to three times the risk of having a child with a major congenital problem.)

pregnancy itself, such as toxemia or pre-eclampsia -- which may elevate the woman's risk of death or injury if the pregnancy continues -- to diseases such as HIV infection (AIDS), which threatens the life of the woman and any child she may have.[14]

Advances in reproductive medicine, including access to safe, legal abortion services, have produced unquestioned health benefits for women. Contraceptive use has helped women time their childbearing and attain their desired family size.[15] Consequently, the decline

---

[14] See Williams Obstetrics at 527-33; Koonin, et al., "Pregnancy-Associated Deaths due to AIDS in the United States," 261 JAMA 1306 (Mar. 3, 1989).

[15] The total fertility rate in the United States averages 1.8 births per woman. Jones, et al., "Unintended Pregnancy: Contraceptive Practice and Family Planning Services in Developed Countries," 20 Fam. Plan. Persp. 53, 54 (Mar./Apr. 1988). By contrast, if a woman lacked access to a contraceptive in the number of pregnancies and live births per woman, along with better medical care, has helped maternal mortality rates to plummet.[16]

Family planning also helps children. Effective contraceptive use has helped produce a decrease in low birth weight deliveries -- a great cause of infant mortality and morbidity -- by allowing women to increase the intervals between births and by reducing the number of births to women with a variety of high method, she could bear up to 16 children during the approximately 35 years during which she is fertile. See Contraceptive Technology at 134-37 (number of fertile years (35) divided by average birth interval of 2.25 years).

---

[16] See Rosenberg & Rosenthal, "Reproductive Mortality in the United: Recent Trends and Methodologic Considerations," 77 Am. J. Pub. Health 833, 833-36 (1987). See also Maine, Family Planning: Its Impact on the Health of Women and Children (Center for Population and Family Health, College of Physicians and Surgeons, Columbia University 1981).

risk characteristics, such as extreme youth or age, hypertension, and severe heart and kidney disease.[17]

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

The Missouri statute, by vesting a fetus with legal rights and by restricting abortion services, unquestionably undermines sound medical practice. Presently, the ability of physicians and other reproductive health professionals to individualize their counsel and care entails balancing the many medical, genetic, and emotional factors involved in each woman's pregnancy. If the professional's legal obligations were expanded to mandate absolute protection of the fetus, the health care provider would be forced to

---

17 See Institute of Medicine, Committee to Study the Prevention of Low Birthweight, Preventing Low Birthweight 17-20 (National Academy Press 1985).

trade off the life and health of the woman -- a demand inconsistent with the Constitution, medical practice, and professional ethics. Similarly, if the health professional is restricted, out of concern for the fetus, from freely providing information about abortion and from offering it as a medical option -- as the Missouri statute also dictates -- the very core of reproductive health care will be eroded at great cost to the medical rights and lives of women.

ARGUMENT

This Court has "'stressed repeatedly the central role of the physician . . . in consulting with the woman'" about medical decisions involving abortion and contraception. City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416, 447 (1983) (quoting Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379, 387 (1979)). The physician-patient relationship receives constitutional protection because central to any concept of ordered liberty is the right of individuals to make informed decisions about "whether to bear or beget a child." Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438, 453 (1972). See also Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965).

The teaching of Griswold and its progeny "is that the Constitution protects individual decisions in matters of childbearing," Carey v. Population Services International, 431 U.S. 678, 687 (1977) (White, J., concurring in pertinent part and concurring in result), because "such decisions are none of the government's business." Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians & Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747, 792 n.2

(White, J., dissenting).[18] The fundamental liberty interest protected by the Constitution includes not only the right to use contraceptives, but also the right to have an abortion. Thornburgh,

---

[18] One of the most valued of our liberties is the "right to be let alone -- the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men." Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438, 478 (1928) (Brandeis, J., dissenting). Thus, this Court consistently has adhered to the principle that:

> the Constitution embodies a promise that a certain private sphere of individual liberty will be kept largely beyond the reach of government. See, e.g., Carey Population Services Intern'l, 431 U.S. 678 (1977); Moore v. East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494 (1977); Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972); Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965); Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925); Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923). See also Whalen v. Roe, 429 U.S. 589 (1977). That promise extends to women as well as to men.

Thornburgh, 476 U.S. at 772.

476 U.S. at 776 (Stevens, J., concurring).

Because this right is fundamental, this Court long has recognized that the appropriate test to judge the constitutionality of state restrictions on abortion and contraception is the strict scrutiny test. An individual's right to make such decisions may not be infringed absent a compelling state interest, and even then, only by a statute narrowly tailored to meet that compelling interest:

> Few decisions are more personal and intimate, more properly private, or more basic to individual dignity and autonomy, than a woman's decision -- with the guidance of her physician and within the limits specified in Roe -- whether to end her pregnancy. A woman's right to make that choice freely is fundamental. Any other result, in our view, would protect inadequately a central part of the sphere of liberty that our law guarantees equally to all.

Thornburgh, 476 U.S. at 772.

The Missouri law disrupts the important relationship between the woman and the medical professional upon whose advice and assistance she relies in making decisions about childbearing, contraception, and abortion. By defining the conceptus as human life, by restricting abortion services based on the State's "value judgment" favoring potential life over the health of the pregnant woman, and by limiting the information, advice, and care medical professionals can provide their patients, the Missouri law unconstitutionally burdens a woman's fundamental right to make these intimate decisions.

I. THE "PREFATORY" PROVISIONS IN THE MISSOURI LAW SUBSTANTIALLY INFRINGE UPON THE CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT OF WOMEN TO RECEIVE, AND OF HEALTH PROFESSIONALS TO PROVIDE, FULL REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH CARE.

Sections 1.205.1(1) and (2), declaring that "the life of each human being begins at conception" and that "unborn children have protectable interests in life, health and well-being," plainly contravene this Court's holding that a state may not "by adopting one theory of life . . . override the rights of the pregnant woman that are at stake." Roe, 410 U.S. at 162.[19] The State directly "overrides" the rights of the woman and impairs the health professional's legal and ethical obligations to provide her with a full range of medical advice and care when it adopts a definition of life that is not and cannot be medically established.

[19] This principle, first laid down in Roe, was reaffirmed in Akron, 462 U.S. 416, and again in Thornburgh, 476 U.S. 747.

A. By Bestowing Legal Rights On The Fetus, Missouri Unconstitutionally Requires Health Care Providers To Sublimate The Woman's Right To Continued Life And Health.

The State claims that neither subsection 1.205.1(1) nor 1.205.1(2) "does anything substantive" (St. Br. at 30).[20] That claim is belied by the State's later proclamation that these provisions represent "'a value judgment favoring childbirth over abortion'" (St. Br. at 30 (citation omitted)), and by its further assertion that these "nonsubstantive" provisions advance its value judgment by bestowing "rights on unborn children . . . in nonabortion situations" (St. Br. at 10), involving "tort, criminal and property law." Reproductive Health Services v. Webster, 851 F.2d 1071, 1076-77 (8th Cir. 1988) (rejecting the State's argument that §§ 1.205.1(1) and (2) have no substantive impact).

[20] The brief of Appellant, the Attorney General of the State of Missouri, is cited as "St. Br." The brief of the Solicitor General of the United States is cited as "S.G. Br."

It is precisely these intended substantive effects that unconstitutionally burden the health care provider and the primary patient, the woman. As the Solicitor General freely admits, "the declaration that human life begins at conception" places "a burden of uncertain scope on the performance of abortions by supplying a general principle that would fill in whatever interstices may be present in existing abortion precedents." (S.G. Br. at 8 & n.5.) These statutory sections, however, deter not only the performance of abortions, but also a broad range of reproductive care by unconstitutionally requiring a health professional to shift the principal focus of care from protecting the life and health of the woman to protecting the fetus.

The State itself concedes that these "prefatory" provisions govern the operative sections of the abortion law. (St. Br. at 10.) The State's preference for potential life thus explains the requirement under § 188.029 that a physician administer a battery of tests to a pregnant woman, thereby delaying the abortion and increasing the risk to the woman's own life and health in a futile attempt to preserve the non-viable fetus.[21] Likewise, the statutorily-

---

[21] As set forth explicitly in the Brief Amicus Curiae filed by the American Medical Association, et al., the tests demanded by § 188.029 are futile at 20 weeks, a point at which the fetus has mandated preference for the fetus bars a health professional, operating under the dictates of the funding provisions of § 188.205, from recommending, or under §§ 188.210 and 188.215, from providing or participating in abortions indicated for health reasons, but not strictly "necessary" to preserve the life of the woman.

These statutory sections also distort the delivery of essential medical services to a pregnant woman who has exercised her fundamental right to carry the pregnancy to term. By mandating that the fetus be regarded as a person from "the moment of conception," the State forces reproductive health providers into a professionally unpalatable "straightjacket." Compare Akron, 462 virtually no chance of survival, and further increase the medical risks to the woman.

---

U.S. at 445; Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52, 67 n.8 (1976). For example, a physician may well be obligated to direct that the woman undergo a cesarean section to protect the fetus, despite the competing demands of the woman's own health, and even over her objections. See Deaconess Hospital v. Ilester McRoberts, No. 87 4-00172 (Cir. Ct. St. Louis Cty., May 21, 1987) (citing §§ 1.205.1(1) and (2), judge ordered woman to submit to cesarean section to protect fetus).

By turning on its head the health care provider's obligation to protect in the first instance the health and life of the woman, the State requires a "trade-off" between the woman's health and "additional percentage points of fetal survival." Thornburgh, 476 U.S. at 768-

69, quoting Colautti, 439 U.S. at 400. It is precisely such a medically unworkable "trade-off" that the Constitution forbids. Id.

Indeed, the notion that one person may be required to "trade off" her health to save the life or health of another live-born person -- even a close relative -- is unprecedented in our jurisprudence. For example, in McFall v. Shimp, 10 Pa. D.&C.3d 90 (Allegheny Cty. 1978), the court refused to order a person to donate bone marrow necessary to save the life of his cousin. The court ruled that "one human being is under no legal compulsion to give aid or to take action to save another human being. . .."

Forcing medical procedures upon an unwilling person, even for the laudable purpose of helping another, is the antithesis of our most abiding principles and would have dire consequences, the judge warned. Indeed:

> [f]or a society which respects the rights of one individual, to sink its teeth into the jugular vein or neck of one of its members and suck from it sustenance for another member, is revolting to our hard-wrought concepts of jurisprudence. Forcible extraction of living body tissue causes revulsion to the judicial mind. Such would raise the spectre of the swastika and the Inquisition, reminiscent of the horrors this portends.

Id. at 91-92 (emphasis in original). See also In re Pescinski, 67 Wis.2d 4, 226 N.W.2d 180, 182 (1975) (court rejected attempt to force an incompetent man to donate a kidney to his sister, "where the dire need of the transfer [was] established" because of "the absence of real consent" and because there was not a demonstrated benefit to the brother).

Consistent with the constitutional and common law protection afforded the inviolability of an individual person, this Court has held unconstitutional state mandated instances of bodily intrusion even upon the person of one who the state believes may have committed a crime. Compelling a person to submit to forced medical procedures would violate an individual's "right to be secure in his person guaranteed by the Fourth Amendment." Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. 753, 755 (1985) (unconstitutional to surgically remove bullet from a suspect's body against his will for use as evidence).[22]

---

[22] See also Rochin v. People of California, 342 U.S. 165, 172 (1952) (the forcible pumping of a criminal suspect's stomach was "conduct that shocks the conscience" and violative of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment due process rights); compare Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757, 772 (1966) (although the state may, in narrow, limited circumstances, compel an individual to take a blood test, that holding "in no way indicates that [the Constitution] permits more substantial intrusions, or intrusions under other conditions").

Surely, the rights of a pregnant woman should not be subordinate to those of every other member of society; conversely, the rights of the fetus should not be superior to the rights of a live-born person. If a person may not be compelled to sacrifice his or her own life or health for that of another human being, then, a fortiori, the State may not compel such a sacrifice for the benefit of a fetus, which is not a "person" at any stage of development. Roe, 410 U.S. at 157-58 & n.54.

Sections 1.205.1(1) and (2), alone and coupled with other substantive provisions of Missouri law, give rise to the potential for criminal prosecution or tort suits on behalf of the fetus. The reproductive health care provider thus disregards at his or her own peril the State's proclamation that life begins at conception. A more chilling rule under which to practice medicine scarcely can be imagined.

B. By Incorrectly Defining The Beginning Of Life, The State Unconstitutionally Restricts The Ability Of Health Professionals To Administer Contraceptives And Other Reproductive Health Services To Women.

The State defines life as beginning at conception and, in turn, attempts to define conception as "the fertilization of the ovum of a female by a sperm of a male." § 188.015(3). Here, as in the courts below, the State contends that "one cannot dispute the established biological fact that the life of an individual human being . . . begins at conception." (St. Br. at 26 (emphasis omitted).)[23] But that conclusion is precisely what this Court eloquently rejected in Roe, 410 U.S. at 159-60, and what is forcefully disputed today by recognized medical authority.

Conception is not a single stage or one-step process. Fertilization of the ovum itself consists of a series of separate, interdependent steps before the first cell division.[24] According to standard medical authorities, conception is not synonymous with fertilization of the ovum. Rather, conception --

---

[23] In the Court of Appeals, the state went one additional step, contending: "The United States Supreme Court misspoke when it declared that the question of when life begins could not be resolved." 851 F.2d at 1076 n.7. The Court of Appeals properly replied, "we see no merit in addressing this contention." Id.

[24] Glass, "Egg Transport and Fertilization", in Gynecology and Obstetrics, Sciarra, ed., Vol. 5, Ch. 46 at 1-3 (rev. ed. 1985).

pregnancy -- occurs six to seven days later, when the fertilized egg, now called a blastula or blastocyst, becomes implanted in the uterine wall.[25] Implantation also consists of several steps.

Thus, defining life as beginning at fertilization does not result in a bright line demarcation between contraception, which purportedly is permitted even under the State's view, and abortion, which the State restricts. Faced with the State's definition of when life begins, a reproductive health care provider is left to founder in a sea of legal uncertainty

---

25 Williams Obstetrics at 88-91. See also Dorland's Illustrated Medical Dictionary at 296 (26th ed. 1985); Milby, "The New Biology and the Question of Personhood: Implications for Abortion," 9 Amer. J. Law & Med. 31, 35 (1983).

Conception does not occur each time an ovum is fertilized; only 50 per cent of fertilized ova ultimately become implanted. "Post Coital Contraception," The Lancet (Apr. 16, 1983) 856.

when prescribing well-accepted contraceptives that may prevent implantation of the blastocyst should ovulation and fertilization have occurred.

For example, oral contraceptives, such as estrogen, may deliberately be administered in high doses to prevent implantation if fertilization has occurred, especially in treatment for sexual assault victims. Rape is the classic example in which a physician administers a contraceptive after coitus. Such treatment most likely will prevent implantation.[26]

Used in this manner, post-coital contraceptives spare the woman who has suffered sexual assault the agonizing

---

26 See "Pregnancy Prophylaxis: Parenteral Postcoital Estrogen," 67 Obstet. & Gynecol. 331-33 (1986); Adashi, "The Morning After: novel hormonal approaches to postcoital interception," 39 Fertil. & Steril. 267-69 (1983).

wait until the onset of the next expected menstrual period to learn whether she is pregnant. She thus is relieved of the need to consider whether to undergo a surgical abortion at that point. Yet, prescribing such contraceptives to victims of sexual assault is precisely what the State's definition and protection of the conceptus prohibits.

The IUD, which long has been accepted as a contraceptive, also is threatened by the State's expansive definition of the conceptus as protectable "life." The most likely working mechanism of an IUD is to prevent fertilization.[27] However, an IUD on occasion is thought to prevent implantation,[28] particularly when inserted post-coitally.[29] The Missouri statute, however, would forbid post-coital insertion of the IUD. Thus, victims of sexual assault are also denied use of this effective and often prescribed contraceptive method.

---

[27] Alvarez, et al., "New insights on the mode of action of intrauterine contraceptive devices in women," 49 Fertil. & Steril. 768 (1988).

Indeed, the Missouri law may threaten these and other medically accepted contraceptive methods by inhibiting physicians from prescribing them at all. Many women now regularly use combined oral contraceptives, which have lower levels of estrogen, because of the perceived health risks of the older,

---

[28] Hutchings, et al., "The IUD After 20 years: A Review," 17 Fam. Plan. Persp. 244,245 (Nov/Dec. 1985). See also U.S. Dept. of HHS, "IUDS: Guidelines For Informed Decision-Making And Use" (1987).

[29] Contraceptive Technology at 377.

higher estrogen dose pills.[30] The lower dose oral contraceptives, however, do not suppress ovulation as effectively as the high estrogen oral contraceptives. Nonetheless, the newer combined oral contraceptives frustrate conception in other ways, including affecting the transportation of the fertilized ovum through the fallopian tubes, so as to decrease the likelihood of implantation.[31]

These "prefatory" sections also will restrict research on the development of new contraceptive methods which are thought to inhibit implantation.[32] For

---

30 See Contraceptive Technology at 208, 212-15.

31 Making Choices at 5; Contraceptive Technology at 252-53.

32 Restricting access to certain contraceptives appears to be the goal of many of the opponents of legal abortion. See Williams Obstetrics at 478 (opponents of abortion frequently oppose "the example, the most significant new development in post-coital contraceptive technology, RU 486, is considered to have great potential precisely because it can act during the indeterminate period between contraception and abortion. This drug will induce menses in women who are not pregnant and also will block the working action of progesterone -- the hormone which supports implantation of dissemination and application of effective contraceptive techniques"); see also Brief Amicus Curiae of Birthright on behalf of Appellants herein, at 12 ("[E]veryone recognizes that abortion is basically the final step of contraception.").

---

Restrictive contraceptive laws in the past have had a severe impact on reproductive health care. The two American scientists who developed the first oral contraceptives were barred by state law from performing their clinical trials in the state in which they practiced. They were forced instead to conduct such trials in Puerto Rico. Potts, "Birth Control Methods In the United States," 20 Fam. Plan. Persp. 288, 289 (Nov./Dec. 1988).

the fertilized ovum -- thus preventing pregnancy when implantation has already occurred.[33]

Finally, by defining the fertilized ovum as a person with legal rights, the State inhibits the development of in vitro fertilization -- research that advances the State's enunciated goal of fostering childbirth. In vitro fertilization often produces an excess of fertilized ova that are not reinserted in [33] Contraceptive Technology at 393; Nieman, et al., "The Progesterone Antagonist RU 486: A Potential New Contraceptive Agent," 316 N. Eng. J. Med. 187 (1987). Recently, RU 486 has been used in France to induce chemical abortions early in pregnancy. It should be noted that RU 486 is a fertility control agent but has the potential for being used in a manner which is not reasonably categorized as either contraception or abortion. Some medical authorities in fact refer to RU 486 as a "contragestive" agent, which indicates the difficulty of describing its working mechanisms with the pre-existing vocabulary. See "Miferistone--Contragestive Agent or Medical Abortifacient?" The Lancet 1308 (1987).

---

the woman and that may be discarded subsequently. Fearing prosecution for destruction of fertilized ova, physicians may decline to develop such new reproductive techniques.

By wrongly defining life as beginning at fertilization, the State thus interferes with the constitutional rights of millions of women who must use contraceptive methods that can act after fertilization; it impedes reproductive health professionals by subjecting them to possible criminal and tort law sanctions; and it blocks advances in reproductive medicine that not only often render surgical abortion unnecessary, but also promote the State's interest in healthy, live-born children.

C. The Natural Continuum Of This Court's Privacy Cases From Contraception To Abortion Requires That The Same Constitutional Standard Be Used To Evaluate Proposed Restrictions On Each.

Unquestionably, the aspect of privacy and due process "liberty" at issue in the cases culminating in Roe is "the freedom from unwarranted governmental intrusion into individual decisions in matters of childbearing." Thornburgh, 476 U.S. at 775 (Stevens, J., concurring). Because there is no principled distinction separating the liberty to use contraceptives to avoid childbearing from the liberty to have an abortion, the proposal by the State and the Solicitor General to evaluate state abortion laws under a less rigorous -- or perhaps non-existent -- standard of review, also must fail. See Thornburgh,

476 U.S. at 772-79 (Stevens, J. concurring).[34]

Just as there is no bright physiological line separating contraception from abortion, there is no legal principle by which to segregate the long continuum of cases protecting the individual's right to make decisions about family, marriage, and childbearing. The distinction that the State and the Solicitor General attempts to draw between cases recognizing a constitutional right of privacy protecting the use of contraceptives and cases protecting a constitutional privacy right to an abortion simply does not

---

34 ". . . I fail to see how a decision on childbearing becomes less important the day after conception than the day before. Indeed, if one decision is more 'fundamental' to the individual's freedom than the other, surely it is the post-conception decision that is the more serious." Id. at 776.

exist. (St. Br. at 18-20; S.G. Br. at 11-14.)

As this Court recognized in Griswold, the right to privacy inherent in the right to use contraceptives stems from several constitutional provisions embodied in the First, Third, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments. Griswold, 381 U.S. at 484-85. Any attempt to place this Court's historical cases from which emanated the right of privacy into simplistic legal pigeonholes and to limit the scope of those cases only to a single constitutional provision (S.G. Br. at 11-13) fails to appreciate the complexity of the constitutional concept of privacy. See Griswold, 381 U.S. at 481-84; Akron, 462 U.S. at 426-27 (rejecting attempt to classify privacy cases).

Similarly, any attempt to distinguish these privacy cases based on the "potentiality" of the life of the fetus also must fail. Although perhaps "potential life is no less potential in the first weeks of pregnancy than it is at viability or afterward." Akron, 462 U.S. at 461 (O'Connor, J., dissenting), for that matter, life is no less "potential" at the point at which a man and a woman engage in sexual intercourse. Nor is it any less "potential" at the moment of sexual intercourse than at the point of fertilization. As the above discussion demonstrates, protecting all such "potential" life would eviscerate modern contraceptive practice.

It is not the abstract "potential" for life that the Court in Roe recognized as compelling enough to justify narrow restrictions on post-viability abortions.

Rather, it is the probability of a live-born person that Justice Blackmun's viability determination addressed as the point at which the state's interest in the life of the fetus becomes compelling. Roe, 410 U.S. at 162-65.[35] Unlike fertilization, the determination of whether a fetus is viable is one that the woman's physician has long been medically

---

[35] See also Justice Stevens' concurrence in Thornburgh, 476 U.S. at 778:

> I should think it obvious that the state's interest in the protection of an embryo -- even if that interest is defined as "protecting those who will be citizens," ibid. -- increases progressively and dramatically as the organism's capacity to feel pain, to experience pleasure, to survive, and to react to its surroundings increases day by day. The development of a fetus -- and pregnancy itself -- are not static conditions, and the assertion that the government's interest is static simply ignores this reality.

equipped to make. Colautti, 439 U.S. at 388-89.[36]

Neither the rational basis test nor the undue burden test proposed by the State and the Solicitor General achieves in any principled manner their purported goal of protecting potential life. Under the Solicitor General's analysis, "the relevant question would be whether a woman has been afforded a meaningful opportunity to avoid an unwanted pregnancy, taking into account all the available options available to her, including abstinence and contraceptives."

---

[36] Notwithstanding the medical advances of the past 16 years, viability continues to hover at approximately 24 weeks, as this Court recognized in Roe, 410 U.S. at 160. Even at 24 weeks, the mortality rate of extremely low birthweight infants is approximately 90 per cent, as discussed in the Brief Amicus Curiae of the American Medical Association, et al. Thus, viability has not advanced to a point closer to conception.

(S.G. Br. at 22 n.16.) This test allows abortion but only under the limited circumstances the Solicitor General deems permissible, such as rape and incest. It thus protects only that "potential life" which is not a consequence of forced sexual conduct, without any attempt at explaining why that "potential life" is more deserving of protection.

The ostensible intent of the Solicitor General's analysis is to prohibit abortion as a "form of routine family planning." Id. That erroneous characterization -- coupled with a test that imposes upon a woman and medical science the impossible task of achieving perfect contraception -- demonstrates a philosophical bias that is grounded not in fact but simply in the unexpressed notion that a woman should be punished for participating in sexual intercourse.

This Court rejected that notion first in Eisenstadt, 405 U.S. at 448 ("[i]t would be plainly unreasonable to assume that [the State] has prescribed pregnancy and the birth of an unwanted child as punishment for fornication . . ."), and again in Roe, 410 U.S. at 148, and in Carey, 431 U.S. at 694-95.

With more than 92 per cent of sexually-active women using contraceptives, abortion simply is not a "routine form of family planning."[37] And, unfortunately, there is no fail-proof method of contraception. Thus, the Solicitor General's focus upon whether a woman has had a "meaningful opportunity to avoid unwanted pregnancy" imposes upon a woman the use of abstinence, despite the dictates of her conscience and religion and despite the sanctity of marriage. The abstinence that the Solicitor General would impose on all persons thus satisfies his standard only by completely eliminating the need for abortion.

---

[37] See note 4, supra; Williams Obstetrics at 811.

This test is unworkable in practice, given the failure rates of many contraceptive methods and the limited access many women have to contraceptives and to basic reproductive health care.[38] Among the questions left unanswered -- perhaps because they are unanswerable -- under the Solicitor General's approach are: May a woman have an abortion if she more than once has experienced a contraceptive failure? May a woman have an abortion if she once forgets to use a contraceptive, but not if she has forgotten more than once? May she have an abortion if she planned the pregnancy but learns that the fetus has a fatal genetic disorder?

---

38 See Forrest, "The Delivery of Family Planning Services in the United States." 20 Fam. Plan. Persp. 88 (March/April 1988).

Relegating issues that implicate a woman's bodily integrity to the legislative process, as the Solicitor General suggests, is inconsistent with the important role of protecting individual liberty that the framers of the Constitution assigned to this Court. See Thornburgh, 476 U.S. at 781-82 (Stevens, J., concurring) (framers "placed a special premium on the protection of individual liberty" and "recognized that certain values are more important than the will of a transient [legislative] majority"). See also West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943).

Defining the fertilized ovum as a "person" thus not only is contrary to established medical practice but also threatens to restrict the prescription and use of all contraceptive methods. Such restrictions strike at the heart of the fundamental right recognized by all members of this Court who have had occasion to address it. See Griswold, 381 U.S. 617 (1965); Carey, 431 U.S. 678 (1977); Thornburgh 476 U.S. 747, 785 (White, J., dissenting).

II. SECTION 188.205 RESTRICTS NECESSARY COMMUNICATIONS BETWEEN PATIENTS AND HEALTH CARE PROVIDERS AND INFRINGES UPON THE RIGHT OF PATIENTS TO MAKE DECISIONS ABOUT MEDICAL CARE AND CHILDBEARING.

Just as the State's definition of when life begins implicitly impedes the ability of all health professionals to advise women of the full range of constitutionally-protected reproductive health care options, the State explicitly restricts health professionals and their patients when, in § 188.205, it bars the use public funds to "encourag[e] or counsel[] a woman to have an abortion not necessary to save her life." Although the State now contends that § 188.205 prohibits only "affirmative" counseling, while allowing the provision of information (St. Br. at 42-43),[39] § 188.205 would, whatever its interpretation, severely inhibit the health care professional's ability to provide, and the woman's ability to receive, the information and counseling necessary before the woman can make a truly informed decision about such fundamental choices as bearing a child.

---

[39] As noted by Appellee, the new construction of § 188.205, offered for the first time before this Court, was developed by the State only after two lower courts rejected the State's prior construction as plainly unconstitutional.

As both a legal and ethical imperative, the dialogue which must exist between doctor and patient is embodied in the doctrine of informed consent.[40] Informed decisionmaking is neither a stagnant doctrine nor an abstract goal; it is an ongoing process which serves as a touchstone of ethical medical practice. Informed consent promotes the self-

---

40 See Planned Parenthood v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976); Canterbury v. Spence, 464 F.2d 772 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1064 (1972). See also Brody, "The Meaning of Informed Consent," Michigan Medicine 557 (Nov. 1984); Making Health Care Decisions: The Ethical and Legal Implications of Informed Consent in the Patient Practitioner Relationship, (1982) (hereinafter cited as Making Health Care Decisions).

determination of patients, as well as their health.[41]

To help a patient make an informed decision, health care professionals have a legal and professional duty to inform a patient of all relevant health hazards and advantages of each treatment option and to recommend the most appropriate ones. This duty of the professional, and the corresponding right of each woman to obtain such information and advice, is recognized by health care providers in every facet of the biomedical

---

41 Recent studies indicate that informed patients "tend toward greater compliance with certain therapeutic regimens, reduced levels of anxiety, faster recovery from surgery, and enhanced ability to protect their own well-being . . .." Second, patients making informed decisions are likely to better advance their own life plan." Making Health Care Decisions at 69-70.

community.[42] By restricting "affirmative" counseling about the very important option of abortion, the Missouri statute eviscerates the possibility of a truly informed decisionmaking by the patient in need of publicly-funded health care counseling.

The bright line the State of Missouri purports to draw in § 188.205,

---

42 See, e.g., Current Opinions of the Council of Ethical and Judicial Affairs of the American Medical Association ("AMA Opinions") par. 807.

The Declaration of Helsinki, adopted by the World Medical Assembly, succinctly details the elements of informed consent:

a) explanation of proposed treatment;

b) explanation of inherent risks and benefits;

c) alternatives to proposed treatment;

d) adequate time for patient questions; and

e) option to withdraw.

separating abortion counseling from all other reproductive health care counseling, again simply does not exist. Health care providers presently provide patients desiring contraceptive services with a panoply of options, including: periodic abstinence; barrier methods, such as the condom and the diaphragm; the intrauterine device ("IUD"); and oral contraceptives.[43]

Counseling about abortion must occur as an indispensable component of counseling about contraceptives. A reproductive health professional must provide every woman with the information required to perform a detailed calculus that is indispensable to an informed decision. This calculus requires each woman to weigh the desire to avoid

---

43 See Contraceptive Technology at 150-62.

pregnancy, the health risk posed by each method of birth control, and the relative failure rates of each method against the health risk posed by either pregnancy or abortion, and the need to consider whether to carry to term or have an abortion should the contraceptive method actually fail.[44]

For example, women suffering from coronary artery disease, cerebrovascular disorders, benign or malignant liver tumors, or cancer of the breast or reproductive system absolutely should not use oral contraceptives, the most effective reversible method of preventing pregnancy.[45] Many of these medical conditions may also complicate pregnancy and demand that pregnancy be avoided

---

[44] Contraceptive Technology at 150-162, 388-89.

[45] Williams Obstetrics 814-17; Contraceptive Technology at 209-10.

altogether.[46] In these situations, a physician may well recommend that the woman use a barrier method of contraception -- with the possibility of an early abortion as a last resort should pregnancy occur -- given the relatively higher failure rate for barrier methods of contraception.[47]

A woman who must avoid both oral contraceptives and pregnancy for health reasons cannot make an informed decision about contraceptive use without being counseled about the option of abortion as a last resort should her method of contraception fail. Yet § 188.205 would restrict such counseling. Thus, by inhibiting the dialogue about abortion that must occur between health care provider and patient, § 188.205

---

[46] See Williams Obstetrics at 477.

[47] See Making Choices at 34.

unconstitutionally interferes with the physician's duty to provide medical care and with the patient's right to make a voluntary, knowledgeable decision in choosing the best contraceptive alternative.

Ironically, in its eagerness to prevent women from having abortions through § 188.205, the State also substantially interferes with counseling those patients who seek to exercise their constitutional right to have a child. See Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464, 474 (1977).[48] For patients at risk of transmitting a genetic condition, reproductive autonomy is enhanced by genetic counseling, a process that

---

[48] That right of choice is often exercised in the context of the marital relationship, the primacy of which long has been recognized and protected by the Court. See Safley v. Turner, 482 U.S. 78 (1987).

communicates the risk of occurrence or recurrence of a genetic disorder within a family.[49]

Prevailing medical standards, as well as the risk of malpractice liability, dictate that genetic screening and counseling be offered patients at risk.[50] These patients, like contraceptive patients, must be advised of the full range of options, including: the availability of prenatal diagnosis of the disease; the effect of the disease on

---

[49] Milunsky, "Genetic Counseling--Prelude to Prenatal Diagnosis," in Genetic Disorders and the Fetus, 3, 4.

[50] See generally Shaw, "Medicolegal Aspects of Prenatal Diagnosis," in Genetic Disorders and the Fetus at 799-817, and cases cited at pp. 815-17. See also American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, Department of Professional Liability, Alert: Professional Liability Implications of AFP Tests (May 1985) ("imperative that every prenatal patient be advised of the availability of [alpha-fetoprotein] tests" to screen for neural tube defects).

the fetus should it be born alive; and the opportunity of terminating the pregnancy.[51]

The reproductive health care provider may be professionally obligated to counsel about abortion as an alternative if the genetic condition is a fatal one, such as Tay-Sachs, and one which would subject the child and the family to a great deal of suffering. The health professional has a similar duty to counsel a pregnant woman with AIDS given the risk of transmitting that fatal

---

51 Milunsky "Genetic Counseling -- A Prelude to Prenatal Diagnosis," in Genetic Disorders and the Fetus at 5. Given the present state of medical knowledge and technology, pregnancy termination is "the predominant preventative approach" for helping patients avoid transmitting a genetic condition. Thus, a discussion of abortion must be included as a part of the prenatal and pre-pregnancy genetic counseling process. Gentile and Schwarz, "Elective Abortion: Techniques, Risks and Complications," in Genetic Disorders and the Fetus at 723.

disease to her offspring and given the increased risk to her health of carrying the pregnancy to term.[52] Yet, a physician or genetic counselor who engages in such counseling with a patient dependent upon public funding for medical care risks violating § 188.205.

Sections 188.210 and 188.215 of the Missouri statute also burden health care providers and their women patients. These provisions explicitly prevent physicians from performing abortions in public hospitals, even when the patient can pay for such an abortion, and even if the physician provides such services as part of a private, non-governmentally funded practice. These provisions, which compound the restrictions imposed by

---

52 Koonin, et al., "Pregnancy-Associated Deaths due to AIDS in the United States," 261 JAMA 1306 (Mar. 3, 1989).

§ 188.205, further prevent all public employees from participating or performing abortions unless the procedure is "necessary to save" the woman's life.

In many communities, physicians maintain both a private practice and staff privileges at the public hospital, which may be the only appropriate facility in which a physician may safely perform an abortion.[53] The health care professional, who must counsel about abortion, which, although indicated for medical reasons, may not be absolutely "necessary" to preserve the life of the 53 See Henshaw, et al., "Abortion Services in the United States, 1984 and 1985," 19 Fam. Plan. Persp. 63, 67 (March/April 1987).

---

As set forth in Appellees' brief, "public facilities" is broadly defined to include even a facility leased by the State to a private physician. See § 188.200(2). Thus, these sections prevent even a privately-funded physician from performing an abortion in his or her private office.

woman, faces an insoluble dilemma: the professional is ethically compelled to suggest a medical alternative that is essentially unavailable to the patient if use of the public hospital is barred or if a publicly employed physician is the only available physician to perform the needed procedure. Especially for patients whose medical condition demands a hospital facility to assure a safe procedure, such as a woman terminating a pregnancy for genetic reasons that present late in the second trimester, the barriers that § 188.210 and § 188.215 erect to the effectuation of a constitutionally protected choice are absolute.

In summary, §§ 188.205, 188.210, and 188.215 trap the reproductive health care provider between the competing obligations of Missouri abortion law and the legal and ethical requirements of all health care professionals. That trap inevitably will prevent health care providers from delivering needed medical care and counseling to patients attempting to exercise their constitutional right of choice.

CONCLUSION

The Missouri statutory scheme is unconstitutional, and the decision of the Court of Appeals should be affirmed.

Respectfully submitted,

Dorothy B. Zimbrakos
Rivkin, Radler,
Dunne & Bayh
30 N. LaSalle Street
Suite 4300
Chicago, IL 60602
(312) 782-5680

Colleen K. Connell
(Counsel of Record)
Roger Baldwin
Fnd'n of ACLU of Illinois
20 East Jackson
Suite 1600
Chicago, IL 60604
(312) 427-7330

Dated: March 30, 1989

Special recognition is given to Mary Mason, Women's Law & Public Policy Fellow, Georgetown University Law Center, for her contributions to this brief.

APPENDIX A

Listing of Amici

Organizational and Institutional Amici

- The Association of Reproductive Health Professionals.
- The Association of Sex Educators and Therapists.
- The National Association of Nurse Practitioners in Reproductive Health.
- The National Society of Genetic Counselors.
- The Sex Information and Education Counsel of the United States (SIECUS).
- The Cedar Rapids Clinic for Women
- The Fox Valley Reproductive Health Care Center, Inc.
- The Ferre Institute, Inc.

Deans of Schools of Medicine

Colin Campbell, M.D.
Laurence Finberg, M.D.
Albert S. Kuperman
Dominick D. Purpura, M.D.
Rudy Schmid, M.D.
Robert Sokol, M.D.

Chairpersons of Medical School Departments of Obstetrics & Gynecology

John N. Blechner, M.D.
Fredrik K. Broekhuizen, M.D.
M. Carlyle Crenshaw, Jr., M.D.

Kenneth C. Edelin, M.D.
Clarence E. Ehrlich, M.D.
Henry W. Foster, Jr., M.D.
Sidney L. Goldfischer, M.D.
John W. Greene, Jr., M.D.
Karen Hein, M.D.
Evan Imber-Black, Ph.D.
D.E. Darnell Jones, M.D.
Raymond H. Kaufman, M.D.
Zeev Koren, M.D.
James A. McGregor, M.D.
Irwin R. Merkatz, M.D.
Daniel R. Mishell, M.D.
Paul Mozley, M.D.
Jennifer R. Niebyl, M.D.
Warren N. Otterson, M.D.
Valeri Parisi, M.D., M.P.H.
William K. Rashbaum
Robert Resnik, M.D.
Daniel Riddick, M.D.
Geraldine St. Onge, M.D.
Richard H. Schwartz, M.D.
John J. Sciarra, M.D.
James R. Scott, M.D.
Donald M. Sherline, M.D.
William N. Spellacy, M.D.
Michael R. Spence, M.D.
Morton A. Stenchever, M.D.
Kathleen E. Ward, M.D.
Lennox S. Westney, M.D.
Sylvia Wassertheil-Smoller, Ph.D.
Gerson Weiss, M.D.
George D. Wilbanks, M.D.
Allan B. Weingold, M.D.

Physicians and Other Health Professionals

Maxine Antell, Ph.D.
Ricardo H. Asch, M.D.
Geraldine M. Berkman
Dr. Barbara K. Birshtein
Nathaniel Bloomfield, M.D.
Olga O. Blumenfeld
Lucy L. Brown, Ph.D.

Joan R. Cates
Hazel Chambers, M.D.
Melva A. Clark, M.D.
Janna C. Collins, M.D.
Robin Panneton Cooper, Ph.D.
Lila G. Croen
Anne Haney Cross, M.D.
Robert Eisenberg, M.D.
Paul Gennis, M.D.
Marion Golluscio
Janet U. Gorkin, M.D.
Lillian Gross, M.D.
John P. Gusdon, Jr., M.D.
Erlio Gurpide
David H. Hall, Ph.D.
Linda M. Hall
Ronnie Halper
E. Jack Harris, M.D.
Rhoda Elison Hirsch, Ph.D.
Ruth B. Hyman
John W. C. Johnson, M.D.
Paul R. Joseph, M.D.
Kenneth R. Jungblut, M.D.
Budimka S. Kajer-Crain, A.S.C.P.
Margaret C. Kielian
Harold P. Klinger, M.D., Ph.D.
Schuyler G. Kohl, M.D., Dr.P.H.
Walter Levine
John K.H. Li, M.D.
Paul Marantz, M.D., M.P.H.
Hershey Marcus, M.D.
Brigid McCue
Solomon L. Moshe, M.D.
Gayle Nybakken, R.N.
Jacques Padawer, Ph.D.
Edith R. Peterson
Fred Pine, Ph.D.
Herbert Pollock, M.D.
Robert F. Porges
Sylvia M. Ramos, M.D.
Isabelle Rapin, M.D.
Daniel Reinharth, M.D.
Charles J. Rolle, M.D.
Stephen Slatin

LaDonne Schulman
Dr. E.R. Stanley
Ruth B.K. Stein, M.D.
Pamela Stanley
Ira Sussman, M.D.
Jonathan N. Tobin, Ph.D.
Rita S. Ulrich, M.S., C.S.W.
Jane Wellemeyer, M.D.
M. Henry Williams, M.D.
J. Robert Willson, M.D.
Herbert G. Winston, M.D.
Joseph Youngerman, M.D.
R. Suzanne Zukin, M.D.

APPENDIX B

ATTORNEY GENERAL OF MISSOURI
JEFFERSON CITY
65102

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER
ATTORNEY GENERAL

P O Box 899
(314) 751-3321

March 27, 1989

Colleen K. Connell
Roger Baldwin Foundation of ACLU, Inc.
20 East Jackson Boulevard, Suite 1600
Chicago, Illinois 60604

Re: William L. Webster, et al., v. Reproductive Health Services, et al., No. 88-605, United States Supreme Court

Dear Ms. Connell:

In response to your request, Attorney General William L. Webster and the State of Missouri consent to your filing an amicus curiae brief on behalf of various individuals and organizations who provide reproductive health care service or who provide information and counseling services, including the Association of Reproductive Health Professionals, National Association of Nurse Practitioners in Reproductive Health, National Society of Genetic Counselors, the Association of Sex Educators and Therapists, the Sex Information Council of the United States, the Ferre Institute, Fox Valley Reproductive Health Care Center, Inc., Cedar Rapids Clinic for Women, et al., in support of appellees.

Very truly yours,

WILLIAM L. WEBSTER
Attorney General

MICHAEL L. BOICOURT
Assistant Attorney General

JERRY L. SHORT
Assistant Attorney General

JLS:j

Planned Parenthood®
Federation of America, Inc.

March 24, 1989

Colleen K. Connell
The Roger Baldwin Foundation of ACLU, Inc.
Suite 1600
20 East Jackson Blvd.
Chicago, IL 60604

Re: Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 88-605

Dear Ms. Connell:

Appellees hereby consent pursuant to Rule 36.3 to the filing of an amicus curiae brief on behalf of the Association of Reproductive Health Professionals, National Association of Nurse Practitioners in Reproductive Health, National Society of Genetic Counselors, the Association of Sex Educators and Therapists, the Sex Information Council of the United States, the Ferre Institute, Fox Valley Reproductive Health Care Center, Inc., Cedar Rapids Clinic for Women, and numerous obstetricians and gynecologists.

Sincerely yours,

Roger K. Evans
Director of Litigation

RKE/ts

cc: Jerry L. Short
Attorney for appellants

810 Seventh Avenue New York, New York 10019 212/541-7800 FAX 212/245-1845